NEW YORK, Nov. 9, 1905. Its 20th year of concert giving in New York was inaugurated by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Carnegie Hall tonight before one of the largest gatherings of its clientele which can be remembered. Seldom in its long record of important services to the cause of orchestral music here has this organization put such truly splendid playing to its credit.

[92]

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
EV'G POST
NOV 8 1905

Change in Programme.

It has been found necessary to make a slight change in the programme of the New York concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for next Saturday afternoon. The second number, instead of being the Bacchanale and Duet from the first act of "Tannhauser," will be merely the bacchanale, and the third number will be Elisabeth's aria from the opening of the second act. The rest of the programme is unchanged.

Vincent d'Indy.

Monsieur Vincent d'Indy, the distinguished French composer, who is to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a series of its concerts, will sail from Cherbourg on the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse on Wednesday, November 15, and is therefore expected to arrive in New York on Tuesday, November 21. Monsieur d'Indy will conduct the concerts in Boston on December 1 and 2, and the concerts in New York on December 7 and 9, as well as concerts in that same week in Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, and Brooklyn. The interest which has been created by the coming of Monsieur d'Indy is most widespread, and his visit will be one of the most notable events of the season. His programme for the two New York concerts are composed entirely of modern French music. The numbers will include some works of his own and works by Chausson, Debussy, Dukas, and other men of that school.

Symphony Concert in Washington.

HERALD BUREAU,
No. 734 FIFTEENTH STREET, N. W.,
WASHINGTON, D. C., Tuesday.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, and with the assistance of Mme. Gadski, sang to an audience which filled the Columbia Theatre this afternoon, opened the concert season in Washington. The audience was large and contained representatives of the official, social and musical worlds of the National Capital. The programme was as follows: [illegible]

Mme. Gadski, resplendent in green net over green velvet and glittering ornaments in gems and silver, aroused great enthusiasm in Boston at the start of her amazing week's tour with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr Gericke's Wagner programme goes the rounds. It will reach New York for a last appearance, when Ellison Van Hoose will also assist.

MISIC IN MAINE.

PORTLAND, Me., November [illegible]

Music lovers in Maine suffered a slight reaction after the musical excitement of the Chapman festival. This is a natural consequence, no doubt. Of unusual interest to music lovers is the late announcement of the Ellis course of concerts to take place in City Hall on the dates Wednesdays, November 22, December 13, January 3, January 24 and February 7. An exceedingly attractive list of artists is announced, containing the following names: Madame Schumann-Heink, assisted by the Boston Symphony Quartet; Madame Gadski, Madame Rider-Kelsey, Marie Hall, Olga Samaroff, Laura Hawkins, Myron W. Whitney, Jr., Prof. Willy Hess, Longy Club, of Boston, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Wilhelm Gericke conductor (two concerts). In no way is this more interesting and to be looked forward to than that it affords Portland another favorable opportunity to listen to and enjoy the exceedingly artistic singing of Madame Rider-Kelsey, who made a most favorable impression at the Maine Music Festival this season.

The Boston Symphony Quartet announces that it will give three concerts in Mendelssohn Hall this winter, the dates being January 2, February 6, and March 7. As its name implies, it is an integral part of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, its members all being players of the principal string instruments in the parent organization. It is composed of Prof. Willy Hess, first violin; Mr. Otto Roth, second violin; Mr. Emile Ferir, viola; and Mr. Heinrich Warnke, 'cello.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau of the World

Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester.

Das Bostoner Symphonieorchester gab gestern Abend in Carnegie Hall sein erstes New Yorker Konzert in dieser Saison, und ein fast gänzlich gefülltes Haus begrüßte die willkommenen Gäste. Wäre der Solist eine Berühmtheit gewesen, würden wahrscheinlich auch die letzten Plätze im Saale verkauft gewesen sein.

Das Programm bot zwar nichts Neues dar, gewährte aber dem ausgezeichneten Orchester hinreichende Gelegenheit, sich von seiner virtuosen Seite zu zeigen. Tschaikowsky und Richard Strauß sind sicherlich nicht unter die Lieblings-Komponisten des Herrn Gericke zu zählen, aber man muß dem Dirigenten nachsagen, daß er sich gestern Abend Mühe gab, dem Orchester die nöthige Freiheit in der Tonentfaltung zu lassen, um „Tod und Verklärung" und die vierte Symphonie (in F-moll) nicht zu zahm klingen zu machen. Man kann nichts gegen seine innerste Natur unternehmen, und Herr Gericke steht nach Temperamentanlage und Gewöhnung der neuen Musik so fern, wie das einem modernen Menschen nur möglich ist; persönlich verdient er also Anerkennung dafür daß er im Emotionellen gestern Abend wirklich weiter als gewöhnlich ging. Aber man kann doch nicht umhin, sich wiederum die Frage vorzulegen, was für eine Ausführung dieses Orchester der Strauß'sche Tondichtung „Tod und Verklärung" bereiten könnte, wenn es dem Stabe eines Dirigenten folgte, der durchaus in Sympathie mit den Modernen ist. Selbst wenn Herr Gericke seinen Leuten eine gewisse Freiheit gestattet, wie er das gestern that, so kommt doch bei einem Tongemälde wie „Tod und Verklärung", wo Alles unkontrollirter Impuls zu sein scheint, wo beim Komponisten der Gedanke kaum ausgedacht war, als er bereits musikalische Form angenommen hatte, unter seiner Leitung etwas Reflektirtes in den Vortrag, das abkühlen muß. Die musikalische Genauigkeit allein thut's nun einmal nicht.

Außer den beiden genannten Werken spielte das Orchester auch noch die „Akademische Ouverture" von Brahms. Wie gesagt, die Orchesterleistung, objektiv betrachtet, war wieder eine unübertreffliche, und die New Yorker waren froh, daß sie wieder einmal das Beste, das von Boston kommt, bei sich zu Gaste hatten.

Als Solist trat der neue erste Cellist des Orchesters, Herr Heinrich Warnke, auf. Trotz seines respektablen Könnens muß gesagt werden, daß die Linie Schroeder-Krasselt-Warnke denn doch eine absteigende ist. Man konnte über den vorjährigen Cellisten nicht in Enthusiasmus gerathen, über den diesjährigen aber noch weniger. Warnke ist gewiß ein tüchtiger Musiker, er besitzt auch eine ansehnliche Technik und keinen üblen Ton, aber von der sublimen Künstlerschaft, die allein ein solch' widerhaariges Ding wie das Concert von Dvorak erfreulich machen kann, ist er ziemlich weit entfernt. Er hatte hübsche Momente, besonders im langsamen Satz, aber über den Schrecken der Cello-Technik, die im Dvorak'schen Concert noch dazu so wenig Cello-mäßig ist, weiß er nicht hinweg zu schmeicheln. Uebrigens hat er auch den empfindlichen technischen Mangel, daß er in den höheren Lagen häufig recht unrein spielt; zu loben ist eine gewisse Frische und Energie der Attacke im Passagenwerk.

Am Samstag Nachmittag giebt es ein Wagner-Programm mit Frau Gadski und van Hoose als Solisten.

THE BOSTON HERALD
NOVEMBER 10, 1905.

SYMPHONY IN NEW YORK.

[Special Dispatch to the Boston Herald.]

NEW YORK, Nov. 9, 1905. Its 20th year of concert giving in New York was inaugurated by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Carnegie Hall tonight before one of the largest gatherings of its clientele which can be remembered. Seldom in its long record of important services to the cause of orchestral music here has this organization put such truly splendid playing to its credit.

[92]

MUSIC AND DRAMA.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. William Gericke brought his excellent Boston Orchestra down to our Carnegie Hall last night and gave the first of the ten concerts we are to hear under his bâton. There was a large audience and much applause. Brahms, more beloved in Boston than in this frivolous town, came first, with one of his most human pieces, the Academic Overture, in which German student songs supply the melodic element in which that great master of technique is apt to be deficient. The orchestra played it in the true Brahms spirit.

Dvorák's violoncello concerto, which followed the overture, served to introduce to Gothamites the Boston band's new 'cellist, Heinrich Warnke, concerning whom Philip Hale supplies this information: "He was born at Wesselburen, a few miles from the German Ocean, on August 30, 1871. His father was a violinist and all his sons are musicians. Mr. Warnke began to study the pianoforte when he was six years old, and when he was ten, his father began to give his violoncello lessons. Two years later, the boy was sent to the Conservatory of Music in Hamburg, where he studied with Gowa, and it was there that he first played in public. He afterwards studied at Leipsic with Julius Klengel, and made his début at the Gewand House. He has been associated with orchestras in Baden-Baden and Frankfurt-on-the-Main. Eight years ago, Felix Weingartner invited him to be first violoncellist of the Kaim Orchestra at Munich and he left that orchestra to take the like position in the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as successor to Mr. Rudolf Krasselt, whom he taught. In Munich, he was associated with Messrs. Rettich and Weingartner in a trio club, and he was also a member of a quartet." Of a man with such antecedents, much was to be expected. If the highest expectations were not realized, this may have been due partly to nervousness, partly to the extreme difficulty of the concerto chosen by him. While written in this country during Dvorák's three years' residence here as director of the National Conservatory, it is not equal in inspiration to the other works the great Bohemian composed on American soil, and there is much in the two allegro movements that is almost unplayable. The adagio shows his genius to better advantage; in this it was that Mr. Warnke revealed himself a master of his instrument, with a warm, rich tone, and genuine musical instincts. In the florid runs his intonation was not always pure. Mr. Warnke was warmly applauded and repeatedly recalled.

One thing the concerto called attention to, and that was Dvorák's superiority as a master of orchestration to Richard Strauss, whose "Death and Transfiguration" was the next number on the programme. It cannot be gainsaid that Strauss succeeds in this tone-poem in creating the moods suggested by the two words "Death" and "Transfiguration"; but he does this almost entirely by means of what might be called musical rhetoric, in the sense of artificial eloquence. Just as an eloquent minister or other speaker might stir an audience by his vocal modulations and vehemence, though he used a language not understood by his hearers, so Richard Strauss has a knack of deluding unsophisticated listeners into the belief that he is telling them something immensely exciting, when as a matter of fact he is not telling anything at all—i. e., has no melodic message to convey. To those who reject music not illumined by the divine spark of melody, these Strauss tone-poems are as hollow and offensive as the ranting of an unintelligent actor.

For his final and chief number Mr. Gericke chose Tchaikovsky's fourth symphony. Apart from the first movement, which is too long and labored, what a contrast this music presents to Strauss's—how it bubbles over with melody! Here we have sparkling champagne in place of stale beer. How sweetly melancholy the andantino! How gay, almost supernaturally weird the scherzo, with its pizzicato obstinato turning the whole string band into an intoxicated guitar! How wildly Russian the final allegro con fuoco! If some of the Cossack fury escaped the Boston players, they were simply perfect in the slow movement and the scherzo. Such precision is fabulous—a triumph for conductor and orchestra alike.

Every year at the first Boston Symphony concert of the season, New York music lovers congratulate one another that such an orchestra is to be heard on this side of the Atlantic. Last night at Carnegie Hall the ninety-six musicians, headed by Wilhelm Gericke, gave a superb exhibition of their precision, their vitality, their nobility of tone, their abundant nervous energy.

In the Brahms "Academic" overture the psychic effect was akin to that produced by a trio of splendidly handled fire engine horses, combining the freest individual initiative with the closest unity of purpose. So, here, did the orchestral choirs leap and thunder. The Richard Strauss "Death and Transfiguration" went boldly, but the feature of the evening, on the technical side, was the scherzo of Tschaikowsky's fourth symphony, in which the pizzicato notes of the strings, against the background of clean-cut brass and wood wind passages, shone like showers of sparks.

Verily, the summer's rest has refreshed Mr. Gericke and his men. Except for two slight slips by one of the horns the performances were without flaw. And it was not merely dazzling, this exhibition of technical proficiency. Rather was it used to bring out the musical significance of what was played. It would be hard to recall a more eloquent reading of the Brahms "Academic" overture, while in the Strauss tone poem, Mr. Gericke, who sometimes has lacked emotional vigor, gave of his best. The Tschaikowsky symphony has sounded more poignant, more heart searching, but never clearer or more sensuously beautiful. The fine audience applauded with cordial unanimity.

A new first 'cellist, Heinrich Warnke, has come to the orchestra, and last night he played Dvorak's long and only intermittently inspired concerto in B minor. His tone seemed superficial, but he showed musicianly qualities.

Three world-musicians in our time have appeared in bodily form at New York's Carnegie Hall. Tschaikowsky, Dvorák and Richard Strauss alone among the giants are more than a name. They have been seen by the deafest inhabitant who is not also blind. So there was a strange living interest in the programme with which Wilhelm Gericke in his most genial mood opened the twnty-fifth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and its twentieth in New York, at Carnegie Hall last evening.

With the well-chosen Brahms "Academic" overture for joyful prelude, the "prima donna" orchestra presented Dvorak's 'cello concerto, Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration" and Tschaikowsky's symphony No. 4. A gilt-edged audience, built up in all these years out of individually sound music-lovers without the chaff of sensational or sentimental personalities, packed the hall. The performance, as usual, was the refinement of art in its way, and after the Russian composer's scherzo, that stirring "Pizzicato ostinato," the conductor opened his arms and signalled all his men to rise with him and bow.

In these busy times, when some new orchestra is forming about every second day, it was a welcome sight to see the familiar heads—some bald heads, too—of Mr. Higginson's famous Boston band, piloted again to Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington, Brooklyn and New York by that human headlight of good humor, Mr. F. R. Comee. From Gericke's averted Olympian calm to the first night tremor of Heinrich Warnke and the half dozen other new men, the public greeting was that given to old friends like Willy Hess, Georges Longy and others, never forgetting the picturesque third double bass.

The 'cellist, Mr. Warnke, was a most presentable person of manly bearing and artistic self-sufficiency. If the human-voiced 'cello and the inhuman "concerto" form are, as Mr. Richard Aldrich has declared, a case of incompatibility of temper, at least there were some highly pleasing sounds interspersed among the kakophonies. It was only too much of a good thing.

The Richard Strauss mountain came to its musical Mohammed like cooing doves and bleating lambs, for no American orchestra can draw the lightning of harmony from Strauss's great scoring as can the wise men from Boston. It is the thunder that they miss.

Johanna Gadski late this afternoon will come flying from a Philadelphia concert to sing with the Boston Orchestra in Brooklyn to-night, when last evening's overture and symphony are to be repeated with other numbers. To-morrow, after the Carnegie Hall matinée, she goes flying back for a Quaker Saturday night with Fritz Scheel's orchestra again. Four concerts of first magnitude in two short days. Who can doubt that such energy still belongs in the class of the youngest of the prima donnas?

EVG. TELEGRAM
NOV 10 1905

...ncert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra

...Boston Symphony comes ...one may be excused from ...interest in even municipal ...whatever individual or detail ...ments there may be—one cannot ...ection all the time out of Boston—at least there is always a fine finish, ...one may forget that it is a band of ...ings of 'cellos, of woodwinds, of brasses, ...tympani; here one may think of a ...voice of marvellous range and color, ...ayed by a dominating musical intelli-...

...e concert last night, the first of the ...son, drew out the usually large and dis-...inating audience. It served to intro-...ce a new member of the organization, ...r. Heinrich Warnke, whose playing in ...Dvorak concerto in B minor made a ...ndly favorable impression.

...Warnke is an artist of ability, a ...who understands his most remark-...instrument, but one would not want ...that last night's work was a fair ...ple of what he can do. Nervous, ...ver, as he was, there was evident a ...command over what is undoubtedly ...nearest instrumental approach to the ...man voice. Mr. Gericke held a master ...and over him, to which one might lay an ...ting lack of variety in the tempo, but ...not excuse the absence of what one ...ked for in the concerto, a contagious ...abandon, a compelling fire.

The most impressive number of the pro...gramme was the Strauss tone poem ...Death and Transfiguration." We are all ...children, with the story loving instinct ...strong in us, and the story told in this won...derful work stirs and holds the imagina...tion. It is an interpretation of life and ...death—themes that enlist mankind in every ...e. This particular story is told in the ...musical language of our day, and its un...derlying note with terrific detail, is—nerves.

Tschaikowsky's symphony in F minor (No. 4) concluded the programme. The themes are melodious, so much so that one might easily understand that one of them is an actual transcription of a Russian bargeman's refrain. Yet so wonderfully are they handled and interwoven by Tschaikowsky that it is difficult to say the fourth ranks below the fifth symphony.

The second part, andantino in modo di canzona, with its three contrasted themes, was performed with admirable precision. The last movement in F was played with even more appreciation, and the effect was electric. It is all brilliancy, all—one might say talk—it is not deep. Constructively only does it take a high place, but the masterful variation of familiar themes atones for all. It was a fitting climax for a splendid programme.

SUSANNE HALPREN.

Miss Susanne Halpren, of the "Fritz in Tammany" company, has recently come into a fortune. The press agent stands for this—the story, not the money.

New York Times
NOV 10 1905

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA RETURNS

First Concert of Its Series in Carnegie Hall.

WARNKE, NEW 'CELLIST, PLAYS

Brahms's Academic Overture, Strauss's Tone Poem, and Tschaikowsky's Favorite Symphony Heard.

Such an audience as greeted the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening on its first reappearance represents the finest taste and musical cultivation of New York, and it is the distinction of this orchestra, under Mr. Gericke's direction, that it appeals to such an aristocracy of intelligence. It was a delight to hear the orchestra again in all its transcendent beauty of tone and impeccable finish. It never sounded more beautiful than it did last evening to ears fresh for its offerings. There was nothing new upon the programme, but the music, all of the modern spirit in different manifestations, was given a new meaning and new freshness by its performance. There was Brahms's Academic overture, with its brilliantly ingenious employment of German students' songs; Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," and Tschaikowsky's favorite symphony. Mr. Heinrich Warnke, the new first 'cellist of the orchestra, made his first appearance in New York, playing Dvorak's 'cello concerto, Opus 104.

Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration" impresses itself more and more as a work of profound poetic beauty and eloquence. It is essentially musical in all its traits, and the means that the composer has employed to illustrate his programme are beautiful and impressive as music. It is not long since this piece was characterized as "charnel house music," but it seems now to have a meaning much higher than the crass significance this description would give it. Mr. Gericke's reading of it was instinct with poetry and imagination, free and unrestrained in the climaxes. It is such a reading as this that makes clear all the instrumental complexities of Strauss's orchestral style, and impresses its poetic significance, which are easily missed by less sympathetic and technically perfect playing.

Mr. Gericke is perhaps less successful in identifying himself with the spirit of Tschaikowsky. The fourth symphony has been somewhat unduly overshadowed by the fifth and sixth; it is music of intensely characteristic spirit, and needs the greatest freedom and fantasy in its interpretation. Needless to say that there was the fullest color and most skillful manipulation of the gleaming instrumental tints, but the music calls for more freedom of tempo, a greater modification in the spirit of the different thematic material, a more complete sensing of all its changing moods.

Mr. Warnke played Dvorak's concerto with the skill and finish of an accomplished artist. It did not appear that he reached the high level of some recent occupants of his place in the orchestra, either in tone or in the freedom and breadth of style. The concerto is exceedingly difficult, and it shares with most others of its kind the wearisome antics and unnatural paces through which one of the noblest and most dignified of instruments is put. The idea of a concerto and the nature of the 'cello are incompatible, incommensurable, and few 'cellists are at ease in trying to reconcile them. There are musical beauties in the work, especially in the slow movement and in the first, when the orchestra is allowed to set them forth. But it is too long and the listener's patience is sorely tried before Dvorak has reached the end of his third movement. Mr. Warnke played with fluency and intelligence, with elegance and flexibility of bowing. He was not always certain of his intonation in the highest positions.

EW YORK WORLD
NOV 10 1905

BOSTON SYMPHONY OPENS 20TH SEASON.

Herr Warnke, First 'Cellist, from Munich, Makes His First Appearance Here.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra inaugurated its twentieth New York season with last night's concert at Carnegie Hall. The occasion also served to introduce to the New York public a new soloist, Heinrich Warnke, the orchestra's first 'cellist. Mr. Warnke is a new acquisition, having until recently been the first 'cello player in the Kaim Orchestra of Munich.

Mr. Warnke's solo number last night was the Dvorak Concerto, a work that has been heard here before, one in which the contents are for the most part dreary and for the rest exceedingly difficult. The new 'cellist did not give a very satisfying performance of this composition, his deviations from pitch being frequent and his tone not luscious. The soloist's entire performance sounded as though the performer was suffering from nervousness.

The orchestra under Mr. Gericke's baton filled in the balance of the evening with Brahms's "Academic Overture," Richard Strauss's tone poem "Death and Transfiguration," and Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony. It seemed that last evening Herr Gericke loosened his customary attitude of restraint, allowing his men greater freedom in the volume of tone. This was especially noticeable in the Brahms Overture. Of the wonderful tonal quality and refinement of the orchestra there is nothing new to be said. The glorious attributes were again set forth in last evening's concert, yet Mr. Gericke's reading of the Strauss number was lacking in emotional surge, and that of the Tschaikowsky symphony was devoid of that brutality that accents this composer's works and stamps them with characteristic Russian individuality.

The audience was large.

GLOBE
...YORK ...ADVERTISER
NOV ... 1905

MUSICAL NOTES

HEINRICH WARNKE.

THE vocabulary of praise has time and again been taxed to the utmost in characterizing the excellences of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. All who care for music know that to-day it stands as a virtuoso among orchestras. In its opening concert, at Carnegie Hall, last night, its virtuosity stood ..., not for its own sake, but as the fitting ...d seemingly inevitable vehicle of the ...music played. You forgot that strings do ...not always sing with warmth and smoothness, that brasses are not necessarily ...mellow as well as strong, that other wood winds sometimes wheeze untunefully. For the time being you accepted the technical ...expertness of the several choirs and the ...wonderful fusion of their blended voices ...as the most natural thing in the world. For once an orchestra played so well that ...the listener could take the performance ...for granted and remember only composer ...and composition.

...Seldom has Brahms's "Academic Overture" been so thoroughly enjoyable as it ...was yesterday. Seldom has a tone-poem ...of Richard Strauss seemed so little a mere orgy of sound as did "Death and Transfiguration." Mr. Gericke read the tone-poem with an intellectual force and ...restraint that untangled its intricacies ...and kept it clear in its wildest fortissimos. One could easily see why "Death and Transfiguration" is as yet probably the most genuinely liked and widely accepted of Strauss's tone-poems. It was ...well, too, to hear Tschaikowsky's Fourth ...Symphony again, somewhat overshadowed ...as it is by the more famous Fifth and ...Sixth. The orchestra played it with ...splendid energy for the resounding outbursts and plaintive delicacy for the lyric ...passages. Once only did the technical ...limitations of the hand cease to exist as ...obstacles and demand recognition on its own account. The "Pizzicato ostinato" is such a show piece for orchestra as any bit of bravura could be for a ...violin or piano. The players were right ...on the conductor's signal to take ...only the applause that answered ...their virtuosity.

...Another virtuoso has entered ...with Heinrich Warnke, the new ...'cellist of the orchestra, who made ...his appearance in New York, playing ...Dvorak's B minor concerto. Mr. ...Warnke's skill, like that of the ...orchestra, is enough to be regarded ...with an end. Mr. ...Warnke's concerto with ...the orchestra sounded ...unconventional ...and technical difficulty, and found, in spite of the composer's sometimes too obvious efforts to exploit the possibilities of the 'cello as a solo instrument, the genuine beauty and charm of the work itself. Some 'cellists have played here with a larger and riper tone than Mr. Warnke revealed, but few with so clean a technique or so fine and sensitive a restraint. The often unsatisfactory quality of Mr. Warnke's tone in the higher registers, as against its fulness and warmth lower down, suggest that the admirable player is hampered with an inferior instrument. Aside from this drawback, his playing was worthy of the orchestra he has come among.

NEW YORK HERALD
NOV 10 1905

Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert.

Its twentieth year of concert giving in New York was inaugurated by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall last night before one of the largest and most brilliant gatherings of its clientele that can be remembered.

Last night's programme was a rather longer list than Mr. Gericke is accustomed to present. It opened with Brahms' "Academic" Overture, contained Dvorak's B minor concerto for violoncello and Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," and closed with Tschaikowsky's fourth symphony.

To say which of these was played with greatest finish or most delightful spirit would be difficult. That most pains had been lavished on the huge Strauss score was evident. Here the climaxes of tone were superb, the contrasted quiet passages of wondrous beauty, and the whole web of instrumentation was dexterously woven.

It was after the dainty third movement of the symphony that the audience was most roused to applause, and here the players had to stand in a body to acknowledge the tribute paid them.

As the soloist of the evening, the new principal 'cellist, Mr. Heinrich Warnke, made his first appearance, playing the Dvorak concerto.

It must be confessed that Mr. Warnke proved somewhat disappointing. Beautiful in quality his tone was, and his style nearly always possessed elegance, but at moments of stress, especially in high flights, his sense of pitch deserted him once or twice.

[93]

...m THE MORNING TELEGRAPH
...dress NOV 10 1905

BOSTON SYMPHONY OPENS ITS SEASON

Mr. Gericke's Musicians Give Beautiful Rendering of Richard Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration."

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the first performance of its New York season last night at Carnegie Hall. The noble organization was at its most vigorous and best, and Mr. Gericke conducted in his usual convincing manner.

The programme included Brahms' Academic Overture and Tschaikowsky's fourth symphony.

The rest of the evening the great orchestra spent in supplying a musical landscape, with Mr. Heinrick Warnke continuously, oh, so continuously, in the foreground.

In other words, the orchestra and Mr. Warnke, as soloist, played violoncello concerto by Dvorak which was half as long as time. Full justice, however, must be done to Mr. Warnke. He is a 'cellist without one redeeming fault.

He is accurate, he is precise, and he is mathematical. He is above mere emotion, and he would scorn to make an appeal to the more human heart.

Those who like the animated ice box in art, and prefer the harsh outlines of geometrical figures to the creations of a Rafael—why, Mr. Warnke is the sort of thing they like.

Strauss' sublime tone-poem, "Death and Transfiguration," is an attempt to depict in music the thoughts, the memories and the sufferings of a man upon his death bed. It is one of the grandest things in modern art. Whatever in it was difficult, whatever in it was obscure, was made forever clear by Mr. Gericke's just conception and perfect rendering.

A. ST. J.-B.

EVG. TELEGRAM

NOV

First Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

WHEN the Boston Symphony comes to town, one may be excused from taking interest in even municipal contests. Whatever individual or detail disappointments there may be—one cannot get perfection all the time out of Boston—here at least there is always a fine finish, here one may forget that it is a band of violins, of 'cellos, of woodwinds, of brasses, of tympani; here one may think of a voice of marvellous range and color, swayed by a dominating musical intelligence.

The concert last night, the first of the season, drew out the usually large and discriminating audience. It served to introduce a new member of the organization, Mr. Heinrich Warnke, whose playing in the Dvorak concerto in B minor made a decidedly favorable impression.

Mr. Warnke is an artist of ability, a man who understands his most remarkable instrument, but one would not want to say that last night's work was a fair example of what he can do. Nervous, however, as he was, there was evident a subtle command over what is undoubtedly the nearest instrumental approach to the human voice. Mr. Gericke held a master hand over him, to which one might lay an irritating lack of variety in the tempo, but did not excuse the absence of what one looked for in the concerto, a contagious abandon, a compelling fire.

The most impressive number of the programme was the Strauss tone poem "Death and Transfiguration." We are all children, with the story loving instinct strong in us, and the story told in this wonderful work stirs and holds the imagination. It is an interpretation of life and death—themes that enlist mankind in every age. This particular story is told in the musical language of our day, and its underlying note with terrific detail, is—nerves.

Tschaikowsky's symphony in F minor (No. 4) concluded the programme. The themes are melodious, so much so that one might easily understand that one of them is an actual transcription of a Russian bargeman's refrain. Yet so wonderfully are they handled and interwoven by Tschaikowsky that it is difficult to say the fourth ranks below the fifth symphony.

The second part, andantino in modo di canzona, with its three contrasted themes, was performed with admirable precision. The last movement in F was played with even more appreciation, and the effect was electric. It is all brilliancy, all—one might say talk—it is not deep. Constructively only does it take a high place, but the masterful variation of familiar themes atones for all. It was a fitting climax for a splendid programme.

"SUSANNE HALPREN."

Miss Susanne Halpren, of the "Fritz in Tammany" company, has recently come into a fortune. The press agent stands for this—the story, not the money.

MUSICAL NOTES

HEINRICH WARNKE.

THE vocabulary of praise has time and again been taxed to the utmost in characterizing the excellences of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. All who care for music know that to-day it stands as a virtuoso among orchestras. In its opening concert, at Carnegie Hall, last night, its virtuosity stood out, not for its own sake, but as the fitting and seemingly inevitable vehicle of the music played. You forgot that strings do not always sing with warmth and smoothness, that brasses are not necessarily mellow as well as strong, that other wood winds sometimes wheeze untunefully. For the time being you accepted the technical expertness of the several choirs and the wonderful fusion of their blended voices as the most natural thing in the world. For once an orchestra played so well that the listener could take the performance for granted and remember only composer and composition.

Seldom has Brahms's "Academic Overture" been so thoroughly enjoyable as it was yesterday. Seldom has a tone-poem of Richard Strauss seemed so little a mere orgy of sound as did "Death and Transfiguration." Mr. Gericke read the tone-poem with an intellectual force and a restraint that untangled its intricacies and kept it clear in its wildest fortissimos. One could easily see why "Death and Transfiguration" is as yet probably the most genuinely liked and widely accepted of Strauss's tone-poems. It was good, too, to hear Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony again, somewhat overshadowed as it is by the more famous Fifth and Sixth. The orchestra played it with splendid energy for the resounding outbursts and plaintive delicacy for the lyric passages. Once only did the technical brilliance of the band cease to exist as a means and demand recognition on its own account. The "Pizzicato ostinato" is as much a show piece for orchestra as any gay bit of bravura could be for a florid soprano. The players were right in rising at the conductor's signal to take in a body the applause that answered their virtuosity.

And now another virtuoso has entered their ranks—Heinrich Warnke, the new first 'cellist of the orchestra, who made his initial appearance in New York, playing Dvorak's B minor concerto. Mr. Warnke's technical skill, like that of the orchestra, is great enough to be regarded as a means rather than an end. Mr. Warnke played the Dvorak concerto with [illegible] less apparent effort than some [illegible] have that one forgot its occasional [illegible] and its deliberate technical difficulty, and found, in spite of the composer's sometimes too obvious efforts to exploit the possibilities of the 'cello as a solo instrument, the genuine beauty and charm of the work itself. Some 'cellists have played here with a larger and riper tone than Mr. Warnke revealed, but few with so clean a technique or so fine and sensitive a restraint. The often unsatisfactory quality of Mr. Warnke's tone in the higher registers, as against its fulness and warmth lower down, suggest that the admirable player is hampered with an inferior instrument. Aside from this drawback, his playing was worthy of the orchestra he has come among.

s

NOV 1 0 1901

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA RETURNS

First Concert of Its Series in Carnegie Hall.

WARNKE, NEW 'CELLIST, PLAYS

Brahms's Academic Overture, Strauss's Tone Poem, and Tschaikowsky's Favorite Symphony Heard.

Such an audience as greeted the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening on its first reappearance represents the finest taste and musical cultivation of New York, and it is the distinction of this orchestra, under Mr. Gericke's direction, that it appeals to such an aristocracy of intelligence. It was a delight to hear the orchestra again in all its transcendent beauty of tone and impeccable finish. It never sounded more beautiful than it did last evening to ears fresh for its offerings. There was nothing new upon the programme, but the music, all of the modern spirit in different manifestations, was given a new meaning and new freshness by its performance. There was Brahms's Academic overture, with its brilliantly ingenious employment of German students' songs; Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," and Tschaikowsky's favorite symphony. Mr. Heinrich Warnke, the new first 'cellist of the orchestra, made his first appearance in New York, playing Dvorak's 'cello concerto, Opus 104.

Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration" impresses itself more and more as a work of profound poetic beauty and eloquence. It is essentially musical in all its traits, and the means that the composer has employed to illustrate his programme are beautiful and impressive as music. It is not long since this piece was characterized as "charnel house music," but it seems now to have a meaning much higher than the crass significance this description would give it. Mr. Gericke's reading of it was instinct with poetry and imagination, free and unrestrained in the climaxes. It is such a reading as this that makes clear all the instrumental complexities of Strauss's orchestral style, and impresses its poetic significance, which are easily missed by less sympathetic and technically perfect playing.

Mr. Gericke is perhaps less successful in identifying himself with the spirit of Tschaikowsky. The fourth symphony has been somewhat unduly overshadowed by the fifth and sixth; it is music of intensely characteristic spirit, and needs the greatest freedom and fantasy in its interpretation. Needless to say that there was the fullest color and most skillful manipulation of the gleaming instrumental tints, but the music calls for more freedom of tempo, a greater modification in the spirit of the different thematic material, a more complete sensing of all its changing moods.

Mr. Warnke played Dvorak's concerto with the skill and finish of an accomplished artist. It did not appear that he reached the high level of some recent occupants of his place in the orchestra, either in tone or in the freedom and breadth of style. The concerto is exceedingly difficult, and it shares with most others of its kind the wearisome antics and unnatural paces through which one of the noblest and most dignified of instruments is put. The idea of a concerto and the nature of the 'cello are incompatible, incommensurable, and few 'cellists are at ease in trying to reconcile them. There are musical beauties in the work, especially in the slow movement and in the first, when the orchestra is allowed to set them forth. But it is too long and the listener's patience is sorely tried before Dvorak has reached the end of his third movement. Mr. Warnke played with fluency and intelligence, with elegance and flexibility of bowing. He was not always certain of his intonation in the highest positions.

ss

NOV

BOSTON SYMPHONY OPENS 20TH SEASON.

Herr Warnke, First 'Cellist, from Munich, Makes His First Appearance Here.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra inaugurated its twentieth New York season with last night's concert at Carnegie Hall. The occasion also served to introduce to the New York public a new soloist, Heinrich Warnke, the orchestra's first 'cellist. Mr. Warnke is a new acquisition, having until recently been the first 'cello player in the Kaim Orchestra of Munich.

Mr. Warnke's solo number last night was the Dvorak Concerto, a work that has been heard here before, one in which the contents are for the most part dreary and for the rest exceedingly difficult. The new 'cellist did not give a very satisfying performance of this composition, his deviations from pitch being frequent and his tone not luscious. The soloist's entire performance sounded as though the performer was suffering from nervousness.

The orchestra under Mr. Gericke's baton filled in the balance of the evening with Brahms's "Academic Overture," Richard Strauss's tone poem "Death and Transfiguration," and Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony. It seemed that last evening Herr Gericke loosened his customary attitude of restraint, allowing his men greater freedom in the volume of tone. This was especially noticeable in the Brahms Overture. Of the wonderful tonal quality and refinement of the orchestra there is nothing new to be said. The glorious attributes were again set forth in last evening's concert, yet Mr. Gericke's reading of the Strauss number was lacking in emotional surge, and that of the Tschaikowsky symphony was devoid of that brutality that accents this composer's works and stamps them with characteristic Russian individuality.

The audience was large.

om MORNING TELEGRAPH

ress OCT 20 1901

BOSTON SYMPHONY OPENS ITS SEASON

Mr. Gericke's Musicians Give Beautiful Rendering of Richard Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration."

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the first performance of its New York season last night at Carnegie Hall. The noble organization was at its most vigorous and best, and Mr. Gericke conducted in his usual convincing manner.

The programme included Brahms' Academic Overture and Tschaikowsky's fourth symphony.

The rest of the evening the great orchestra spent in supplying a musical landscape with Mr. Heinrich Warnke continuously, oh, so continuously, in the foreground.

In other words, the orchestra and Mr. Warnke, as soloist, played 'cello concerto by Dvorak which was half as long as time. Full justice, however, must be done to Mr. Warnke. He is a 'cellist without one redeeming fault.

He is accurate, he is precise, and he is mathematical. He is above mere emotion, and he would scorn to make an appeal to the more human hearts.

Those who like the announced box in art, and prefer the kaleidoscopic outlines of geometrical figures to the creations of a Rafael—why, Mr. Warnke is the sort of thing they like.

Strauss' sublime tone-poem, "Death and Transfiguration," is an attempt to depict in music the thoughts, the memories and the sufferings of a man upon his death bed. It is one of the grandest things in modern art. Whatever in it was difficult, whatever in it was obscure, was made forever clear by Mr. Gericke's just conception and perfect rendering.

A. ST. J.-B.

RALD

Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert.

Its twentieth year of concert giving in New York was inaugurated by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall last night before one of the largest and most brilliant gatherings of its clientele that can be remembered.

Last night's programme was a rather longer list than Mr. Gericke is accustomed to present. It opened with Brahms' "Academic" overture, contained Dvorak's B minor concerto for violoncello and Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," and closed with Tschaikowsky's fourth symphony.

To say which of these was played with greatest finish or most delightful spirit would be difficult. That most pains had been lavished on the huge Strauss score was evident. Here the climaxes of tone were superb, the contrasted quiet passages of wondrous beauty, and the whole web of instrumentation was dexterously woven.

It was after the dainty third movement of the symphony that the audience was most roused to applause, and here the players had to stand in a body to acknowledge the tribute paid them.

As the soloist of the evening the new principal 'cellist, Mr. Heinrich Warnke, made his first appearance, playing the Dvorak concerto.

It must be confessed that Mr. Warnke proved somewhat disappointing. Beautiful in quality his tone was, and his style nearly always possessed elegance, but at moments of stress, especially in high flights, his sense of pitch deserted him once or twice.

[93]

W YORK PRESS
NOV 10 1905

IN THE REALM OF MUSIC

Let New York's musical cohorts rejoice. The Boston Symphony Orchestra is with us again. Before an audience that filled Carnegie Hall from top to bottom that body of virtuosos last night opened its season of concerts with an energy and dash, with a splendid outpouring of music that was well-nigh irresistible. After the first number, Brahms's "Academic" overture, given with superb spirit and with a perfection of tonal beauty which was as elevating as it was astonishing, your true enthusiast might have jumped up in his chair and shouted with delight. But an exceedingly proper spirit prevails at Gericke's concerts, and whatever wild feelings may have sprung up were curbed. The result was only manual applause—strong, emphatic and prolonged, to be sure.

The second number of the programme, Dvorak's 'cello concerto in B minor, opus 104, brought forward as soloist Heinrich Warnke, the orchestra's new first 'cellist, this being his first appearance in New York. It was a foregone conclusion that Warnke would prove himself an admirable player and an excellent musician, for his career abroad and his reputation there were known. Nevertheless it is pleasant to be able to confirm outside reports. Warnke gave a musicianly and poetically eloquent interpretation of Dvorak's difficult work, if his performance did not have the abandonment and brilliancy that win frenzied approval from hysterical women. One cannot say that this 'cellist has the mellow tone or finished technique of Alwin Schroeder. Nevertheless Warnke is admirably equipped technically, and his tone, if a bit raspy at times, is manly and expressive. His playing of Cantilena was at once warm, tender and noble. It revealed the true character of the man, his healthy musical fervor and strength. Warnke was recalled repeatedly.

If Gericke's readings of Strauss's tone poems are not as realistic as that master of orchestral effect himself would have them, yet they are interesting expositions of these monstrously intricate scores. So last night it was fascinating and instructive to hear "Death and Transfiguration" performed in a way that laid bare every musical thread with astonishing clearness, though perfection of detail was often destructive to the emotional stress of certain passages. One missed the feverish ecstasy, the passionate outbursts, the swirl of excitement which the music itself contains in this striving for microscopic precision. Yet Gericke seemed to be in unusually good spirits, and put more dash into the performance than is his wont.

Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 4, in F minor, opus 36, a composition exceedingly familiar to New Yorkers, brought the evening to an impressive end.

At Saturday afternoon's concert the programme will be made up of Wagner music, in which the solo parts will be sung by Johanna Gadski and Ellison Von Hoose.

16 CITY

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA WINS 'FIRST NIGHTERS.'

Fashionables Throng Carnegie Hall, Laud Conductor Gericke and Enthuse Over the Work of His Musicians

It was the Boston Symphony Orchestra's first appearance of the season at Carnegie Hall last evening. Fashion was there; music had almost all its enthusiasts there.

They came early to applaud in advance the conductor, Wilhelm Gericke, whose face has the precise lines of mathematics; the concert master, Willy Hess, and the soloist of the concert, Heinrich Warnke.

Warnke played the violoncello of Dvorak's B minor concerto with a learning so grave, a sentiment so delicate, an art so individual, that it was easy to imagine that the violoncello is the most praiseworthy musical instrument in the world.

There was the academic overture of Brahms in which the joyfulness of German students is exhaled, and surely, no one ever heard the "Gaudeamus Egitur" played with a splendor comparable to that of Mr. Gericke's orchestra.

There was Richard Strauss's tone-poem, "Death and Transfiguration," which is as weird as the Dance of Death that was drawn in the margins of the Gothic Book of Hours. It was played so that one could let one's mind be diverted from the work's dreadful sadness to its complicated science.

There was Tschaikowsky's symphony in F minor. It had never a more ardent audience. The applause was entirely deserved. Those who said that the Boston Symphony Orchestra was excellent had afire of uttering a commonplace.

N. Y. EV'G WORLD
NOV 10 1905

GERICKE'S MEN WARMLY GREETED

Boston Symphony's First Concert, with Warnke, 'Cellist, as Soloist.

Just a coming into its own again was the Boston Symphony Orchestra's first concert of its twentieth season at Carnegie Hall last evening. There was a warm greeting for Mr. Gericke, and then, as he turned to his men for the opening bar, a settling down of the large audience to a realization of the fact that the music season of 1905-1906 was really begun.

How inspiring, though familiar, it was all! In the gayety of the Brahms "Academic Overture" at the start; through that lovely composition of Dvorak's, the 'cello concerto in B minor; passing on to the weird tone-poem of Richard Strauss, "Death and Transfiguration," and finishing with Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 4 in F minor, dedicated "To My Best Friend," the crispness, the coloring, the tone, the sonority—all the qualities that have made the band so famous were displayed at their best. The playing of the scherzo in the symphony brought out applause so extraordinary at these concerts that the whole orchestra had to rise and bow its acknowledgments.

Heinrich Warnke, lured away from Munich to be the new 'cellist of the organization, was the soloist. It may not be said that he wiped out the memories of his illustrious predecessor, Alwin Schroeder, but he showed musicianly qualities and is an expert performer, leaving something to be desired in sentiment and feeling.

The programme of the first matinee concert to-morrow is made up exclusively of Wagner's works, with Gadski and Ellison Van Hoose as soloists.

COMMERCIAL
NEW YORK CITY

The programme of the Boston Symphony concert contained much that was interesting, and at least one movement of the symphony that was delightful. Brahms' Academic Overture, written as a return compliment to the University of Breslau for presenting him with the honorary degree of Ph. D., opened the concert; Dvorak's concerto for 'cello, written in this country with the assistance of Alwyn Schroeder, who played it at its first hearing here, was played last night by Heinrich Warnke, the first 'cellist of the orchestra, and Richard Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration," the third of his seven tone-poems, was played in quicker tempo than that of Emil Paur. If I remember aright, it was Mr. Gericke who, when he became the musical godfather of the Boston Symphony, banished the cornets and installed trumpets in their place. In the Strauss tone-poem the trumpets proclaimed their note of triumph with great forcefulness and beauty of tone.

Tschaikowski's Fourth Symphony, which brought the concert to a close, was played superbly. It was the Scherzo, that wonderful whirr of picked strings, that I referred to as the joy-giving symphony movement. As a reward for the perfect way in which it was played, the auditors insisted upon calling the entire orchestra to its feet to bow its acknowledgments.

To-morrow Mr. Gericke will present a [illegible] programme. F. D.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
NEW YORK PRESS
NOV 1 1905

At the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert this afternoon in Carnegie Hall, the programme will be made up entirely of Wagner music. The numbers announced are the "Huldigungsmarsch," the Bacchanale from "Tannhauser" and Elizabeth's greeting from the second act of that opera; the Prize Song from "Die Meistersinger," and excerpts from "Goetterdaemmerung," comprising Siegfried's Parting from Brunhilde, Siegfried's Death and Funeral March and the closing scene of the music drama. The soloists will be Gadski and Ellison Van Hoose.

From NEW YORK SUN
Address NOV 10 1905
Date

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

BEGINS ITS TWENTIETH SEASON IN THIS CITY.

Heinrich Warnke, the New First 'Cellist, Is the Soloist—A Programme Made of the Music of the Present With a Touch of the Music of the Future.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the first concert of its twentieth season in this city at Carnegie Hall last night. The programme consisted of the "Academic Festival" overture of Brahms, Dvorák's 'cello concerto, "Death and Transfiguration," by Richard Strauss, and Tschaikowsky's fourth symphony. The soloist was Heinrich Warnke, the new first 'cellist of the orchestra.

It was a programme of the music of today that Mr. Gericke gave us, with just a dash of the music of the future. It is the fashion now to speak of the compositions of Richard Strauss as the music of the future, because Wagner is such an old story, don't you know, and so deliciously simple and naïve in comparison with the tone photographer of Munich.

Some people are wondering since they heard the "Symphonia Domestica" whether the work of Strauss has not already become the music of the past. Even his devoted admirer, Ernest Newman, felt constrained to say of it that he took it to be the work of a clever man who was once a genius.

But let that pass. The "Death and Transfiguration" is now common ground. We may shudder at the crass realism of it all, and wonder why a composer should practise a sort of psychological vivisection, but we cannot and need not deny the masterful skill in the construction of the work, nor the impressiveness of the climacteric development of the transfiguration motive at the end.

After we have done all that, those of us who have not yet conceded the ultimate victory of the Strauss ideal may rest in the secure conclusion that this, too, is the work of a vastly clever man who probably never was a genius. The composition was beautifully played by Mr. Gericke's men last night—perhaps a little too beautifully.

There is more blood in the work than the amiable Mr. Gericke cared to shed. He always flows with milk and honey, and he has no use for the vinegar and gall of Strauss. He spared us much of the raucousness of the dying struggle, but to do that is to beg the question, which at the best can hardly be regarded as the duty of a faithful interpreter.

The Tschaikowsky symphony is a tried and true friend, not one of the great utterances of the powerful Russian, but one of his most ingratiating. Here again one longed for a little more rudeness, for your Muscovite bear growls not honestly when he fears to affright the ladies. But the dainty pizzicato ostinato was a triumph of orchestral virtuosity as tinkled out by the gentlemen of Boston.

Brahms's "Academic" overture is always agreeable and university men get a pleasant shock when they hear the unexpected "Lauriger Horatius." The composition went well last night. Throughout the orchestral numbers went the unfailing clarity and purity of tone, the nicety of balance and the certainty of technic which make the playing of this orchestra an unceasing joy.

The new 'cellist is a decided acquisition to the organization. He is a player of solid merit, with a beautiful tone, a well developed technic and a genuinely musical style. He is perhaps not a virtuoso of the very first rank, but such a player is not required for his position in the orchestra. It was not his fault, furthermore, that some passages in the Dvorak concerto sounded strained and unmusical.

The amiable Bohemian composer in striving for brilliancy kept the solo voice too much of the time in the high positions of the first string. Now a 'cello is not a violin, and if you try to make one of it the instrument will turn and rend not only you but also euphony.

Mr. Warnke disposed of the difficult passages with skill. That he could not make them sound beautiful was their fault, not his. He played the slow movement exquisitely, and that after all is the true test of 'cello playing. The instrument reluctantly enters into the colorature caperings of a soprano voice.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
NEW YORK SUN
NOV 12 1905

One of the most interesting concerts of the season will be given by the Longy Club of Boston, in Mendelssohn Hall on Tuesday evening, December 19. The Longy Club is composed of the principal players of wind instruments in the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and takes its name from its leader, M. Georges Longy, the first oboe of the parent organization. Although it has been in existence for five years, this will be its formal début in New York, its only other appearance in this city having been made several seasons ago in the Lyceum Theatre at a special matinée.

From N. Y. TRIBUNE
Address
Date NOV 10 1905

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra began its twentieth season of concerts in New-York at Carnegie Hall last night, and incidentally introduced one of its new members in the character of a solo performer. This was Mr. Heinrich Warnke, the principal violoncello player of the organization, who played Dvorak's concerto in B minor. So far as a work which is so deficient in virility as this concerto (the melodious charm of which is not called in question) permitted him to do so, Mr. Warnke displayed a fine and manly style, free from affectation or claptrap of any kind, a full, round tone and exceptional taste. Slips of intonation in the passions in which they occurred last night call for little comment. It is so difficult to play high up (or down) on the 'cello's fingerboard that an expression of Dr. Johnson's pious wish, "Would to God, sir, it were impossible!" always seems justinable. But Mr. Warnke's playing was not the chief delight of last night's concert. That came from the marvellous euphony of the band in all its numbers—the "Academic Overture" by Brahms, Richard Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration" and Tschaikowsky's F minor symphony (the first movement of which, to have it in harmony with the composer's fatalistic interpretation, we could have wished in a slightly slower tempo). Mr. Gericke deserves as much immortality as the memory of all his hearers can give him for the lessons in pure musical beauty which are a part and parcel of every one of his concerts.

From N. Y. TRIBUNE
Address
Date NOV 12 1905

MUSIC.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for this season took place in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. The programme was composed wholly of music by Wagner, and only the first number, the "March of Homage," had a legitimate place in a concert scheme in New-York where Wagner's dramatic music is heard every season under the conditions which are essential if its meaning and beauty are to be understood. The list of pieces was made out for the edification of Boston and other places, and its presentation in New-York lacked justification on the grounds which were defensible there; but popular opinion, as expressed in the attendance on the concert, and the enthusiasm with which the music was received, so plainly disclosed the futility of all discussion of the artistic principles involved that it need not be attempted here. Only those listeners who were able to draw on their knowledge and experience knew how much the superb performance of the music lost by dissociation from scene and action. With their less fortunate companions, however, they were led to rejoice in the purely sensuous beauty of the music poured out with marvellous eloquence by Mr. Gericke and his band of artists. It was again an occasion when all who are trying to uphold the standard of the beautiful in art against the assaults of the champions of ugliness ("for truth's sake"—heaven save the mark!) were entitled to rejoice. Of energetic utterance, of large sonority, there was enough to satisfy even those who were thrown into conniption fits of ecstacy by Strauss's "Heldenleben" on Friday afternoon: but it was energy and sonority saturated with that euphony which comes from the refinement of each individual voice of all vulgar alloy and the homogeneous and symmetrical blending of all the constituent elements of harmony. The achievement of such a result was due to Mr. Gericke.

Two singers took part in the concert. They were Mme. Gadski and Mr. Van Hoose. The former first sang the entrance air of Elizabeth in "Tannhäuser," the latter the prize song from "Die Meistersinger"; next the two joined their voices in the first scene of "Götterdämmerung," holding unintelligible converse against the flood of music which came from behind their dapper forms, and playing the parts of two instruments added to the orchestra. Next the tenor sang the dying words of Siegfried, and the orchestra complacently added the death march as a postlude, while the singer contemplated the occupants of the gallery. Then, as a close, Mme. Gadski sang the words (presumably) and the vocal music (indubitably) of the closing scene of the drama, the tremendously moving picture of this scene being left, of course, to the imagination of the audience. Mme. Gadski sang the music with a superb sweep of expression and with a voice of compelling beauty. The listeners, who crowded the music room, were delighted—even those who knew how much was lost by the absence of scene and action.

...TIMES PRESS
...1905

IN THE REALM OF MUSIC

Let New York's musical cohorts rejoice. The Boston Symphony Orchestra is with us again. Before an audience that filled Carnegie Hall from top to bottom that body of virtuosos last night opened its season of concerts with an energy and dash, with a splendid outpouring of music that was well-nigh irresistible. After the first number, Brahm's "Academic" overture, given with superb spirit and with a perfection of tonal beauty which was as elevating as it was astonishing, your true enthusiast might have jumped up in his chair and shouted with delight. But an exceedingly proper spirit prevails at Gericke's concerts, and whatever wild feelings may have sprung up were curbed. The result was only manual applause—strong, emphatic and prolonged, to be sure.

The second number of the programme, Dvorak's 'cello concerto in B minor, opus 104, brought forward as soloist Heinrich Warnke, the orchestra's new first 'cellist, this being his first appearance in New York. It was a foregone conclusion that Warnke would prove himself an admirable player and an excellent musician, for his career abroad and his reputation there were known. Nevertheless it is pleasant to be able to confirm outside reports. Warnke gave a musicianly and poetically eloquent interpretation of Dvorak's difficult work, if his performance did not have the abandonment and brilliancy that win frenzied approval from hysterical women. One cannot say that this 'cellist has the mellow tone or finished technique of Alwin Schroeder. Nevertheless Warnke is admirably equipped technically, and his tone, if a bit raspy at times, is manly and expressive. His playing of Cantilena was at once warm, tender and noble. It revealed the true character of the man, his healthy musical fervor and strength. Warnke was recalled repeatedly.

If Gericke's readings of Strauss's tone poems are not as realistic as that master of orchestral effect himself would have them, yet they are interesting expositions of these monstrously intricate scores. So last night it was fascinating and instructive to hear "Death and Transfiguration" performed in a way that laid bare every musical thread with astonishing clearness, though perfection of detail was often destructive to the emotional stress of certain passages. One missed the feverish ecstasy, the passionate outbursts, the swirl of excitement which the music itself contains in this striving for microscopic precision. Yet Gericke seemed to be in unusually good spirits, and put more dash into the performance than is his wont.

Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 4, in F minor, opus 36, a composition exceedingly familiar to New Yorkers, brought the evening to an impressive end.

At Saturday afternoon's concert the programme will be made up of Wagner music, in which the solo parts will be sung by Johanna Gadski and Ellison Von Hoose.

...m N. Y. EVG. WORLD
...dress
...te

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA WINS 'FIRST NIGHTERS.'

Fashionables Throng Carnegie Hall, Laud Conductor Gericke and Enthuse Over the Work of His Musicians

It was the Boston Symphony Orchestra's first appearance of the season at Carnegie Hall last evening. Fashion was there; music had almost all its enthusiasts there. They came early to applaud in advance the conductor, Wilhelm Gericke, whose face has the precise lines of mathematics; the concert master, Willy Hess, and the soloist of the concert, Heinrich Warnke.

Warnke played the violoncello of Dvorak's B minor concerto with a learning so grave, a sentiment so delicate, an art so individual, that it was easy to imagine that the violoncello is the most praiseworthy musical instrument in the world.

There was the academic overture of Brahms in which the joyfulness of German students is exhaled, and surely no one ever heard the "Gaudeamus Igitur" played with a splendor comparable to that of Mr. Gericke's orchestra.

There was Richard Strauss's tone-poem, "Death and Transfiguration," which is as weird as the Dance of Death that was drawn in the margins of the Gothic Book of Hours. It was played so that one could let one's mind be diverted from the work's dreadful sadness to its complicated science.

There was Tschaikowsky's symphony in F minor. It had never a more ardent audience. The applause was entirely deserved. Those who said that the Boston Symphony Orchestra was excellent had terms of utter ng a commonplace.

...s

The programme of the Boston Symphony concert contained much that was interesting, and at least one movement of the symphony that was delightful. Brahms' Academic Overture, written as a return compliment to the University of Breslau for presenting him with the honorary degree of Ph. D., opened the concert; Dvorak's concerto for 'cello, written in this country with the assistance of Alwyn Schroeder, who played it at its first hearing here, was played last night by Heinrich Warnke, the first 'cellist of the orchestra, and Richard Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration," the third of his seven tone-poems, was played in quicker tempo than that of Emil Paur. If I remember aright, it was Mr. Gericke who, when he became the musical godfather of the Boston Symphony, banished the cornets and installed trumpets in their place. In the Strauss tone-poem the trumpets proclaimed their note of triumph with great forcefulness and beauty of tone.

Tschaikowski's Fourth Symphony, which brought the concert to a close, was played superbly. It was the Scherzo, that wonderful whirr of picked strings, that I referred to as the joy-giving symphony movement. As a reward for the perfect way in which it was played the auditors insisted upon calling the entire orchestra to its feet to bow its acknowledgments.

Tomorrow Mr. Gericke will present a Wagner programme.

F. D.

...m N. Y. EVG. WORLD
...dress
...t

GERICKE'S MEN WARMLY GREETED

Boston Symphony's First Concert, with Warnke, 'Cellist, as Soloist.

Just a coming into its own again was the Boston Symphony Orchestra's first concert of its twentieth season at Carnegie Hall last evening. There was a warm greeting for Mr. Gericke, and then, as he turned to his men for the opening bar, a settling down of the large audience to a realization of the fact that the music season of 1905-1906 was really begun.

How inspiring, though familiar, it was all! In the gayety of the Brahms "Academic Overture" at the start; through that lovely composition of Dvorak's, the 'cello concerto in B minor; passing on to the weird tone-poem of Richard Strauss, "Death and Transfiguration," and finishing with Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 4 in F minor, dedicated "To My Best Friend," the crispness, the coloring, the tone, the sonority—all the qualities that have made the band so famous were displayed at their best. The playing of the scherzo in the symphony brought out applause so extraordinary at these concerts that the whole orchestra had to rise and bow its acknowledgments.

Heinrich Warnke, lured away from Munich to be the new 'cellist of the organization, was the soloist. It may not be said that he wiped out the memories of his illustrious predecessor, Alwin Schroeder, but he showed musicianly qualities and is an expert performer, leaving something to be desired in sentiment and feeling.

The programme of the first matinee concert to-morrow is made up exclusively of Wagner's works, with Gadski and Ellison Van Hoose as soloists.

...Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
...s

At the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert this afternoon in Carnegie Hall, the programme will be made up entirely of Wagner music. The numbers announced are the "Huldigungsmarsch," the Bacchanale from "Tannhauser" and Elizabeth's greeting from the second act of that opera; the Prize Song from "Die Meistersinger," and excerpts from "Goetterdaemmerung," comprising Siegfried's Parting from Brunhilde, Siegfried's Death and Funeral March and the closing scene of the music drama. The soloists will be Gadski and Ellison Van Hoose.

...spaper Cutting Bureau in the World
...NOV 12 1905

One of the most interesting concerts of the season will be given by the Longy Club of Boston, in Mendelssohn Hall on Tuesday evening, December 19. The Longy Club is composed of the principal players of wind instruments in the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and takes its name from its leader, M. Georges Longy, the first oboe of the parent organization. Although it has been in existence for five years, this will be its formal début in New York, its only other appearance in this city having been made several seasons ago in the Lyceum Theatre at a special matinée.

From NEW YORK SUN
Address NOV 10 1905
Date

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

BEGINS ITS TWENTIETH SEASON IN THIS CITY.

Heinrich Warnke, the New First 'Cellist, Is the Soloist—A Programme Made of the Music of the Present With a Touch of the Music of the Future.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the first concert of its twentieth season in this city at Carnegie Hall last night. The programme consisted of the "Academic Festival" overture of Brahms, Dvorák's 'cello concerto, "Death and Transfiguration," by Richard Strauss, and Tschaikowsky's fourth symphony. The soloist was Heinrich Warnke, the new first 'cellist of the orchestra.

It was a programme of the music of today that Mr. Gericke gave us, with just a dash of the music of the future. It is the fashion now to speak of the compositions of Richard Strauss as the music of the future, because Wagner is such an old story, don't you know, and so deliciously simple and naïve in comparison with the tone photographer of Munich.

Some people are wondering since they heard the "Symphonia Domestica" whether the work of Strauss has not already become the music of the past. Even his devoted admirer, Ernest Newman, felt constrained to say of it that he took it to be the work of a clever man who was once a genius.

But let that pass. The "Death and Transfiguration" is now common ground. We may shudder at the crass realism of it all, and wonder why a composer should practise a sort of psychological vivisection, but we cannot and need not deny the masterful skill in the construction of the work, nor the impressiveness of the climacteric development of the transfiguration motive at the end.

After we have done all that, those of us who have not yet conceded the ultimate victory of the Strauss ideal may rest in the secure conclusion that this, too, is the work of a vastly clever man who probably never was a genius. The composition was beautifully played by Mr. Gericke's men last night—perhaps a little too beautifully.

There is more blood in the work than the amiable Mr. Gericke cared to shed. He always flows with milk and honey, and he has no use for the vinegar and gall of Strauss. He spared us much of the raucousness of the dying struggle, but to do that is to beg the question, which at the best can hardly be regarded as the duty of a faithful interpreter.

The Tschaikowsky symphony is a tried and true frind, not one of the great utterances of the powerful Russian, but one of his most ingratiating. Here again one longed for a little more rudeness, for your Muscovite bear growls not honestly when he fears to affright the ladies. But the dainty pizzicato ostinato was a triumph of orchestral virtuosity as tinkled out by the gentlemen of Boston.

Brahms's "Academic" overture is always agreeable and university men get a pleasant shock when they hear the unexpected "Lauriger Horatius." The composition went well last night. Throughout the orchestral numbers went the unfailing clarity and purity of tone, the nicety of balance and the certainty of technic which make the playing of this orchestra an unceasing joy.

The new 'cellist is a decided acquisition to the organization. He is a player of solid merit, with a beautiful tone, a well developed technic and a genuinely musical style. He is perhaps not a virtuoso of the very first rank, but such a player is not required for his position in the orchestra. It was not his fault, furthermore, that some passages in the Dvorak concerto sounded strained and unmusical.

The amiable Bohemian composer in striving for brilliancy kept the solo voice too much of the time in the high positions of the first string. Now a 'cello is not a violin, and if you try to make one of it the instrument will turn and rend not only you but also euphony.

Mr. Warnke disposed of the difficult passages with skill. That he could not make them sound beautiful was their fault, not his. He played the slow movement exquisitely, and that after all is the true test of 'cello playing. The instrument reluctantly enters into the colorature caperings of a soprano voice.

...m N. Y. EVENING
...dress
...te NOV 12 1905

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra began its twentieth season of concerts in New-York at Carnegie Hall last night, and incidentally introduced one of its new members in the character of a solo performer. This was Mr. Heinrich Warnke, the principal violoncello player of the organization, who played Dvorak's concerto in B minor. So far as a work which is so deficient in virility as this concerto (the melodious charm of which is not called in question) permitted him to do so, Mr. Warnke displayed a fine and manly style, free from affectation or claptrap of any kind, a full, round tone and exceptional taste. Slips of intonation in the regions in which they occurred last night call for little comment. It is so difficult to play high up (or down) on the 'cello's fingerboard that an expression of Dr. Johnson's pious wish, "Would to God, sir, it were impossible!" always seems justifiable. But Mr. Warnke's playing was not the chief delight of last night's concert. That came from the marvellous euphony of the band in all its numbers—the "Academic Overture" by Brahms, Richard Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration" and Tschaikowsky's F minor symphony (the first movement of which, to have it in harmony with the composer's fatalistic interpretation, we could have wished in a slightly slower tempo). Mr. Gericke deserves as much immortality as the memory of all his hearers can give him for the lessons in pure musical beauty which are a part and parcel of every one of his concerts.

...rom N. Y. TRIBUNE
...ddress
...te NOV 12 1905

MUSIC.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for this season took place in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. The programme was composed wholly of music by Wagner, and only the first number, the "March of Homage," had a legitimate place in a concert scheme in New-York where Wagner's dramatic music is heard every season under the conditions which are essential if its meaning and beauty are to be understood. The list of pieces was made out for the edification of Boston and other places, and its presentation in New-York lacked justification on the grounds which were defensible there; but popular opinion, as expressed in the attendance on the concert, and the enthusiasm with which the music was received, so plainly disclosed the futility of all discussion of the artistic principles involved that it need not be attempted here. Only those listeners who were able to draw on their knowledge and experience knew how much the superb performance of the music lost by dissociation from scene and action. With their less fortunate companions, however, they were led to rejoice in the purely sensuous beauty of the music poured out with marvellous eloquence by Mr. Gericke and his band of artists. It was again an occasion when all who are trying to uphold the standard of the beautiful in art against the assaults of the champions of ugliness ("for truth's sake"—heaven save the mark!) were entitled to rejoice. Of energetic utterance, of large sonority, there was enough to satisfy even those who were thrown into conniption fits of ecstacy by Strauss's "Heldenleben" on Friday afternoon: but it was energy and sonority saturated with that euphony which comes from the refinement of each individual voice of all vulgar alloy and the homogeneous and symmetrical blending of all the constituent elements of harmony. The achievement of such a result was due to Mr. Gericke.

Two singers took part in the concert. They were Mme. Gadski and Mr. Van Hoose. The former first sang the entrance air of Elizabeth in "Tannhäuser," the latter the prize song from "Die Meistersinger"; next the two joined their voices in the first scene of "Götterdämmerung," holding unintelligible converse against the flood of music which came from behind their dapper forms, and playing the parts of two instruments added to the orchestra. Next the tenor sang the dying words of Siegfried, and the orchestra complacently added the death march as a postlude, while the singer contemplated the occupants of the gallery. Then, as a close, Mme Gadski sang the words (presumably) and the vocal music (indubitably) of the closing scene of the drama, the tremendously moving picture of this scene being left, of course, to the imagination of the audience. Mme. Gadski sang the music with a superb sweep of expression and with a voice of compelling beauty. The listeners, who crowded the music room, were delighted—even those who knew how much was lost by the absence of scene and action.

THE MORNING TELEGRAPH
NOV 12 1905

A PICTURE HAT

Goes to a Tea Table Siegfried in a Frock Coat in Carnegie Hall.

WAGNER IN TAILOR MADE DRESS

By ALGERNON ST. JOHN BRENON.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Mr. Gericke's direction, was heard yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, in a programme which was strictly confined to Wagnerian selections.

First I must also say that this disciplined body of capable players and this carefully educated conductor devoted their efforts to that which can only be termed strangely conceived and most inartistic.

Wagner's whole life and his best efforts were spent in creating and popularizing a new art-form, in which music and drama should be so united and welded that the interest of the audience should be focused on both alike. This, of course, is as well known to Mr. Gericke as to half the school girls in America, but the entire second part of Mr. Gericke's concert was devoted to long excerpts from Wagner's mighty music drama, "The Dusk of the Gods."

In these excerpts Brunnhilde was represented by a beautiful songstress in a picture hat, and a dress of the most exquisite fashion, while the mythological Siegfried, that romantic imagining from the world of dreams, was impersonated by a well known local choir singer in a frock coat.

Fancy Mr. Gericke!

This same play, "The Dusk of the Gods," the mystic poetry of which is intensified by its very title, contains a beautiful and affecting scene, set to music as beautiful and affecting, portraying the death of Siegfried, his last vision of his queenly bride and the removal of his corpse upon a bier.

Stood Up at His Funeral.

Mr. Ellison Van Hoose died standing up and in the aforesaid frock coat.

The death of the hero is followed in the drama by what is called a 'funeral march.' During this Van Hoose still stood up, listening to his own requiem, and when it was over, he stalked off the stage.

Fancy Mr. Gericke!

During the great love scene between Siegfried and Brunnhilde, the two again stood as still as posts, gestureless and solemn, as of course, under concert circumstances, they had to.

"Why dost thou frown at me?" pleads Siegfried.

But Madame Gadski's eyes were all the time glued to her score.

To communities unblest with an opera house it may be a sort of kindness to parody Wagner's majestic tragedies in this way, but surely such a parody is more of a sacrilege than a thousand well-meant, if inadequate performances of "Parsifal."

As far as the singing was concerned Mme. Gadski proved herself to be a vocal Jekyll and Hyde. In her first two selections she was disappointing. Her high notes were tremulous and forced and her hold upon her audience weak.

The Gadski We Know.

But all the great artist in her flashed out clear, full and pervasive in her glorious rendering of the great scene in which Brunnhilde rushes into the flames to destroy herself.

Suddenly Mme. Gadski's voice gained in beauty, nobility and dramatic power, the faults I have noted disappeared, and she became the Gadski whom we know.

Ellison Van Hoose (I am speaking now of vocal style and manner) was a well bred, churchy and tea-table Siegfried. His voice is good, and his singing is commendably free from faults, but he is not a Wagnerian singer.

The artistic triumph of the concert was Mr. Gericke's beautiful rendering of the bacchanale music from "Tannhauser." Because of the absolutely perfect way in which it brought out every touch of musical color and every intention of the composer it will linger in the minds of his audience as the criterion of future interpretations.

Precise, however, is wasted on this great orchestra; it has heard so much of it already.

It is my sincere hope and earnest prayer that Mr. Gericke will never again play Wagner's sublime music dramas as if they were oratorios. We have enough oratorios already.

NEW YORK SUN
NOV 12 1905

The distinguished French composer, who is to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a series of its concerts, will sail from Cherbourg on the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse on next Wednesday, and is therefore expected to arrive in New York on Tuesday, November 21. He will conduct the concerts in Boston on December 1 and 2 and the concerts in New York on December 7 and 9, as well as concerts in that same week in Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore and Brooklyn. His programmes for the two New-York concerts are composed entirely of modern French music. The numbers will include some works of his own, and works by Chausson, Debussy, Dukas and other men of that school.

N. Y. TRIBUNE
NOV 12 1905

Ein Wagner-Konzert.

Das Bostoner Symphonieorchester gab gestern Nachmittag in Carnegie Hall ein Wagner-Konzert. Daß Wagner-Konzerte, genau genommen, ein Unding sind, braucht nicht erst erörtert zu werden. Allerdings hat Wagner selbst viele Bruchstücke seiner Werke im Konzertsaal dirigirt, aber das war dann allemal ein Nothbehelf, das war seiner Zeit die einzige Möglichkeit, Propaganda zu machen. In den übrigen Städten des Landes mag man auch heute noch zu einem solchen Nothbehelf greifen, aber New York besitzt eine Oper und kann sich dem Wagner-Genuß in der einzig legitimen Form hingeben.

Trotzdem sind Wagner-Programme auch noch in New Yorker Konzerten beliebt, woraus man den Schluß ziehen mag, daß nicht genug Leute sich den Opernbesuch leisten können. Carnegie Hall war denn auch bei dieser Gelegenheit übervoll; natürlich mußte Frau Gadski's Mitwirkung die Anziehungskraft noch erheblich verstärken. Als sie die Schlußscene der „Götterdämmerung" beendet hatte, wurde die Dame mit Beifall überschüttet, und die meisten Leute legten sich wohl die Frage vor, warum man Frau Gadski nicht mehr im Metropolitan Opera House zu hören bekomme. Wenn der Lateiner recht hätte, müßte sich auch bei diesem Kampf der Dritte freuen, Thatsache aber ist, daß bei dem Zwiste zwischen dem Direktor und der Sängerin das Publikum keinen Vortheil hat. Sogar Rußland und Japan haben doch Frieden geschlossen, wird man da nicht bald, mit passender Variante, auch berichten können:

Der Conried und die Tauscherin
Des langen Haders müde,
Erweichten ihren harten Sinn
Und machten endlich Friede?

Frau Gadski hatte sich kürzlich bei den Festvorstellungen in München mit den drei Brünnhilden-Rollen große Erfolge errungen, und so war es begreiflich, daß sie auch dem New Yorker Publikum eine Probe davon zu geben wünschte, wie sie die „Götterdämmerungs"-Brünnhilde interpretirt. Das ist nun freilich im Konzertsaal nicht vollständig möglich, aber mit dem, was sie gestern gesanglich darbot, wird sie das Publikum erst recht begierig gemacht haben, sie in der ganzen Rolle auf der Bühne zu sehen. Ihre Stimme, die glorioser als je klang, gab in den Schlußphrasen ganz mächtig aus, ohne auch nur um ein Häärchen die Schönheitsgrenze, die den Gesang vom Schreien trennt, zu überschreiten. Und es war nicht bloß schönster, mächtiger Ton, sondern es steckte auch dramatische Wärme darin. Wie sie sich den Brünnhilden-Charakter darstellerisch zu eigen gemacht, darüber kann man sich natürlich auch nach dem gestrigen großzügigen Vortrage nur Vermuthungen hingeben. Frau Gadski's Stimme hat übrigens in der unteren Lage an Fülle und Resonanz noch zugenommen, während die obere Lage denselben Glanz wie früher besitzt. Auch in der Elisabeth-Arie aus „Tannhäuser", und dem Duett mit Siegfried (aus der „Götterdämmerung") brachte sie es dem Zuhörer zum Bewußtsein, daß die Bühne ihr richtiger Wirkungskreis ist.

In jenem Duett sang Herr van Haaste den Siegfried, desgleichen Siegfried's Sterbescene und das Preislied aus den Meistersingern. Das letztere gelang ihm am besten. Van Haaste ist kein dramatischer, sondern ein lyrischer Tenor.

Das Orchester setzte seine schönsten Virtuosen-Qualitäten besonders in den „Götterdämmerungs"-Fragmenten in's vortheilhafteste Licht, und man muß es Herrn Gericke nachrühmen, daß er „Siegfried's Tod" ungemein eindrucksvoll interpretirte. Im „Tannhäuser"-Bacchanal fehlte die Keckheit und Wildheit der Leidenschaft gar zu sehr; man bekam den Eindruck, als seien bei diesem Bacchanal nur "Soft Drinks" servirt worden.

NEW YORK STAATS-ZEITUNG
NOV 12 1905

Ein Wagner-Konzert.

Das Bostoner Symphonieorchester gab gestern Nachmittag in Carnegie Hall ein Wagner-Konzert. Daß Wagner-Konzerte, genau genommen, ein Unding sind, braucht nicht erst erörtert zu werden. Allerdings hat Wagner selbst viele Bruchstücke seiner Werke im Konzertsaal dirigirt, aber das war dann allemal ein Nothbehelf, das war seiner Zeit die einzige Möglichkeit, Propaganda zu machen. In den übrigen Städten des Landes mag man auch heute noch zu einem solchen Nothbehelf greifen, aber New York besitzt eine Oper und kann sich dem Wagner-Genuß in der einzig legitimen Form hingeben.

Trotzdem sind Wagner-Programme auch noch in New Yorker Konzerten beliebt, woraus man den Schluß ziehen mag, daß nicht genug Leute sich den Opernbesuch leisten können. Carnegie Hall war denn auch bei dieser Gelegenheit übervoll; natürlich mußte Frau Gadski's Mitwirkung die Anziehungskraft noch erheblich verstärken. Als sie die Schlußscene der „Götterdämmerung" beendet hatte, wurde die Dame mit Beifall überschüttet, und die meisten Leute legten sich wohl die Frage vor, warum man Frau Gadski nicht mehr im Metropolitan Opera House zu hören bekomme. Wenn der Lateiner recht hätte, müßte sich auch bei diesem Kampf der Dritte freuen, Thatsache aber ist, daß bei dem Zwiste zwischen dem Direktor und der Sängerin das Publikum keinen Vortheil hat. Sogar Rußland und Japan haben doch Frieden geschlossen, wird man da nicht bald, mit passender Variante, auch berichten können:

Der Conried und die Tauscherin
Des langen Haders müde,
Erweichten ihren harten Sinn
Und machten endlich Friede?

Frau Gadski hatte sich kürzlich bei den Festvorstellungen in München mit den drei Brünnhilden-Rollen große Erfolge errungen, und so war es begreiflich, daß sie auch dem New Yorker Publikum eine Probe davon zu geben wünschte, wie sie die „Götterdämmerungs"-Brünnhilde interpretirt. Das ist nun freilich im Konzertsaal nicht vollständig möglich, aber mit dem, was sie gestern gesanglich darbot, wird sie das Publikum erst recht begierig gemacht haben, sie in der ganzen Rolle auf der Bühne zu sehen. Ihre Stimme, die glorioser als je klang, gab in den Schlußphrasen ganz mächtig aus, ohne auch nur um ein Häärchen die Schönheitsgrenze, die den Gesang vom Schreien trennt, zu überschreiten. Und es war nicht bloß schönster, mächtiger Ton, sondern es steckte auch dramatische Wärme darin. Wie sie sich den Brünnhilden-Charakter darstellerisch zu eigen gemacht, darüber kann man sich natürlich auch nach dem gestrigen großzügigen Vortrage nur Vermuthungen hingeben. Frau Gadski's Stimme hat übrigens in der unteren Lage an Fülle und Resonanz noch zugenommen, während die obere Lage denselben Glanz wie früher besitzt. Auch in der Elisabeth-Arie aus „Tannhäuser", und dem Duett mit Siegfried (aus der „Götterdämmerung") brachte sie es dem Zuhörer zum Bewußtsein, daß die Bühne ihr richtiger Wirkungskreis ist.

In jenem Duett sang Herr van Haaste den Siegfried, desgleichen Siegfried's Sterbescene und das Preislied aus den Meistersingern. Das letztere gelang ihm am besten. Van Haaste ist kein dramatischer, sondern ein lyrischer Tenor.

Das Orchester setzte seine schönsten Virtuosen-Qualitäten besonders in den „Götterdämmerungs"-Fragmenten in's vortheilhafteste Licht, und man muß es Herrn Gericke nachrühmen, daß er „Siegfried's Tod" ungemein eindrucksvoll interpretirte. Im „Tannhäuser"-Bacchanal fehlte die Keckheit und Wildheit der Leidenschaft gar zu sehr; man bekam den Eindruck, als seien bei diesem Bacchanal nur "Soft Drinks" servirt worden.

NEW YORK TIMES
NOV 12 1905

BOSTON ORCHESTRA PLAYS WAGNER MUSIC

Extracts from the Master's Dramas at Its Second Concert.

GADSKI AND VAN HOOSE SING

Superb Performance of Orchestral and Vocal Fragments.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, was devoted to a "Wagner programme." It comprised the March of Homage that Wagner wrote for his royal patron, Ludwig of Bavaria; the the Bacchanalé from "Tannhäuser," as rewritten and extended for Paris; Elizabeth's greeting to the hall of song, from the second act of "Tannhäuser"; the Prize Song from "The Mastersingers," and three selections from "Götterdämmerung"—Siegfried's parting from Brünnhilde in the first act, Siegfried's death and funeral march, (as it is commonly called,) and the closing scene, with Brünnhilde's exordium and immolation. Mme. Gadski and Ellison Von Hoose were the singers.

That a Wagner programme was not unpleasing to the Boston Orchestra's subscribers was shown by the fact that the audience was even larger than the one of Thursday evening; how much of it was due to the programme did not appear. Such a concert scheme, made up chiefly of excerpts from the music dramas, among them three long vocal passages from "Gotterdammerung," has rarely been undertaken by the conductors of this orchestra. Much might be said as to the propriety of it, especially in a city where the music dramas themselves are so often performed upon the stage. To give such concerts in Boston, where "The Ring of the Nibeling" is practically unknown as a dramatic entity, is one thing; to bring them to New York is another.

The logic of the music drama and Wagner's own theories are, of course, all quite against it. But Wagner himself, in the midst of his most convincing arguments, did it repeatedly whenever he had a chance—generally to be sure, with a practical pecuniary object in view, although he was a man who could suffer all sorts of privations for his artistic principles. The logic of the music-drama demonstrates that, at least such selections as those from "Gotterdämmerung" are only half represented when sung by a lady in a feathered hat and a gentleman in black frock coat upon the edge of a platform. It needs, of course, no argument in this day and generation to show it, when the fundamental reasoning upon which Wagner based his reform of the opera is so well known.

Yet so perverse is human nature that no doubt everybody was willing to faive the argument and forget the logic in order to hear how this music sounds when played by such an orchestra and in such a style. It is scarcely in the nature of things that it should ever sound so in the Opera House. "The Götterdämerung" selections lose much when wrenched from their context in the scene upon the stage; but the imaginative listener will supply what is lacking through his mind's eye—cannot help doing so, in fact, and thus paying tribute to the true power of the music. And listening thus, he will find a new meaning in the music from such sheer technical perfection of its performance.

Mme. Gadski's reappearance was meb bya glad welcome. She was in superb voice, and sang the song of Elizabeth well, but the music of Brünnhilde with thrilling power and the true accent of dramatic eloquence. It is, indeed, a beautiful voice, and its warmth and richness and fullness were most beautifully employed yesterday. So, too, was Mme. Gadski's art of song, through which the music was not only declaimed, but sung, as Wagner's music should be. Mr. Van Hoose is a tenor whom it is always a delight to head, and he has grown materially in artistic power in recent years. His voice is too light and lyric in character for the most effective delivery of Siegfried's impassioned song, some of which is too low for him; but he gave it with fine skill and much fervor. More in his style was the Prize Song from "The Mastersingers," in which he sang delightfully.

The achievements of Mr. Gericke and his men in all this music was of a wonderful beauty and impressiveness. The orchestra was increased in numoers to approximate all of Wagner's demands in the "Götterdämmerung" score, Bayreuth tubes and all. It was superb in color and sonority. Mr. Gericke kept the thematic articulation clear and in subtle adjustment throughout, yet maintained the homogeneity and balance of the whole, and preserved always the magnificent swetp of its melodic line. The marvel of Wagner's scoring, the infinitude of its expressiveness, could not be more convincingly shown. The "Tannhaeuser" Bacchante glowed and burned with color, but it failed, if at all, in reaching the extreme of that dionysiac madness that is of its essence.

NEW YORK HERALD
NOV 12 1905

SCORES TRIUMPH IN WAGNER MUSIC

Boston Symphony Orchestra Wins Fresh Laurels in Interpretation of Famous Selections.

MME. GADSKI CHIEF SOLOIST

Her Singing in Excerpts from "Die Gotterdammerung" Aroused the Audience to Enthusiasm.

With a programme devoted entirely to the music of Richard Wagner, the Boston Symphony Orchestra at yesterday's matinee in Carnegie Hall scored one of the biggest popular triumphs which can be recollected in all its twenty seasons of New York concert giving.

Even Mme. Gadski's reappearance as the chief soloist of the occasion and her truly splendid singing could not quite push into the second place of interest the magical playing of the virtuoso orchestra.

Mr. Gericke knew what he was about when he forswore symphonic works for once and set his men to playing famous pages from the scores of the Wagner music dramas.

Few opera house orchestras in the world have either the time or the talent to interpret them quite as did the Boston players yesterday afternoon. Blasé operagoers found themselves speculating as to what the familiar music dramas would sound like in complete form with such an exquisite instrumental background and deciding that they were realizing the full beauty of this or that passage for the first time.

The purely instrumental numbers were the "Huldigungsmarsch" and the Bacchanale from "Tannhäuger," according to the Parisian version. Following these, Mme. Gadski made her appearance to sing with big effect "Dich theure Halle," from the second act of the same opera, and then Mr. Ellison Van Hoose to delight the house with Walther's Prize Song from "Die Meistersinger." This talented lyric tenor has done few things of greater worth here.

The programme's climax arrived with its last number, a series of excerpts from "Die Götterdämmerung." These brought Mr. Van Hoose to Mme. Gadski's support in the superb duet of parting which opens the first act, and gave him also Siegfried's dying words to sing and, after the orchestra had played the funeral march, introduced Mme. Gadski in the great closing scene of immolation.

GADSKI SCORES AS AN INDEPENDENT BRUNNHILDE.

She Gives a Magnificent Rendition at Carnegie Hall, Although She Has to Quit Conried's Forces to Do So

Johanna Gadski sang as Brunnhilde in "Gotterdaemmerung" yesterday at Carnegie Hall. It was magnificent, and Herr Director Conried was not there. He had said Johanna Gadski should not sing as Brunnhilde at the end of the Trilogy. She had said she would.

She had to quit the opera company of Herr Direktor Conried in order to do what she said she would do but a great crowd of music lovers said yesterday that the disadvantage was the Herr Direktor's, not Gadski's. The Herr Direktor could not give to her the Boston Symphony Orchestra's accompaniment.

It was almost perfect; he could give to her a more harmonious costume. Her gown and the ostrich feather in her large hat were of a blue too pale. But, the expression of her voice was Brunnhilde's at the pyre of Siegfried and in her last call to Grane, her horse, or there is a conventional Brunnhilde whom artists of individuality do not know.

She sang Elisabeth's greeting in act III. of "Tannhaeuser" with great charm. Ellison Van Hoose sang the prize song of the "Meistersinger," the parting of Siegfried from Brunnhilde and his song to her at his death.

The audience was numerous and its fervent applause not extravagant.

NEW YORK CITY
THE MORNING TELEGRAPH
ess NOV 12 1905

BRUNNHILDE IN A PICTURE HAT

She Sings to a Tea Table Siegfried in a Frock Coat in Carnegie Hall.

WAGNER IN TAILOR MADE DRESS

By ALGERNON ST. JOHN BRENON.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Mr. Gericke's direction, was heard yesterday afternon in Carnegie Hall, in a programme which was strictly confined to Wagnerian selections.

But I must also say that this disciplined body of capable players and this justly celebrated conductor devoted their efforts to that which can only be termed a strangely conceived and most inartistic concert.

Wagner's whole life and his best efforts, were spent in creating and popularizing a new art-form, in which music and drama should be so united and welded that the interest of the audience should be focused on both alike. This, of course, is as well known to Mr. Gericke as to half the school girls in America, but the entire second part of Mr. Gericke's concert was devoted to long extracts from Wagner's mighty music drama, "The Dusk of the Gods."

In these excerpts Brunnhilde was represented by a beautiful songstress in a picture hat, and a dress of the most exquisite fashion, while the mythological Siegfried, that romantic imagining from the world of dreams, was impersonated by a well known local choir singer in a frock coat.

Oh! Mr. Gericke!

This same play, "The Dusk of the Gods," the mystic poetry of which is indicated by its very title, contains a beautiful and affecting scene, set to music just as beautiful and affecting, portraying the death of Siegfried, his last vision of his queenly bride and the removal of his corpse upon a bier.

Stood Up at His Funeral.

Mr. Ellison Van Hoose died standing up, and in the aforesaid frock coat.

The death of the hero is followed in the drama by what is called a 'funeral march.' During this Van Hoose still stood up, listening to his own requiem, and when it was over, he stalked off the stage.

Oh! Mr. Gericke!

During the great love scene between Siegfried and Brunnhilde, the two again stood as still as posts, gestureless and solemn, as of course, under concert circumstances, they had to.

"Why dost thou frown at me?" pleads Siegfried.

But Madame Gadski's eyes were all the time glued to her score.

To communities unblest with an opera house it may be a sort of kindness to parody Wagner's majestic tragedies in this way, but surely such a parody is more of a sacrilege than a thousand well-meant, if inadequate performances of "Parsifal."

As far as the singing was concerned Mme. Gadski proved herself to be a vocal Jekyll and Hyde. In her first two selections she was disappointing. Her high notes were tremulous and forced and her hold upon her audience weak.

The Gadski We Know.

But all the great artist in her flashed out clear, full and pervasive in her glorious rendering of the great scene in which Brunnhilde rushes into the flames to destroy herself.

Suddenly Mme. Gadski's voice gained in beauty, nobility and dramatic power, the faults I have noted disappeared, and she became the Gadski whom we know.

Ellison Van Hoose (I am speaking now of his vocal style and manner) was a well-bred, churchy and tea-table Siegfried. His voice is good, and his singing commendably free from faults, but he is not a Wagnerian singer.

The artistic triumph of the concert was Mr. Gericke's beautiful rendering of the bacchanale music from "Tannhauser." Because of the absolutely perfect way in which it brought out every touch of musical color and every intention of the composer it will linger in the minds of his audience as the criterion of future interpretations.

Praise, however, is wasted on this great orchestra; it has heard so much of it already.

It is my sincere hope and earnest prayer that Mr. Gericke will never again give Wagner's sublime music dramas as if they were oratorios. We have enough oratorios already.

NEW YORK SUN
NOV 12 1905

Vincent d'Indy, the distinguished French composer, who is to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a series of its concerts, will sail from Cherbourg on the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse on next Wednesday, and is therefore expected to arrive in New-York on Tuesday, November 21. He will conduct the concerts in Boston on December 1 and 2 and the concerts in New-York on December 7 and 9, as well as concerts in that same week in Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore and Brooklyn. His programmes for the two New-York concerts are composed entirely of modern French music. The numbers will include some works of his own, and works by Chausson, Debussy, Dukas and other men of that school.

rom N. Y. TRIBUNE
Address
Date NOV 12 1905

Ein Wagner-Konzert.

Das Bostoner Symphonieorchester gab gestern Nachmittag in Carnegie Hall ein Wagner-Konzert. Daß Wagner-Konzerte, genau genommen, ein Unding sind, braucht nicht erst erörtert zu werden. Allerdings hat Wagner selbst viele Bruchstücke seiner Werke im Konzertsaal dirigirt, aber das war dann allemal ein Nothbehelf, das war seiner Zeit die einzige Möglichkeit, Propaganda zu machen. In den übrigen Städten des Landes mag man auch heute noch zu einem solchen Nothbehelf greifen, aber New York besitzt eine Oper und kann sich dem Wagner-Genuß in der einzig legitimen Form hingeben.

Trotzdem sind Wagner-Programme auch noch in New Yorker Konzerten beliebt, woraus man den Schluß ziehen mag, daß nicht genug Leute sich den Opernbesuch leisten können. Carnegie Hall war denn auch bei dieser Gelegenheit übervoll; natürlich mußte Frau Gadski's Mitwirkung die Anziehungskraft noch erheblich verstärken. Als sie die Schlußscene der „Götterdämmerung" beendet hatte, wurde die Dame mit Beifall überschüttet, und die meisten Leute legten sich wohl die Frage vor, warum man Frau Gadski nicht mehr im Metropolitan Opera House zu hören bekomme. Wenn der Lateiner recht hätte, müßte sich auch bei diesem Kampf der Dritte freuen, Thatsache aber ist, daß bei dem Zwiste zwischen dem Direktor und der Sängerin das Publikum keinen Vortheil hat. Sogar Rußland und Japan haben doch Frieden geschlossen, wird man da nicht bald, mit passender Variante, auch berichten können:

Der Conried und die Tauscherin
Des langen Haders müde,
Erweichten ihren harten Sinn
Und machten endlich Friede?

Frau Gadski hatte sich kürzlich bei den Festvorstellungen in München mit den drei Brünnhilden-Rollen große Erfolge ersungen, und so war es begreiflich, daß sie auch dem New Yorker Publikum eine Probe davon zu geben wünschte, wie sie die „Götterdämmerungs"-Brünnhilde interpretirt. Das ist nun freilich im Konzertsaal nicht vollständig möglich, aber mit dem, was sie gestern gesanglich darbot, wird sie das Publikum erst recht begierig gemacht haben, sie in der ganzen Rolle auf der Bühne zu sehen. Ihre Stimme, die glorioser als je klang, gab in den Schlußphrasen ganz mächtig aus, ohne auch nur um ein Häärchen die Schönheitsgrenze, die den Gesang vom Schreien trennt, zu überschreiten. Und es war nicht bloß schönster, mächtiger Ton, sondern es steckte auch dramatische Wärme darin. Wie sie sich den Brünnhilden-Charakter darstellerisch zu eigen gemacht, darüber kann man sich natürlich auch nach dem gestrigen großzügigen Vortrage nur Vermuthungen hingeben. Frau Gadski's Stimme hat übrigens in der unteren Lage an Fülle und Resonanz noch zugenommen, während die obere Lage denselben Glanz wie früher besitzt. Auch in der Elisabeth-Arie aus „Tannhäuser", und dem Duett mit Siegfried (aus der „Götterdämmerung") brachte sie es dem Zuhörer zum Bewußtsein, daß die Bühne ihr richtiger Wirkungskreis ist.

In jenem Duett sang Herr van Haase den Siegfried, desgleichen Siegfried's Sterbescene und das Preislied aus den Meistersingern. Das letztere gelang ihm am besten. Van Haase ist kein dramatischer, sondern ein lyrischer Tenor.

Das Orchester setzte seine schönsten Virtuosen-Qualitäten besonders in den „Götterdämmerungs"-Fragmenten in's vortheilhafteste Licht, und man muß es Herrn Gericke nachrühmen, daß er „Siegfried's Tod" ungemein eindrucksvoll interpretirte. Im „Tannhäuser"-Bacchanal fehlte die Keckheit und Wildheit der Leidenschaft gar zu sehr; man bekam den Eindruck, als seien bei diesem Bacchanal nur "Soft Drinks" servirt worden.

NEW YORK TIMES
NOV 12 1905

BOSTON ORCHESTRA PLAYS WAGNER MUSIC

Extracts from the Master's Dramas at Its Second Concert.

GADSKI AND VAN HOOSE SING

Superb Performance of Orchestral and Vocal Fragments.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, was devoted to a "Wagner programme." It comprised the March of Homage that Wagner wrote for his royal patron, Ludwig of Bavaria; the the Bacchanalé from "Tannhäuser," as rewritten and extended for Paris; Elizabeth's greeting to the hall of song, from the second act of "Tannhäuser"; the Prize Song from "The Mastersingers," and three selections from "Götterdämmerung" -Siegfried's parting from Brünnhilde in the first act, Siegfried's death and funeral march, as it is commonly called, and the closing scene, with Brünnhilde's exordium and immolation. Mme. Gadski and Ellison Van Hoose were the singers.

That a Wagner programme was not unpleasing to the Boston Orchestra's subscribers was shown by the fact that the audience was even larger than the one of Thursday evening; how much of it was due to the programme did not appear. Such a concert scheme, made up chiefly of excerpts from the music dramas, among them three long vocal passages from "Gotterdammerung," has rarely been undertaken by the conductors of this orchestra. Much might be said as to the propriety of it, especially in a city where the music dramas themselves are so often performed upon the stage. To give such concerts in Boston, where "The Ring of the Nibelung" is practically unknown as a dramatic entity, is one thing; to bring them to New York is another.

The logic of the music drama and Wagner's own theories are, of course, all quite against it. But Wagner himself, in the midst of his most convincing arguments, did it repeatedly whenever he had a chance-generally to be sure, with a practical pecuniary object in view, although he was a man who could suffer all sorts of privations for his artistic principles. The logic of the music-drama demonstrates that at least such selections as those from "Gotterdammerung" are only half represented when sung by a lady in a feathered hat and a gentleman in black frock coat upon the edge of a platform. It needs, of course, no argument in this day and generation to show it, when the fundamental reasoning upon which Wagner based his reform of the opera is so well known.

Yet so perverse is human nature that no doubt everybody was willing to waive the argument and forget the logic in order to hear how this music sounds when played by such an orchestra and in such a style. It is scarcely in the nature of things that it should ever sound so in the Opera House. "The Götterdämmerung" selections lose much when wrenched from their context in the scene upon the stage; but the imaginative listener will supply what is lacking through his mind's eye, cannot help doing so, in fact, and thus paying tribute to the true power of the music. And listening thus, he will find a new meaning in the music from such sheer technical perfection of its performance.

Mme. Gadski's reappearance was met by a glad welcome. She was in superb voice, and sang the song of Elizabeth well, but the music of Brünnhilde with thrilling power and the true accent of dramatic eloquence. It is, indeed, a beautiful voice, and its warmth and richness and fullness were most heartfully employed yesterday. So, too, was Mme. Gadski's art of song, through which the music was not only declaimed, but sung, as Wagner's music should be. Mr. Van Hoose is a tenor whom it is always a delight to hear, and he has grown materially in artistic power in recent years. His voice is too light and lyric in character for the most effective delivery of Siegfried's impassioned song, some of which is too low for him; but he gave it with fine skill and much fervor. More in his style was the Prize Song from "The Mastersingers," in which he sang delightfully.

The achievements of Mr. Gericke and his men in all this music was of a wonderful beauty and impressiveness. The orchestra was increased in numbers to approximate all of Wagner's demands in the "Götterdämmerung" score. Bayreuth tubes and all. It was superb in color and sonority. Mr. Gericke kept the thematic articulation clear and in subtle adjustment throughout, yet maintained the homogeneity and balance of the whole, and preserved always the magnificent swetp of its melodic line. The marvel of Wagner's scoring, the infinitude of its expressiveness, could not be more convincingly shown. The "Tannhaeuser" Bacchanale glowed and burned with color, but it failed, if at all, in reaching the extreme of that dionysiac madness that is of its essence.

is

SCORES TRIUMPH IN WAGNER MUSIC

Boston Symphony Orchestra Wins Fresh Laurels in Interpretation of Famous Selections.

MME. GADSKI CHIEF SOLOIST

Her Singing in Excerpts from "Die Gotterdammerung" Aroused the Audience to Enthusiasm.

With a programme devoted entirely to the music of Richard Wagner the Boston Symphony Orchestra at [illegible] afternoon in Carnegie Hall [illegible] one of the greatest [illegible] which can be recollected in all its [illegible] New York concert giving.

Even Mme. Gadski's appearance as the chief soloist of the occasion and her truly splendid singing could not push into the second place of [illegible] the magical playing of the virtuoso [illegible].

Mr. Gericke knew what he was about when he forswore [illegible] once and set his men to [illegible] pages from the scores of [illegible] music dramas.

Few opera [illegible] orchestras in the world have either the time or the [illegible] interpret them quite as did [illegible] at yesterday afternoon. [illegible] found themselves [illegible] the familiar motifs [illegible] like in complete form with [illegible] quisite instrumentation [illegible] ciding that they were [illegible] beauty of this or that [illegible] first time.

The purely instrumental [illegible] the "Huldigungsmarsch" and [illegible] chanale from "Tannhäuser" [illegible] to the Parisian version. [illegible] Mme. Gadski made her [illegible] with big effect "Dich [illegible] the second act of the same [illegible] Mr. Ellison Van Hoose [illegible] house with Walther's [illegible] "Die Meistersinger." [illegible] tenor has done [illegible] worth here.

The programme's climax [illegible] with its last number, a series of excerpts from "Die Götterdämmerung." [illegible] Mr. Van Hoose to Mme. [illegible] in the superb duet of parting [illegible] the first act, and gave [illegible] dying words to sing and [illegible] tra had played the [illegible] duet Mme. Gadski [illegible] scene of immolation.

GADSKI SCORES AS AN INDEPENDENT BRUNNHILDE.

She Gives a Magnificent Rendition at Carnegie Hall, Although She Has to Quit Conried's Forces to Do So

Johanna Gadski sang as Brunnhilde in "Gotterdammerung" [illegible] afternoon at Carnegie Hall. It was a [illegible] and Herr Direktor Conried was not there. He had said Johanna Gadski should not sing as Brunnhilde at the [illegible] of the Trilogy. She had said she would.

She had to quit the opera company of Herr Direktor Conried in order to do what she said she could do [illegible] a great crowd of music lovers said yesterday that the disadvantage was [illegible] Herr Direktor's, not Gadski's. The Leipsic [illegible] could not give to her the Boston Symphony Orchestra's accompaniment.

It was almost perfect; he could give to her a more harmonious costume. Her gown and the ostrich feather in her large hat were of a blue too pale. But, the expression of her voice was Brunnhilde's at the pyre of Siegfried and in her last call to Grane, her horse, or there is a conventional Brunnhilde whom artists of individuality do not know.

She sang Elisabeth's greeting in act III. of "Tannhaeuser" with great charm. Ellison Van Hoose sang the prize song of the "Meistersinger," the parting of Siegfried from Brunnhilde and his song to her at his death.

The audience was numerous and its fervent applause not extravagant.

ess

Bach, Beethoven and Wagner music will make up the programme at this season's first trial of the People's Symphony Concerts. Bach will be represented by Abert's orchestral arrangement of the organ fugue in G minor; Beethoven by his Fifth Symphony, and Wagner by the "Meistersinger" overture and a vocal selection. This list is to be performed in Cooper Union on November 23, in the Grand Central Palace on November 24 and in Carnegie Hall on November 27.

Vincent d'Indy, who is to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a series of concerts, will sail from Cherbourg on November 15, and is due here November 21. D'Indy will conduct the concerts in Boston on December 1 and 2, and the concerts in New York on December 7 and 9. His programmes for the two New York concerts, composed entirely of modern French music, will include works of his own and others by Chausson, Debussy and Dukas.

The Boston Symphony Quartet will give three concerts in Mendelssohn Hall this winter on Tuesdays, January 2, and February 6, and Wednesday, March 7. It is composed of Willy Hess, first violin; Otto Roth, second violin; Emile Ferir, viola, and Heinrich Warnke, 'cello.

NEW YORK TIMES.

ess

NOV 12 1905

Vincent d'Indy, the distinguished French composer, who is to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a series of its concerts, will sail from Cherbourg on the Kaiser der Grosse on Wednesday, Nov. 15, and is, therefore, expected to arrive in New York on Tuesday, Nov. 21. M. d'Indy will conduct the concerts in Boston on Dec. 1 and 2 and the concerts in New York on Dec. 7 and 9, as well as concerts in that same week in Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, and Brooklyn. His programmes for the two New York concerts are composed entirely of modern French music. The numbers will include some works of his own and works by Chausson, Debussy, Dukas, and other men of that school.

MAIL

ess

NOV 13 1905

Gadski with Boston Orchestra.

Mme. Gadski's concert appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra Saturday afternoon proroked new regrets that she is no longer a member of Mr. Conried's opera troupe at the Metropolitan. The German soprano's voice is as full and rich as ever. Her singing is that of an artist; in Brunnhilde's final scene from "Gotterdammerung" she touched a high level of earnestness. And Mme. Gadski has by no means reached her prime.

Ellison Van Hoose has grown into one of the best of concert tenors; his singing on Saturday, especially of Siegfried's death scene, marked one of his best public accomplishments here.

With these soloists and a Wagner programme, the Boston orchestra drew an audience that left no seat in Carnegie Hall unoccupied. Mr. Gericke and the players were in brilliant mood.

From W T R SUN

Address NOV 13 1905

MME. GADSKI AND [illegible]

Also Ellison Van Hoose, Tenor, and the Admirable Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The first matinée concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's season took place at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. The programme was composed wholly of music by Richard Wagner and every seat in the house was sold an hour before the concert began. Hundreds of people were turned away, bitterly disappointed, and some of the departing women were almost on the verge of tears. From their conversation it was easy to learn that they bewailed not only missing a performance of Wagner music by the admired orchestra, but the loss of one of the rare opportunities to hear Mme. Gadski, the popular Wagnerian sopano.

Those who were in the house testified to their admiration of her art in no uncertain manner, and by loud and long continued applause paid a just tribute to the splendor of the freshest and most serviceable voice now to be heard in the later dramas of Wagner. This voice can be heard only in the concert room, unless one chooses to journey in the summer all the way to the Prinz Regenten Theatre in Munich, where it may be heard on the lyric stage. In the present dearth of young and rising Wagnerian singers the journey is almost worth while.

The programme which Mr. Gericke presented yesterday comprised the "Huldigungsmarsch," which is not often heard; the bacchanale from "Tannhauser"; the aria, "Dich theure Halle," from the same opera; the prize song from "Die Meistersinger," the duet from the first act of "Gotterdammerung," the death of Siegfried and the funeral march and Brunnhilde's final scene from the same drama. The singer of the Siegfried music and the prize song was Ellison Van Hoose, the American tenor, who was most cordially received, as he deserved to be.

Mr. Van Hoose has made steady and consistent progress in his art and his clear round tones are well suited to the Wagnerian music. He has sometimes sung with more vigor than he displayed yesterday. As for Mme. Gadski, it was, as we have intimated, a joy to hear her. She was especially interesting in the music of the "Gotterdammerung." Brunnhilde, which she has not yet sung here in the opera house, but with which she had a brilliant success in Munich last summer. She sang this music with brilliant, clear, vibrant voice, with enthusiasm and with understanding.

Mr. Gericke, as usual, gave a masterly illustration of how to be polite though Wagnerian. His readings were distinguished by nicety of tonal balance, by exquisite clarity and polish, and by ravishing beauty of instrumental sound. These are the features of orchestral performance upon which our Bostonian Arbiter Elegantiarum excels.

In Wagner he is a firm believer in the suaviter in modo, fortiter in re. But this makes one ardently wish that he would occasionally pull out the brass stop to its end.

In the climax of the funeral march, to paraphrase the poet, one blast upon the bugle horns were worth a thousand strings. But Mr. Gericke abhors blasts. He does not mind a moderate draught, but no blasts. Nevertheless the funeral march went with much breadth and solemnity. The best bits of orchestral playing, however, were the closing bars after the "Gotterdammerung" duet and the pyrographic finish of the Walhalla dynasty in the last scene.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

NEW YORK PRESS

om

ldress NOV 19 1905

ate

The Boston Symphony Quartet, which will give a series of three concerts in Mendelssohn Hall, has engaged as assistant artists, Stojowsky, a Polish pianist, who has come to this country to be at the head of the piano department in the Institute of Musical Art; Susan Metcalf, soprano, and Olga Samaroff, pianist. Professor Willy Hess, the leader of the quartet, promises three interesting programmes.

[illegible] London, 1881; New York, 188

Boston Band Gives a Wagner Disconcert.

No one complained more strenuously than Wagner himself against what conductors and musical managers like to call a Wagner concert, but which to any one who knows is most decidedly a disconcert. His music, he declared, was written for the theatre, and it must have the theatrical accompaniments to be fully understood. Saturday afternoon in the Carnegie Hall the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave one of these disconcerts, but it is doubtful if Wagner would have been any the more reconciled to it, by the fact that the insult came from his intimate friends and self-appointed guardians, the Bostonians.

There is, of course, another side to the question of the value of the Wagner concert. In towns that are operaless every little bit helps, and nearly all things are welcome, but it is extremely doubtful if there is a very large demand for it in New York city, which has opera, and a rather good opera, for a quite respectable portion of the year. The mere fact that even here Wagner may be found furnishing the Sunday night programme for popular beer gardens should hardly be taken as a precedent for the visiting band.

The opening number, "The March of Homage" and the "Prize Song" might be regarded as a part atonement for the rest of the violations. The former was played with superb accord. This was followed by the "Bacchanate" from "Tannhauser."

Mme. Johanna Gadski in singing Elisabeth's greeting was less happy than in the selections from "The Dusk of the Gods." In Brunnhilde's closing scene her best work was done. Even in the strenuous physical effort which this demanded Mme. Gadski's voice retained its purity and legato.

Mr. Van Hoose's higher notes were somewhat veiled in his singing of Walter's "Prize Song," a piece so lyric that it is not out of place in programme music.

But, Siegfried in formal afternoon dress, parting passionately from Brunnhilde in a picture hat! What's the use? As well King Lear in a clawhammer.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From TOWN TOPICS

Address NEW YORK CITY NOV 16 1905

Date

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, chaperoned by Frederic Comee, began their twentieth season in New York by an evening concert and a matinee of usual date and dignity. At the first the soloist was Heinrich Warnke, the recently acquired first 'cellist of the orchestra. He played the Dvorak Concerto, which is one of the most ungrateful works imaginable, and as a matter of very frank fact he played it disappointingly. His tone was lovable only in spots, and his intonation was not like Cæsar's wife. I hope and believe he was nervous; and as some of my friendly enemies may challenge this attitude, I fortify myself by assuring them that Mr. Warnke is to be the first 'cellist and not the constant soloist of the orchestra. The orchestral numbers at this first concert were the Tschaikowsky Fourth Symphony—in which I missed a great deal of brutality that seems to be part and parcel of the Russian's emotional make-up—and Strauss's Tone-poem, "Death and Transfiguration." The latter also was refined of some of its "fever" beats—some stanch anti-Straussite insists upon calling this work the "Quinine Symphony"—and in consequence the tossings of the delirious invalid, pictured in tonal throbs, were comparatively gentlemanly. But Herr Gericke did unleash his orchestra a bit to my amazement. Much more was this the case at the matinee, when the brass of the band was allowed to puff some very rude blasts. This final concert was all Wagner, which is doubtless delightful to New Haven and Providence, but New York has four months of Opera, so that Wagner excerpts are a bit outmoded here. The orchestra played very wonderfully that afternoon. The concert served to let us hear Mme. Gadski in more wonderful vocal condition than I have ever heard her before. She had that usual incomparable brilliancy of the upper register, while her lower notes have taken on additional dramatic warmth. And about it all there was a freshness that is rare and fascinating in a dramatic soprano. It made me long to hear this voice at the Metropolitan again. Ellison Van Hoose was the other soloist, and he sang brilliantly and lyrically as ever. He seems neither to have lost nor to have gained in vocal charms.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From [illegible]

Address

Date NOV 18 1905

On Thursday evening a large and cultivated audience greeted the Boston Symphony Orchestra (Mr. Gericke, conductor) upon its return to this city at its first concert of the season. Brahm's Academic Overture; Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration"; a Tschaikowsky selection in F minor, and Dvorak's 'Cello Concerto, opus 104, made up the program. In the latter number Heinrich Warnke, the new first 'cellist of the orchestra, was the assisting soloist. He played with skill and finish, but did not display great warmth or beauty of tone. He succeeded, however, to a certain extent in performing the difficult task of making interesting a concerto for the 'cello, an instrument of great loveliness of tone in both solo and ensemble works. The orchestra played with the marvelous finish and technical perfection for which it has long been noted, but, if anything, it is too perfect, for it lacks a certain amount of fire and buoyancy for which intense music lovers often long.

This quality was not so lacking at their next concert, which took place on Saturday afternoon, when a Wagner program was given. On this occasion Mme. Gadski and Ellison Van Hoose were the soloists. Both artists were in splendid form and sang with great effect.

From N. Y. TRIBUNE.

Address NOV 19 1905

Date

The Boston Symphony Quartet, which will give a series of three concerts in Mendelssohn Hall this winter, announces the following list of assisting artists: Tuesday evening, January 2, Mr. Stojowsky, a Polish pianist, who has come to this country to be at the head of the pianoforte department in the Institute of Musical Art; Tuesday evening, February 6, Susan Metcalf, the popular soprano, and Wednesday evening, March 7, Mme. Olga Samaroff, the Russian pianist.

s

NOV 19 1905

The Boston Symphony Quartet, which will give a series of three concerts in Mendelssohn Hall this winter, announces the following list of assisting artists: Tuesday evening, January 2, Mr. Stojowsky, the Polish pianist, who has come to this country to be at the head of the piano department in the Institute of Musical Art; Tuesday evening, February 6, Susan Metcalf, the popular soprano, and Wednesday evening, March 7, Mme. Olga Samaroff, the Russian pianist. Prof. Willy Hess, the leader of the quartet, promises three very interesting programmes which will contain some important novelties. The quartet gave but one concert in New York last season and was most favorably received. From now on its concerts will be regular fixtures in the musical season.

N. Y. EVG. TELEGRAM

s

NOV 21 1905

Among the passengers on the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse, which is due to-day is M. Vincent d'Indy, the French composer, who comes to this country by invitation to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a series of its concerts. M. d'Indy will conduct the orchestra in New York at its regular concerts on Thursday evening, December 7, and Saturday afternoon, December 9. By asking him to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra a firmly established precedent of twenty-four years was broken, for he will be the first musician other than its regular conductor, to direct it at its regular concerts.

[96]

ess .....

Bach, Beethoven and Wagner music will make up the programme at this season's first trial of the People's Symphony Concerts. Bach will be represented by Abert's orchestral arrangement of the organ fugue in G minor; Beethoven by his Fifth Symphony, and Wagner by the "Meistersinger" overture and a vocal selection. This list is to be performed in Cooper Union on November 23, in the Grand Central Palace on November 24 and in Carnegie Hall on November 27.

Vincent d'Indy, who is to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a series of concerts, will sail from Cherbourg on November 15, and is due here November 21. D'Indy will conduct the concerts in Boston on December 1 and 2, and the concerts in New York on December 7 and 9. His programmes for the two New York concerts, composed entirely of modern French music, will include works of his own and others by Chausson, Debussy and Dukas.

The Boston Symphony Quartet will give three concerts in Mendelssohn Hall this winter on Tuesdays, January 2, and February 6, and Wednesday, March 7. It is composed of Willy Hess, first violin; Otto Roth, second violin; Emile Ferir, viola, and Heinrich Warnke, 'cello.

1 ..... NEW YORK TIMES.

ess .....

NOV 12 1905

Vincent d'Indy, the distinguished French composer, who is to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a series of its concerts, will sail from Cherbourg on the Kaiser der Grosse on Wednesday, Nov. 15, and is, therefore, expected to arrive in New York on Tuesday, Nov. 21. M. d'Indy will conduct the concerts in Boston on Dec. 1 and 2 and the concerts in New York on Dec. 7 and 9, as well as concerts in that same week in Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, and Brooklyn. His programmes for the two New York concerts are composed entirely of modern French music. The numbers will include some works of his own and works by Chausson, Debussy, Dukas, and other men of that school.

ess .....

Gadski with Boston Orchestra.

Mme. Gadski's concert appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra Saturday afternoon provoked new regrets that she is no longer a member of Mr. Conried's opera troupe at the Metropolitan. The German soprano's voice is as full and rich as ever. Her singing is that of an artist; in Brunnhilde's final scene from "Gotterdammerung" she touched a high level of earnestness. And Mme. Gadski has by no means reached her prime.

Ellison Van Hoose has grown into one of the best of concert tenors; his singing on Saturday, especially of Siegfried's death scene, marked one of his best public accomplishments here.

With these soloists and a Wagner programme, the Boston orchestra drew an audience that left no seat in Carnegie Hall unoccupied. Mr. Gericke and the players were in brilliant mood.

From .....

Address 1 15 1905

MME. GADSKI AND WAGNER.

Also Ellison Van Hoose, Tenor, and the Admirable Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The first matinée concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's season took place at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. The programme was composed wholly of music by Richard Wagner and every seat in the house was sold an hour before the concert began. Hundreds of people were turned away, bitterly disappointed, and some of the departing women were almost on the verge of tears. From their conversation it was easy to learn that they bewailed not only missing a performance of Wagner music by the admired orchestra, but the loss of one of the rare opportunities to hear Mme. Gadski, the popular Wagnerian sopano.

Those who were in the house testified to their admiration of her art in no uncertain manner, and by loud and long continued applause paid a just tribute to the splendor of the freshest and most serviceable voice now to be heard in the later dramas of Wagner. This voice can be heard only in the concert room, unless one chooses to journey in the summer all the way to the Prinz Regenten Theatre in Munich, where it may be heard on the lyric stage. In the present dearth of young and rising Wagnerian singers the journey is almost worth while.

The programme which Mr. Gericke presented yesterday comprised the "Huldigungsmarsch," which is not often heard; the bacchanale from "Tannhauser"; the aria, "Dich theure Halle," from the same opera; the prize song from "Die Meistersinger," the duet from the first act of "Gotterdammerung," the death of Siegfried and the funeral march and Brunnhilde's final scene from the same drama. The singer of the Siegfried music and the prize song was Ellison Van Hoose, the American tenor, who was most cordially received, as he deserved to be.

Mr. Van Hoose has made steady and consistent progress in his art and his clear round tones are well suited to the Wagnerian music. He has sometimes sung with more vigor than he displayed yesterday. As for Mme. Gadski, it was, as we have intimated, a joy to hear her. She was especially interesting in the music of the "Gotterdammerung" Brunnhilde, which she has not yet sung here in the opera house, but with which she had a brilliant success in Munich last summer. She sang this music with brilliant, clear, vibrant voice, with enthusiasm and with understanding.

Mr. Gericke, as usual, gave a masterly illustration of how to be polite though Wagnerian. His readings were distinguished by nicety of tonal balance, by exquisite clarity and polish, and by ravishing beauty of instrumental sound. These are the features of orchestral performance upon which our Bostonian Arbiter Elegantiarum excels.

In Wagner he is a firm believer in the suaviter in modo, fortiter in re. But this makes one ardently wish that he would occasionally pull out the brass stop to its end.

In the climax of the funeral march, to paraphrase the poet, one blast upon the bugle horns were worth a thousand strings. But Mr. Gericke abhors blasts. He does not mind a moderate draught, but no blasts. Nevertheless the funeral march went with much breadth and solemnity. The best bits of orchestral playing, however, were the closing bars after the "Gotterdammerung" duet and the pyrographic finish of the Walhalla dynasty in the last scene.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

NEW YORK PRESS

om .....

ldress .....

NOV 19 1905

ate .....

The Boston Symphony Quartet, which will give a series of three concerts in Mendelssohn Hall, has engaged as assistant artists, Stojowsky, a Polish pianist, who has come to this country to be at the head of the piano department in the Institute of Musical Art; Susan Metcalf, soprano, and Olga Samaroff, pianist. Professor Willy Hess, the leader of the quartet, promises three interesting programmes.

Established: London, 1881; New York, 188

Boston Band Gives a Wagner Disconcert.

No one complained more strenuously than Wagner himself against [illegible] conductors and musical managers [illegible] to call a Wagner concert, but which to any one who knows is most decidedly a disconcert. His music, he declared, was written for the theatre, and it must have the theatrical accompaniments to be fully understood. Saturday afternoon in the Carnegie Hall the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave one of these disconcerts, but it is doubtful if Wagner would have been any the more reconciled to it, by the fact that the insult came from his intimate friends and self-appointed guardians, the Bostonians.

There is, of course, another side to the question of the value of the Wagner concert. In towns that are operaless every little bit helps, and nearly all things are welcome, but it is extremely doubtful if there is a very large demand for it in New York city, which has opera, and a rather good opera, for a quite respectable portion of the year. The mere fact that even here Wagner may be found furnishing the Sun[illegible] night programme for popular beer [illegible]rdens should hardly be taken as a pre[illegible]ent for the visiting band.

The opening number, "The March of Homage" and the "Prize Song" might be regarded as a part atonement for the rest of the violations. The former was played with superb accord. This was followed by the "Bacchanate" from "Tannhauser."

Mme. Johanna Gadski in singing Elisabeth's greeting was less happy than in the selections from "The Dusk of the Gods." In Brunnhilde's closing scene her best work was done. Even in the strenuous physical effort which this demanded Mme. Gadski's voice retained its purity and legato.

Mr. Van Hoose's higher notes were somewhat veiled in his singing of Walter's "Prize Song," a piece so lyric that it is not out of place in programme music.

But, Siegfried in formal afternoon dress, parting passionately from Brunnhilde in a picture hat! What's the use? As well King Lear in a clawhammer.

[illegible]ewspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

TOWN TOPICS

From .....

Address .....

NOV 15 1905

Date .....

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, chaperoned by Frederic Comee, began their twentieth season in New York by an evening concert and a matinee of usual date and dignity. At the first the soloist was Heinrich Warnke, the recently acquired first 'cellist of the orchestra. He played the Dvorak Concerto, which is one of the most ungrateful works imaginable, and as a matter of very frank fact he played it disappointingly. His tone was lovable only in spots, and his intonation was not like Cæsar's wife. I hope and believe he was nervous; and as some of my friendly enemies may challenge this attitude, I fortify myself by assuring them that Mr. Warnke is to be the first 'cellist and not the constant soloist of the orchestra. The orchestral numbers at this first concert were the Tschaikowsky Fourth Symphony—in which I missed a great deal of brutality that seems to be part and parcel of the Russian's emotional make-up—and Strauss's Tone-poem, "Death and Transfiguration." The latter also was refined of some of its "fever" beats—some stanch anti-Straussite insists upon calling this work the "Quinine Symphony"—and in consequence the tossings of the delirious invalid, pictured in tonal throbs, were comparatively gentlemanly. But Herr Gericke did unleash his orchestra a bit to my amazement. Much more was this the case at the matinee, when the brass of the band was allowed to puff some very rude blasts. This final concert was all Wagner, which is doubtless delightful to New Haven and Providence, but New York has four months of Opera, so that Wagner excerpts are a bit outmoded here. The orchestra played very wonderfully that afternoon. The concert served to let us hear Mme. Gadski in more wonderful vocal condition than I have ever heard her before. She had that usual incomparable brilliancy of the upper register, while her lower notes have taken on additional dramatic warmth. And about it all there was a freshness that is rare and fascinating in a dramatic soprano. It made me long to hear this voice at the Metropolitan again. Ellison Van Hoose was the other soloist, and he sang brilliantly and lyrically as ever. He seems neither to have lost nor to have gained in vocal charms.

A novelty added [illegible]

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From .....

Address .....

Date .....

On Thursday evening a large and cultivated audience greeted the Boston Symphony Orchestra (Mr. Gericke, conductor) upon its return to this city at its first concert of the season. Brahm's Academic Overture; Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration"; a Tschaikowsky selection in F minor, and Dvorak's 'Cello Concerto, opus 104, made up the program. In the latter number Heinrich Warnke, the new first 'cellist of the orchestra, was the assisting soloist. He played with skill and finish, but did not display great warmth or beauty of tone. He succeeded, however, to a certain extent in performing the difficult task of making interesting a concerto for the 'cello, an instrument of great loveliness of tone in both solo and ensemble works. The orchestra played with the marvelous finish and technical perfection for which it has long been noted, but, if anything, it is too perfect, for it lacks a certain amount of fire and buoyancy for which intense music lovers often long.

This quality was not so lacking at their next concert, which took place on Saturday afternoon, when a Wagner program was given. On this occasion Mme. Gadski and Ellison Van Hoose were the soloists. Both artists were in splendid form and sang with great effect.

From .....

Address ..... NOV 19 1905

Date .....

The Boston Symphony Quartet, which will give a series of three concerts in Mendelssohn Hall this winter, announces the following list of assisting artists: Tuesday evening, January 2, Mr. Stojowsky, the Polish pianist, who has come to this country to be at the head of the piano department in the Institute of Musical Art; Tuesday evening, February 6, Susan Metcalf, the popular soprano, and Wednesday evening, March 7, Mme. Olga Samaroff, the Russian pianist.

s .....

NOV 19 1905

The Boston Symphony Quartet, which will give a series of three concerts in Mendelssohn Hall this winter, announces the following list of assisting artists: Tuesday evening, January 2, Mr. Stojowsky, the Polish pianist, who has come to this country to be at the head of the piano department in the Institute of Musical Art; Tuesday evening, February 6, Susan Metcalf, the popular soprano, and Wednesday evening, March 7, Mme. Olga Samaroff, the Russian pianist. Prof. Willy Hess, the leader of the quartet, promises three very interesting programmes which will contain some important novelties. The quartet gave but one concert in New York last season and was most favorably received. From now on its concerts will be regular fixtures in the musical season.

N. Y. EVG. TELEGRAM

s .....

NOV 21 1905

Among the passengers on the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse, which is due to-day, is M. Vincent d'Indy, the French composer, who comes to this country by invitation to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a series of its concerts. M. d'Indy will conduct the orchestra in New York at its regular concerts on Thursday evening, December 7, and Saturday afternoon, December 9. By asking him to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra a firmly established precedent of twenty-four years was broken, for he will be the first musician, other than its regular conductor, to direct it at its regular concerts.

[illegible]shed

[96]

From

Address

Date

...ing the devotion ... to the concerts of the ... orchestra and especially re... the eager efforts to greet the open...

...of the season. Word now comes of the ...ewed interest not only of the moneyed pa... but of the faithful devotees who count ...joy to stand on the steps of Symphony ... through long Friday mornings from ...er to April, in fair weather or in foul, ...they may gain access to the 505 seventy-...ent seats of the upper gallery.

...on's 505 is necessarily made up of those ...om time is not money, for in order to ... one of these limited number of seats ...must be at the hall early in the morning ... afternoon concert. The majority of ... are women. They come singly and ...ks; they are of all ages, and they have ... pronounced air of business in this ...er at least than the men. They bring ... to read; they bring cushions and pa... folding camp stools to sit on; they bring ...ons to eat, and all bring slabs ... sweet chocolate. The mind stag... in the effort to compute the amount ... sweet chocolate consumed in a single sym... season upon the steps of Symphony ...

...and it sometimes happens that one of ...on's Four Hundred joins the 505 on the ...s of Symphony Hall. For she is de...mined to hear the symphony, and if there ...no ticket to be had at any price for the ... or the first balcony, she drives up to ...curb in her carriage, with coachman and ...man, and takes her place in the line, ...a bright new quarter tucked in her ...

...It is no small task for the attendants to ...ntain the line until the doors are opened. ...no do not stand the regulations, and ...ers are ready to evade them if they can. ...avoid speculation, no one is allowed to ...nge place or hold a place for another. ...every rehearsal day some one is disap...nted to find that he cannot keep a place ...r a friend, and that they must go to the ...end of the line together.

...1 o'clock draws near the scene grows ...animated. Every trolley car brings ...contribution of belated music lovers, who ...to the end of the line, hoping that they ...be among the 505.

...troupe of conservatory girls flutter half ...broking down the avenue, risking their ...ance of a seat rather than stand long in ...n. Often the line contains hundreds who ...cannot possibly gain admission.

...Promptly at 1 o'clock the door is opened, ...one must have his quarter ready—quar... not two dimes and a nickel, or a dollar, ...anything that requires change. Down ...ey go jingling into a burlap bag, and a ...with a ticket clicks off the numbers ...until 505 have entered, and the door of ...is closed for that day.

...There is some hurrying for seats, but not ..., for the crowd can enter only one by ..., and there is not a poor seat in the bal... It is a unique sight when the balcony ...packed and not a person in any other part ...f the hall.

...Such scenes are unique to Boston, but who ...will say what may occur in Brooklyn when ...have our new Academy—one of the finest ...the world. Meanwhile, it is pertinent to ...mark that the Boston Symphony Orches... which is honored abroad as well as in ...own city, will give their one hundred and ...one hundred and seventh, one hundred ...eighth, one hundred and ninth, and ...hundred and tenth concerts in Brooklyn ...during this season. The dates fixed upon are ...November 10, December 8, January 12, Feb...ruary 16, and March 16. As for several years ...these concerts are under Brooklyn In...stitute local management, and the books for ...subscribers will be opened on Tuesday ...evening next at the Art Building, 174 Mon... street. The soloists announced are ...Gadski, soprano; Alfred Reisenauer, ...ist; Willy Hess, violinist (concert mas... the orchestra), and Heinrich Warncke, ...new principal 'cellist of the orchestra. ...Gericke continues as conductor for the ...ton players, but a feature of the second ...cert of the series will be the appearance ...d'Indy, one of the distinguished French ...posers of the day, who will wield the ...n in Mr. Gericke's stead.

...These concerts by this orchestra have be... such an established institution here ...it is difficult to realize that this year ...mark the end of the first quarter cen... of its existence. So much has been ...lished in that time by the orchestra, ...mous has been the musical develop... of the country, due in no small de... the missionary work of the orches... its earlier years, that so far as the ...eneration of concert-goers is con... the orchestra seems always to have ...

...those that have worked with the ...the time seems to have been very ... that first memorable concert in ...Hall of Boston on October ...struggle to place the orchestra ...have was a long and hard one, ...and success came to gratify its ...all concerned in its manage... responded more quickly than ...city has been more loyal ...more generous in its ...of the Academy of ...Brook...

From

Address

Date

...Symphony Orchestra will give in the Baptist Temple in this city during the coming winter, under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, will number respectively 106, 107, 108, 109 and 110, for the last concert of last season was the 105th the orchestra has given in Brooklyn. Its concerts have become such an established institution in this city that it is difficult to realize that this year will mark the end of the first quarter century of its existence. So much has been accomplished in that time by the orchestra, so enormous has been the musical development of the country, due in no small degree to the missionary work of the orchestra in its earlier years, that so far as the present generation of concert-goers is concerned the orchestra seems always to have been.

But to those that have worked with the orchestra the time seems to have been very short since that first memorable concert in the old Music Hall of Boston on October 22, 1881. The struggle to place the orchestra on a proper basis was a long and hard one, but in the end success came to gratify its founder and all concerned in its management. No city responded more quickly than Brooklyn and no city has been more loyal than Brooklyn and more generous in its patronage. The burning of the Academy of Music was a misfortune for musical Brooklyn, but the patrons of the orchestra followed it loyally to the Baptist Temple. Next year it is promised that the beautiful new music hall will be completed, and when that happens the orchestra will feel that it has a home in Brooklyn second only to that in Boston.

The five concerts this year will be given as usual on Friday evenings, the dates being November 10, December 8, January 12, February 16 and March 16. The renewals of last year's subscribers are now proceeding at the office of the Institute, 502 Fulton st. Books for new subscribers will be opened on Tuesday evening, October 24, at the Art Building, 174 Montague street.

The concerts this year promise to be unusually attractive. The list of soloists is strong, the novelties promise well and, above all, Brooklyn will be enabled to make the acquaintance of the most distinguished French composer of to-day, M. Vincent d'Indy, who will conduct a programme of modern French music at the December concert.

The soloists will be Mme. Gadski at the first concert; Alfred Reisenauer, the distinguished pianist, at the third; Professor Willy Hess, the violinist who made so favorable impression last year, at the fourth; and Heinrich Warnke, the new principal 'cellist of the orchestra, at the fifth. For the second concert no soloist is announced, as M. d'Indy's programme does not provide for one.

Of M. d'Indy, much will be said later. Suffice to say now, he is the foremost composer of France, the acknowledged leader of the advanced school known as the "younger Frenchmen," the director of the celebrated Schola Cantorum, of Paris, of which he was one of the founders, the dictator of all things pertaining to music in his country. Much of his music has been played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and greatly admired. He has had great success as a "guest" conductor in Germany and Vienna, and his visit promises to be the musical sensation of the year.

Mme. Gadski, Mr. Reisenauer and Professor Hess need no introduction to Brooklyn. Mr. Warnke, the new principal 'cellist, engaged to take the place of Mr. Krasselt, comes from the Kaim Orchestra of Munich, where for the past eight years he has been the principal 'cellist. His engagement was due largely to the very warm recommendations of Felix Weingartner and Richard Strauss.

The novelties will be chosen from the list made up by Mr. Gericke, for the Boston concerts. This list includes: Mahler, Symphony, No. 5; Amherst Webber-Symphony in E major; Sir Edward Elgar-Overture, "In the South," "Chanson de Nuit," "Chanson de Matin"; Glazounow-symphonic poem, "Le Kremlin"; Boehe-symphonic poem, "Odysseus Ausfahrt und Schiffbruck"; Busoni-overture, "Lustspiel," and suite "Geharnischte"; Max Schilling-overture, "Der Pfeifertag"; Smetana-overture, "Libussa," and Eugene d'Harcourt-overture, "Le Tasse."

...1051

The Boston Orchestra in Brooklyn.

Five concerts will be given at the Baptist Temple, Brooklyn, this season by Mr. Gericke and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the joint auspices of the Institute of Arts and Sciences, and the Ladies' Auxiliary Board of the Institute; the dates are Friday evenings, November 10, December 8, January 12, February 16, March 16. The soloists to be heard are Mme. Gadski, Vincent D'Indy, Alfred Reisenauer, Willy Hess, Heinrich Warnke. Students' tickets may be obtained at reduced rates.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

Standard Union

m

Brooklyn

ress

e

OCT 15 1903

Mme. Gadski will be the soloist at the first Boston Symphony concert (Brooklyn Institute and Brooklyn Philharmonic Society, at the Baptist Temple, Friday, Nov. 10.

[illegible]

[97]

Standard Union

Brooklyn, N. Y.

ess

In the Mer...

THE season ticket sale for new subscribers to the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which are given under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, will open on next Tuesday evening, at the Art Building, 174 Montague street. Meanwhile the subscribers of last season have been securing their old seats, and the number of renewals is considerably larger than last year, indicating that the coming season will be most successful. The five concerts will be given as usual on Friday evenings, in the Baptist Temple, the dates being Nov. 10, Dec. 8, Jan. 12, Feb. 16 and March 18. Mr. Gericke has arranged a particularly attractive set of programmes. The list of soloists is strong, the novelties promise well, and, above all, Brooklyn will be enabled to become acquainted with the French composer of to-day, M. Vincent d'Indy, who will conduct a programme of modern French music at the December concert. The soloists will be Mme Gadski, at the first concert; Alfred Reisenauer, the pianist, at the third; Prof. Willy Hess, the concertmeister, at the fourth; and Heinrich Warnke, the new principal 'cellist of the orchestra, at the fifth. For the second concert no soloist is announced, as M. d'Indy's programme does not provide for one. M. d'Indy is director of the Schola Cantorum of Paris, of which he was a founder. Much of his music has been played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and greatly admired. He has had a great success as a "guest" conductor in Germany and Vienna, and his coming to America promises to be the musical sensation of the season. The novelties for the concerts will be chosen from the list prepared by Mr. Gericke for the Boston concerts. This list includes among other things: Mahler—Symphony No. 5. Amherst Webber—Symphony in E major. Sir Edward Elgar—Overture, "In the South," "Chanson de Nuit," "Chanson de Matin." Glazounow—Symphonic poem, "Le Kremlin." Boehe—Symphonic poem, "Odusseus Ausfahrt und Schiffbruck." Busoni—Overture, "Lustspiel," suite "Geharnischte." Max Schilling—Overture, "Der Pfeifertag." Smetana—Overture, "Libussa," and Eugene d'Harcourt—Overture, "Le Tasse."

m

ress

FALL MUSIC EVENTS IN QUICK SUCCESSION

Bispham to Give First Institute Song Recital.

SOUSA AT THE HIPPODROME.

Boston Symphony Plans for Brooklyn—Other Concerts Near at Hand in Two Boroughs.

The season ticket sale for new subscribers to the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will again be given under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, will open on next Tuesday evening, Oct. 24, at the Art Building, No. 174 Montague street. Meanwhile the subscribers of last season have been securing their old seats and the number of renewals is considerably larger than last year, indicating that the coming season will be most successful.

The five concerts will be given as usual on Friday evenings in the Baptist Temple, the dates being Nov. 10, Dec. 8, Jan. 12, Feb. 16 and March 16.

The soloists will be Mme. Gadski at the first concert, Mr. Alfred Reisenauer, the distinguished pianist, at the third; Prof. Willy Hess, the violinist who made so favorable an impression last year, at the fourth, and Heinrich Warnke, the new principal 'cellist of the orchestra, at the fifth. For the second concert no soloist is announced, as M. d'Indy's programme does not provide for one.

The novelties for the concerts will be chosen from the list prepared by Mr. Gericke for the Boston concerts. This list includes among other things, Mahler, Symphony No. 5; Amherst Webber, Symphony in E Major; Sir Edward Elgar, overture, "In The South;" "Chanson de Nuit," "Chanson de Matin;" Glazounow, symphonic poem, "Le Kremlin;" Boehe, symphonic poem, "Odysseus Ausfahrt und [illegible] Busoni, overture, "Lustspiel," suite "Geharnischte;" Max Schilling, overture, "Der Pfeifertag;" Smetana, overture, "Libussa," and Eugene d'Harcourt, overture, "Le Tasse."

WOMEN DISCUSS THE MUNICIPAL THEATRE

Philharmonic Auxiliary Deeply Interested in the Academy of of Music.

The regular autumn meeting of the Woman's Auxiliary Board on Philharmonic Concerts was held at 174 Montague street Saturday afternoon, Mrs. Camden C. Dike presiding. In the absence of Mrs. Frank M. Lupton, Mrs. Franklin W. Hooper acted as secretary. A meeting of the Executive Committee of the Board was held that morning and informal report made of it and of the period since the last general meeting, by its chairman, Mrs. Andrew Jacobs. She said that all returns are not yet in, but that the auxiliary has raised quite a sum of money toward the Academy of Music fund, though not what was desired. Mrs. Hooper and Mrs. Francis Young were elected to fill vacancies on the board left by the resignations of Mrs. Stuart H. Moore and Mrs. Henry A. Powell.

The Boston Symphony artists for the season were announced, and the lectures to precede each concert by Henry E. Krehbial, Henry T. Finck, William J. Henderson, Charles M. Skinner and Louis C. Elson, respectively, which are made possible through the generosity of the late Henry K. Sheldon, who left a fund whose income is to be used for such purposes. Mrs. Hooper, Mrs. Paul Lichtenstein, Mrs. J. Elliot Langstaff, and the chairman were appointed a committee to confer with Mrs. H. H. A. Beach with regard to giving a concert here of her own works, and with assisting artists. The report was approved.

Miss Jessie Mattison, Mrs. John An-

ss

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Baptist Temple on a week from next Friday evening, Nov. 10. The sale of season tickets, which has been in progress at the Institute of Arts and Sciences for the past week, lasts only another week, and all those intending to get season tickets for the series have not much time left in which to secure good seats. The sale has been very large, and the coming series promises to be the best the orchestra has ever had in Brooklyn. For his first programme Mr. Gericke has arranged a most interesting set of works. The soloist will be Mme. Johanna Gadski, always a great favorite in Brooklyn, who returns this year laden with the new honors acquired in Germany during the summer by her appearances in Cologne and Munich. She will sing two arias, to be announced later. The orchestral numbers will be three. The first will be Brahms' "Academic Overture," which is always a favorite, if only because it contains some of the best known of the German student songs. The second number will be a novelty, Dvorak's symphonic poem "Die Waltaube" (The Wild Dove), which when performed in Boston the other day was not only well received, but made something of a sensation. The last number will be Tschaikowsky's symphony in F minor, No. 4. This is the least well known of the last three symphonies by the great Russian master, but by many critics it is ranked higher than the fifth, in E minor, and little below, the sixth, the "Pathetique." It contains that charming scherzo marked "pizzicate ostinato," which more than almost any other work displays the remarkable virtuosity of the Boston Orchestra. The sale of tickets for the first concert will begin Nov. 1.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

ss

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLANS.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has just published its little Year Book showing its complete bookings for the season. Altogether, including those which have already been given, the orchestra will give 100 concerts, its season ending in Boston on Saturday, April 28. Forty-eight of the concerts will be given in its home city. New York comes next with ten and Brooklyn with six. Then come Boston, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington with five each, Providence and Hartford with three each and Buffalo, Worcester and Portland, Me., with two each. The others are scattered among the principal towns of New York State and New England. The season promises to be the most prosperous in the history of the [illegible]

Newspaper Cutting Bureau

From

Address

Date

It is the season when some word is sure to come from Boston regarding the devotion of loyal music lovers to the concerts of the Symphony Orchestra and especially respecting the eager efforts to greet the opening of the season. Word now comes of the renewed interest not only of the moneyed patrons but of the faithful devotees who count it joy to stand on the steps of Symphony Hall through long Friday mornings from October to April, in fair weather or in foul, that they may gain access to the 505 ewenty-five cent seats of the upper gallery.

Boston's 505 is necessarily made up of those to whom time is not money, for in order to secure one of these limited number of seats one must be at the hall early in the morning for the afternoon concert. The majority of the 505 are women. They come singly and in flocks; they are of all ages, and they have a more pronounced air of business in this matter at least than the men. They bring books to read; they bring cushions and patent folding camp stools to sit on; they bring luncheons to eat, and all bring slabs of sweet chocolate. The mind staggers in the effort to compute the amount of sweet chocolate consumed in a single symphony season upon the steps of Symphony Hall.

And it sometimes happens that one of Boston's Four Hundred joins the 505 on the steps of Symphony Hall. For she is determined to hear the symphony, and if there is no ticket to be had at any price for the floor or the first balcony, she drives up to the curb in her carriage, with coachman and footman, and takes her place in the line, with a bright new quarter tucked in her glove.

It is no small task for the attendants to maintain the line until the doors are opened. Some do not stand the regulations, and others are ready to evade them if they can. To avoid speculation, no one is allowed to change place or hold a place for another. On every rehearsal day some one is disappointed to find that he cannot keep a place for a friend, and that they must go to the tail-end of the line together.

As 1 o'clock draws near the scene grows more animated. Every trolley car brings its contribution of belated music lovers, who rush to the end of the line, hoping that they may be among the 505.

Groups of conservatory girls flutter half shrieking down the avenue, risking their chance of a seat rather than stand long in line. Often the line contains hundreds who cannot possibly gain admission.

Promptly at 1 o'clock the door is opened, and one must have his quarter ready—quarter, not two dimes and a nickel, or a dollar, nor anything that requires change. Down they go jingling into a burlap bag, and a man with a ticket clicks off the numbers until 505 have entered, and the door of hope is closed for that day.

There is some hurrying for seats, but not much, for the crowd can enter only one by one, and there is not a poor seat in the balcony. It is a unique sight when the balcony is packed and not a person in any other part of the hall.

Such scenes are unique to Boston, but who shall say what may occur in Brooklyn when we have our new Academy—one of the finest in the world. Meanwhile, it is pertinent to remark that the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is honored abroad as well as in its own city, will give their one hundred and sixth, one hundred and seventh, one hundred and eighth, one hundred and ninth, and one hundred and tenth concerts in Brooklyn during this season. The dates fixed upon are November 10, December 8, January 12, February 16, and March 16. As for several years past, these concerts are under Brooklyn Institute local management, and the books for new subscribers will be opened on Tuesday evening next at the Art Building, 174 Montague street. The soloists announced are Mme. Gadski, soprano; Alfred Reisenauer, pianist; Willy Hess, violinist (concert master of the orchestra), and Heinrich Warncke, the new principal 'cellist of the orchestra. Mr. Gericke continues as conductor for the Boston players, but a feature of the second concert of the series will be the appearance of M. d'Indy, one of the distinguished French composers of the day, who will wield the baton in Mr. Gericke's stead.

The concerts by this orchestra have become such an established institution here that it is difficult to realize that this year will mark the end of the first quarter century of its existence. So much has been accomplished in that time by the orchestra, so enormous has been the musical development of the country, due in no small degree to the missionary work of the orchestra in its earlier years, that so far as the present generation of concert-goers is concerned, the orchestra seems always to have been.

But to those that have worked with the orchestra the time seems to have been very short since that first memorable concert in the old Music Hall of Boston on October 22, 1881. The struggle to place the orchestra on a proper basis was a long and hard one, but in the end success came to gratify its founder, and all concerned in its management. No city responded more quickly than Brooklyn, and no city has been more loyal than Brooklyn nor more generous in its patronage. The burning of the Academy of Music was a misfortune for musical Brooklyn, but the patrons of the orchestra followed it loyally to the Baptist Temple. Next year it is promised that the beautiful new music hall will be completed, and when that happens the orchestra will feel that it has a home in Brooklyn second only to that in Boston.

From

Address

Date

Five concerts, which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in the Baptist Temple in this city during the coming winter, under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, will number respectively 106, 107, 108, 109 and 110, for the last concert of last season was the 105th the orchestra has given in Brooklyn. Its concerts have become such an established institution in this city that it is difficult to realize that this year will mark the end of the first quarter century of its existence. So much has been accomplished in that time by the orchestra, so enormous has been the musical development of the country, due in no small degree to the missionary work of the orchestra in its earlier years, that so far as the present generation of concert-goers is concerned the orchestra seems always to have been.

But to those that have worked with the orchestra the time seems to have been very short since that first memorable concert in the old Music Hall of Boston on October 22, 1881. The struggle to place the orchestra on a proper basis was a long and hard one, but in the end success came to gratify its founder and all concerned in its management. No city responded more quickly than Brooklyn and no city has been more loyal than Brooklyn and more generous in its patronage. The burning of the Academy of Music was a misfortune for musical Brooklyn, but the patrons of the orchestra followed it loyally to the Baptist Temple. Next year it is promised that the beautiful new music hall will be completed, and when that happens the orchestra will feel that it has a home in Brooklyn second only to that in Boston.

The five concerts this year will be given as usual on Friday evenings, the dates being November 10, December 8, January 12, February 16 and March 16. The renewals of last year's subscribers are now proceeding at the office of the Institute, 502 Fulton st. Books for new subscribers will be opened on Tuesday evening, October 24, at the Art Building, 174 Montague street.

The concerts this year promise to be unusually attractive. The list of soloists is strong, the novelties promise well and, above all, Brooklyn will be enabled to make the acquaintance of the most distinguished French composer of to-day, M. Vincent d'Indy, who will conduct a programme of modern French music at the December concert.

The soloists will be Mme. Gadski at the first concert; Alfred Reisenauer, the distinguished pianist, at the third; Professor Willy Hess, the violinist who made so favorable impression last year, at the fourth; and Heinrich Warnke, the new principal 'cellist of the orchestra, at the fifth. For the second concert no soloist is announced, as M. d'Indy's programme does not provide for one.

Of M. d'Indy, much will be said later. Suffice to say now, he is the foremost composer of France, the acknowledged leader of the advanced school known as the "younger Frenchmen," the director of the celebrated Schola Cantorum, of Paris, of which he was one of the founders, the dictator of all things pertaining to music in his country. Much of his music has been played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and greatly admired. He has had great success as a "guest" conductor in Germany and Vienna, and his visit promises to be the musical sensation of the year.

Mme. Gadski, Mr. Reisenauer and Professor Hess need no introduction to Brooklyn. Mr. Warnke, the new principal 'cellist, engaged to take the place of Mr. Krasselt, comes from the Kaim Orchestra of Munich, where for the past eight years he has been the principal 'cellist. His engagement was due largely to the very warm recommendations of Felix Weingartner and Richard Strauss.

The novelties will be chosen from the list made up by Mr. Gericke, for the Boston concerts. This list includes: Mahler, Symphony, No. 5; Amherst Webber-Symphony in E major; Sir Edward Elgar-Overture, "In the South," "Chanson de Nuit," "Chanson de Matin"; Glazouncw-symphonic poem, "Le Kremlin"; Boehe-symphonic poem, "Odysseus Ausfahrt und Schiffbruck"; Busoni-overture, "Lustspiel," and suite "Geharnischte"; Max Schilling-overture, "Der Pfeifertag"; Smetana-overture, "Libussa"; and Eugene d'Harcourt-overture, "Le Tasse."

The Boston Orchestra in Brooklyn.

Five concerts will be given at the Baptist Temple, Brooklyn, this season by Mr. Gericke and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the joint auspices of the Institute of Arts and Sciences, and the Ladies' Auxiliary Board of the institute; the dates are Friday evenings, November 10, December 8, January 12, February 16, March 16. The soloists to be heard are Mme. Gadski, Vincent D'Indy, Alfred Reisenauer, Willy Hess, Heinrich Warnke. Students' tickets may be obtained at reduced rates.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau of the World

m

ress

e

Brooklyn Eagle

Mme. Gadski will be the soloist at the first Boston Symphony concert (Brooklyn Institute and Brooklyn Philharmonic Society, at the Baptist Temple, Friday, Nov. 10.

In the Wor

THE season ticket sale for new subscribers to the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which are given under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, will open on next Tuesday evening, at the Art Building, 174 Montague street. Meanwhile the subscribers of last season have been securing their old seats, and the number of renewals is considerably larger than last year, indicating that the coming season will be most successful. The five concerts will be given as usual on Friday evenings, in the Baptist Temple, the dates being Nov. 10, Dec. 8, Jan. 12, Feb. 16 and March 18. Mr. Gericke has arranged a particularly attractive set of programmes. The list of soloists is strong, the novelties promise well, and, above all, Brooklyn will be enabled to become acquainted with the French composer of to-day, M. Vincent d'Indy, who will conduct a programme of modern French music at the December concert. The soloists will be Mme Gadski, at the first concert; Alfred Reisenauer, the pianist, at the third; Prof. Willy Hess, the concertmeister, at the fourth; and Heinrich Warnke, the new principal 'cellist of the orchestra, at the fifth. For the second concert no soloist is announced, as M. d'Indy's programme does not provide for one. M. d'Indy is director of the Schola Cantorum of Paris, of which he was a founder. Much of his music has been played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and greatly admired. He has had a great success as a "guest" conductor in Germany and Vienna, and his visit promises to be the musical sensation of the season. The novelties for the concerts will be chosen from the list prepared by Mr. Gericke for the Boston concerts. This list includes among other things: Mahler—Symphony No. 5. Amherst Webber—Symphony in E major. Sir Edward Elgar—Overture, "In the South," "Chanson de Nuit," "Chanson de Matin." Glazounow—Symphonic poem, "Le Kremlin." Boehe—Symphonic poem, "Odusseus Ausfahrt und Schiffbruck." Busoni—Overture, "Lustspiel," suite "Geharnischte." Max Schilling—Overture, "Der Pfeifertag." Smetana—Overture, "Libussa," and Eugene d'Harcourt—Overture, "Le Tasse."

m

ress

FALL MUSIC EVENTS IN QUICK SUCCESSION

Bispham to Give First Institute Song Recital.

SOUSA AT THE HIPPODROME.

Boston Symphony Plans for Brooklyn—Other Concerts Near at Hand in Two Boroughs.

The season ticket sale for new subscribers to the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will again be given under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, will open on next Tuesday evening, Oct. 24, at the Art Building, No. 174 Montague street. Meanwhile the subscribers of last season have been securing their old seats and the number of renewals is considerably larger than last year, indicating that the coming season will be most successful.

The five concerts will be given as usual on Friday evenings in the Baptist Temple, the dates being Nov. 10, Dec. 3, Jan. 12, Feb. 16 and March 16.

The solosits will be Mme. Gadski at the first concert, Mr. Alfred Reisenauer, the distinguished pianist, at the third; Prof. Willy Hess, the violinist who made so favorable an impression last year, at the fourth, and Heinrich Warnke, the new principal 'cellist of the orchestra, at the fifth. For the second concert no solosist is announced, as M. d'Indy's programme does not provide for one.

The novelties for the concerts will be chosen from the list prepared by Mr. Gericke for the Boston concerts. This list includes among other things, Mahler, Symphony No. 5; Amherst Webber, Symphony in E Major; Sir Edward Elgar, overture, "In The South;" "Chanson de Nuit;" "Chanson de Matin;" Glazounow, symphonic poem, "Le Kremlin;" Boehe, symphonic poem, "Odysseus Ausfahrt und Schiffbruck;" Busoni, overture, "Lustspiel," suite "Geharnischte;" Max Schilling, overture, "Der Pfeifertag;" Smetana, overture, "Libussa," and Eugene d'Harcourt—overture, "Le Tasse."

WOMEN DISCUSS THE MUNICIPAL THEATRE

Philharmonic Auxiliary Deeply Interested in the Academy of of Music.

The regular autumn meeting of the Woman's Auxiliary Board on Philharmonic Concerts was held at 174 Montague street Saturday afternoon, Mrs. Camden C. Dike presiding. In the absence of Mrs. Frank M. Lupton, Mrs. Franklin W. Hooper acted as secretary. A meeting of the Executive Committee of the Board was held that morning and informal report made of it and of the period since the last general meeting, by its chairman, Mrs. Andrew Jacobs. She said that all returns are not yet in, but that the auxiliary has raised quite a sum of money toward the Academy of Music fund, though not what was desired. Mrs. Hooper and Mrs. Francis Young were elected to fill vacancies on the board left by the resignations of Mrs. Stuart H. Moore and Mrs. Henry A. Powell.

The Boston Symphony artists for the season were announced, and the lectures to precede each concert by Henry E. Krehbial, Henry T. Finck, William J. Henderson, Charles M. Skinner and Louis C. Elson, respectively, which are made possible through the generosity of the late Henry K. Sheldon, who left a fund whose income is to be used for such purposes. Mrs. Hooper, Mrs. Paul Lichtenstein, Mrs. J. Elliot Langstaff, and the chairman were appointed a committee to confer with Mrs. H. H. A. Beach with regard to giving a concert here of her own works, and with assisting artists. The report was approved.

Miss Jessie Mattison, Mrs. John An-

ss

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Baptist Temple on a week from next Friday evening, Nov. 10. The sale of season tickets, which has been in progress at the Institute of Arts and Sciences for the past week, lasts only another week, and all those intending to get season tickets for the series have not much time left in which to secure good seats. The sale has been very large, and the coming series promises to be the best the orchestra has ever had in Brooklyn. For his first programme Mr. Gericke has arranged a most interesting set of works. The soloist will be Mme. Johanna Gadski, always a great favorite in Brooklyn, who returns this year laden with the new honors acquired in Germany during the summer by her appearances in Cologne and Munich. She will sing two arias, to be announced later. The orchestral numbers will be three. The first will be Brahms' "Academic Overture," which is always a favorite, if only because it contains some of the best known of the German student songs. The second number will be a novelty, Dvorak's symphonic poem "Die Waltaube" (The Wild Dove), which when performed in Boston the other day was not only well received, but made something of a sensation. The last number will be Tschaikowsky's symphony in F minor, No. 4. This is the least well known of the last three symphonies by the great Russian master, but by many critics it is ranked higher than the fifth, in E minor, and little below, the sixth, the "Pathetique." It contains that charming scherzo marked "pizzicate ostinato," which more than almost any other work displays the remarkable virtuosity of the Boston Orchestra. The sale of tickets for the first concert will begin Nov. 1.

ss

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLANS.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has just published its little Year Book showing its complete bookings for the season. Altogether, including those which have already been given, the orchestra will give 100 concerts, its season ending in Boston on Saturday, April 28. Forty-eight of its concerts will be given in its home city. New York comes next with ten and Cambridge with six. Then come Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington with five each, Providence and Hartford with three each and Buffalo, Worcester and Portland, Me., with two each. The others are scattered among the cities and towns of New York State and New England. The season promises to be the most prosperous in the history of the orches-

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Baptist Temple Nov. 10. The sale of season tickets will last only another week. The sale has been very large and the coming series promises to be the best the orchestra has ever had in Brooklyn.

For his first programme Mr. Gericke has arranged a most interesting set of works. The soloist will be Mme. Johanna Gadski, always a great favorite in Brooklyn, who returns this year laden with the new honors acquired in Germany during the summer by her appearances in Cologne and Munich. She will sing two arias.

The orchestral numbers will be three. The first will be Brahm's "Academic Overture," which is always a favorite, if only because it contains some of the best known of the German student songs. The second number will be a novelty, Dvorak's symphonic poem, "Die Waltaube" (The Wild Dove), which, when performed in Boston the other day, was not only well received, but made something of a sensation. The last number will be Tschaikowsky's symphony in F minor, No. 4. This is the least well known of the last three symphonies by the great Russian master, but by many critics it is ranked higher than the Fifth—in E minor—and little below the Sixth—the "Pathetique." It contains that charming scherzo marked "Pizzicato ostinato;" which more than almost any other work displays the remarkable virtuosity of the Boston Orchestra.

The sale of tickets for the first concert will begin Nov. 1.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has just published its little Year Book, showing its complete bookings for the season. Altogether including those which have already been given, the orchestra will give 109 concerts, its season ending in Boston on Saturday, April 28. Forty-eight of its concerts will be given in its home city. New York comes next with ten and Cambridge with six. Then comes Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington with five each. Providence and Hartford with three each, and Buffalo, Worcester and Portland, Me., with two each. The others are scattered among the cities and towns of New York State and New England. The season promises to be the most prosperous in the history of the orchestra. Not only was the week's trip to Canada and the middle West very profitable, but everywhere, without a single exception, the subscriptions show a substantial increase over those of last year. In Washington, where five concerts are to be given for the first time in seven years, the New National Theatre has been entirely sold out by subscription.

"Melody Manor" is the name which Ellison Van Hoose has hit upon for his country place, and the tenor is said to be so taken up with the novelty of raising everything from chickens to peaches that his manager has had to make all sorts of dire threats to induce the newly fledged farmer to leave the joys of agriculture for the toils of the concert stage. The tales of marvelous melons and pumpkins, for which Van Hoose has stood sponsor, have only been exceeded in size by the melons and pumpkins themselves, while the latter's flavor, according to their enthusiastic progenitor, would make ordinary fruit and vegetables give up trying in confusion. Van Hoose, who will tour the country under Loudon G. Charlton's direction, will open his season in Boston, November 3, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Baptist Temple a week from next Friday evening, November 10. The sale of season tickets which has been in progress at the Institute of Arts and Sciences for the past week lasts only another week, and all those intending to get season tickets for the series have not much time left in which to secure good seats. The sale has been very large and the coming series promises to be the best the orchestra has ever had in Brooklyn. For his first programme Mr. Gericke has arranged a most interesting set of works. The soloists will be Mme. Johanna Gadski, always a great favorite in Brooklyn, who returns this year laden with the new honors acquired in Germany during the summer by her appearances in Cologne and Munich. She will sing two arias, to be announced later. The orchestral numbers will be three. The first will be Brahms' "Academic Overture," which is always a favorite if only because it contains some of the best known of the German student songs. The second number will be a novelty, Dvorak's symphonic poem, "Die Waltaube" ("The Wild Dove"), which, when performed in Boston the other day, was not only well received but made something of a sensation. The last number will be Tschaikowsky's Symphony in F minor, No. 4. This is the least well known of the last three symphonies by the great Russian master, but by many critics it is ranked higher than the Fifth (in E minor) and little below the Sixth, the "Pathetique." It contains that charming sherzo marked "Pizzicato Ostinato," which, more than almost any other work, displays the remarkable virtuosity of the Boston orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has just published its little Year Book showing its complete bookings for the season. Altogether, including those which have already been given, the orchestra will give 109 concerts, its season ending in Boston on Saturday, April 28. Forty-eight of its concerts will be given in its home city. New York comes next with ten and Cambridge with six. Then come Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington with five each, Providence and Hartford with three each, and Buffalo, Worcester and Portland, Me., with two each. The others are scattered among the cities and towns of New York State and New England. The season promises to be the most prosperous in the history of the orchestra. Not only was the week's trip to Canada and the Middle West very profitable, but everywhere, without a single exception, the subscriptions show a substantial increase over those of last year. In Washington, where five concerts are to be given for the first time in seven years, the New National Theatre has been entirely sold out on subscription. The season sale of seats for the Brooklyn season is now in progress at the Brooklyn Institute office.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Baptist Temple next Friday evening at 8:15 o'clock. The return of this favorite organization will signify that Brooklyn's musical season, which is so well cared for by the Institute of Arts and Sciences, is at last under full swing. Always there are a few scattering concerts in the early autumn, but with the symphony season the serious work of the winter for music-lovers really begins.

This year Boston's great band returns to us stronger and better than ever. The few changes which have been made in the personnel have, so report has it, been entirely for the better. Mr. Warnke, the new principal 'cellist, who will be heard here later as a soloist, met with a most flattering reception at his debut in Boston week before last. Mr. Sadony, the new first bassoon, seems to have given the finishing touch to the wonderful perfection of the wood-winds. His tone is remarkably smooth and mellow and his reputation of being the best bassoon in Germany seems likely to be completely confirmed in this country. Mr. Max Hess, of Munich, the new alternate first horn, has also been a marked success. Now the Boston Symphony Orchestra stands in the unique position of being sufficient unto itself, for it possesses two first in every group of the wind instruments and need no longer have to rely on outside help.

The soloist at the first grand concert will be Mme. Gadski, for a long time one of Brooklyn's favorite singers, and this year more interesting than ever because of her triumphs won last summer in Germany. She will sing twice.

The orchestra numbers are all of them very attractive, and it is likely that the orchestra's performance of Tschaikowsky's F minor symphony will cause a sensation. It did in Boston, when it was played there on the 20th and 21st.

The programme in full is as follows: Academic Overture, Brahms; recitative and aria from "Der Freischutz," "Wie nahte mir der Schlummer," Weber; Symphonic poem, "Die Waldtaube" (first time at these concerts), Dvorak; recitative and aria from "Le Nozze di Figaro, "Dove sono," Mozart; Symphony No. 4, in F minor, Tschaikowsky, soloist, Mme. Gadski.

The first of the season's concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Baptist Temple on next Friday evening, November 10, at 8:15 o'clock. The return of this favorite organization will signify that Brooklyn's musical season, which is so well cared for by the Institute of Arts and Sciences, is at last under full swing. Always there are a few scattering concerts in the early autumn, but with the symphony season the serious work of the winter for music-lovers really begins. This year Boston's great band returns to us stronger and better than ever. The few changes which have been made in the personnel have, so report has it, been entirely for the better. Mr. Warnke, the new principal 'cellist, who will be heard here later as a soloist, met with a most flattering reception at his debut in Boston week before last. Mr. Sadony, the new first bassoon, seems to have given the finishing touch to the wonderful perfection of the wood winds. His tone is remarkably smooth and mellow and his reputation of being the best bassoon in Germany seems likely to be completely confirmed in this country. Max Hess of Munich, the new alternate first horn, has also been a marked success. Now the Boston Symphony Orchestra stands in the unique position of being sufficient unto itself, for it possesses two firsts in every group of the wind instruments and need no longer have to rely on outside help. With its ninety-six men, the orchestra is divided as follows: First violins, 16; second violins, 14; violas, 10; 'celli, 10; basses, 8; flutes, 4; oboes, 3; English horn, 1; clarinets, 3; bass clarinets, 1; bassoons, 4; contrabassoon, 1; horns, 6; trumpets, 4; trombones, 3; and harp, tuba, tympani, drums, cymbals, triangle, tambour, castanets, and librarian, each 1. Thus it is the most complete orchestra in this country and the largest traveling orchestra in the world.

The soloist at the first concert will be Mme. Gadski, for a long time one of Brooklyn's favorite singers, and this year more interesting than ever because of her triumphs won last summer in Germany when she astonished her compatriots in Munich at the Wagner festival by her superb singing of "Brunnhilde" in the third performance of "The Ring" at the Prinz Regenten Theater. She will sing twice.

The orchestra numbers are all of them very attractive, and it is likely that the orchestra's performance of Tschaikowsky's F minor symphony will cause a sensation. It did in Boston when it was played there on the 20th and 21st. The general consensus of opinion was that Mr. Gericke had never given a more beautiful reading of any work than he did of this, and that the orchestra had never played more superbly. After the wonderful "Pizzicato" scherzo it was some minutes before the concert could be resumed so prolonged was the applause.

The programme in full is as follows:

Academic overture ..... Brahms
Recitative and Aria from "Der Freischutz," "Wie nahte mir der Schlummer" ..... Weber
Symphonic poem, Die Waldtaube ..... Dvorak
(First time at these concerts.)
Recitative and Aria from "Le Nozze di Figaro," "Dove sono" ..... Mozart
Symphony No. 4 in F minor ..... Tschaikowsky
Soloist—Mme. Gadski.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Brooklyn Institute's department of music, together with the Philharmonic Society, have arranged for the first concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, William Gericke, conductor, to be held at the Baptist Temple on Friday evening, Nov. 10, at 8.15 o'clock P. M. Mme. Gadski, the soprano soloist, will appear.

38

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will come to Brooklyn next week for the first concert of its annual series to be given on Friday evening at the Baptist Temple. Mme. Gadski will be the soloist, and will sing arias from "Der Freischutz" and "Le Nozze di Figaro." The orchestra will give Brahms' Academic Overture, Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony and for the first time at these concerts Dvorak's symphonic poem, "Die Waldtaube."

This orchestra is the leader among organizations of its kind before the public, and its occasional visits are among the most welcome musical events of the season. It is said that the orchestra will return in better form than ever. The few changes which have been made in the personnel have, so report has it, been entirely for the better. Mr. Warnke, the new principal 'cellist who will be heard here later as a soloist met with a most flattering reception at his debut in Boston week before last. Mr. Sadony, is the new first bassoon and Max Hess, of Munich, the new alternate first horn. Now the Boston Orchestra stands in the unique position of having two first or solo players in every group of the wind instruments, and need no longer have to rely on outside help.

MME. GADSKI.
Soloist at first Brooklyn concert of Symphony Orchestra.

With its ninety-six men, the orchestra is divided as follows: First violins, 16; second violins, 14; violas, 10; 'celli, 10; basses, 8; flutes, 4; oboes, 3; English horn, 1; clarinets, 3; bass clarinets, 1; bassoons, 4; contrabassoon, 1; horns, 6; trumpets, 4; trombones, 3; and harp, tuba, tympani, drums, cymbals, triangle, tambour, castanets and librarian, each one. Thus it is the most complete [illegible] in this country, and the largest traveling orchestra in the world. Mr. Gericke is still the capable conductor.

From LIFE
N. Y.
Address

BROOKLYN INSTITUTE NOTES.

THOUGH for another season the subscribers must fain content themselves with the insufficient accommodations of the Baptist Temple, the best that can be procured pending the completion of the new Academy of Music, the resumption of the Philharmonic concerts, under otherwise more attractive circumstances than ever, must be hailed with pleasure by all music lovers. The Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its eighteenth season in Brooklyn on Friday evening of the coming week, under the joint auspices of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society, the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences and the Ladies' Auxiliary Board of the Institute. It is enough to say of the orchestra that Wilhelm Gericke will again be the conductor. The soloists announced for the season constitute a remarkably distinguished list. Gadski will appear at the first concert next week, and at the second on December the eighth Vincent D'Indy, the celebrated orchestral leader of Paris, will conduct. On January the twelfth Alfred Reisenauer, the pianist, will be heard; on February the sixteenth the violinist, Willy Hess, and on March the sixteenth the 'cellist, Heinrich Warnke. As heretofore, an intermission will be granted about the middle of the program to encourage the social side of the concert, which has always been one of its most agreeable features, and the Ladies' Auxiliary will especially see to the comfort of the subscribers and undertake the floral decoration.

[98]

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Baptist Temple Nov. 10. The sale of season tickets will last only another week. The sale has been very large and the coming series promises to be the best the orchestra has ever had in Brooklyn.

For his first programme Mr. Gericke has arranged a most interesting set of works. The soloist will be Mme. Johanna Gadski, always a great favorite in Brooklyn, who returns this year laden with the new honors acquired in Germany during the summer by her appearances in Cologne and Munich. She will sing two arias.

The orchestral numbers will be three. The first will be Brahm's "Academic Overture," which is always a favorite, if only because it contains some of the best known of the German student songs. The second number will be a novelty, Dvorak's symphonic poem, "Die Waltaube" (The Wild Dove), which, when performed in Boston the other day, was not only well received, but made something of a sensation. The last number will be Tschaikowsky's symphony in F minor, No. 4. This is the least well known of the last three symphonies by the great Russian master, but by many critics it is ranked higher than the Fifth—in E minor—and little below the Sixth—the "Pathetique." It contains that charming scherzo marked "Pizzicato ostinato," which more than almost any other work displays the remarkable virtuosity of the Boston Orchestra.

The sale of tickets for the first concert will begin Nov. 1.

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Baptist Temple a week from next Friday evening, November 10. The sale of season tickets which has been in progress at the Institute of Arts and Sciences for the past week lasts only another week, and all those intending to get season tickets for the series have not much time left in which to secure good seats. The sale has been very large and the coming series promises to be the best the orchestra has ever had in Brooklyn. For his first programme Mr. Gericke has arranged a most interesting set of works. The soloists will be Mme. Johanna Gadski, always a great favorite in Brooklyn, who returns this year laden with the new honors acquired in Germany during the summer by her appearances in Cologne and Munich. She will sing two arias, to be announced later. The orchestral numbers will be three. The first will be Brahms' "Academic Overture," which is always a favorite if only because it contains some of the best known of the German student songs. The second number will be a novelty, Dvorak's symphonic poem, "Die Waltaube" ("The Wild Dove"), which, when performed in Boston the other day, was not only well received but made something of a sensation. The last number will be Tschaikowsky's Symphony in F minor, No. 4. This is the least well known of the last three symphonies by the great Russian master, but by many critics it is ranked higher than the Fifth (in E minor) and little below the Sixth, the "Pathetique." It contains that charming sherzo marked "Pizzicato Ostinato," which, more than almost any other work, displays the remarkable virtuosity of the Boston orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has just published its little Year Book showing its complete bookings for the season. Altogether, including those which have already been given, the orchestra will give 109 concerts, its season ending in Boston on Saturday, April 28. Forty-eight of its concerts will be given in its home city. New York comes next with ten and Cambridge with six. Then come Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington with five each, Providence and Hartford with three each, and Buffalo, Worcester and Portland, Me., with two each. The others are scattered among the cities and towns of New York State and New England. The season promises to be the most prosperous in the history of the orchestra. Not only was the week's trip to Canada and the Middle West very profitable, but everywhere, without a single exception, the subscriptions show a substantial increase over those of last year. In Washington, where five concerts are to be given for the first time in seven years, the New National Theatre has been entirely sold out on subscription. The season sale of seats for the Brooklyn season is now in progress at the Brooklyn Institute office.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has just published its little Year Book, showing its complete bookings for the season. Altogether including those which have already been given, the orchestra will give 109 concerts, its season ending in Boston on Saturday, April 28. Forty-eight of its concerts will be given in its home city. New York comes next with ten and Cambridge with six. Then comes Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington with five each, Providence and Hartford with three each, and Buffalo, Worcester and Portland, Me., with two each. The others are scattered among the cities and towns of New York State and New England. The season promises to be the most prosperous in the history of the orchestra. Not only was the week's trip to Canada and the middle West very profitable, but everywhere, without a single exception, the subscriptions show a substantial increase over those of last year. In Washington, where five concerts are to be given for the first time in seven years, the New National Theater has been entirely sold out by subscription.

"Melody Manor" is the name which Ellison Van Hoose has hit upon for his country place, and the tenor is said to be so taken up with the novelty of raising everything from chickens to peaches that his manager has had to make all sorts of dire threats to induce the newly fledged farmer to leave the joys of agriculture for the toils of the concert stage. The tales of marvelous melons and pumpkins, for which Van Hoose has stood sponsor, have only been exceeded in size by the melons and pumpkins themselves, while the latter's flavor, according to their enthusiastic progenitor, would make ordinary fruit and vegetables give up trying in confusion. Van Hoose, who will tour the country under Loudon G. Charlton's direction, will open his season in Boston, November 3, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The first of the season's concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Baptist Temple on next Friday evening, November 10, at 8:15 o'clock. The return of this favorite organization will signify that Brooklyn's musical season, which is so well cared for by the Institute of Arts and Sciences, is at last under full swing. Always there are a few scattering concerts in the early autumn, but with the symphony season the serious work of the winter for music-lovers really begins. This year Boston's great band returns to us stronger and better than ever. The few changes which have been made in the personnel have, so report has it, been entirely for the better. Mr. Warnke, the new principal 'cellist, who will be heard here later as a soloist, met with a most flattering reception at his debut in Boston week before last. Mr. Sadony, the new first bassoon, seems to have given the finishing touch to the wonderful perfection of the wood winds. His tone is remarkably smooth and mellow and his reputation of being the best bassoon in Germany seems likely to be completely confirmed in this country. Max Hess of Munich, the new alternate first horn, has also been a marked success. Now the Boston Symphony Orchestra stands in the unique position of being sufficient unto itself, for it possesses two firsts in every group of the wind instruments and need no longer have to rely on outside help. With its ninety-six men, the orchestra is divided as follows: First violins, 16; second violins, 14; violas, 10; 'celli, 10; basses, 8; flutes, 4; oboes, 3; English horn, 1; clarinets, 3; bass clarinets, 1; bassoons, 4; contrabassoon, 1; horns, 6; trumpets, 4; trombones, 3; and harp, tuba, tympani, drums, cymbals, triangle, tambour, castanets, and librarian, each 1. Thus it is the most complete orchestra in this country and the largest traveling orchestra in the world.

The soloist at the first concert will be Mme. Gadski, for a long time one of Brooklyn's favorite singers, and this year more interesting than ever because of her triumphs won last summer in Germany when she astonished her compatriots in Munich at the Wagner festival by her superb singing of "Brunnhilde" in the third performance of "The Ring" at the Prinz Regenten Theater. She will sing twice.

The orchestra numbers are all of them very attractive, and it is likely that the orchestra's performance of Tschaikowsky's F minor symphony will cause a sensation. It did in Boston when it was played there on the 20th and 21st. The general consensus of opinion was that Mr. Gericke had never given a more beautiful reading of any work than he did of this, and that the orchestra had never played more superbly. After the wonderful "Pizzicato" scherzo it was some minutes before the concert could be resumed so prolonged was the applause.

The programme in full is as follows:

Academic overture ..... Brahms
Recitative and Aria from "Der Freischutz," "Wie nahte mir der Schlummer" ..... Weber
Symphonic poem, Die Waldtaube ..... Dvorak
(First time at these concerts.)
Recitative and Aria from "Le Nozze di Figaro," "Dove sono" ..... Mozart
Symphony No. 4, in F minor ..... Tschaikowsky
Soloist—Mme. Gadski.

Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Baptist Temple next Friday evening at 8:15 o'clock. The return of this favorite organization will signify that Brooklyn's musical season, which is so well cared for by the Institute of Arts and Sciences, is at last under full swing. Always there are a few scattering concerts in the early autumn, but with the symphony season the serious work of the winter for music-lovers really begins.

This year Boston's great band returns to us stronger and better than ever. The few changes which have been made in the personnel have, so report has it, been entirely for the better. Mr. Warnke, the new principal 'cellist, who will be heard here later as a soloist, met with a most flattering reception at his debut in Boston week before last. Mr. Sardony, the new first bassoon, seems to have given the finishing touch to the wonderful perfection of the wood-winds. His tone is remarkably smooth and mellow and his reputation of being the best bassoon in Germany seems likely to be completely confirmed in this country. Mr. Max Hess, of Munich, the new alternate first horn, has also been a marked success. Now the Boston Symphony Orchestra stands in the unique position of being sufficient unto itself, for it possesses two first in every group of the wind instruments and need no longer have to rely on outside help.

The soloist at the first grand concert will be Mme. Gadski, for a long time one of Brooklyn's favorite singers, and this year more interesting than ever because of her triumphs won last summer in Germany. She will sing twice.

The orchestra numbers are all of them very attractive, and it is likely that the orchestra's performance of Tschaikowsky's F minor symphony will cause a sensation. It did in Boston, when it was played there on the 20th and 21st.

The programme in full is as follows: Academic Overture, Brahms; recitative and aria from "Der Freischutz," "Wie nahte mir der Schlummer," Weber; Symphonic poem, "Die Waldtaube" (first time at these concerts), Dvorak; recitative and aria from "Le Nozze di Figaro, "Dove sono," Mozart; Symphony No. 4, in F minor, Tschaikowsky, soloist, Mme. Gadski.

Boston SSymphony Orchestra.

The Brooklyn Institute's department of music, together with the Philharmonic Society, have arranged for the first concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, William Gericke, conductor, to be held at the Baptist Temple on Friday evening, Nov. 10, at 8.15 o'clock P. M. Mme. Gadski, the soprano soloist, will appear.

38

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will come to Brooklyn next week for the first concert of its annual series to be given on Friday evening at the Baptist Temple. Mme. Gadski will be the soloist, and will sing arias from "Der Freischutz" and "Le Nozze di Figaro." The orchestra will give Brahms' Academic Overture, Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony and for the first time at these concerts Dvorak's symphonic poem, "Die Waldtaube."

This orchestra is the leader among organizations of its kind before the public, and its occasional visits are among the most welcome musical events of the season. It is said that the orchestra will return in better form than ever. The few changes which have been made in the personnel have, so report has it, been entirely for the better. Mr. Warnke, the new principal 'cellist, who will be heard here later as a soloist, met with a most flattering reception at his debut in Boston week before last. Mr. Sadony, is the new first bassoon and Max Hess, of Munich, the new alternate first horn. Now the Boston Orchestra stands in the unique position of having two first or solo players in every group of the wind instruments, and need no longer have to rely on outside help.

MME. GADSKI.
Soloist at first Brooklyn concert of I Symphony Orchestra.

With its ninety-six men, the orchestra is divided as follows: First violins, 16; second violins, 14; violas, 10; 'celli, 10; basses, 8; flutes, 4; oboes, 3; English horn, 1; clarinets, 3; bass clarinets, 1; bassoons, 4; contrabassoon, 1; horns, 6; trumpets, 4; trombones, 3, and harp, tuba, tympani, drums, cymbals, triangle, tambour, castanets and librarian, each one. Thus it is the most complete [illegible] in this country, and the largest traveling orchestra in the world. Mr. Gericke is still the capable conductor.

From LIFE

Address .....

BROOKLYN INSTITUTE NOTES.

THOUGH for another season the subscribers must fain content themselves with the insufficient accommodations of the Baptist Temple, the best that can be procured pending the completion of the new Academy of Music, the resumption of the Philharmonic concerts, under otherwise more attractive circumstances than ever, must be hailed with pleasure by all music lovers. The Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its eighteenth season in Brooklyn on Friday evening of the coming week, under the joint auspices of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society, the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences and the Ladies' Auxiliary Board of the Institute. It is enough to say of the orchestra that Wilhelm Gericke will again be the conductor. The soloists announced for the season constitute a remarkably distinguished list. Gadski will appear at the first concert next week, and at the second on December the eighth Vincent D'Indy, the celebrated orchestral leader of Paris, will conduct. On January the twelfth Alfred Reisenauer, the pianist, will be heard; on February the sixteenth the violinist, Willy Hess, and on March the sixteenth the 'cellist, Heinrich Warnke. As heretofore, an intermission will be granted about the middle of the program to encourage the social side of the concert, which has always been one of its most agreeable features, and the Ladies' Auxiliary will especially see to the comfort of the subscribers and undertake the floral decoration.

[98]

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
N. Y. EV'G SUN
NOV 8 1905

The Brooklyn Institute, in addition to its Boston Symphony concerts opening on Friday night, its lecture recitals about each programme and its chamber music series by the Kneisels, has this year announced two song recitals by Mme. Gadski on Dec. 1 and Mme. Eames on Dec. 14; violin recitals by Marie Hall, Kubelik, Marteau and Maud Powell; two chamber concerts by the Adamowski Trio and the Olive Mead Quartet, two appearances of Walter Damrosch's New York Symphony Orchestra with Weingartner and with Joseffy, the usual Christmas rendition of "Messiah" and also a spring concert by Mr. Hall's Brooklyn Oratorio Society, choral concerts of the Brooklyn Arion and Saengerbund, and several more.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
N. Y. EV'G SUN
NOV 11 1905

BOSTON BAND RETURNS.

Symphony Orchestra and Mme. Gadski Welcomed at Baptist Temple.

Brooklynites gave a little more than their united patronage to the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night at its first concert this season in the Baptist Temple, with Mme. Gadski as soloist.

When it comes to the point that some people will pay an admission and stand for two hours, as was the case here, the Boston habit is growing; and the call for a suitable and commodious auditorium is louder than ever.

The scene of this opening contest was exactly like that of its predecessors in the Baptist Temple, with subscribers, for the most part in the seats which they occupy each winter.

The orchestra and the audience are again making the best of a bad situation. The former crowded the platform space allotted it; but it is a question whether violins would not have clashed had they been known by less skillful musicians in want of elbow room.

The platform was banked with palms and crimson and white carnations, and a screen of tall palms hid the organ box in the gallery.

There was applause when Mr. Gericke took up his baton for the opening number of the programme, Brahm's "Academic" overture. At once the listeners appreciated the marvelous technique and finish that the Boston orchestra gives to all its plays. This assurance was enhanced by the second orchestral number, Dvorak's symphonic poem "Die Waldtaube." This was new here, and enjoyed the most of Dvorak's pictorial compositions. "Die Waldtaube," or "Wood Dove," has a bohemian legend for its background; and the realism of a story of a young widow, lamenting the death of her husband as he is borne to the grave; then the consolation of another lover, and a glorious wedding, provides a succession of stirring and joyous musical passages, easy for the listener to interpret but difficult for the musicians.

Tschaikowsky's symphony No. 4, in F minor, Op. 36, was the final number, and the orchestral climax of the concert. No modern composer seems to have surpassed Tschaikowsky in the strange beauty of his melodies and their elaborate working out, nor to put in them the mysticism of the Orient combined with the warmer sentiment of the Western world. The Scherzo movement of the symphony—all pizzicato, with contrasted themes—one for the violins, for wood-wind instruments, and for the basses, was especially fine as to its finished rendering.

Mme. Gadski is one of the operatic stars, whose second appearance with the orchestra in Brooklyn. A most cordial welcome awaited her, and unmistakable approbation followed her singing. She has an excellent voice and sang with all her artistic efforts. Her two selections were the recitative and aria from "Der Freischuetz," and the recitative, "How Susanna Delays!" and the aria, "Flown Are Those Days," from "The Marriage of Figaro."

The next concert occur on Dec. 8.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
N. Y. EV'G SUN
NOV 8 1905

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Baptist Temple on next Friday evening, Nov. 10, at 8:15 o'clock. This year the orchestra returns, the management says, stronger and better than ever. The few changes which have been made in the personnel have, so report has it, been entirely for the better. Mr. Warnke, the new principal 'cellist, who will be heard here later as a soloist, met with a most flattering reception at his debut in Boston week before last. Mr. Sadony, the new first bassoon, seems to have given the finishing touch to the wonderful perfection of the wood-winds. Max Hess, of Munich, the new alternate first horn, has also been a marked success. With its ninety-six men the orchestra is divided as follows: First violins, 16; second violins, 14; violas, 10; celli, 10; basses, 8; flutes, 4; oboes, 3; English horn, 1; clarinets, 3; bass clarinets, 1; bassoons, 4; contrabassoon, 1; horns, 6; trumpets, 4; trombones, 3, and harp tuba, tympani, drums, cymbals, triangle, tambour, castanets and librarian, each 1. Thus it is the largest traveling orchestra in the world. The soloist at the first concert will be Mme. Gadski, for a long time one of Brooklyn's favorite singers and this year more interesting than ever because of her triumphs won last summer in Germany when she astonished her compatriots in Munich at the Wagner festival by her superb singing of "Brunnhilde" in the third performance of "The Ring" at the Prinz Regenten Theatre. She will sing twice.

The orchestra numbers are all of them very attractive and the orchestra's performance of Tschaikowsky's F minor caused a sensation in Boston when it was played there Oct. 20 and 21. After the wonderful "Pizzicato" scherzo it was some minutes before the concert could be resumed, so prolonged was the applause. The programme in full is as follows: Brahm's Academic Overture; Weber's recitative and aria from "Der Freischutz," "Wie nahte mir der Schlummer"; Dvorak, symphonic poem, "Die Waldtaube" (first time at these concerts); Mozart, recitative and aria from "Le Nozze di Figaro," "Dova Sono"; Tschaikowsky, symphony No. 4, in F minor; soloist, Mme. Gadski.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
N. Y. EV'G SUN
NOV 8 1905

Practically all the seats were sold for the first of the concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which was given last evening in the Baptist Temple. The orchestral numbers were Brahm's Academic Overture, Op. 80; Dvorak's Symphonic Poem, "The Wood Dove," Op. 110, and the Tschaikowsky Symphony No. 4, in F minor, Op. 36. Mr. Gericke conducted. The orchestra was banked in with chrysanthemums, and, as usual, it was a gala occasion. There have been several important changes in the personnel of the orchestra, but "men may come, and men may go," and the orchestra remains the same superb virtuoso organization as in the past. Of the principals, at least Willy Hess remains at the concertmeister's desk, where he is proving a worthy successor to Franz Kneisel. The Dvorak number was one of those massive compositions written after the composer had left America for Bohemia, and was the novelty of the evening. The attempt to tell a story in music has been made by an army of composers, and has generally failed, from the beginning, even unto the days of Richard Strauss. Music as a language is too vague for continuous narrative, and can only be made available for suggestion, yet the latter part of "The Wood Dove" proved very beautiful, however much it may have puzzled those who tried to follow it as a ballad. The symphony was played with the cold correctness which characterizes the conductor. It would seem to have been built upon a Gregorian tone, although the theme was declaimed in martial style from the brasses. The second and third movements introduce fresh subject matter. The scherzo was undoubtedly "obstinately pizzicato," the passages in which the bows are abandoned being longer than any which the writer now recalls, and this movement so pleased the audience that there would have been a demand for a repeat but for the knowledge that the rules on this point are more inviolable than were the laws of the Persians and Medes. Mme. Gadski, a favorite singer with Brooklyn audiences, was the soloist. She appeared in a symphony of green (sartorial, not sonorous), and gave Agathe's recitative and aria from "Der Freischuetz," and "How Susanna Delays!" with the Countess's aria from "Figaro." It need hardly be remarked that the latter number was quite out of place at a symphony concert here, not merely because it is an excerpt from opera comique, but because it is sufficiently familiar from regular operatic performance during the season. There was more reason for the "Freischuetz" number, since this opera has been shelved for several years. Mme. Gadski's middle register recalls her great achievements as Brunnhilde, but it was observed that she attacked the higher passages with caution. She was very cordially received.

NOV 7 1905

The concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday night at the Baptist Temple will be the opening of the social-musical season in Brooklyn. The soloist will be Joanna Gadski, long a favorite prima donna

Mme. Gadski.

at the Opera House and an admirable concert singer.

NOV 11 1905

Series of Concerts by Boston Symphony Orchestra Opens Brilliantly at Baptist Temple.

The series of Brooklyn concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra opened brilliantly at the Baptist Temple last night, with a musical offering of exceptional interest to those who really appreciate orchestral music. With apparently a larger platform for their accommodation the orchestra seemed to be more advantageously grouped than ever before in this auditorium, and has never made a finer showing there. Indeed, the fine showing of the orchestra in a singularly striking group of pieces made the listener almost forget the unsuitableness of the Temple for concerts of this character. It is evident that Brooklyn has determined to make the best of the present situation, whereby the community is deprived of a suitable concert hall, and a very large assemblage filled the church last night. But the desirability, nay, absolute need, of the new Academy of Music should not be lost sight of. The burden of raising the rest of the money necessary to guarantee the completion of the new structure should not be placed on a few public-spirited citizens. Step up, ladies and gentlemen, with your subscriptions, however small, and make it possible for the committee to go ahead with their plans.

Three orchestral numbers with two solos from Mme. Gadski, the soprano, made up the programme. The pieces for orchestra were eloquent specimens of individuality of style—Brahms' Academic Overture, Dvorak's symphonic poem, "The Wood Dove," and Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 4, in F minor. There is rare largeness of conception as to orchestral possibilities in all of these. The overture is interesting as showing what a great composer can do in building into composite fullness themes based upon student songs. In this overture Brahms' manner is more ingratiating than in many of his symphonic utterances.

The peculiar witchery of Dvorak's use of instrumental effects is heard most convincingly in "The Wood Dove," a very beautiful and ingeniously contrived bit of programme music, which, while it hardly tells a story of itself, nevertheless vividly illuminates the spirit of Erben's ballad, of which it is a musical exposition. To a musicianly mastery of orchestral resources Dvorak's work reveals in this composition especially, his really wonderful subtlety in the adjustment of instrumental tone color and melodic poignancy full of pathetic significance. What a peculiar appeal, for instance, there is in his use of the middle-voiced strings as disclosed in the first part of this symphonic poem and reminiscently in the last. Though comparatively short, this composition suggests vividly the characteristic that has made Dvorak's music a thing of soul as well as of technical mastery.

The Tschaikowsky symphony has not often been heard in Brooklyn, and this was made the more regrettable by the hearing last night. Perhaps we shall some day have so many orchestral concerts that such works shall become more familiar, and the glory of their musical proclamation thereby made a living reality to the music-lover. This symphony is the splendid creation of a mind not confined to the dictates of formal correctness. It shows plain enough an understanding of the basis of artistic exposition, but, at least in the first movement, there is an unconventional play of the imagination. The scherzo "Pizzicato ostinato" is in pronounced contrast to the other parts of the work, being a frolicsome inter-play of three distinctive themes given out by the strings, the wood-winds and the brasses, respectively. A free, buoyant, exuberant rondo, the last movement has been called a set of variations on a Russian folk-song, but to call it an apotheosis of the folk-song melody would be a more definite and perhaps a more correct characterization.

Mme. Gadski sang Agathe's prayer scene and aria from the third act of "Der Freischutz," and the less engaging recitative and aria of the Countess from the third act of "The Marriage of Figaro." This conscientious singer, with the sincerity that marks all her undertakings, in the first-named solo, sang with fine effect. We doubt if Mme Gadski has ever sung as well before in Brooklyn. Mr. Gericke conducted with the unassuming authority that cloaks his masterly ability.

ess

Next Thursday, at 8.15 p. m., Jerome K. Jerome will give a lecture in Association Hall. On Friday evening the first concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Wilhelm Gericke conductor, assisted by Mme. Gadski, soprano, will take place in the Baptist Temple. An interesting programme has been arranged.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

om

dress

NOV 8 1905

t

The Brooklyn Institute, in addition to its Boston Symphony concerts opening on Friday night, its lecture recitals about each programme and its chamber music series by the Kneisels, has this year announced two song recitals by Mme. Gadski on Dec. 1 and Mme. Eames on Dec. 14; violin recitals by Maria Hall, Kubelik, Marteau and Maud Powell; two chamber concerts by the Adamowski Trio and the Olive Mead Quartet, two appearances of Walter Damrosch's New York Symphony Orchestra with Weingartner and with Joseffy, the usual Christmastide "Messiah" and also a spring concert by Mr. Hall's Brooklyn Oratorio Society, choral concerts of the Brooklyn Arion and Saengerbund, and several more.

n

ess

BOSTON BAND RETURNS.

Symphony Orchestra and Mme. Gadski Welcomed at Baptist Temple.

Brooklynites gave a little more than their united patronage to the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night at its first concert this season in the Baptist Temple, with Mme. Gadski as soloist.

When it comes to the point that some will pay an admission and stand for two hours, as was the case here, the Boston spirit is growing; and the call for a suitable and commodious auditorium is louder than ever.

The scene of this opening contest was precisely like that of its predecessors in the Baptist Temple, with subscribers for the most part in the seats which they occupied last winter.

The orchestra and the audience are again making the best of a bad situation. The former crowded the platform space allotted to it; but it is a question whether violin bows would not have clashed had they been drawn by less skillful musicians in the scant elbow room.

The platform was banked with palms and crimson and white carnations, and a screen of tall palms hid the organ box in the gallery.

There was applause when Mr. Gericke took up his baton for the opening number of the programme, Brahm's "Academic" overture. At once the listeners appreciated the marvelous technique and finish that the Boston orchestra gives to all its plays. This assurance was enhanced by the second orchestral number, Dvorak's symphonic poem "Die Waldtaube." This was new here, and enjoyed as are all of Dvorak's pictorial compositions. "Die Waldtaube," or "Wood Dove," has a bohemian legend for its background; and the realism of a story of a young widow, lamenting the death of her husband as he is borne to the grave; then the consolation of another lover, and the joyous wedding, provides a succession of serious and joyous musical passages, easy for the listener to interpret but difficult for the musicians.

Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 4, in F minor, op. 36, was the final number, and the orchestral climax of the concert. No Russian composer seems to have surpassed this one in the strange beauty of his themes and their elaborate working out. One feels in them the mysticism of the Oriental, combined with the warmer sentiment of the Western world. The Scherzo movement of the symphony—all pizzicato, with three contrasted themes—one for strings, one for wood-wind instruments, and the third for the basses, was especially beautiful as to its finished rendering.

Mme. Gadski, one of the operatic stars, made her second appearance with the Boston orchestra in Brooklyn. A most cordial welcome awaited her, and unbounded applause followed her singing. She was in excellent voice and sang with thoroughly artistic efforts. Her two selections were the recitative and aria from "Der Freischutz" and the recitative, "How Susanna Delays!" and the aria, "Flown Forever," from "The Marriage of Figaro," by Mozart.

The next concert will occur on Dec. 8.

THE first of the season's concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Baptist Temple on next Friday evening, Nov. 10, at 8:15 o'clock. This year the orchestra returns, the management says, stronger and better than ever. The few changes which have been made in the personnel have, so report has it, been entirely for the better. Mr. Warnke, the new principal 'cellist, who will be heard here later as a soloist, met with a most flattering reception at his debut in Boston week before last. Mr. Sadony, the new first bassoon, seems to have given the finishing touch to the wonderful perfection of the wood-winds. Max Hess, of Munich, the new alternate first horn, has also been a marked success. With its ninety-six men the orchestra is divided as follows: First violins, 16; second violins, 14; violas, 10; celli, 10; basses, 8; flutes, 4; oboes, 3; English horn, 1; clarinets, 3; bass clarinets, 1; bassoons, 4; contrabassoon, 1; horns, 6; trumpets, 4; trombones, 3, and harp, tuba, tympani, drums, cymbals, triangle, tambour, castanets and librarian, each 1. Thus it is the largest traveling orchestra in the world. The soloist at the first concert will be Mme. Gadski, for a long time one of Brooklyn's favorite singers and this year more interesting than ever because of her triumphs won last summer in Germany when she astonished her compatriots in Munich at the Wagner festival by her superb singing of "Brunnhilde" in the third performance of "The Ring" at the Prinz Regenten Theatre. She will sing twice.

The orchestra numbers are all of them very attractive and the orchestra's performance of Tschaikowsky's F minor caused a sensation in Boston when it was played there Oct. 20 and 21. After the wonderful "Pizzicato" scherzo it was some minutes before the concert could be resumed, so prolonged was the applause. The programme in full is as follows: Brahm's Academic Overture; Weber's recitative and aria from "Der Freischutz," "Wie nahte mir der Schlummer"; Dvorak, symphonic poem, "Die Waldtaube" (first time at these concerts); Mozart, recitative and aria from "Le Nozze di Figaro," "Dove Sono"; Tschaikowsky, symphony No. 4, in F minor; soloist, Mme. Gadski.

ddress

ate

Practically all the seats were sold for the first of the concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which was given last evening in the Baptist Temple. The orchestral numbers were Brahm's Academic Overture, Op. 80; Dvorak's Symphonic Poem, "The Wood Dove," Op. 110, and the Tschaikowsky Symphony No. 4, in F minor, Op. 36. Mr. Gericke conducted. The orchestra was banked in with chrysanthemums, and, as usual, it was a gala occasion. There have been several important changes in the personnel of the orchestra, but "men may come, and men may go," and the orchestra remains the same superb virtuoso organization as in the past. Of the principals, at least Willy Hess remains at the concertmeister's desk, where he is proving a worthy successor to Franz Kneisel. The Dvorak number was one of those massive compositions written after the composer had left America for Bohemia, and was the novelty of the evening. The attempt to tell a story in music has been made by an army of composers, and has generally failed, from the beginning, even unto the days of Richard Strauss. Music as a language is too vague for continuous narrative, and can only be made available for suggestion, yet the latter part of "The Wood Dove" proved very beautiful, however much it may have puzzled those who tried to follow it as a ballad. The symphony was played with the cold correctness which characterizes the conductor. It would seem to have been built upon a Gregorian tone, although the theme was declaimed in martial style from the brasses. The second and third movements introduce fresh subject matter. The scherzo was undoubtedly "obstinately pizzicato," the passages in which the bows are abandoned being longer than any which the writer now recalls, and this movement so pleased the audience that there would have been a demand for a repeat but for the knowledge that the rules on this point are more inviolable than were the laws of the Persians and Medes. Mme. Gadski, a favorite singer with Brooklyn audiences, was the soloist. She appeared in a symphony of green (sartorial, not sonorous), and gave Agathe's recitative and aria from "Der Freischuetz," and "How Susanna Delays!" with the Countess's aria from "Figaro." It need hardly be remarked that the latter number was quite out of place at a symphony concert here, not merely because it is an excerpt from opera comique, but because it is sufficiently familiar from regular operatic performance during the season. There was more reason for the "Freischuetz" number, since this opera has been shelved for several years. Mme. Gadski's middle register recalls her great achievements as Brunnhilde, but it was observed that she attacked the higher passages with caution. She was very cordially received.

The concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday night at the Baptist Temple will be the opening of the social-musical season in Brooklyn. The soloist will be Joanna Gadski, long a favorite prima donna at the Opera House and an admirable concert singer.

Mme. Gadski.

m

ress

te

MUSICAL.

Series of Concerts by Boston Symphony Orchestra Opens Brilliantly at Baptist Temple.

The series of Brooklyn concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra opened brilliantly at the Baptist Temple last night, with a musical offering of exceptional interest to those who really appreciate orchestral music. With apparently a larger platform for their accommodation the orchestra seemed to be more advantageously grouped than ever before in this auditorium, and has never made a finer showing there. Indeed, the fine showing of the orchestra in a singularly striking group of pieces made the listener almost forget the unsuitableness of the Temple for concerts of this character. It is evident that Brooklyn has determined to make the best of the present situation, whereby the community is deprived of a suitable concert hall, and a very large assemblage filled the church last night. But the desirability, nay, absolute need, of the new Academy of Music should not be lost sight of. The burden of raising the rest of the money necessary to guarantee the completion of the new structure should not be placed on a few public-spirited citizens. Step up, ladies and gentlemen, with your subscriptions, however small, and make it possible for the committee to go ahead with their plans.

Three orchestral numbers with two solos from Mme. Gadski, the soprano, made up the programme. The pieces for orchestra were eloquent specimens of individuality of style—Brahms' Academic Overture, Dvorak's symphonic poem, "The Wood Dove," and Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 4, in F minor. There is rare largeness of conception as to orchestral possibilities in all of these. The overture is interesting as showing what a great composer can do in building into composite fullness themes based upon student songs. In this overture Brahms' manner is more ingratiating than in many of his symphonic utterances.

The peculiar witchery of Dvorak's use of instrumental effects is heard most convincingly in "The Wood Dove," a very beautiful and ingeniously contrived bit of programme music, which, while it hardly tells a story of itself, nevertheless vividly illuminates the spirit of Erben's ballad, of which it is a musical exposition. To a musicianly mastery of orchestral resources Dvorak's work reveals in this composition especially, his really wonderful subtlety in the adjustment of instrumental tone color and melodic poignancy full of pathetic significance. What a peculiar appeal, for instance, there is in his use of the middle-voiced strings as disclosed in the first part of this symphonic poem and reminiscently in the last. Though comparatively short, this composition suggests vividly the characteristic that has made Dvorak's music a thing of soul as well as of technical mastery.

The Tschaikowsky symphony has not often been heard in Brooklyn, and this was made the more regrettable by the hearing last night. Perhaps we shall some day have so many orchestral concerts that such works shall become more familiar, and the glory of their musical proclamation thereby made a living reality to the music-lover. This symphony is the splendid creation of a mind not confined to the dictates of formal correctness. It shows plain enough an understanding of the basis of artistic exposition, but, at least in the first movement, there is an unconventional play of the imagination. The scherzo "Pizzicato ostinato" is in pronounced contrast to the other parts of the work, being a frolicsome inter-play of three distinctive themes given out by the strings, the wood-winds and the brasses, respectively. A free, buoyant, exuberant rondo, the last movement has been called a set of variations on a Russian folk-song, but to call it an apotheosis of the folk-song melody would be a more definite and perhaps a more correct characterization.

Mme. Gadski sang Agathe's prayer scene and aria from the third act of "Der Freischutz," and the less engaging recitative and aria of the Countess from the third act of "The Marriage of Figaro." This conscientious singer, with the sincerity that marks all her undertakings, in the first-named solo, sang with fine effect. We doubt if Mme Gadski has ever sung as well before in Brooklyn. Mr. Gericke conducted with the unassuming authority that cloaks his masterly ability.

rom

ddress

ate

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Its Season in Brooklyn Begun by a Concert at the Baptist Temple.

Good music is an unspeakable solace in a time of bad plays and social trivialities, and Brooklyn is to have such share of this solace as it deserves, but no more, for in its million and a quarter of inhabitants there are so few who like the best that it is still without its Academy of Music. When it was half its present size it had Theodore Thomas four times a month during the season. Now it has Mr. Gericke once. We are not to argue from this retrogression that when it has two millions it will subsist entirely on variety shows or that the Baptist Temple will always be large enough for the saving remnant, but the remnant did not overcrowd the Temple last night, when the musical season was inaugurated by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The house was comfortably filled, however, and something of the old distinction that pertained to the Philharmonic concerts was conferred by the dress of the assemblage and the decorative adjuncts of palms and chrysanthemums.

And it is great music that is made by this band from Boston. Nowhere in the world is heard the better of it. Firm and clear in tone, faultless in technique, with infinite variety in its color and shading, it is a monument of artistic perfection. There are times when one could wish a little more abandon and fire, but it is Mr. Gericke, and not the band, who reads niceties into the selections and, after all, he is doing his honest best to keep out of ruts that an academic practice and instinct for conservatism are apt to make. Indeed, such a bull as he gave last night, where the east-European strove to overthrow the traditions and regulations that were exemplified in the tranquil vocal numbers, indicates his determination to widen his vision beyond the bounds of purely Teutonic accomplishment.

Brahms' "Academic" overture was delightfully played, of course, with spring of spirits, youthful pomp and declamatory stress in the college songs so ingeniously welded into it, with special amplitude in the "Gaudeamus." The novelty was Dvorak's symphonic poem, "The Wild Dove," founded on a grewsome legend of Bohemia that presents the ghost of a murdered man in the form of a dove that coos from the branches of a tree above his grave. The widow, who has killed him, follows the body to the cemetery where she meets a rollicking soldier and after an exceeding brief courtship agrees to marry him, but the voice of the dead sounding from the dark fills her with remorse, terror and madness, and she leaps into the stream to die. It is not essential to the prosperity of the music to know this, for if it were all programme it would not be music; but knowing the story one listens with interest to the disclosures of the orchestra; the solemn funeral march, the queer, fluttering sobs of the strings, the distant roistering, the impetuous meeting, the dance, the sudden hush when the ghost calls, the more complicate matter denoting the final tragedy, and the strange ending with its iterated cooing of the dove and its surcease on a single note. The number has moments of melodic beauty and what is rude and turgid is relieved by passages of nobility, like the choral for the horns, and by well managed effects of drama.

If this poem of Dvorak's was a defiance of the ancient canons of his art, Tschaikowsky's fourth symphony was a defiance of all the rules, old and new, and it even sounds as if he contemplated rebellion against the church and government. This tumultuous Tatar indicates the state of the Russian mind as clearly as it is denoted in the day's dispatches from Cronstadt and Odessa, if, indeed it is possible to have a clear indication of so clouded and uncertain a state. In its formlessness, in its harshness, in its wild sweep and swirl of anger and striving, when the brasses scream and the violins swear, there is heard that blind upward struggle that shakes political Russia to-day. Tschaikowsky is the musical voice of his people, defiant yet despairing, filled with a melancholy that sinks him to the depths, yet springing into the light ever and again with forced gayety and spirit sometimes hopeful, sometimes more melancholy than his dirges. It was his thought in this symphony to compose a work like the Fifth Symphony of Beethoven, wherein the certainty of fate is denoted by the ceaseless recurrence of the opening figure. In the Beethoven symphony Fate knocks at the door in the imperative triple beat, but Tschaikowsky hears it as a trumpet summons. He shows musicianly skill in weaving this motive through his story, now sounding it as a challenge and again as a solace, for he is not utterly pessimistic, and in no part of this work does he descend into the tartarus that he paints in his Symphonie Pathetique; indeed, he is almost human in the scherzo, which is unique in music and a delightful break in the manner of all symphonies. Here the string orchestra becomes a gigantic guitar, playing pizzicato with a certainty and speed that are nothing less than wonderful, and for some short minutes dissipating the sadness, temperamental, hence inevitable, in the other numbers of the work. The gay little interlude of a folk-song character in this scherzo should not have been described by the composer, yet even he cannot spoil it for us by telling us that it is the burbling of a drunken clown, and the scrap of military march that follows is delightfully barbaric. The fourth movement is like nearly all closings of symphonies, superfluous, and a yielding to conventions as absolute as those in melodrama, where the villian must be killed and the hero and heroine must smile and embrace, and the peasantry must wear red ribbons and rejoice. Not that our Russian can disclose this much of happiness, but he fulfills the task because others have fulfilled it before; then, determined not to even attempt happiness any farther, sounds his Fate call stridently, and so an end.

music, or to pure music, so for another hundred years or so we must have solos. Those of last night were contributed by Mme. G[illegible]ski, who sang the prayer from "Der Freischutz," and "Flown forever" from "The Marriage of Figaro," and sang them delightfully. She placed her notes with obvious care, and in the lower register did not wholly avert a suspicion that she was going off the key presently, but her voice is of such fine texture and she sang with such enjoyment of her task, such purity and sweetness of intonation, and even with the rarer quality of sympathy and tenderness, all the more effective for the brightness and buoyancy of her fioriture, that she fully earned the applause bestowed on her.

The Baptist Temple is not made for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and there is not room for all of it. The first violins were 12 in number instead of 16, and other reductions were in proportion; but the band last night was large enough for the building, and it had an ampler stage and more room to breathe than it had last winter. Some changes have been made in its personnel, but it remains practically as it was when last heard here, and nothing better can be said for it. The next concert will be given on the 8th of December.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, NOV 19, 1905.

Two novelties were played at the fifth Symphony rehearsal and concert, Prof J. K. Paine's prelude to "The Birds" of Aristophanes and Sinding's A major violin concerto, the latter with Mr Felix Winternitz as the soloist. The other numbers were the G minor symphony by Mozart and Tschaikowsky's theme and variations from suite No 3. Prof Paine's orchestral prelude to "The Birds" was given in this city in 1904, but with a much smaller band of musicians and with less pleasing effect than was the case at the Symphony, for the larger orchestra enabled Mr Gericke to illuminate the trial contrasts more vividly and to impart to the scholarly work an impressiveness that was lacking at the previous performance. The prelude, which is composed of themes of the music-drama, is a tone poem in miniature, skilfully orchestrated and developed into climaxes which illustrate the most dramatic episodes of the story, and close in a stunning fortissimo worked up by the whole orchestra.

The instrumentation is very varied in character, giving to the various parts of the orchestra plenty of complex work alternating in character. The interpretation was thoroughly satisfactory and interesting, too, despite the classic nature of the composition, for Prof Paine has the gift of melodic utterance combined with his high ideal of musical expression.

The Sinding violin concerto is chiefly interesting, so far as the solo instrument is concerned, in the final movement, although all of Mr Winternitz' performance was meritorious, and displayed his artistry in a way to win hearty plaudits. He was little at fault in fingering some of the passages on the G string in the first movement and in the quick double fingering in the finale, but the deflection was so slight that one may speak of his work in high praise and with little reservation.

The Mozart symphony was given in a sympathetic spirit by the orchestra. The Tschaikowsky variations on a simple theme is one of those compositions which illustrate the cleverness of the writer in juggling with instrumental possibilities and combinations, conditions which were admirably met and conquered by Mr Gericke's men. Aside from showing the abilities of the orchestra, either in parts or as a whole, the work calls for no special consideration.

The soloist at this week's rehearsal and concert will be Hugo Heerman, who will play Brahms' D minor concerto for violin. The orchestral numbers will be Busoni's "Lustspiel" overture, for the first time here; Loeffler's "Villanelle du Diable" and Schumann's first symphony.

SYMPHONY PENSION FUND.

The first concert of the year for the benefit of the Symphony orchestra pension fund will be given in Symphony hall next Sunday evening. There is a sentimental interest connected with this event because it is to be commemorative of the 25th season of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and to give eclat to the occasion Mr Georg Henschel, the first conductor of the orchestra, has kindly consented to come from New York and assist Mr Gericke. The object of these pension fund concerts is to establish a sufficient fund to care for members of the orchestra when through age or through inability they must give up active work as members of the organization.

Governmental support for music is out of the question in America for the present, at any rate, and, therefore, governmental pensions are equally impossible. While it is true that musicians in Germany are not so well paid as they are in America, it is equally true that musicians connected with any of the subsidized orchestras in Germany and Austria can look forward to the future free from care because at the end of their term of service there is a pension awaiting them.

It was with the idea of placing the Boston Symponv orchestra on a similar basis that the movement was begun several years ago to establish a pension fund so that the men in the orchestra might be sure of support when the time of need came. The public of Boston responded from the first most generously to this effort, and already a considerable sum has been invested for the benefit of the men.

While it is true that the men contribute themselves to the fund by means of annual dues, a considerable part of this money must come from the music-loving public. The cause is a good one, and it is to be hoped that next Sunday Symphony hall will be filled, for it is the one way in which Boston can show its appreciation of the pleasure the orchestra has given it during the past 24 years. The program for the concert will open with the Beethoven overture, "The Dedication of the House," George Henschel conducting. This was the first overture performed at the Symphony concerts. The other selections will be Tschaikowsky's symphony, "Pathetique"; bacchanale from "Tannhauser," Wagner and the symphonic poem, "Don Juan," Richard Strauss.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

Mozart. Symphony in G minor.
Sinding. Concerto for Violin.
(First time.)
Soloist, Mr. Felix Winternitz.
J. K. Paine. Prelude to "The Birds" of Aristophenes.
(First time.)
Tschaikowsky. Variations from Suite No. 3.

The concert began with a novelty by a would-be composer named Mozart. We regret that such a work, which is contrary to all modern canons of musical art, should be placed before an advanced audience. From the very beginning it was absurdly melodic! There were tunes that could be recognized and followed through each movement. To make matters worse these tunes were in related keys, so that there was absolutely nothing vague or perplexing in any of them. The music often stayed in a single key for 10 or more measures and one sought in vain for any dislocated modulations.

The scoring, too, was of a primitive character, which placed it far beneath the attention of a respectable or self-respecting reviewer. There were no trombones, no tubas, no gong, not even a piccolo or an English horn! Mr. Mozart mistakes the scope of the musical art; he has here given us a work that is distinctly pleasing; he should understand that the true function of music is to worry and torment.

This can be achieved in various ways; numerous dissonances, a profusion of unrelated keys, very loud instruments, hiccoughy rhythms, and a total lack of continuity may help towards it, and we hope that this misguided composer will endeavor to attain some of these qualities before he attempts further composition.

The symphony was admirably performed and Mr. Gericke spared no repeats. He evidently thinks we ought to take this music because it is good for us,—like spring medicine, or blue pills and black draught. The audience applauded the classical work heartily. We think "the G minor" is the most Mozartish of all the symphonies; more interesting even than the "Jupiter."

Now Mr. Hess took the baton and carried the orchestra finely through the Sinding violin concerto. It is a very broad work in which the massive "tutti" effects often overshadow the solo passages. Its brooding spirit and its heroic vein render it more akin to Bruch's G minor symphony than to any other of its predecessors. Especially was this the case in the slow movement, where the muttering violoncellos made a weird background for the solo violin.

There were some sombre effects of the wood-wind in the transition here that were remarkably impressive. At a first hearing the concerto seems to us a very strong addition to a repertoire that is none too crowded. There are only four or five really great violin concertos in existence.

Sinding demands almost impossible breadth from his soloist; and he piles up difficulties in a heartless manner. There is double-stopping at the very beginning and the end of the work is a whirlwind of technique. Mr. Winternitz proved himself a true artist in the performance. His tone was light at times, but his surety was commendable. His expressive interpretation of the slow movement was something especially fine. He won, and he deserved, great enthusiasm, being recalled three times and given a laurel wreath.

Paine's "Birds" were a superior order of poultry and were bright of plumage and tender enough for the Thanksgiving season. The prelude is not so Helenic in dignity as that wonderful introduction to "Oedipus," but it is powerful and full of contrasts. The pomp and festivity of the ending are a sort of epithalamium suited to one part of Aristophanes' comedy, and Mr. Schuecker's work upon the Kithara was brilliant and Grecian in style, even if it was executed upon a modern concert harp. To have fully carried out the ancient idea Mr. Gericke might have conducted by stamping his right foot, previously cased in an iron or leaden shoe, as the choryphanes of Athens used to do.

The composition was very heartily applauded and Mr. Paine came to the front of the house and bowed his acknowledgments. Then came a dress parade of the various departments of the orchestra carefully displayed in Tschaikowsky's powerful variations. Some of the execution was memorable. The violins, for example, did wonderful work in the second variation; the flute was exquisitely played in the third; the English horn solo, with its peculiar melody with a flatted seventh, was very impressive, and the finale was the acme of brilliancy. Therefore this concert, which came in like a lamb, went out like a lion, and Mr. Gericke, Mr. Hess, Mr. Winternitz, and all the forces, deserve unstinted laud and praise.

We learn that the Mozart spoken of above is no longer composing, but is the composer. This slight mistake is analogous to the one made by the actress in the western theatre. Finding a notice in the greenroom running—"Next in rehearsal, 'Winter's Night,' by Shakespeare," she exclaimed—"Good gracious! Has that man written another play!"

Louis C. Elson.

The Boston Journal

MOZART SYMPHONY AT FIFTH CONCERT

Mozart's beautiful, ever fresh and inspiring G minor symphony began the fifth concert of the Symphony Orchestra with a call to the noblest emotions. Plain and simple as it appears to be, it has within it a complexity of thought and a richness of inspiration that place it far above most of the resounding, heavily orchestrated works of the moderns. It would "carry" better, probably, in a much smaller hall, and yet the perfect dynamic force at which Mr. Gericke and his men gave it made it large enough for all purposes. That it was played with complete purity and charm goes without saying.

Sinding's A major concerto for the violin, played here for the first time by Felix Winternitz, is a work that does not greatly attract at one hearing. "Dark and true and tender is the North," wrote Tennyson, and in many ways the line fits Norse music. This concerto is mostly dark, however; somber in its breadth and not always tender in its poetry. Yet it has moments of romantic beauty in its andante and a certain rugged warmth in its final allegro. Mr. Winternitz played it with grace, elegance and good taste, but lacked the force and fire to make the concerto as vital as it might have been.

Another "first time at these concerts" was professor John K. Paine's prelude to "The Birds" of Aristophanes. The work is festal in tone, richly scored and artistic in its musicianship. It is not in the least suggestive, however, as program music; it would serve equally well as an introduction for any play or for none at all. It is best to listen to it as absolute music; it then gives the impression of classical strength, some inspiration and not a little beauty. Professor Paine, in answer to hearty applause, walked down to the platform and bowed in his oddly sincere fashion.

At the end came another giant—Tschaikowsky. The wonderfully diverse and fascinating variations on a theme from his Suite No. 3 have never been more clearly and gorgeously played in this city, and rarely has the all-around genius of the Russian been better illustrated. Almost every mood and style of musical writing is contained in these dozen glowing bits of composition, yet through them all, from choral to polonaise, the theme is never buried beneath nor overburdended by the opulent scoring it contains. The work was a triumph and the orchestra's playing of it worthy in every respect.

The Boston Post

FIFTH SYMPHONY CONCERT

Felix Winternitz, violinist, was the soloist of the fifth Symphony concert last evening, and the programme was as follows:

Symphony, G minor.....Mozart
Concerto for violin, A major.....Sinding
Prelude to "The Birds of Arestophanes"..Paine
Theme and variations from op. 55..Tschaikowsky

The symphony by Mozart is an old favorite and was finely played. But the wisdom of having the Mozart symphonies, as well as those by Haydn, played in a large hall, may well be doubted.

The theme and variations by Tschiakowsky is the finale from the composer's third suite in G major, op. 55, which was directed by him, when he visited New York in 1891.

The theme is pleasing and the 12 variations are all exceedingly well contrasted and ingenious. The performance was much enjoyed.

Professor Paine's prelude to "The Birds of Arestophanes" was given at these concerts for the first time. Its initial performance in Boston was under the composer's direction, at a Chickering concert, March 9, 1904. This prelude was composed for the final scenes of the Greek text of "The Birds," by Arestophanes, given at Harvard University in 1901. It is interesting music, and in its way is among the best efforts of the former professor of music at Harvard. The performance was an exceedingly fine one, and the composer was present and acknowledged the applause bestowed upon him and his effort.

Mr. Winternitz, the soloist, played a concerto by Christian Sinding, the Norwegian composer, for the first time in Boston. The work is thoroughly modern, in three sections, without pause. On a first hearing it impresses as an uneven work, interesting in many pages, with others that proved dull and without distinction.

Mr. Winternitz played with fine quality of tone which in breadth, however, was deficient for the work, which apparently is one demanding a violinist of exceptional powers, artistic and otherwise. Mr. Winternitz's interpretation was of the refined, intellectual sort, eminently respectable, but hardly one that will haunt the memory. He was enthusiastically applauded, recalled several times, and presented with a wreath.

For the rehearsal and concert this week Hugo Heermann, another violinist, is to be the soloist in the Brahms concerto.

PENSION FUND CONCERT

The first concert of the year for the benefit of the pension fund will be given in Symphony Hall on next Sunday evening, Nov. 26. Commemorative of the 25th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and to add to the atmosphere of the occasion, Mr. George Henschel, the first conductor of the orchestra, has kindly consented to come over from New York and assist Mr. Gericke.

The object of these pension fund concerts should and does find ready sympathy with all the patrons of the Symphony concerts. It is to establish a sufficient fund to care for members of the orchestra when the time comes, whether through age or inability, that they must give up active work as members of the organization. Governmental support for music is out of the question in America for the present, at any rate, and therefore governmental pensions are equally impossible.

The movement was begun several years ago to establish a pension fund so that the men in the orchestra might be sure of support when the times of need came. The public of Boston responded from the first most generously to this effort and already a considerable sum has been invested for the benefit of the men.

[100]

...BERG'S VIOLIN CONCERTO HEARD

...s Its First Performance by the Symphony Orchestra—More Interesting in Orchestral Passages.

...N FINAL SECTION, MANY MEASURES ARE UGLY

...r. Winternitz Is Soloist—Familiar Works by Mozart and Tschaikowsky—Prof. Paine's Prelude to "Birds."

The programme of the fifth concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Gericke conductor, given last night in Symphony Hall, was as follows:

Symphony in G minor.....Mozart
Concerto in A minor for violin.....Sinding
(First time.)
Prelude to "The Birds" of Aristophanes..Paine
Variations from Suite No. 3....Tschaikowsky

Mozart's symphony in G minor has not been played at these concerts for some years, and it was, therefore the more appreciated last night. Some, it is true, do not hesitate to say that it now has only a historical interest; there are others who are apparently vexed by its exquisite proportions and tender melancholy, and, like the old Athenian, they would gladly mark an oyster shell with the word "exile." That it was conceived in the true and frank spirit in which it was conceived it is unnecessary to say, for Mr. Gericke is a lover of Mozart, and he has an extraordinary orchestra to carry out his wishes. Hear- at the end of the concert the enchanting variations of Tschaikowsky, with the polacca finale, superb in its barbaric pomp, we recalled the Russian's profound reverence and admiration for Mozart and the eloquent letter in which he explained to Mrs. von Meck the reasons for this admiration. Richard Strauss is another of the ultra-moderns who join the long line of those that do Mozart homage, and not with mere lip service. The announcement of any unfamiliar concerto may well interest an audience. This concerto by Sinding, the first of which was introduced in German cities by Mr. Marteau, to whom the younger composers for the violin owe a heavy debt of gratitude. Mr. Marteau played it for the first time in America at a Philharmonic concert in New York in March, 1900. The performance last night was the first in this city.

A distinguished composer once said to us: "I was born hating Weber and the Scandinavian composers." This remark showed catholicity of prejudice, for surely there is little or nothing in common between the romanticism of Weber and that of the Norwegians and Swedes. The hater evidently objected to the character of the formulas in each instance rather than to mere formulas, for every composer has his formulas, and no one is more faithful to them than Weber, except possibly Debussy. The exasperating formula of Weber is that which has been characterized in Berlioz's "chivalric flourish." Equally operating is the peculiar whine which nearly all the Scandinavians that have followed Grieg, nor is Grieg himself free from it. The admirers of northern music find this whine suggestive of wind-swept pines, lonely fiords, black tarns, the midnight sun, cairns of dead kings and the Lord knows what else.

Sinding's later music that we have heard is like a dilution of Grieg stiffened with Wagner. The promise of the earlier, stern, granitic works has not been fulfilled. When there is no whine there is a forbidding rigidity, as in this concerto. It is in three movements, which are so connected that the piece might be characterized as a fantasia in three moods. The hunter, after the sentences, pricks up his ears as soon as he hears the first theme. He is reminded of the last movement of Sinding's concerto in G minor, of the first movement of Brahms' concerto; or the theme recall a polonaise by Chopin, or is there not a touch of Liszt? Let him have his pleasure. What he does with the theme is of little importance. It may be said of the work as a whole that it is more interesting in the full orchestral passages than in the solo part. Much of this is unthankful, and in the final movement there are long series of measures that are ugly, deliberately or carelessly—it matters not.

The most impressive portions of the work are the final orchestral passages at the end of the first section and the corresponding measures immediately following measures of the coda. The opening of this andante is somewhat commonplace; there is no suggestion of something elemental in the theme, but when the solo violin enters the suggestion is dispelled. There is a striking effect gained by the contrast of violin against flute and clarinet. The finale begins with a tune that is at first very vigorously accented for a dance, and the contrast- ing theme, effective in its way, but the movement as an organic whole is not

Boston Transcript

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 18, 1905

IN THE WORLD OF MUSIC

ENTERTAINMENT AT THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

Mozart, Paine, Tschaikovsky and Gericke Give It—The Concerts of Next Week and of Weeks to Come—Messager, the French Composer, on the Decline of French Opera—The Prima Donna's Labors, According to Nordica

It was a comparatively light programme that Mr. Gericke had made for the fifth pair of Symphony concerts. Mozart's symphony in G-minor began it, yesterday afternoon, and Sinding's concerto for violin and orchestra and Professor Paine's prelude to "The Birds" of Aristophanes continued it. For ending there was the set of variations that make the final movement of Tschaikovsky's third suite. By all accounts, the concerto, in which Felix Winternitz played the violin part was heard for the first time in Boston, and Professor Paine's prelude for the first time at the Symphony concerts. Mr. Winternitz has not played often in public of late, and the pupils from the Conservatory, in which he teaches, partly filled the upper gallery and applauded him with a warmth that Ysaye or Kreisler might have envied.

Mr. Gericke is a wise maker of programmes. He must be, perforce, when he has twenty-four to contrive for forty-eight concerts to the same public in six months. He has passed the age when he burns to be perpetually educational. Perhaps his cool discretion has always kept him from that pernicious heat, and made him adamant in atmospheres that sometimes blaze red with it. He is content sometimes to be simply entertaining. He was so in the programme that he chose for the first pair of concerts last month, and he was so, again, yesterday. We in America have made rapid progress in the last ten years with our orchestras, and we have tripped willingly along in the footing and the support of them to the tune that they were very educational indeed. They are, and they are also very entertaining. They can provide us, moreover, with a sort of public entertainment that almost every one of our cities sorely lacks—entertainment that is refined, artistic and intelligent, and they need not do that by descending to what in Pittsburg and Chicago the conductors rather patronize as "popular" programmes. Mr. Gericke's yesterday was by no means such, but most of us in Symphony Hall listened to it for the pure pleasure of beautiful and ordered sound. A week hence Mr. Gericke will ask us to open our minds to Brahms and Schumann. A fortnight ago he was stirring our emotions with Wagner. A little before, he was playing upon us as sensitive men and women of this twentieth-century world with Richard Strauss and Tschaikovsky. To do all these things is a part of the duty of our conductor and our band toward us. It is just as much their duty to give us pleasure and nothing else now and then. Sometimes we reproach Mr. Gericke with over-much sanity, as conductors go. But were he not so sane would he distribute so well all the various functions of an orchestra that ministers to a town like ours? Two entertaining concerts thus far is a pleasant omen for the rest of the season.

But, it is easy to hear certain lovers of Mozart saying, you are taking his symphony much too lightly. There are deep moods in it, and sore; tumultuous moods even, according to the means of expression that were at his command. There are and there are not, you are as ready to reply, Richard Strauss when he conducts any of the three last symphonies of Mozart persuades his listeners of such moods, and they depart in debate as to how much he has read into them from himself and how much he has discovered that no other imagination has detected there. Motti is almost as persuasive. But their Mozart was not the Mozart of Mr. Gericke yesterday. He was content to take him as he stood transparently, and perhaps the composer rose up in the Elysian Fields to bless him. Certainly Mozart did not take his emotions nearly so seriously as some of the commentators have taken them. It is as hard to transfigure him, almost as it is to transfigure Schubert. Beethoven and Schumann strove with themselves and with the world and wrought with travail. Mozart and Schubert were simple men, who let the world do with them as it would, and expressed themselves oftenest in pure spontaneity. Schubert touches his music with a peculiar melancholy; Mozart touches his with a peculiar tenderness. But these are not searching emotions and surging passions for orchestral bite and thunder. They are lyric and not tragic, and

...the charm ... spontaneously into being, ... follow their fluttering, gentle tracery, to hear them leap with youthful energy, soften with youthful tenderness, or loiter in simple youthful dalliance? It is the music of idealized youth in an idealized world, where the very air gives it birth and where no shadow lingers long or turns very dark while it stays. Shall not charm serve us better sometimes than passion, and still delight be the keenest emotional response? Need Mozart be put into a twentieth century forcing house, if we do miss a little of his spontaneous fragrance out-of-doors?

The severest had to take the rest of the programme as pure entertainment. Tschaikovsky's variations are all orchestral play. Yesterday it was a composer, who is a virtuoso when he undertakes such sport, in full frolic with a band of virtuosi. Tschaikovsky tossed off his variation con amore. The band tossed it about for the pure fun of the game. Between them they made it flawless fun. To the listeners it was like drinking orchestral champagne, when every bubble is rushing upward to tingle on the palate—or the ear—and the lamplight is playing through the glass in twenty tints. For a pricking nervous thrill Tschaikovsky never did better than in the little ritardando before the band swings into the final glorified dance. It bites and it catches. A very eminent conductor once told us that he had a nearly irresistible desire to shout "Now we go!" whenever he was carrying his men through it.

There is not a hint, again, in the prelude to "The Birds" that Professor Paine is a born New Englander who has lived there all his life, and who was the best of teachers those many years at Cambridge. Was it Aristophanes who had taken him out of New England, out of himself, and set him to writing, like that volatile Slav thousands of miles away in Russia, for the pure sport of the thing? By every sign he had as much fun in the making and the scoring of that prelude as we listeners had in hearing it. The dry-as-dusts will discover whether there are "worthy" musical ideas in it, properly academic ideas for an academic function. For our part, we neither know nor care. We do know, and it seems much more to the point, that much of it sounds and swings and clicks like a chorus in Aristophanes's own verse with an orchestra, instead of Greek choristers, to sing it. There is the joy of living in the prelude. For the moment, though it is hard to imagine, the good professor turned pure pagan.

H. T. P.

/ / + / /

Concerts Next Week

A violinist of the first rank, Hugo Heerman, who is on his way to Germany from a tour of Australia, appears at the sixth pair of Symphony concerts in Symphony Hall, next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. He will play Brahms's concerto, and as he proved on his previous American tour, scarcely a living violinist is better fitted to cope with it technically, mentally and musically. He used to make it sound like the music of a man, played by a man, for men. The symphony is Schumann's first, and the other numbers are Mr. Loeffler's "The Devil's Round" for orchestra and organ, and a concert overture "for a comedy" by Busoni. The latter is altogether new, and there need be no doubt of its musical scholarship, and we hope there will be something more besides. Mr. Loeffler's tone poem, which is comparatively unfamiliar, is sure to have imagination. For the last time in three weeks Mr. Gericke will conduct at these concerts. For the following pair, on Dec. 2, D'Indy takes the orchestra. The next week the band will be making its monthly tour.

Monday evening, Nov. 27, in Jordan Hall, the second chamber concert of the Boston Symphony Quartet, with Mr. Pugno, the pianist, assisting, and music by Beethoven, Franck and Taneieff on the programme.

Tuesday evening, Nov. 28, in Potter Hall,

Friday afternoon, Dec. 1, in Symphony Hall, seventh Symphony rehearsal, with d'Indy conducting.

Saturday evening, Dec. 2, in Symphony Hall, seventh Symphony concert, with d'Indy conducting.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
EXPRESS.
ILLUSTRATED
BUFFALO N. Y
NOV 19 1905

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which gives its second Buffalo concert at Convention Hall on Monday evening, February 19th, has been winning triumphs both in its home city and in New York this season, scoring last week one of the most brilliant New York successes that is recorded in the history of its twenty years of metropolitan concert giving.

With Mme. Gadski as leading soloist, the orchestra presented a programme at Carnegie Hall, devoted entirely to the works of Richard Wagner. "No other orchestra in America could have done it," declares one of the New York critics. "Even Mme. Gadski's reappearance and her splendid singing could not push into the second place of interest the magnificent playing of the virtuoso orchestra."

NEWS
BUFFALO, N. Y
NOV 19 1905

Foreign Conductors and the Boston Symphony Orchestra

Tributes paid to the artistic perfection of the Boston Symphony Orchestra by the great European conductors who have heard it are most significant in that without exception they confirm the opinion held here in America that Europe possesses no orchestra which may be called its superior. Despite the influx of European musicians and virtuosi who justly regard America as Golconda and despite the stories they take home with them, the general attitude in Europe towards music in America is one of skepticism. But the leaven has so worked in the past ten years that now when a distinguished musician reaches America almost his first question is when he can hear the Boston Symphony.

One of the first great visiting conductors to hear the Orchestra was Hans von Bulow, whose enthusiastic opinion of it is recorded in several letters he wrote to Europe after his visit to Boston. Up to the present year no visiting conductor has ever been invited to lead the orchestra with the single exception of Richard Strauss who, a year ago last spring, conducted one of the pension fund concerts. This year, however, as told some time ago in the NEWS, an invitation has been extended to the distinguished French composer and conductor, Vincent d'Indy to conduct a series of concerts in Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington.

Such men as Felix Mottl, Felix Weingartner, Edouard Colonne and Ernst von Schuch have not hesitated to say that the Boston Symphony has no superior in Europe and possibly no equal, a very great admission from such men as these. They all were anxious to have a chance to conduct the orchestra, had the policy of the management admitted of such a thing and not a small part of the reputation the orchestra enjoys in Europe is due to the reports carried home by such men as these.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gives its second concert in Buffalo at Convention Hall on Monday evening, February 19.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
PRESS
NOV 1905

Vincent d'Indy's Coming.

M. Vincent d'Indy, the distinguished French conductor and composer, sailed for New York from Cherbourg on Wednesday last, the 15th, on the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse. M. d'Indy will be in America about three weeks, during which time he will be fully occupied with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which he will conduct in eight of its concerts. He will make his American debut in Boston on December 1st and 2d, and on the following week will accompany the orchestra on its regular monthly trip, appearing in Philadelphia on the 4th, Washington on the 5th, Baltimore on the 6th, Brooklyn on the 8th, and New York on the evening of the 7th, and afternoon of the 9th.

For these concerts he has arranged two complete programmes. On the first appear the names of d'Indy, Faure, Franck, and Dukas. The composers on the second are Chausson, Magnard, Franck, Debussy, d'Indy, and Roparts. There will be no soloist at these concerts.

During his stay in Boston, he will in all probability lecture at Harvard University, and it is possible that a lecture may be arranged for Columbia. M. d'Indy is an authority on the esthetics of music, and his lectures are very popular in Paris.

A vast amount of interest is displayed in his coming, which promises to be one of the most interesting features of the year.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
STAR
WASHINGTON D. C
NOV 19 1905

MUSICAL MENTION

M. Vincent d'Indy, the distinguished French composer and conductor, sailed for New York from Cherbourg last Wednesday on the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse. M. d'Indy will be in America about three weeks, during which time he will be fully occupied with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which he will conduct in eight of its concerts. He wil make his American debut in Boston December 1 and 2, and the following week he will accompany the orchestra in its regular monthly trip, appearing in Philadelphia on the 4th, Washington on the 5th, Baltimore on the 6th, Brooklyn on the 8th and New York on the evening of the 7th and afternoon of the 9th. For these concerts he has arranged two complete programs. On the first appearance the names of d'Indy, Faure, Franck and Dukas. The composers represented on the second are Chausson, Magnard, Franck, Debussy, d'Indy and Roparts. There will be no soloist at these concerts.

Invitations ...

There is one woman in this town who knows a sporting page when she sees it. She was apparently on her way to market the other morning when a flock of young sters from the Y. M. C. A. ...

[101]

...ST HERALD
...Every Day in the Year.
VOL. CXVIII., NO. 142.
SUNDAY, NOV. 19, 1905.

SINDING'S VIOLIN CONCERTO HEARD

Has Its First Performance by the Symphony Orchestra—More Interesting in Orchestral Passages.

IN FINAL SECTION, MANY MEASURES ARE UGLY

Mr. Winternitz Is Soloist—Familiar Works by Mozart and Tschaikowsky—Prof. Paine's Prelude to "Birds."

The programme of the fifth concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Gericke conductor, given last night in Symphony Hall, was as follows:

Symphony in G minor.....Mozart
Concerto in A minor for violin.....Sinding
(First time.)
Prelude to "The Birds" of Aristophanes..Paine
Variations from Suite No. 3....Tschaikowsky

Mozart's symphony in G minor has not been played at these concerts for some years, and it was therefore the more appreciated last night. Some, it is true, do not hesitate to say that it now has only a historical interest; there are others who are apparently vexed by its exquisite proportions and tender melancholy, and, like the old Athenian, they would gladly mark an oyster shell with the word "exile." That it was played in the true and frank spirit in which it was conceived it is unnecessary to say, for Mr. Gericke is a lover of Mozart, and he has an extraordinary orchestra to carry out his wishes. Hearing at the end of the concert the engrossing variations of Tschaikowsky, with the polacca finale, superb in its festal pomp, we recalled the Russian's affection and admiration for Mozart and the eloquent letter in which he explained to Mrs. von Meck the reasons of this admiration. Richard Strauss is another of the ultra-moderns who join the long line of those that do Mozart homage, and not with mere lip service.

The announcement of any unfamiliar concerto may well interest an audience. This concerto by Sinding, the first of two, was introduced in German cities by Mr. Marteau, to whom the younger composers for the violin owe a heavy debt of gratitude. Mr. Marteau played it for the first time in America at a Philharmonic concert in New York in March, 1900. The performance last night was the first in this city.

A distinguished composer once said to us: "I was born hating Weber and the Scandinavian composers." This remark showed catholicity of prejudice, for surely there is little or nothing in common between the romanticism of Weber and that of the Norwegians and Swedes. The hater evidently objected to the character of the formulas in each instance rather than to mere formulas, for every composer has his formulas, and no one is more faithful to them than Wagner, except possibly Debussy. The most exasperating formula of Weber is that which has been characterized in praise as his "chivalric flourish." Equally exasperating is the peculiar whine of nearly all the Scandinavians that have followed Grieg, nor is Grieg himself free from it. The admirers of northern music find this whine suggestive of wind-swept pines, lonely fiords, black water, the midnight sun, cairns of heroes, and the Lord knows what else besides.

Sinding's later music that we have heard is like a dilution of Grieg stiffened with Wagner. The promise of the earlier, stern, granitic works has not been fulfilled. When there is no whine there is a forbidding rigidity, as in this concerto.

The concerto is in three movements, which are so connected that the piece might be characterized as a fantasia in three moods. The hunter, after reminiscences, pricks up his ears as soon as he hears the first theme. He is reminded of the last movement of Bruch's concerto in G minor, of the last movement of Brahms' concerto; or does the theme recall a polonaise by Wieniawski, or is there not a touch of Dvorak? Let him have his pleasure. What Sinding does with the theme is of more importance. It may be said of the work as a whole that it is more interesting in the full orchestral passages than in the solo part. Much of this part is unthankful, and in the final section there are long series of measures that are ugly, deliberately or carelessly ugly, it matters not.

The most impressive portions of the concerto are the final orchestral passage at the end of the first section and the immediately following measures of the andante. The opening of this andante has sombre imagination; there is the suggestion of something elemental and grand, but when the solo violin enters, the suggestion is dispelled. There is also a striking effect gained by the use of the solo violin against flute and horn. The finale begins with a tune that might be any vigorously accented sailors' song or dance, and the contrasting theme is effective in its way, but the interest in the organic whole is not sustained.

...ese days when smearing too ... is mistaken for an emotional display. He is to be classed among the sound musicians who have an excellent technic rather than among the players of pronounced individuality or deep sentiment, for he gains few effects by mere quality of tone. He was heartily and deservedly applauded.

Prof. Paine's prelude to "The Birds," composed for a performance of Aristophanes' comedy by the Harvard Classical Club, was performed over a year ago in Chickering Hall. The performance last night was the first at these concerts. If some wondered at the exultation of the festal spirit of the prelude and queried why the expression of this spirit rather than ornithological suggestion should be the main theme of the prelude, they should know that the composer had in mind the bridal chorus toward the end of the comedy, and it should be remembered that the final scene was staged in the amphitheatre with the pomp and gorgeousness lavished on the production of a great tragedy. Prof. Paine was obliged to acknowledge the applause.

Tschaikowsky's variations, familiar and well-liked, a virtuoso test for an orchestra, were played by an orchestra of virtuosos, and the polacca dismissed the audience in holiday mood.

Boston Transcript
SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 18, 1905

IN THE WORLD OF MUSIC

ENTERTAINMENT AT THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

Mozart, Paine, Tschaikovsky and Gericke Give It—The Concerts of Next Week and of Weeks to Come—Messager, the French Composer, on the Decline of French Opera—The Prima Donna's Labors, According to Nordica

It was a comparatively light programme that Mr. Gericke had made for the fifth pair of Symphony concerts. Mozart's symphony in G-minor began it, yesterday afternoon, and Sinding's concerto for violin and orchestra and Professor Paine's prelude to "The Birds" of Aristophanes continued it. For ending there was the set of variations that make the final movement of Tschaikovsky's third suite. By all accounts, the concerto, in which Felix Winternitz played the violin part was heard for the first time in Boston, and Professor Paine's prelude for the first time at the Symphony concerts. Mr. Winternitz has not played often in public of late, and the pupils from the Conservatory, in which he teaches, partly filled the upper gallery and applauded him with a warmth that Ysaye or Kreisler might have envied.

Mr. Gericke is a wise maker of programmes. He must be, perforce, when he has twenty-four to contrive for forty-eight concerts to the same public in six months. He has passed the age when he burns to be perpetually educational. Perhaps his cool discretion has always kept him from that pernicious heat, and made him adamant in atmospheres that sometimes blaze red with it. He is content sometimes to be simply entertaining. He was so in the programme that he chose for the first pair of concerts last month, and he was so, again, yesterday. We in America have made rapid progress in the last ten years with our orchestras, and we have tripped willingly along in the founding and the support of them to the tune that they were very educational indeed. They are, and they are also very entertaining. They can provide us, moreover, with a sort of public entertainment that almost every one of our cities sorely lacks—entertainment that is refined, artistic and intelligent, and they need not do that by descending to what in Pittsburg and Chicago the conductors rather patronize as "popular" programmes. Mr. Gericke's yesterday was by no means such, but most of us in Symphony Hall listened to it for the pure pleasure of beautiful and ordered sound. A week hence Mr. Gericke will ask us to open our minds to Brahms and Schumann. A fortnight ago he was stirring our emotions with Wagner. A little before, he was playing upon us as sensitive men and women of this twentieth-century world with Richard Strauss and Tschaikovsky. To do all these things is a part of the duty of our conductor and our band toward us. It is just as much their duty to give us pleasure and nothing else now and then. Sometimes we reproach Mr. Gericke with over-much sanity, as conductors go. But were he not so sane would he distribute so well all the various functions of an orchestra that ministers to a town like ours? Two entertaining concerts thus far is a pleasant omen for the rest of the season.

But, it is easy to hear certain lovers of Mozart saying, you are taking his symphony much too lightly. There are deep moods in it, and sore; tumultuous moods even, according to the means of expression that were at his command. There are and there are not, you are as ready to reply. Richard Strauss when he conducts any of the three last symphonies of Mozart persuades his listeners of such moods, and they depart in debate as to how much he has read into them from himself and how much he has discovered that no other imagination has detected there. Motti is almost as persuasive. But their Mozart was not the Mozart of Mr. Gericke yesterday. He was content to take him as he stood transparently, and perhaps the composer rose up in the Elysian Fields to bless him. Certainly Mozart did not take his emotions nearly so seriously as some of the commentators have taken them. It is as hard to transfigure him, almost as it is to transfigure Schubert. Beethoven and Schumann strove with themselves and with the world and wrought with travail. Mozart and Schubert were simple men, who let the world do with them as it would, and expressed themselves oftenest in pure spontaneity. Schubert touches his music with a peculiar melancholy; Mozart touches his with a peculiar tenderness. But these are not searching emotions and surging passions for orchestral bits and thunder. They are lyric, and not tragic, and

...month with ...
...bert's unfinished symphony, and yesterday with Mozart's, he took them for what they frankly are. After all, is there finer musical pleasure than to yield unfeignedly to the charm of Mozart's melodies as of pure song springing spontaneously into being, to follow their fluttering, gentle tracery, to hear them leap with youthful energy, soften with youthful tenderness, or loiter in simple youthful dalliance? It is the music of idealized youth in an idealized world, where the very air gives it birth and where no shadow lingers long or turns very dark while it stays. Shall not charm serve us better sometimes than passion, and still delight be the keenest emotional response? Need Mozart be put into a twentieth century forcing house, if we do miss a little of his spontaneous fragrance out-of-doors?

The severest had to take the rest of the programme as pure entertainment. Tschaikovsky's variations are all orchestral play. Yesterday it was a composer, who is a virtuoso when he undertakes such sport, in full frolic with a band of virtuosi. Tschaikovsky tossed off his variation con amore. The band tossed it about for the pure fun of the game. Between them they made it flawless fun. To the listeners it was like drinking orchestral champagne, when every bubble is rushing upward to tingle on the palate—or the ear—and the lamplight is playing through the glass in twenty tints. For a pricking nervous thrill Tschaikovsky never did better than in the little ritardando before the band swings into the final glorified dance. It bites and it catches. A very eminent conductor once told us that he had a nearly irresistible desire to shout "Now we go!" whenever he was carrying his men through it.

There is not a hint, again, in the prelude to "The Birds" that Professor Paine is a born New Englander who has lived there all his life, and who was the best of teachers those many years at Cambridge. Was it Aristophanes who had taken him out of New England, out of himself, and set him to writing, like that volatile Slav thousands of miles away in Russia, for the pure sport of the thing? By every sign he had as much fun in the making and the scoring of that prelude as we listeners had in hearing it. The dry-as-dusts will discover whether there are "worthy" musical ideas in it, properly academic ideas for an academic function. For our part, we neither know nor care. We do know, and it seems much more to the point, that much of it sounds and swings and clicks like a chorus in Aristophanes's own verse with an orchestra, instead of Greek choristers, to sing it. There is the joy of living in the prelude. For the moment, though it is hard to imagine, the good professor turned pure pagan.

H. T. P.

/ / + / /

Concerts Next Week

A violinist of the first rank, Hugo Heerman, who is on his way to Germany from a tour of Australia, appears at the sixth pair of Symphony concerts in Symphony Hall, next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. He will play Brahms's concerto, and as he proved on his previous American tour, scarcely a living violinist is better fitted to cope with it technically, mentally and musically. He used to make it sound like the music of a man, played by a man, for men. The symphony is Schumann's first, and the other numbers are Mr. Loeffler's "The Devil's Round" for orchestra and organ, and a concert overture "for a comedy" by Busoni. The latter is altogether new, and there need be no doubt of its musical scholarship, and we hope there will be something more besides. Mr. Loeffler's tone poem, which is comparatively unfamiliar, is sure to have imagination. For the last time in three weeks Mr. Gericke will conduct at these concerts. For the following pair, on Dec. 2, D'Indy takes the orchestra. The next week the band will be making its monthly tour.

Monday evening, Nov. 27, in Jordan Hall, the second chamber concert of the Boston Symphony Quartet, with Mr. Pugno, the pianist, assisting, and music by Beethoven, Franck and Tanéieff on the programme.

Tuesday evening, Nov. 28, in Potter Hall,

Friday afternoon, Dec. 1, in Symphony Hall, seventh Symphony rehearsal, with d'Indy conducting.

Saturday evening, Dec. 2, in Symphony Hall, seventh Symphony concert, with d'Indy conducting.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
...
...ess ...
NOV

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which gives its second Buffalo concert at Convention Hall on Monday evening, February 19th, has been winning triumphs both in its home city and in New York this season, scoring last week one of the most brilliant New York successes that is recorded in the history of its twenty years of metropolitan concert giving.

With Mme. Gadski as leading soloist, the orchestra presented a programme at Carnegie Hall, devoted entirely to the works of Richard Wagner. "No other orchestra in America could have done it," declares one of the New York critics. "Even Mme. Gadski's reappearance and her splendid singing could not push into the second place of interest the magnificent playing of the virtuoso orchestra."

NEWS
NOV 19 1905

Foreign Conductors and the Boston Symphony Orchestra

Tributes paid to the artistic perfection of the Boston Symphony Orchestra by the great European conductors who have heard it are most significant in that without exception they confirm the opinion held here in America that Europe possesses no orchestra which may be called its superior. Despite the influx of European musicians and virtuosi who justly regard America as Golconda and despite the stories they take home with them, the general attitude in Europe towards music in America is one of skepticism. But the leaven has so worked in the past ten years that now when a distinguished musician reaches America almost his first question is when he can hear the Boston Symphony.

One of the first great visiting conductors to hear the Orchestra was Hans von Bulow, whose enthusiastic opinion of it is recorded in several letters he wrote to Europe after his visit to Boston. Up to the present year no visiting conductor has ever been invited to lead the orchestra with the single exception of Richard Strauss who, a year ago last spring, conducted one of the pension fund concerts. This year, however, as told some time ago in the NEWS, an invitation has been extended to the distinguished French composer and conductor, Vincent d'Indy to conduct a series of concerts in Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington.

Such men as Felix Mottl, Felix Weingartner, Edouard Colonne and Ernst von Schuch have not hesitated to say that the Boston Symphony has no superior in Europe and possibly no equal, a very great admission from such men as these. They all were anxious to have a chance to conduct the orchestra, had the policy of the management admitted of such a thing and not a small part of the reputation the orchestra enjoys in Europe is due to the reports carried home by such men as these.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gives its second concert in Buffalo at Convention Hall on Monday evening, February 19.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
...ss ...

Vincent d'Indy's Coming.

M. Vincent d'Indy, the distinguished French conductor and composer, sailed for New York from Cherbourg on Wednesday last, the 15th, on the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse. M. d'Indy will be in America about three weeks, during which time he will be fully occupied with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which he will conduct in eight of its concerts. He will make his American debut in Boston on December 1st and 2d, and on the following week will accompany the orchestra on its regular monthly trip, appearing in Philadelphia on the 4th, Washington on the 5th, Baltimore on the 6th, Brooklyn on the 8th, and New York on the evening of the 7th, and afternoon of the 9th.

For these concerts he has arranged two complete programmes. On the first appear the names of d'Indy, Faure, Franck, and Dukas. The composers on the second are Chausson, Magnard, Franck, Debussy, d'Indy, and Ropartz. There will be no soloist at these concerts.

During his stay in Boston, he will in all probability lecture at Harvard University, and it is possible that a lecture may be arranged for Columbia. M. d'Indy is an authority on the esthetics of music, and his lectures are very popular in Paris.

A vast amount of interest is displayed in his coming, which promises to be one of the most interesting features of the year.

...r Cutting Bureau in the World

MUSICAL MENTION

M. Vincent d'Indy, the distinguished French composer and conductor, sailed for New York from Cherbourg last Wednesday on the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse. M. d'Indy will be in America about three weeks, during which time he will be fully occupied with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which he will conduct in eight of its concerts. He wil make his American debut in Boston December 1 and 2, and the following week he will accompany the orchestra in its regular monthly trip, appearing in Philadelphia on the 4th, Washington on the 5th, Baltimore on the 6th, Brooklyn on the 8th and New York on the evening of the 7th and afternoon of the 9th. For these concerts he has arranged two complete programs. On the first appearance the names of d'Indy, Faure, Franck and Dukas. The composers represented on the second are Chausson, Magnard, Franck, Debussy, d'Indy and Ropartz. There will be no soloist at these concerts.

Invitations ...

There is one woman in this town who knows a sporting page when she sees it. She was apparently on her way to market the other morning when a flock of youngsters from the Y. M. C. A. flashed by on

[101]

REDUCTION

RATIO

13x

2.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.0 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

150 mm

100 mm

A5

A4

1.0 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.0 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION[SM] RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

4.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

3.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.0 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

SYMPHONY HALL
SUNDAY EVENING, NOV. 26, at 8

Pension Fund Concert

Boston Symphony Orchestra

WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor

This concert is commemorative of the twenty-fifth year of the founding of the Orchestra

THE FIRST CONDUCTOR

Georg Henschel

HAS KINDLY CONSENTED TO ASSIST

Programme

BEETHOVEN . . Overture, "Dedication of the House"
GEORG HENSCHEL, Conductor
TSCHAIKOWSKY . . . . Symphonie Pathetique
WAGNER . . . . Bacchanale from "Tannhaeuser"
R. STRAUSS . . . . Symphonic Poem, "Don Juan"

Tickets, $2.00, $1.50, and $1.00, now on sale. Mail orders should be addressed to C. A. ELLIS, Symphony Hall

PUBLIC LEDGER
PHILA., PA.
NOV 19 1905

Vincent d'Indy, who sailed for New York on the 15th, expects to stay in this country about three weeks, conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra in eight concerts, and probably giving a lecture at Harvard University. His first concerts will be at Boston on December 1 and 2, and he will go with the orchestra on its monthly trip, appearing in Philadelphia on December 4, and successively in Washington, Baltimore, New York and Brooklyn, and a second time in New York. For these concerts he has made up two complete programmes of modern French music. The first contains the names of Vincent d'Indy, Faure, Franeck and Dukas; the second, Chausson, Magnard, Franck, Debussy, d'Indy and Roparts.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
INQUIRER.
PHILA., PA.
NOV 19 1905

Vincent D'Indy's Coming

M. Vincent d'Indy, the distinguished French composer and conductor, sailed from Cherbourg for New York last Wednesday, the 15th, on the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse. M. d'Indy will be in America about three weeks, during which time he will be fully occupied with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which he is to conduct in eight of its concerts. He will make his American debut in Boston on December 1 and 2. The following week he will accompany the orchestra on its regular monthly trip, appearing in Philadelphia on the 4th, Washington on the 5th, Baltimore on the 6th, Brooklyn on the 8th, and New York on the evening of the 7th and afternoon of the 9th.

SUN
BALTIMORE, MD.
NOV 19 1905

D'Indy To Conduct Boston Orchestra

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its second concert of the season at the Lyric December 6. It is announced that Vincent d'Indy, the distinguished French composer, will conduct the orchestra this visit. The Boston Symphony has often been heard in concerts containing d'Indy's compositions.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

M. Vincent d'Indy, the distinguished French composer and conductor, sailed for New York from Cherbourg on Wednesday last, the 15th, in the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse. M. d'Indy will be in America about three weeks, during which time he will be fully occupied with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which he will conduct in eight of its concerts. He will make his American debut in Boston on December 1 and 2, and the following week he will accompany the orchestra on its regular monthly trip, appearing in Philadelphia on the 4th, Washington on the 5th, Baltimore on the 6th, Brooklyn on the 8th, and Manhattan on the evening of the 7th and afternoon of the 9th. For these concerts M. d'Indy has arranged two complete programmes. On the first appear the names of D'Incy, Faure, Franck and Dukas. The composers represented on the second are Chausson, Magnard, Franck, Debussy, d'Indy and Roperts.

During his stay in Boston he will in all probability give a lecture at Harvard University, and it is possible that one may be arranged for at Columbia. In Paris his lectures attract much attention among professionals and amateurs, as he is one of the greatest living authorities on the esthetics of his art.

over Cutting Bureau in the World
Y. AMERICAN
NOV 22 1905

TWO NOTED COMPOSERS ARRIVE FROM EUROPE

Herr Humperdinck and M. d'Indy on Same Ship with Buffalo Bill.

Engelbert Humperdinck, the celebrated German composer, reached New York last night on the North German Lloyd steamship Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse. He is here to witness the production of his opera, "Haensel und Gretel," to be presented Saturday afternoon at the Metropolitan Opera House. He said he would not act as conductor.

Vincent d'Indy, the French composer, also arrived on the Kaiser Wilhelm, having been invited to America by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to conduct several concerts, two of which will be given at Carnegie Hall, December 7 and 9.

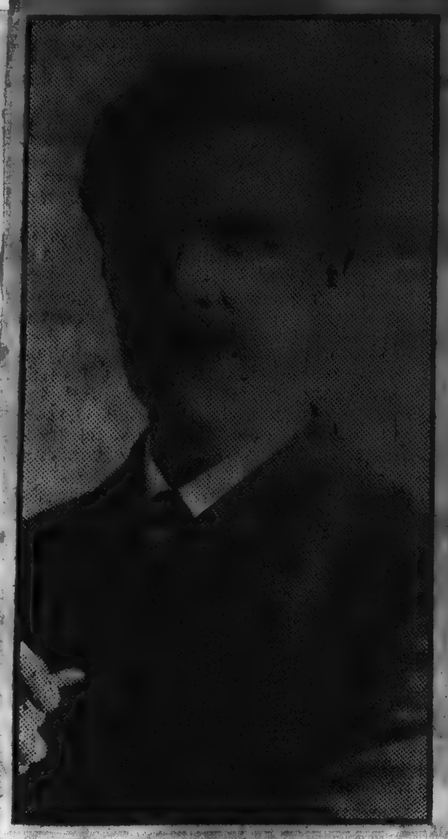
Gertrude Arnold-Schuenan, who has been engaged by Heinrich Conried for leading roles in "Iphigenia" and "Messalina," soon to be produced at the Irving Place Theatre, was also on board, as well as Colonel William F. Cody, "Buffalo Bill."

[102]

HERALD
BALTIMORE, MD.
NOV 17 1905

The Life and Works of Vincent D'Indy

¶Something About the Famous French Composer Who Is Coming Here With the Boston Symphony Orchestra.



Vincent D'Indy

The announcement that Vincent d'Indy, the distinguished French composer, will visit America this fall and conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a series of its concerts in Baltimore and other cities gives much pleasure to others beside the admirers of the "younger" French school. There is always curiosity to see a celebrated man, and, while composers are not necessarily the best interpreters of their own works, M. d'Indy has had much experience as a member and conductor of orchestras.

In the last fifteen years four distinguished composers have visited America. The first was Tschaikowsky, who was brought to this country to add brilliancy and dignity to the formal opening of Carnegie Hall, in New York. The second was the Bohemian, Dvorak, who came to America to preside over the fortunes of a conservatory of music. The third was Richard Strauss, whose object in coming was merely to conduct concerts and give recitals of his own songs. M. d'Indy, the fourth member of this distinguished company, comes at the invitation of the Boston orchestra, an invitation which was intended as a compliment to those energetic younger men of France who have tried so hard and with such considerable success to restore absolute music to its rightful position in their country.

In a sense M. d'Indy's visit has a certain missionary character. America is yet to have authoritative readings of the new and interesting music which has been given to the world by d'Indy, Debussy, Chausson, Bruneau, Charpentier and the other men who follow in their footsteps, and it is M. d'Indy's purpose to devote himself entirely to these works and thus let America know them under the most favorable conditions.

Fought in Franco-Prussian War.

M. d'Indy is first of all a composer, then a teacher and then a conductor. In the last named capacity he has commanded the respectful attention in various cities of Europe, by reason of his artistic purpose in spreading the knowledge of modern French music and also by his abilities as a conductor.

He comes of an aristocratic and wealthy family. He was intended for the law and against his wishes he studied to become a lawyer, but at the same time he studied music. He took pianoforte lessons of Diemar and harmony lessons of Lavignac (1862-1863). During the Franco-Prussian war he served as a volunteer in the 105th Regiment and took part in the defense of Paris, notably in the battle of Montretout. After the war he gave up definitely any idea of becoming a lawyer, and, against the will of his family, henceforth devoted himself to music.

It should here be said that his father, a man of large income, was fond of music and played the violin not too disagreeably. His mother died soon after his birth and, his father taking himself a second wife, the boy was brought up by his grandmother, Mme. Therese d'Indy, who, an excellent musician, taught him the rudiments of the art. It was she that led him in his early years to the study of the great masters. Moreover, he had an uncle, Saint-Ange Wilfred d'Indy, who, as an amateur composer, was popular in Parisian parlors and halls in which his romances, chamber music and operas de salon were performed. It was he that first showed him Berlioz's treatise on instrumentation.

A Native of Paris.

M. d'Indy was born in Paris, March 27, 1852. (The date in most musical dictionaries is 1851, but according to M. d'Indy himself 1852 was the year.) Two years after he had left Lavignac, in 1867, he came under the influence of Henri Duparc, who took him into the Wagnerian fold, where he has been ever since, and after the war, when he had decided definitely to adopt music as a profession, it was Duparc that introduced him to Cesar Frank, whose genius at that time was recognized only by a chosen few who formed that remarkable little circle about the great man and ultimately lifted him stein" triology, was performed at one of Pasdeloup's concerts in 1875. In 1882 a little comic opera in one act, "Attendez Moi Sous l'Orme," with a libretto based on Regnard's comedy, was produced at the Opera Comique, and perplexed the habitues, accustomed to simpler harmonies and conventional tunes.

There were other works produced before 1885, but several of them have been dropped from the catalogue drawn up by the composer. "The Enchanted Forest," an orchestral ballad (1878); "The Ride of the Cid," for barytone, chorus and orchestra (1879), and the "Wallenstein" triology are retained, as is the piano quartet (1878). A symphony and an overture to "Antony and Cleopatra" have been thrown overboard. In 1885 D'Indy was awarded the prize of the city of Paris for his "Song of the Bell" (after Schiller). This prize for a musical composition by a Frenchman was established in 1878, and there is a competition for it every two years. "The Song of the Bell," a romantic symphony for solo voices, double chorus and orchestra, was produced at the expense of the city and performed several times under the direction of Lamoureux. Van Dyck, the tenor, then at the beginning of his career (1886), sang the music of Wilhelm, the bell founder.

In 1887 d'Indy became chorus master of the Lamoureux concerts and he prepared the choruses for the first production of "Lohengrin," in Paris, at the Eden Theater, May 3, 1887. Chauvinism allowed only one performance.

Busied with composition, he visited Baireuth several times. He was at the first performance of the "Ring" and of "Parsifal." With Franck, Saint-Saens, Gabriel Faure, Castillon, Chausson and Duparc he was a founder of the National School of Music, and after the death of Franck he was made president of that society. In 1893 the government appointed him one of a committee to recommend reforms in the Paris Conservatory, but the professors of the institutions made such lively protests that the idea of such a committee was abandoned. In 1896 a professorship in the conservatory was offered him, but he refused the position, as he wished to preserve his liberty. The next year he founded with Charles Bordes, the director of the "Singers of St. Gervais," and Alexander Guilmant, the famous organist, a school of music, the Schola Cantorum, of which he is now the honored head.

A Lover of the Mountains.

D'Indy was always a lover of nature. His family came originally from Verdieux, in Ardeche, a department formerly a portion of the province Languedoc. The mountains of the Cevennes are often naked, barren, forbidding, and d'Indy has long been in the habit of spending his vacations in this picturesque country. He has also delighted in the Tyrol, the Engadine, the Black forest; he has listened intently to what Millet called "the cry of the earth." In a letter written from Vernoux in 1887 he said: "At this moment I see the snowy summits of the Alps, the nearer mountains, the plain of the Rhone, the pine woods that I know so well, and the green, rich harvest which has not yet been gathered. It is a true pleasure to be here after the labors and the vexations of the winter. What they call at Paris 'the artistic world' seems afar off and a trifling thing. Here is true repose, here one feels at the true source of all art."

His love of nature is seen in "Poeme des Montagnes," suite for piano (1881); "La Foret Enchantee," symphonic ballad (1878); the symphony for orchestra and piano on a mountain air (1886); fantasia for oboe and orchestra on some folk tunes (1888); "Tableux de Voyage," pieces for piano (1889), and chamber music by him suggests the austerity of mountain scenery.

In his childhood D'Indy loved folk-tales and fantastic stories. Then he read eagerly the works of Uhland, Hoffman, Poe. There came the worship of Dante, and then he came under the influence of Shakespeare, Moliere, Schiller and Goethe. Flambert, especially by his "Temptation of St. Anthony," made a profound impression on him. In painting he prefers the masters of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, and he confesses frankly that he experiences a greater and more artistic stimulus in the presence of Assyrian art long before Christ than in the presence of the art known to Pericles. Imbert says that D'Indy will remain for hours in contemplation before the pictures of certain primitive German or Flemish painters, while the marvelous compositions of the Italian painters of the Renaissance leave him cold. "So that one may well trace in his disdain for the charming creations of the Renaissance the determination to keep from his music all that seems to him to have the least affectation or that which is merely graceful or tender."

His Operas and Other Works.

In addition to the works already mentioned, D'Indy has composed the operas "Fervaal" and "The Stranger," which have been produced; incidental music to Mendes' "Medee"; "Sauge Fleurie," a legend for orchestra; "Istar," orchestral variations; choral and variations for saxophone or 'cello and orchestra, and symphony No. 2. He has also written a sonata for violin and piano; a piano quartet, a suite in the old style for trumpet, flutes and strings; a trio for piano, clarinet and 'cello; two string quartets, "Chansons et Danses" for wind instruments; "Schumanniana," for piano; "Helvetia," three waltzes for piano; "Mary Magdalene," a cantata for solo voice and female chorus; "Deus Israel," a motet for six voices unaccompanied; "Clair de Lune," for voice and orchestra (poem by Hugo); "Sur la mer," chorus for female voices, and a few songs. He has written an elaborate and [illegible] treatise on musical composition.

It was in 1872 that D'Indy with great confidence took a string quartet to Franck [illegible] elaborated with [illegible] tions of folk-songs of certain Fre[illegible]

SYMPHONY HALL
SUNDAY EVENING, NOV. 26, at 8

Pension Fund Concert

Boston Symphony Orchestra

WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor

This concert is commemorative of the twenty-fifth year of the founding of the Orchestra

THE FIRST CONDUCTOR

Georg Henschel

HAS KINDLY CONSENTED TO ASSIST

Programme

BEETHOVEN . . Overture, "Dedication of the House"
GEORG HENSCHEL, Conductor
TSCHAIKOWSKY . . . . Symphonie Pathetique
WAGNER . . . . Bacchanale from "Tannhaeuser"
R. STRAUSS . . . Symphonic Poem, "Don Juan"

Tickets, $2.00, $1.50, and $1.00, now on sale. Mail orders should be addressed to C. A. ELLIS, Symphony Hall

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

PUBLIC Press
n
ess

Vincent d'Indy, who sailed for New York on the 15th, expects to stay in this country about three weeks, conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra in eight concerts, and probably giving a lecture at Harvard University. His first concerts will be at Boston on December 1 and 2, and he will go with the orchestra on its monthly trip, appearing in Philadelphia on December 4, and successively in Washington, Baltimore, New York and Brooklyn, and a second time in New York. For these concerts he has made up two complete programmes of modern French music. The first contains the names af Vincent d'Indy, Faure, Franck and Dukas; the second, Chausson, Magnard, Franck, Debussy, d'Indy and Ropartz.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

Vincent D'Indy's Coming

M. Vincent d'Indy, the distinguished French composer and conductor, sailed from Cherbourg for New York last Wednesday, the 15th, on the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse. M. d'Indy will be in America about three weeks, during which time he will be fully occupied with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which he is to conduct in eight of its concerts. He will make his American debut in Boston on December 1 and 2. The following week he will accompany the orchestra on its regular monthly trip, appearing in Philadelphia on the 4th, Washington on the 5th, Baltimore on the 6th, Brooklyn on the 8th, and New York on the evening of the 7th and afternoon of the 9th.

Press
BALTIMORE, MD.
NOV 19 1905

D'Indy To Conduct Boston Orchestra

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its second concert of the season at the Lyric December 6. It is announced that Vincent d'Indy, the distinguished French composer, will conduct the orchestra this visit. The Boston Symphony has often been heard in concerts containing d'Indy's compositions.

M. Vincent d'Indy, the distinguished French composer and conductor, sailed for New York from Cherbourg on Wednesday last, the 15th, in the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse. M. d'Indy will be in America about three weeks, during which time he will be fully occupied with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which he will conduct in eight of its concerts. He will make his American debut in Boston on December 1 and 2, and the following week he will accompany the orchestra on its regular monthly trip, appearing in Philadelphia on the 4th, Washington on the 5th, Baltimore on the 6th, Brooklyn on the 8th, and Manhattan on the evening of the 7th and afternoon of the 9th. For these concerts M. d'Indy has arranged two complete programmes. On the first appear the names of D'Incy, Faure, Franck and Dukas. The composers represented on the second are Chausson, Magnard, Franck, Debussy, d'Indy and Ropertz.

During his stay in Boston he will in all probability give a lecture at Harvard University, and it is possible that one may be arranged for at Columbia. In Paris his lectures attract much attention among professionals and amateurs, as he is one of the greatest living authorities on the esthetics of his art.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

TWO NOTED COMPOSERS ARRIVE FROM EUROPE

Herr Humperdinck and M. d'Indy on Same Ship with Buffalo Bill.

Engelbert Humperdinck, the celebrated German composer, reached New York last night on the North German Lloyd steamship Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse. He is here to witness the production of his opera, "Haensel und Gretel," to be presented Saturday afternoon at the Metropolitan Opera House. He said he would not act as conductor.

Vincent d'Indy, the French composer, also arrived on the Kaiser Wilhelm, having been invited to America by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to conduct several concerts, two of which will be given at Carnegie Hall, December 7 and 9.

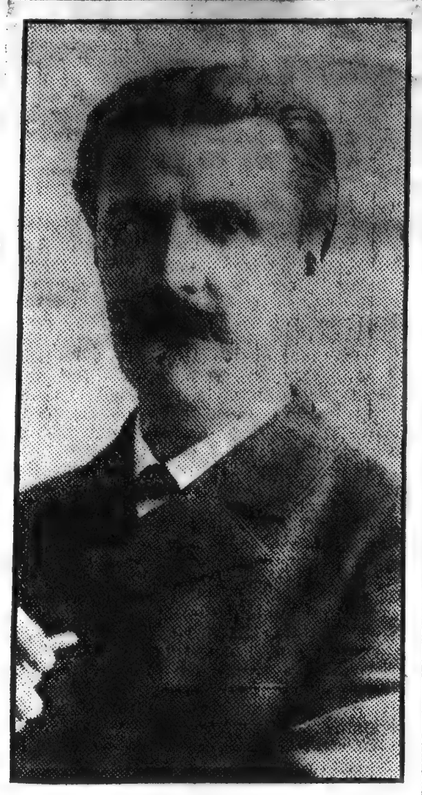
Gertrude Arnold-Schuenan, who has been engaged by Heinrich Conried for leading roles in "Iphigenia" and "Messalina," soon to be produced at the Irving Place Theatre, was also on board, as well as Colonel William F. Cody, "Buffalo Bill."

[102]

HERALD
BALTIMORE, MD.
NOV 17 1905

The Life and Works of Vincent D'Indy

¶Something About the Famous French Composer Who Is Coming Here With the Boston Symphony Orchestra.



Vincent D'Indy

The announcement that Vincent d'Indy, the distinguished French composer, will visit America this fall and conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a series of its concerts in Baltimore and other cities gives much pleasure to others beside the admirers of the "younger" French school. There is always curiosity to see a celebrated man, and, while composers are not necessarily the best interpreters of their own works, M. d'Indy has had much experience as a member and conductor of orchestras.

In the last fifteen years four distinguished composers have visited America. The first was Tschaikowsky, who was brought to this country to add brilliancy and dignity to the formal opening of Carnegie Hall, in New York. The second was the Bohemian, Dvorak, who came to America to preside over the fortunes of a conservatory of music. The third was Richard Strauss, whose object in coming was merely to conduct concerts and give recitals of his own songs. M. d'Indy, the fourth member of this distinguished company, comes at the invitation of the Boston orchestra, an invitation which was intended as a compliment to those energetic younger men of France who have tried so hard and with such considerable success to restore absolute music to its rightful position in their country.

In a sense M. d'Indy's visit has a certain missionary character. America is yet to have authoritative readings of the new and interesting music which has been given to the world by d'Indy, Debussy, Chausson, Bruneau, Charpentier and the other men who follow in their footsteps, and it is M. d'Indy's purpose to devote himself entirely to these works and thus let America know them under the most favorable conditions.

Fought in Franco-Prussian War.

M. d'Indy is first of all a composer, then a teacher and then a conductor. In the last named capacity he has commanded the respectful attention in various cities of Europe, by reason of his artistic purpose in spreading the knowledge of modern French music and also by his abilities as a conductor.

He comes of an aristocratic and wealthy family. He was intended for the law and against his wishes he studied to become a lawyer, but at the same time he studied music. He took pianoforte lessons of Diemar and harmony lessons of Lavignac (1862-1863). During the Franco-Prussian war he served as a volunteer in the 105th Regiment and took part in the defense of Paris, notably in the battle of Montretout. After the war he gave up definitely any idea of becoming a lawyer, and, against the will of his family, henceforth devoted himself to music.

It should here be said that his father, a man of large income, was fond of music and played the violin not too disagreeably. His mother died soon after his birth and, his father taking himself a second wife, the boy was brought up by his grandmother, Mme. Therese d'Indy, who, an excellent musician, taught him the rudiments of the art. It was she that led him in his early years to the study of the great masters. Moreover, he had an uncle, Saint-Ange Wilfred d'Indy, who, as an amateur composer, was popular in Parisian parlors and halls in which his romances, chamber music and operas de salon were performed. It was he that first showed him Berlioz's treatise on instrumentation.

A Native of Paris.

M. d'Indy was born in Paris, March 27, 1852. (The date in most musical dictionaries is 1851, but according to M. d'Indy himself 1852 was the year.) Two years after he had left Lavignac, in 1867, he came under the influence of Henri Duparc, who took him into the Wagnerian fold, where he has been ever since, and after the war, when he had decided definitely to adopt music as a profession, it was Duparc that introduced him to Cesar Frank, whose genius at that time was recognized only by a chosen few who formed that remarkable little circle about the great man and ultimately lifted him to popularity.

It was in 1872 that D'Indy with great diffidence took a string quartet to Franck for criticism. Franck, although he received him with his usual kindness, showed him that the quartet was hopelessly bad, despite certain good ideas it contained—yet he encouraged him to try again. Immediately D'Indy began to study composition in all its branches with Franck, and in 1873 entered his organ class in the Conservatory, where he remained two years and succeeded in taking a first accessit. Then, believing that the study of composition at the Conservatory was not wholly serious, he became a private pupil of Franck. It is not unlikely that the pupils of Franck at the Conservatory at this time suffered alike with their master, who was, if not exactly under the ban, only tolerated by the most conservative, who shuddered at his reputation of being an "independent."

Under Brahms' Influence.

In 1874 D'Indy became acquainted with the "Deutsches Requiem" of Brahms, and his admiration for it was so great that he determined to make a pilgrimage in the hope of seeing the composer and of obtaining advice from him. He went to Weimar, where he met Liszt, and he was, in a way, his pupil for some time. He then went to Vienna, and found that Brahms had gone to Bavaria. He followed him, and finally found him in Tutzing, but whether Brahms was not in a mood to receive strangers, or whether he was absorbed by work that demanded concentration, the interview was short and unsatisfactory, despite the letter D'Indy had from Saint-Saens and Franck.

D'Indy felt the need of becoming thoroughly acquainted with the details of the orchestra. For this purpose he entered the Society of the Chatelet Concerts as chorus master and second drummer, and he filled these positions until 1878, when he retired on account of a disagreement with Colonne, the conductor.

His "Piccolomini" overture, which now forms the second part of the "Wallenstein" triology, was performed at one of Pasdeloup's concerts in 1875. In 1882 a little comic opera in one act, "Attendez Moi Sous l'Orme," with a libretto based on Regnard's comedy, was produced at the Opera Comique, and perplexed the habitues accustomed to simpler harmonies and conventional tunes.

There were other works produced before 1885, but several of them have been dropped from the catalogue drawn up by the composer. "The Enchanted Forest," an orchestral ballad (1878); "The Ride of the Cid," for barytone, chorus and orchestra (1879), and the "Wallenstein" triology are retained, as is the piano quartet (1878). A symphony and an overture to "Antony and Cleopatra" have been thrown overboard. In 1885 D'Indy was awarded the prize of the city of Paris for his "Song of the Bell" (after Schiller). This prize for a musical composition by a Frenchman was established in 1878, and there is a competition for it every two years. "The Song of the Bell," a romantic symphony for solo voices, double chorus and orchestra, was produced at the expense of the city and performed several times under the direction of Lamoureux. Van Dyck, the tenor, then at the beginning of his career (1886), sang the music of Wilhelm, the bell founder.

In 1887 d'Indy became chorus master of the Lamoureux concerts and he prepared the choruses for the first production of "Lohengrin," in Paris, at the Eden Theater, May 3, 1887. Chauvinism allowed only one performance.

Busied with composition, he visited Baireuth several times. He was at the first performance of the "Ring" and of "Parsifal." With Franck, Saint-Saens, Gabriel Faure, Castillon, Chausson and Duparc he was a founder of the National School of Music, and after the death of Franck he was made president of that society. In 1893 the government appointed him one of a committee to recommend reforms in the Paris Conservatory, but the professors of the institutions made such lively protests that the idea of such a committee was abandoned. In 1895 a professorship in the conservatory was offered him, but he refused the position, as he wished to preserve his liberty. The next year he founded with Charles Bordes, the director of the "Singers of St. Gervais," and Alexander Guilmant, the famous organist, a school of music, the Schola Cantorum, of which he is now the honored head.

A Lover of the Mountains.

D'Indy was always a lover of nature. His family came originally from Verdieux, in Ardeche, a department formerly a portion of the province Languedoc. The mountains of the Cevennes are often naked, barren, forbidding, and d'Indy has long been in the habit of spending his vacations in this picturesque country. He has also delighted in the Tyrol, the Engadine, the Black forest; he has listened intently to what Millet called "the cry of the earth." In a letter written from Vernoux in 1887 he said: "At this moment I see the snowy summits of the Alps, the nearer mountains, the plain of the Rhone, the pine woods that I know so well, and the green, rich harvest which has not yet been gathered. It is a true pleasure to be here after the labors and the vexations of the winter. What they call at Paris 'the artistic world' seems afar off and a trifling thing. Here is true repose, here one feels at the true source of all art."

His love of nature is seen in "Poeme des Montagnes," suite for piano (1881); "La Foret Enchantee," symphonic ballad (1878); the symphony for orchestra and piano on a mountain air (1886); fantasia for oboe and orchestra on some folk tunes (1888); "Tableux de Voyage," pieces for piano (1889), and chamber music by him suggests the austerity of mountain scenery.

In his childhood D'Indy loved folk-tales and fantastic stories. Then he read eagerly the works of Uhland, Hoffman, Poe. There came the worship of Dante, and then he came under the influence of Shakespeare, Moliere, Schiller and Goethe. Flambert, especially by his "Temptation of St. Anthony," made a profound impression on him. In painting he prefers the masters of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, and he confesses frankly that he experiences a greater and more artistic stimulus in the presence of Assyrian art long before Christ than in the presence of the art known to Pericles. Imbert says that D'Indy will remain for hours in contemplation before the pictures of certain primitive German or Flemish painters, while the marvelous compositions of the Italian painters of the Renaissance leave him cold. "So that one may well trace in his disdain for the charming creations of the Renaissance the determination to keep from his music all that seems to him to have the least affectation or that which is merely graceful or tender."

His Operas and Other Works.

In addition to the works already mentioned, D'Indy has composed the operas "Fervaal" and "The Stranger," which have been produced; incidental music to Mendes' "Medee"; "Sauge Fleurie," a legend for orchestra; "Istar," orchestral variations; choral and variations for saxophone or 'cello and orchestra, and symphony No. 2. He has also written a sonata for violin and piano; a piano quartet, a suite in the old style for trumpet, flutes and strings; a trio for piano, clarinet and 'cello; two string quartets, "Chansons et Danses" for wind instruments; "Schumanniana," for piano; "Helvetia," three waltzes for piano; "Mary Magdalene," a cantata for solo voice and female chorus; "Deus Israel," a motet for six voices unaccompanied; "Clair de Lune," for voice and orchestra (poem by Hugo); "Sur la mer," chorus for female voices, and a few songs. He has written an elaborate and valuable treatise on musical composition and [illegible] has been published [illegible] elaborated with Tiersot in editions of folk-songs of certain French provinces. He is a writer of singular force and style, and his tribute to Cesar Franck reveals the man and the musician, as well as the literary stylist.

This is not the time to discuss at length the characteristics, the quality of Vincent d'Indy's music. It may be said, however, that his technical mastery is great and undisputed; his aims are pure and noble, and he might say with Victor Ignotus, "at least no merchant traffics in my heart." His polyphonic artistry, his use of rhythm and color, his skill and taste in orchestration—these cannot be too highly praised. His musical thought is seldom, if ever, sensuous; it is often, especially of late years, austere, and at times almost, if not wholly, forbidding. A modern of the moderns, he reveres the memory of the great masters, whatever their country or century. He is today a strong influence in French musical life. His chapel is a large one, and it is filled with the faithful. It should be said that this influence is unselfishly exerted; that in every way, in opera house, concert hall and in private, it makes for musical righteousness.

W. E. WALTER.

REDUCTION

RATIO

12x

2.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.0 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

150 mm

100 mm

A4

A5

1.0 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.0 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

4.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

3.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

THE MORNING TELEGRAPH
NOV 22 1905.

D'INDY HERE FROM PARIS

Eminent French Composer Arrives to Conduct Concerts for Boston Symphony Orchestra.

HUMPERDINCK COMES ALSO

Will Superintend Rehearsal of His Opera, "Haensel and Gretel"—Arnold-Schoenau, Tragedienne.

By ALGERNON ST. JOHN-BRENON

Vincent d'Indy, the distinguished French composer, arrived yesterday on the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse. He comes to conduct a series of seven concerts with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in various Eastern cities. Two will take place in New York. He was met by his manager, Alfred Ellis, and they both immediately left for Boston.

Vincent d'Indy is tall and courtly, not unlike Maurel in general bearing. "This is my first visit to America," said he, when seen on the dock, "and it is likely to prove an interesting experience.

"Though I cannot say that I am a young man, I do belong to the younger French school of composers. I am a follower of the composer Cesar Franck, who did much to popularize symphonic music in Paris. It required some encouragement, for the general taste in Paris leans to the opera rather than to classical music, but of late years there has been a great change. There are now many concert halls, whereas formerly there were but one or two."

Mr. d'Indy was asked what compositions of his own he was going to play with the Boston Orchestra. He replied: "My Second Symphony and a symphonic poem called 'Ystar,' dealing with an Assyrian subject and touched with Oriental color; also another called 'Souge Fleuri.'"

French Prejudice Against Wagner.

As Mr. Vincent d'Indy was associated with the only attempt made in France to give any sort of performance of "Parsifal," and that took place twenty years ago, he was asked whether the French people had overcome their prejudice against Wagner.

"Well," said he, "it was political rather than musical. Wagner, besides being a German, had grievously insulted the French nation in one of his incessant pamphlets."

He was reminded that the production of "Lohengrin," fourteen years ago, had caused a riot in the Opera House in Paris and the open space outside it.

"I remember that well," said he. "I was choirmaster at the opera at the time. Lamoureux was conductor. We have got over all that, however," he continued. "And Wagner has a strong hold upon cultured Parisians."

Music of the Future.

"What are the lines along which the music of the future will develop?" he was then asked.

He thought a while and replied:

"There are three elements in music—melody, harmony and rhythm. The resources of melody and harmony I believe to be wellnigh exhausted, so eccentricities of rhythm will probably be the next element of music to be experimented upon."

To the question why America and England had produced no great composers, though both countries had given birth to such commanding geniuses in other departments of creative art, he answered:

"I have only the explanation that music is the last of the arts to be developed in a national art life.

"The national art life of England and of America is younger than that of France or Italy, consequently their music is to come, and assuredly it will come.

"I am also the composer of two operas, 'Fervaal' and 'L'Etranger.' I wrote the poems myself. I cannot write to the words of others. I have tried it, but in vain. So I always do both book and music."

"Like Wagner?" was suggested.

"Yes," he answered. "I have the same feeling about that matter."

Mr. D'Indy is the director of the Schola Cantorum, or "School of Singing" in Paris, a school originally founded to teach the music of Gregory and Palestrina. It has now developed into a conservatoire, in which Mr. D'Indy is professor of composition and of organ playing.

NEW YORK WORLD
Address
NOV 22 1905

MUSICAL AUTHORS OF RENOWN ARRIVE.

Herr Humperdinck, Composer of Opera of "Haensel and Gretel," and D'Indy.

Herr Engelbert Humperdinck, composer of German comic opera, who became famous through his opera of "Haensel and Greted," arrived last night with Frau Humperdinck on the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse. Herr Humperdinck is about forty-five years old. He might be mistaken for a jolly landlord or the player of a bass viol in an orchestra. Unassuming, modest to a degree, amiable and engaging, he looks the humorist, which his work has proved him to be.

The composer will attend the first performance on Saturday afternoon at the Metropolitan Opera House of his fairy opera, "Haensel and Gretel." He will not conduct the orchestra, but will advise at the rehearsals.

Herr Humperdinck will remain here about two weeks. He spoke with pride last night of having seven or eight American pupils. The German Emperor appointed him to a professorship at the Berlin Musical High School.

Vincent D'Indy, the French composer, who accepted the invitation of Henry L. Higginson to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a series of concerts, also arrived on the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse. He will conduct the Boston Symphony concerts in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, Dec. 7, and Saturday afternoon, Dec. 9. As the head of the Schola Cantorum, he exerts the widest influence over the musical students of France. M. D'Indy will be the first outside director to conduct the Boston Symphony.

Frau Gertrud Arnold-Schonau, the tragedienne of Berlin, whom Manager Heinrich Conried has secured for the Irving Place Theatre, arrived on the same ship. She will play in "Iphegenie," "Messalina" and other heavy dramas.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
THE MORNING TELEGRAPH
NOV 21 1905
Address

VINCENT D'INDY TO ARRIVE ON KAISER

Famous French Composer Comes to Conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Series of Concerts.

Among the passengers on the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse, which is due today, is M. Vincent d'Indy, the distinguished French composer, who comes to this country by invitation from Henry L. Higginson to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a series of its concerts. M. D'Indy will conduct the orchestra in New York at its regular concerts on Thursday evening, December 7, and Saturday afternoon, December 9.

M. D'Indy is by all odds the leading figure in contemporary French music. As the head of the celebrated Schola Cantorum of Paris his is the most powerful individual influence over French musical students. As a composer, he is generally acknowledged to be the most talented France has produced in a generation.

M. D'Indy will go directly to Boston, where he will begin his rehearsals. He will be in America about three weeks.

New York
NOV 22 1905

HUMPERDINCK ARRIVES.

Composer Will See First Presentation of His Opera Here on Saturday.

Engelbert Humperdinck, the composer of the fairy opera, "Haensel und Gretel," arrived on the North German Lloyd liner Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse last night. He comes for a tour of the country, and will be present next Saturday afternoon at the first performance in America of his opera at the Metropolitan Opera House.

Vincent d'Indy, also a composer, and Gertrude Arnold-Schonau, the German actress, who is to appear at the Irving Place Theatre, also arrived on the Kaiser.

N. Y. TRIBUNE
dress
NOV 22 1905

TWO COMPOSERS HERE.

Engelbert Humperdinck and Vincent d'Indy on Kaiser Wilhelm.

Engelbert Humperdinck, the German composer, accompanied by his wife, arrived here last night on the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse. He says that he comes here on Mr. Conried's invitation to attend the first production this season of his fairy opera, "Hänsel und Gretel," next Saturday afternoon, at the Metropolitan Opera House.

The steamer had heavy weather nearly all the way from Bremen, and Professor Humperdinck was not in good spirits when the steamer reached Quarantine.

"Ach, the rough voyage!" he said when the steamer docked. "It did not agree with me, but I shall feel good, I know, by Saturday. No! I shall not conduct the performance. I prefer to see it from the auditorium, as it will better enable me to make suggestions. I am delighted to get here, but can say nothing regarding my plans. In fact, I have none. I am in the hands of my friends."

Professor Humperdinck was smothered in a huge fur coat. He seemed anxious to get away from the chilly pier, but was willing, through an interpreter, to tell the reporters all they wished to know. The composer said that he had completed a new fairy opera, called "Die Heirath Wieder Willen" ("The Forced Marriage"). "I trust my new opera will be produced in America," he said, "but no plans have been made."

Professor Humperdinck will remain here two weeks. When asked if this was his first visit to this country, the professor smiled and said: "I am not a stranger to America, for I have eight American pupils at home."

Herr Humperdinck is a great friend of Mme. Cosima Wagner. His "Hänsel und Gretel" was begun as a diversion, to amuse the composer's little nephews and nieces. At the outset it was only a free pianoforte arrangement of various German folk songs. Gradually Professor Humperdinck developed the idea of making the simple melodies of the Fatherland the themes of an opera, until it grew into what soon made him one of the most popular of living musicians. The success of "Hänsel und Gretel" was instantaneous and remarkable. The German Emperor, soon after, appointed the composer to a professorship at the Berlin Musical High School, and his fame spread until it reached America.

Vincent d'Indy, the distinguished French composer, was also a passenger on the Kaiser. He comes here by invitation of Henry L. Higginson, to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a series of concerts. On the 8th and 7th of next month M. d'Indy will conduct the Boston orchestra at Carnegie Hall. Among the compositions he will conduct are his Second Symphony, "Istra," a symphonic poem, and "Sauje Fleur," a fairy composition. Before appearing in New-York M. d'Indy will conduct in Baltimore and Boston.

In asking M. d'Indy to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra a precedent has been broken, for he will be the first musician other than the regular conductor to direct the orchestra in its regular concerts. The invitation was extended to him as a compliment to the younger school of French composers who have been doing such admirable work in the last two decades.

M. d'Indy will go to Boston to-day. His visit to this country will last three weeks.

MAIL
NEW YORK CITY
NOV 18 1905

Two composers of European celebrity are aboard the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse, due in New York Tuesday, and each comes for the first time. One is Engelbert Humperdinck, already mentioned in connection with next week's opera. The other is Vincent d'Indy, the aristocratic French composer and conductor, who comes to direct a few concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, including those at Carnegie Hall December 7 and 9. Mr. d'Indy's visit will put the star of young and progressive French composers at least momentarily in the ascendant here.

N. Y. EVG. TELEGRAM
NOV 20 1905

The Boston Symphony Quartet, which will give a series of three concerts in Mendelssohn Hall this winter, announces the following list of assisting artists:—Tuesday evening, January 2, Mr. Stojowsky, the Polish pianist, who has come to this country to be at the head of the piano department in the Institute of Musical Art; on Tuesday evening, February 6, Miss Susan Metcalf, soprano, and on Wednesday even-

NEW YORK SUN
NOV 21 1905

Composer D'Indy Due To-day.

Among the passengers of the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse, which will dock at 5 this afternoon, is M. Vincent d'Indy, the French composer. M. d'Indy is the head of the Schola Cantorum of Paris. He comes to this country by invitation of Mr. Henry L. Higginson to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a series of concerts. M. d'Indy will go directly to Boston.

REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NOV 15 1905

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Appearance of the New First 'Cellist at a Kiltie Concert in Hartford.

The first of the series of three concerts by the Boston symphony orchestra, which Hartford is so fortunate as to have every year, was given last evening in Foot guard hall to an audience which filled nearly all the available seats. The program book announces this as the 19th concert in Hartford. Last evening's concert opened with a most charming overture by Goldmark, "In the Spring," less known than his favorite "Sakuntala." No descriptive title or "program" is needed, for nothing more joyous or springlike can be fancied than this overture. The symphony, placed last on the program, was Tschaikowsky's fourth, in F minor, a work containing many beauties, but nevertheless so far inferior to his fifth and sixth as to make one understand the criticism passed upon the composer after its appearance, namely, that he could not write symphonies. The work is a succession of episodes strung together with little relation to one another. Even the reappearance in the last movement of the ominous "Fate motive" from the first movement does not succeed in giving unity to the work. The second movement is exquisitely melodic, and the noteworthy orchestration gives it an original charm; the third movement is pizzicato for the strings throughout, giving rise to the irreverent nickname, the "banjo symphony." The last movement contains the characteristic Tschaikowsky climaxes, and ends with barbaric iteration. Besides the overture and the symphony the orchestra played two numbers by Edmond Elgar, a "Chanson de Nuit" and a "Chanson de Matin." They are melodious trifles, originally written for the violin, with piano accompaniment, and later orchestrated by the composer.

One of the most interesting features of the concert was the first appearance in Hartford of the new first 'cellist of the orchestra, Heinrich Warnke, who had already made his bow to Boston and New York audiences. My Warnke, so the program book informs us, was born in 1871, into a musical family, and began piano lessons at the age of six, and the study of the violoncello at 10. Later his teachers were Gowa at Hamburg and Klengel at Leipsic. For the last eight years he has been the first violoncellist of the Kaim orchestra at Munich, under Weingartner's direction, a position which he left to come to Boston. Rudolf Krasselt, his predecessor in the Boston orchestra, was his pupil.

Mr Warnke made a distinctly favorable impression last evening, and was recalled several times with enthusiasm. He was fortunate in his choice of the Dvorak concerto, the charms of which he revealed with consummate art. The lovely melodies in which the work abounds were played with exquisite shading, while the ornamental passages were accurate and clear, and played with an apparent ease that deprived them of their terror for the listener. At a first hearing the last movement gives less pleasure than the other two. The slow movement is full of the poetic beauty so pre-eminently Dvorakian, and the instrumentation is by a master hand.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
NOV 23 1905
Address

COMPOSERS FROM ABROAD.

Humperdinck of Germany and d'Indy of France Here.

Engelbert Humperdinck arrived here yesterday on the Kaiser Wilhelm. Mr. Humperdinck is the composer of "Hänsel und Gretel," which is to be sung at the Metropolitan Opera House on Saturday afternoon, and comes here to superintend the last rehearsals of the opera, which Alfred Hertz is to conduct. He is accompanied by his wife and will remain for several weeks.

Humperdinck was for years a music critic in Frankfort. Now he lives in the Rhine country, and since his first success has devoted himself to music. His recent works were "The Forced Marriage," which was produced a few months ago under the direction of Richard Strauss, a "Moorish" symphony, and incidental music to "Königskinder," "Cinderella" and "The Merchant of Venice." He is now at work on opera comique intended for Vienna. Although only 40 years old he was the teacher of Richard Wagner, and for a while chorusmaster at Bayreuth.

Vincent d'Indy, the illustrious French composer, was a passenger by the same steamer. He is best known through "Fervaal," an opera that has met with great success in France and Belgium. M. d'Indy comes here at the request of Wilhelm Gericke and Col. Higginson to conduct a series of concerts with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The First Established Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
THE MORNING TELEGRAPH
NOV 22 1905.

VINCENT D'INDY HERE FROM PARIS

Eminent French Composer Arrives to Conduct Concerts for Boston Symphony Orchestra.

HUMPERDINCK COMES ALSO

Will Superintend Rehearsal of His Opera, "Haensel und Gretel"—Arnold-Schoenau, Tragedienne.

By ALGERNON ST. JOHN-BRENON

Vincent d'Indy, the distinguished French composer, arrived yesterday on the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse. He comes to conduct a series of seven concerts with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in various Eastern cities. Two will take place in New York. He was met by his manager, Alfred Ellis, and they both immediately left for Boston.

Vincent d'Indy is tall and courtly, not unlike Maurel in general bearing. "This is my first visit to America," said he, when seen on the dock, "and it is likely to prove an interesting experience.

"Though I cannot say that I am a young man, I do belong to the younger French school of composers. I am a follower of the composer Cesar Franck, who did much to popularize symphonic music in Paris. It required some encouragement, for the general taste in Paris leans to the opera rather than to classical music, but of late years there has been a great change. There are now many concert halls, whereas formerly there were but one or two."

Mr. d'Indy was asked what compositions of his own he was going to play with the Boston Orchestra. He replied: "My Second Symphony and a symphonic poem called 'Ystar,' dealing with an Assyrian subject and touched with Oriental color; also another called 'Songe Fleuri.'"

French Prejudice Against Wagner.

As Mr. Vincent d'Indy was associated with the only attempt made in France to give any sort of performance of "Parsifal," and that took place twenty years ago, he was asked whether the French people had overcome their prejudice against Wagner.

"Well," said he, "it was political rather than musical. Wagner, besides being a German, had grievously insulted the French nation in one of his incessant pamphlets."

He was reminded that the production of "Lohengrin," fourteen years ago, had caused a riot in the Opera House in Paris and the open space outside it.

"I remember that well," said he. "I was choirmaster at the opera at the time. Lamoureux was conductor. We have got over all that, however," he continued. "And Wagner has a strong hold upon cultured Parisians."

Music of the Future.

"What are the lines along which the music of the future will develop?" he was then asked.

He thought a while and replied:

"There are three elements in music—melody, harmony and rhythm. The resources of melody and harmony I believe to be wellnigh exhausted, so eccentricities of rhythm will probably be the next element of music to be experimented upon."

To the question why America and England had produced no great composers, though both countries had given birth to such commanding geniuses in other departments of creative art, he answered:

"I have only the explanation that music is the last of the arts to be developed in a national art life.

"The national art life of England and of America is younger than that of France or Italy, consequently their music is to come, and assuredly it will come.

"I am also the composer of two operas, 'Fervaal' and 'L'Etranger.' I wrote the poems myself. I cannot write to the words of others. I have tried it, but in vain. So I always do both book and music."

"Like Wagner?" was suggested.

"Yes," he answered. "I have the same feeling about that matter."

Mr. D'Indy is the director of the "Scola Cantorum, or "School of Singers," in Paris, a school originally founded to teach the music of Gregory and Palestrina. It has now developed into a conservatoire, in which Mr. D'Indy is professor of composition and of organ playing.

NEW YORK WORLD
NOV 22 1905

MUSICAL AUTHORS OF RENOWN ARRIVE.

Herr Humperdinck, Composer of Opera of "Haensel and Gretel," and D'Indy.

Herr Engelbert Humperdinck, composer of German comic opera, who became famous through his opera of "Haensel and Greted," arrived last night with Frau Humperdinck on the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse. Herr Humperdinck is about forty-five years old. He might be mistaken for a jolly landlord or the player of a bass viol in an orchestra. Unassuming, modest to a degree, amiable and engaging, he looks the humorist, which his work has proved him to be.

The composer will attend the first performance on Saturday afternoon at the Metropolitan Opera House of his fairy opera, "Haensel and Gretel." He will not conduct the orchestra, but will advise at the rehearsals.

Herr Humperdinck will remain here about two weeks. He spoke with pride last night of having seven or eight American pupils. The German Emperor appointed him to a professorship at the Berlin Musical High School.

Vincent D'Indy, the French composer, who accepted the invitation of Henry L. Higginson to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a series of concerts, also arrived on the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse. He will conduct the Boston Symphony concerts in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, Dec. 7, and Saturday afternoon, Dec. 9. As the head of the Schola Cantorum, he exerts the widest influence over the musical students of France. M. D'Indy will be the first outside director to conduct the Boston Symphony.

Frau Gertrud Arnold-Schoenau, the tragedienne of Berlin, whom Manager Heinrich Conried has secured for the Irving Place Theatre, arrived on the same ship. She will play in "Iphegenie," "Messalina" and other heavy dramas.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
NOV 22

VINCENT D'INDY TO ARRIVE ON KAISER

Famous French Composer Comes to Conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Series of Concerts.

Among the passengers on the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse, which is due today, is M. Vincent d'Indy, the distinguished French composer, who comes to this country by invitation from Henry L. Higginson to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a series of its concerts. M. D'Indy will conduct the orchestra in New York at its regular concerts on Thursday evening, December 7, and Saturday afternoon, December 9.

M. D'Indy is by all odds the leading figure in contemporary French music. As the head of the celebrated Schola Cantorum of Paris his is the most powerful individual influence over French musical students. As a composer, he is generally acknowledged to be the most talented France has produced in a generation.

M. D'Indy will go directly to Boston, where he will begin his rehearsals. He will be in America about three weeks.

HUMPERDINCK ARRIVES.

Composer Will See First Presentation of His Opera Here on Saturday.

Engelbert Humperdinck, the composer of the fairy opera, "Haensel und Gretel," arrived on the North German Lloyd liner Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse last night. He comes for a tour of the country, and will be present next Saturday afternoon at the first performance in America of his opera at the Metropolitan Opera House.

Vincent d'Indy, also a composer, and Gertrude Arnold-Schonau, the German actress, who is to appear at the Irving Place Theatre, also arrived on the Kaiser.

N. Y. TRIBUNE
NOV 22

TWO COMPOSERS HERE.

Engelbert Humperdinck and Vincent d'Indy on Kaiser Wilhelm.

Engelbert Humperdinck, the German composer, accompanied by his wife, arrived here last night on the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse. He says that he comes here on Mr. Conried's invitation to attend the first production this season of his fairy opera, "Hänsel und Gretel," next Saturday afternoon, at the Metropolitan Opera House.

The steamer had heavy weather nearly all the way from Bremen, and Professor Humperdinck was not in good spirits when the steamer reached Quarantine.

"Ach, the rough voyage!" he said when the steamer docked. "It did not agree with me, but I shall feel good, I know, by Saturday. No! I shall not conduct the performance. I prefer to see it from the auditorium, as it will better enable me to make suggestions. I am delighted to get here, but can say nothing regarding my plans. In fact, I have none. I am in the hands of my friends."

Professor Humperdinck was smothered in a huge fur coat. He seemed anxious to get away from the chilly pier, but was willing, through an interpreter, to tell the reporters all they wished to know. The composer said that he had completed a new fairy opera, called "Die Heirath Wieder Willen" ("The Forced Marriage"). "I trust my new opera will be produced in America," he said, "but no plans have been made."

Professor Humperdinck will remain here two weeks. When asked if this was his first visit to this country, the professor smiled and said: "I am not a stranger to America, for I have eight American pupils at home."

Herr Humperdinck is a great friend of Mme. Cosima Wagner. His "Hänsel und Gretel" was begun as a diversion, to amuse the composer's little nephews and nieces. At the outset it was only a free pianoforte arrangement of various German folk songs. Gradually Professor Humperdinck developed the idea of making the simple melodies of the Fatherland the themes of an opera, until it grew into what soon made him one of the most popular of living musicians. The success of "Hänsel und Gretel" was instantaneous and remarkable. The German Emperor, soon after, appointed the composer to a professorship at the Berlin Musical High School, and his fame spread until it reached America.

Vincent d'Indy, the distinguished French composer, was also a passenger on the Kaiser. He comes here by invitation of Henry L. Higginson, to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a series of concerts. On the 6th and 7th of next month M. d'Indy will conduct the Boston orchestra at Carnegie Hall. Among the compositions he will conduct are his Second Symphony, "Istra," a symphonic poem, and "Sauje Fleur," a fairy composition. Before appearing in New-York M. d'Indy will conduct in Baltimore and Boston.

In asking M. d'Indy to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra a precedent has been broken, for he will be the first musician other than the regular conductor to direct the orchestra in its regular concerts. The invitation was extended to him as a compliment to the younger school of French composers who have been doing such admirable work in the last two decades.

M. d'Indy will go to Boston to-day. His visit to this country will last three weeks.

Two composers of European celebrity are aboard the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse, due in New York Tuesday, and each comes for the first time. One is Engelbert Humperdinck, already mentioned in connection with next week's opera. The other is Vincent d'Indy, the aristocratic French composer and conductor, who comes to direct a few concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, including those at Carnegie Hall December 7 and 9. Mr. d'Indy's visit will put the star of young and progressive French composers at least momentarily in the ascendant here.

EVG. TELEGRAM

The Boston Symphony Quartet, which will give a series of three concerts in Mendelssohn Hall this winter, announces the following list of assisting artists:—Tuesday evening, January 2, Mr. Stojowsky, the Polish pianist who has come to this country to be at the head of the piano department in the Institute of Musical Art; on Tuesday evening, February 6, Miss Susan Metcalf, soprano, and on Wednesday even-

NOV 22

Composer D'Indy Due To-day.

Among the passengers of the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse, which will dock at 5 this afternoon, is M. Vincent d'Indy, the French composer. M. d'Indy is the head of the Schola Cantorum of Paris. He comes to this country by invitation of Mr. Henry L Higginson to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a series of concerts. M. d'Indy will go directly to Boston.

REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NOV 15 1905

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Appearance of the New First 'Cellist at a Fine Concert in Hartford.

The first of the series of three concerts by the Boston symphony orchestra, which Hartford is so fortunate as to have every year, was given last evening in Foot guard hall to an audience which filled nearly all the available seats. The program book announces this as the 19th concert in Hartford. Last evening's concert opened with a most charming overture by Goldmark, "In the Spring," less known than his favorite "Sakuntala." No descriptive title or "program" is needed, for nothing more joyous or springlike can be fancied than this overture. The symphony, placed last on the program, was Tschaikowsky's fourth, in F minor, a work containing many beauties, but nevertheless so far inferior to his fifth and sixth as to make one understand the criticism passed upon the composer after its appearance, namely, that he could not write symphonies. The work is a succession of episodes strung together with little relation to one another. Even the reappearance in the last movement of the ominous "Fate motive" from the first movement does not succeed in giving unity to the work. The second movement is exquisitely melodic, and the noteworthy orchestration gives it an original charm: the third movement is pizzicato for the strings throughout, giving rise to the irreverent nickname, the "banjo symphony." The last movement contains the characteristic Tschaikowsky climaxes, and ends with barbaric iteration. Besides the overture and the symphony the orchestra played two numbers by Edmond Elgar, a "Chanson de Nuit" and a "Chanson de Matin." They are melodious trifles, originally written for the violin, with piano accompaniment, and later orchestrated by the composer.

One of the most interesting features of the concert was the first appearance in Hartford of the new first 'cellist of the orchestra, Heinrich Warnke, who had already made his bow to Boston and New York audiences. Mr Warnke, so the program book informs us, was born in 1871, into a musical family, and began piano lessons at the age of six, and the study of the violoncello at 10. Later his teachers were Gowa at Hamburg and Klengel at Leipsic. For the last eight years he has been the first violoncellist of the Kaim orchestra at Munich, under Weingartner's direction, a position which he left to come to Boston. Rudolf Krasselt, his predecessor in the Boston orchestra, was his pupil.

Mr Warnke made a distinctly favorable impression last evening, and was recalled several times with enthusiasm. He was fortunate in his choice of the Dvorak concerto, the charms of which he revealed with consummate art. The lovely melodies in which the work abounds were played with exquisite shading, while the ornamental passages were accurate and clear, and played with an apparent ease that deprived them of their terror for the listener. At a first hearing the last movement gives less pleasure than the other two. The slow movement is full of the poetic beauty so pre-eminently Dvorakian, and the instrumentation is by a master hand.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
NOV 22

COMPOSERS FROM ABROAD.

Humperdinck of Germany and d'Indy of France Here.

Engelbert Humperdinck arrived here yesterday on the Kaiser Wilhelm. Mr. Humperdinck is the composer of "Hänsel und Gretel," which is to be sung at the Metropolitan Opera House on Saturday afternoon, and comes here to superintend the last rehearsals of the opera, which Alfred Hertz is to conduct. He is accompanied by his wife and will remain for several weeks.

Humperdinck was for years a music critic in Frankfort. Now he lives in the Rhine country, and since his first success has devoted himself to music. His recent works were "The Forced Marriage," which was produced a few months ago under the direction of Richard Strauss, a "Moorish" symphony, and incidental music to "Königskinder," "Cinderella" and "The Merchant of Venice." He is now at work on opera comique intended for Vienna. Although only 46 years old he was the teacher of Richard Wagner, and for a while chorusmaster at Bayreuth.

Vincent d'Indy, the illustrious French composer, was a passenger by the same steamer. He is best known through "Fervaal," an opera that has met with great success in France and Belgium. M. d'Indy comes here at the request of Wilhelm Gericke and Col. Higginson to conduct a series of concerts with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Vincent D'Indy, French Composer Here to Lead the Symphony Orchestra

BOSTON PLEASES VINCENT D'INDY

Distinguished French Composer Arrives Here to Conduct Symphony Orchestra in Series of Concerts.

WAS MUCH IMPRESSED BY N. Y. SKYSCRAPERS

Programmes Arranged Represent Best Product of the Younger French School—Raoul Pugno's Piano Recital.

A slender man of medium height, his head crowned with one of those seal skin caps which pull down over the ears if Jack Frost is nipping; his body encased in a thick overcoat, beneath which were seen trouser legs of Parisian voluminosity; a cigar in the end of an abnormally long meerschaum holder, held nervously in the right hand—such were the first impressions made by Mr. Vincent d'Indy, the distinguished French composer, who has come from Paris to conduct the Symphony orchestra in some of the concerts of modern French music here, in New York, in Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and Brooklyn.

Another glance showed a pair of dark keen, twinkling eyes, an attractive face—attractive not only in its regularity, but in its manifest signs of culture—a slight gray moustache and the beginnings of what used to be called an imperial.

Mr. d'Indy reached Boston Wednesday morning in company with Mr. C. A. Ellis, the manager of the orchestra, who went to New York to meet him. He has not been long in that city, as the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse, on which he came, was not docked until nearly 8 last evening, and Mr. d'Indy was delayed at the pier waiting for his music, which had been stored away in the lowest part of the hold. Just a glimpse at Broadway and Fifth avenue and he took the midnight train; for he was anxious to get to this city and settle himself at the St. Botolph Club, where he will stay while here.

Mr. d'Indy is full of enthusiasm over this, his first visit to America. He marvelled at the wonderful panorama of lights which was spread before him last evening as he came up New York bay. The ferryboat was "tres amusant"; the skyscrapers, what little he saw of them, were "merveilleux"; the train, with its long string of sleeping cars, was "epatant" and the South station was "magnifique."

He speaks little, very little English, although he reads it without difficulty. Wherefore he was much worried how he would get on with the orchestra. When he was told that all the men spoke either German or French, he was most relieved, but he could not understand why so few Americans took up orchestral playing as a profession.

"It is a great pleasure for me to come to America," said Mr. d'Indy, "although the coming was not so pleasant as it might have been. The first two days we were out from Cherbourg the weather was very bad and the sea very rough. After that, however, it was not [illegible]

[illegible] what I think are most interesting programmes, and at the same time are very representative of the so-called younger French school. Some of us are not so young as we once were, but the name was given to us through our effort to make opera less monopolistic in France. For years past, nearly the whole tendency of music in France has been toward the theatre. Cesar Franck was the first 'independent,' and we have been working along in the same general lines as he did.

"Most of the works which I shall present are more or less known in America and in Boston. For my Boston programme I have chosen my second symphony, which was played by the Symphony orchestra last year; Faure's 'Pelleas et Melisande' suite and my 'Istar' variations, which have also been played in Boston. The other two numbers, however, will be quite new here: Cesar Franck's 'Psyche et Eros,' from the symphonic poem 'Psyche,' and Ropartz's 'Les landes, paysage breton.'

"I shall be in this country about three weeks. I regret that I cannot stay longer, but an important concert of the Schola Cantorum of Paris, of which I am the head, demands my presence at home in December. I have heard much about the Boston Symphony orchestra and I am most eager to hear it. To be asked to conduct it is a great honor."

BOSTON HERALD

Published Every Day in the Year.
VOL. CXVIII., NO. 146.

THURSDAY, NOV. 23, 1905.

CONCERT FOYER

[illegible]ston Fund Concert Sunday by Symphony Orchestra

ON ITS 25TH ANNIVERSARY

A concert for the benefit of the pension fund of the Boston Symphony orchestra will be given next Sunday night in Symphony Hall. The concert will also be commemorative of the 25th year of the founding of the orchestra. The programme will consist of Beethoven's overture, "Dedication of the House," Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony, the Bacchanale from "Tannhaeuser" and R. Strauss' symphonic poem, "Don Juan." Inasmuch as Beethoven's overture was the first piece played by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Henschel, who conducted it at the first concert, Oct. 22, 1881, has kindly consented to lead it next Sunday night. Mr. Gericke will conduct the other pieces.

The establishment of a Symphony pension fund was announced Feb. 13, 1903. The first concert was given on March 1 of that year.

Let us consider for a moment the reasonableness of these concerts.

Hazlitt, who loved the playhouse, and wrote shrewdly about play actors, once said: "There is no class of society whom so many persons regard with affection as actors. We greet them on the stage; we like to meet them in the streets; they almost always recall to us pleasant associations, and we feel our gratitude excited, without the uneasiness of a sense of obligation. * * * The very gayety and popularity, however, which surround the life of a favorite performer make the retiring from it a very serious business. It glances a mortifying reflection on the shortness of human life and the vanity of human pleasures."

King David said unto Barzillai: "Come thou over with me, and I will feed thee with me in Jerusalem." Barzillai, an old man, refused. "Can thy servant taste what I eat or what I drink? Can I hear any more the voice of singing men and singing women?"

There comes a time when the most passionate amateur of music finds no pleasure in it. His ears are dull; alike to him are scherzo and andante, funeral march and jig. The famous virtuosos fiddle and sing and pound the piano in vain.

But this amateur has joined his pleasure in the indefatigable labor, the single purpose, and the inborn artistry of men who are obliged to leave the stage long before his pleasure leaves him.

For the nimble fingers of the players of stringed instruments stiffen, the lips of the horn and trumpet players refuse the service that they once gladly and triumphantly gave, the wind that once breathed phrases of surprising rhetorical length and beauty is now choked or broken. In the old Dance of Death the grim skeleton, or the lean man with a scythe pipes or fiddles to the musician, who needs must follow him. For the musician, however dear he may be to the Muse, is not spared the accidents, the infirmities of common humanity; nor did the lute of Orpheus turn Death from his appointed errand.

Even a slight bodily accident, an injury to a finger, may remove a violinist from the ranks.

Youth, said Liszt, is the period of the virtuoso. The orchestral player has given his boyhood, his youth, his manhood to his art. No matter how great his skill in his virtuoso days, he knows that the time will surely come and come before he is old, as the world measures age, when conductor and audience will be less and less patient instead of enthusiastic; when a younger and fresher player will be called to take his place.

What can the player then do? He has been the guiding part of an instrument. There is nothing for him. He has given the best years of his life to conductors, employers, audiences.

In many foreign cities, where the government takes an active interest in the maintenance and regulation of opera and drama, orchestral players who are faithful in service look forward to an adequate pension when they are disabled or incapacitated in any manner. When Mr. Gericke and the members of the Symphony orchestra founded this pension fund in Boston, they proposed to found it and maintain it by self-taxation and by giving concerts. Thus they hoped to have a fund which would provide for widows and orphans of the members; for the disabled; for those who should pass beyond the line of activity.

Furthermore the close friends of the orchestra believed that the establishment of this fund would be of value also to the general public; that it would in a certain way make for musical righteousness in the city. They argued that the players would not be harassed by thoughts of the future; by any dread of becoming dependent on the charity of some benevolent person or of some public institution; that they would be knit more firmly together in bonds of sympathy and brotherhood, as well as by the thought that conductor, players and those that encouraged by subscriptions and applause and regard for their future were all fellow-servants in the temple of art.

There is a peculiar sentiment attached to the concert of next Sunday. It will commemorate the establishment of the orchestra.

It was in April, 1881, that Mr. Henry L. Higginson published a letter in the newspapers of Boston, a statement of his intention to establish and maintain a full and permanent orchestra, which should offer the best music at a low price. He reminded the public of the fact that, however praiseworthy the attempts to furnish such music had been in the past, there was then no local orchestra "such as may be found in all the large European cities, or even in the smaller musical centres of Germany." He rightly thought that the essential condition of success was stability; that the members of the orchestra should be able to devote their best energies to the rehearsals and concerts of the organization during the season, with the assurance of re-engagement and continued service.

The orchestra was to number 60 selected musicians. There were to be 20 concerts. The price of a season ticket with a reserved seat was to be $10 or $5 a season. Single tickets were to be sold at 75 or 25 cents. There were to be public rehearsals without any reserved seats, and the price of admission was fixed at 25 cents. Mr. Higginson in this open letter announced his choice of Mr. Georg Henschel as a conductor.

The programme of the first concert, Oct. 22, 1881, was as follows: Beethoven's overture, "Dedication of the House"; aria from Gluck's "Orpheus"; Haydn's Symphony in B-flat, No. 12; ballet music from Schubert's "Rosamunde"; scene from Bruch's "Odysseus"; Weber's festival overture. Miss Annie Louise Cary was the singer.

It appears from Dwight's Journal of Music that just before the publication of the statement of Mr. Higginson's intentions there had been an "orchestral ebullition" in this city; a "curious fermentation of petty politics and jealousies of music." We learn from a daily newspaper of the time that "select audiences of 500 or 600" used to "doze through" concerts of the Harvard Musical Association, while the Philharmonic concerts were given to audiences of over 2400.

It is doubtful whether any one in 1881, except its founder, had any idea of the development and future glory of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

This present glory is not merely an illusion of parochial pride. The fame of this orchestra, established and maintained by one man, encouraged by the generous support of the citizens of Boston and of towns visited by the orchestra, has gone to the uttermost ends of the musical world. Visiting virtuosos and conductors bear willing testimony. Only last week Mr. Willem Mengelberg, the conductor of the Amsterdam Concertgebouw, invited to New York to conduct a concert of the Philharmonic Society, spoke as follows of the orchestra which he heard in New York: "In my opinion it has no superior anywhere. Indeed, there are only three or four others that can be compared with it." While he praised the performance of the Philharmonic orchestra he made this significant remark: "Its lack of continuous practice throughout the year prevents its attaining the same grade of perfection as the Boston Symphony." It should be remembered that the Amsterdam orchestra is a first-class organization, and that Mr. Mengelberg is a conductor of high reputation, to whom Richard Strauss dedicated his "Heldenleben."

Profitable hours may be spent in looking over the bound volumes of the Symphony programmes in the unique library now belonging to the city of Boston, through the exceeding generosity of Mr. Allen A. Brown. Not only the newspaper reviews of the concerts, but all items of gossip, all public letters of praise and complaint—and some of these letters are bitterly personal—are here carefully pasted in according to the respective dates. (Let it be added that there are vandals so lost to decency that they do not hesitate to mutilate or steal scores thus enlarged. Not long ago the score of Cesar Francke's Symphony and another valuable score were thus carried off; and by acts of such incredible meanness, students and antiquarians are hampered in their work, and Boston itself sustains a loss.)

There was not at first a general outburst of appreciation. There was adverse criticism even before the first concert; there was carping; there were cheap sneers. Criticism more than once degenerated into personal abuse of conductors, each in their turn, of imported players, whose names are now highly honored. There was no detail so small that it did not excite sour discussion.

Mr. Higginson was not moved by inevitable disappointments, by the adverse criticism that is so easy, by the failure of the public itself to appreciate for some time the noble generosity of his purpose. He knew that time would vindicate his judgment and reward his labors.

Mr. Henschel conducted for three seasons, and then Mr. Gericke took command. A representative of The Herald talked with Mr. Gericke in Vienna before he came to this country, and it is interesting to note that the straightforwardness, the high musical aims, the indomitable energy and will of Mr. Gericke were as marked in 1884 as they are in 1905.

Mr. Gericke's first concert was given Oct. 18, 1884. The programme included Beethoven's overture, "Leonore No. 3"; Vieuxtemps' violin concerto in A minor, played by Mr. Lichtenberg, three pieces by Bach arranged by Bachrich; Volkmann's symphony in D minor. He returned to Europe in 1889 according to his own wish and left the orchestra a superb instrument on which other conductors might play.

Mr. Nikisch's first concert was on Oct. 12, 1889. The programme included the prelude to "The Mastersingers," Beethoven's overture to "Coriolanus," entr'acte from ballet music to Schubert's "Rosamunde" and Schumann's symphony in D minor.

He in turn gave way to Mr. Paur, who arranged this programme for his first concert: Beethoven's 5th symphony, Tschaikowsky's Serenade for Strings op. 48, the overture to "Tannhaeuser."

Mr. Gericke returned in 1898 and this was his first programme (Oct. 15): Overture to "Euryanthe"; Pieces by Bach arranged by Bachrich; Brahm's St. Anthony Variations, Beethoven's symphony in C minor.

Mr. Henschel was conductor for three years, Mr. Nikisch for four years, Mr. Paur for five years; Mr. Gericke has now entered on his 13th year of service.

All these conductors contributed to the final result, but it is not invidious, it is only just, to say that the high state of technical perfecton, the plasticity, the instinctive phrasing, the exquisite balance and proportion, the inimitable euphony that distinguish the orchestra are due chiefly to the intelligent and unwearying discipline exerted by Mr. Gericke. His zeal and courage, his ambition, not for self, but for the orchestra, knew no obstacles or bounds. He first established the brilliant reputation of the orchestra, and this brilliance has never been so dazzling as in concerts of his 13th season.

But this orchestra that now asks for a generous contribution to its pension fund is something more than a huge machine. Many individualities are obedient to one mind which controls through intelligence—a combination that works together for a common purpose in its devotion to art, and it is this union of virtuoso elements that sets the Boston Symphony orchestra apart.

[104]

...nscript

...N THE WORLD OF MUSIC

...EERMANN, THE VIOLINIST, AT THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

Concerts of the Coming Week—Gilbert and Sullivan Again—Recitals in Prospect

The musically conservative could rejoice with full hearts at the Symphony concert yesterday afternoon. For once the concerto and the symphony—Brahms and Schumann—surpassed all else on the programme. A new overture by the scholarly Busoni began it, dedicated to Mr. Gericke and played for the first time on this side of the sea. It is gay in mood, spontaneous in expression. The melodies are quick, light fancies pleasant to hear, but hardly impressive or notably individual. Busoni develops them fluently, adorns them richly and sets them against a warmly colored background. He does not bury them in intricacies or dry and stiffen them with meditation. They flow forward in bright interplay or contrast, with now and then a flash of imagination in the scoring to make them sparkle. A "comedy" overture Busoni calls it, and evidently life in Berlin has made him merry. In his Boston days he was scholarly seriousness incarnate. He never trifled and he was seldom gay.

It was easy to think well of the overture while it was still sounding in the ear, but somehow after the concerto and Hugo Heermann's playing of it, Busoni's music had vanished. To Brahms went the smaller share of the glory. Our audiences have heard his violin concerto so often that they are beginning to take it for granted and to think chiefly of the virtuoso who may be playing it. By every sign the particular audience that filled every seat in Symphony Hall yesterday had come to hear Heermann in whatever music he might choose. For two years it had cherished its discovery of him as one of the most notable violinists of our time. The moment in which he appeared on the stage it hailed him with warmer and more general applause than any virtuoso or singer has received thus far this season. When once he and the band had begun, not even the swish of a programme leaf broke the rapt silence. At the close of the first and the second movements the listeners seemed too stirred to applaud, but at the end of the concerto there was round upon round of clapping, and from an audience nine-tenths of whom were women.

As such things go in Boston and on Friday afternoons, it was almost magnificent. It took a cynic to say that by sheer masculinity Heermann had won a man's victory over the sex.

No wonder that Brahms seemed to recede. Heermann was not playing his concerto in the ordinary sense of the word. Seemingly he was creating it, movement by movement, passage by passage, phrase by phrase. There was no place to ask where the composer ended and the interpreter began. The two had become as one voice. In vague flashes of memory came the recollection of tender young women struggling with the difficulties and pitfalls Brahms had laid in their path. Yesterday there seemed none such in the concerto. The most intricate and difficult passages were serving only for the expression of the composer's and the virtuoso's thought and mood. Why had violinists vexed themselves and their audiences with them? Under Heermann's hand they sounded natural, almost inevitable. So with his own technical mastery. It was superb in its largeness and surety. Yet the listener took no thought of it. The violinist was using it only as the voice of his own and the composer's eloquence. There was the beauty of sound in the voice—most of all of the long, warm curves that rise and deepen and then fall and fade. There was the power of sound as well—the power that fills and transports. At every moment there was the exultation of mood and of expression that makes musical or any other eloquence. For once it was easy to feel and to yield to the large austere beauty of Brahms's music. Heermann had lifted it, or perhaps lifted himself, to its heights. In a few moments his listeners had climbed with him.

Between this Brahms, as Heermann recreated him, and Schumann, as Mr. Gericke has often made him live again, stood the "orchestral fantasia" to which certain macabre rhymes of the French poet, Rollinat, inspired Mr. Loeffler. It was not the best possible place for it. Try as you might to catch Mr. Loeffler's vein and sympathize with him and his poet, the music sounded trivial, forced and much too earthy. You felt Mr. Loeffler's characteristic virtues, but you also felt, as he seldom lets you do when his music has its proper environment, the limitations and the defects of those virtues. You were impatient of the close Parisian night when Schumann was about to proclaim the spring. Rollinat's fancies were hollow meanderings and discordant cries after Brahms's and Heermann's exalted eloquence. Perhaps it will be easier tonight to take Mr. Loeffler by himself. H. T. P.

/ / + / /

Concerts Next Week

Vincent d'Indy, the French composer, about whom we are printing an article in another column today, will be the conductor at the seventh pair of Symphony concerts, on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening of next week. Never before in its twenty-four years of existence has the orchestra had any but its established conductor at its regular concerts. Mr. d'Indy takes the band at the invitation of Mr. Gericke and Mr. Higginson as an honor to the newer and less academic school of French music of which he is the acknowledged chief, and which has found quicker and warmer appreciation in Boston than in any other American city. From the music of this school Mr. d'Indy has chosen his entire programme. It begins with his own second symphony that Mr. Gericke played for us last winter. It con- with a suite from Gabriel Fauré's music to Maeterlinck's play, "...nde," which was heard ...d the piece in Bos-genious musical setting of a Phœnician legend that has been played at least once before at the Symphony concerts. The fourth number, however, is entirely new here—a fragment of César Franck's tone-poem, "Psyché." For ending is Dukas's gay and humorous scherzo, "The Magician's Apprentice," first performed here a year ago. There will be no soloist. The following week the orchestra makes its monthly journey to New York and other cities with Mr. d'Indy conducting.

On Sunday evening, in Symphony Hall, at eight, the Symphony Orchestra gives the first of its two annual concerts for the profit of the Pension Fund of its members. On Wednesday we wrote at length of the duty and the pleasure of our musical public in the support of the fund and of the opportunity to hear the orchestra that these extra concerts give to those who do not care to attend the regular series. On Sunday evening in one of the conductors and in a single number, the programme will recall the first concert of the orchestra twenty-four years ago. The first number on that first programme was Beethoven's overture, "The Dedication of the House," and Georg Henschel was the conductor. Tomorrow the same overture, under the same conductor, begins the concert, and Mr. Henschel, who is now teaching in New York, has come to Boston for the occasion. The rest of the programme, with Mr. Gericke conducting, comprises Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony, the Bacchanale from Wagner's "Tannhäuser," and Richard Strauss's tone-poem "Don Juan," all richly colored and highly emotional music of the modern sort. If we half appreciate what we and the artistic prestige of Boston owe to the Symphony Orchestra, we should fill the hall to the last seat.

On Monday evening at eight, in Jordan Hall, the Boston Symphony Quartet—Messrs. Hess, Roth, Ferir and Warnke—gives the second of its chamber concerts with the assistance of Mr. Pugno, the eminent Franch pianist. He joins Mr. Hess in Franck's sonata in A major for violin and piano, and his playing in ensemble needs no praise. The programme begins with a string quartet by the Russian, Taneieff, which is new to Boston, and ends with Beethoven's quartet in C minor (Op. 18, No. 4.).

Boston Sunday Globe.

Hugo Heerman, the Symphony Soloist.

Interesting Program Tonight for Pension Fund Benefit.

D'Indy's Coming — Other Events of the Week.

Ferruccio Busoni's "Comedy" overture, dedicated to Conductor William Gericke, and Charles Loeffler's fantasia, "The Devil's Villanelle," dedicated to Franz Kneisel, were two of the four selections on the 6th Symphony program. Mr Hugo Heermann, the celebrated violinist, was soloist, playing Brahm's D major concerto, and Schumann's first symphony completed the list. The Busoni overture was given for the first time here. This composer was a resident of Boston about a dozen years ago and his association on one program with Messrs Gericke, Loeffler and Kniesel made two numbers especially interesting, as the four artists are personally known to many of the Symphony patrons.

The Busoni work is a charming little concert piece, the dainty thematic material being skilfully scored and treated melodically without a profusion of dissonant modulations of the so-called up-to-date character. Of course our orchestra gave to each phase of the composition its proper significance, for Mr Gericke conducted and the bond of sympathy between men and director was unusually strong and ensured an artistic interpretation.

The splendid abilities so modestly displayed by Mr Heermann in past seasons have suffered no diminution, nor has his honest and earnest demeanor changed. He played the Brahms concerto with a delicacy of sentiment, vigor and depth of expression that was appealing in its nature, and his facility of execution, more prominently shown in the cadenza in the first movement, was something to be highly praised, even in these days of phenomenally deft fingered young executants. The dignity and grace of the second movement was given with consummate skill and in difficult demands of the finale, with its arpeggios, double-stopping, single and chord runs, he met every requirement. The whole performance was one to be greatly enjoyed, and the orchestra joined with the audience in the plaudits at the close that summoned Mr Heermann to the front of the platform a half dozen times. Mr Hess conducted this number in admirable style.

The fantastic "Devil's Villanelle," by Mr Loeffler, was given all the diabolic significance its title implies, all the weird, inharmonic musical phrases and bits of themes being set forth with the effect intended by the composer. The Schumann symphony was up to the standard of performance usual in important works. This week the celebrated French composer and director, Vincent D'Indy, will assist in conducting.

FUND CONCERT.

The eighth concert for the benefit of the pension fund of the Boston Symphony orchestra will be given in Symphony hall tonight. The purpose of this concert has become almost self explanatory. It is to add to the fund which is now being accumulated for the purpose of providing for the members of the orchestra when age or sickness incapacitates them for active duty.

All the members of the orchestra contribute to the fund in the shape of annual dues, but the money secured in this way is not sufficient for the purpose, and rather than to make an appeal to the public which patronizes and is interested in the orchestra, the policy has always been, since the movement started three years ago, to give special concerts and devote to the fund the gross proceeds from these.

In a sense, these concerts are a boon to many music lovers of this city. It is a curious fact that Boston is a most difficult place to hear the orchestra for all that do not subscribe for the whole series of concerts. Such is the esteem in which the orchestra is held that there are no seats for sale on Friday afternoons and only a very limited number for Saturday evenings. Consequently, for the large public which does not feel able to subscribe for the series and is unable to take its chances in the "rush line" on Friday afternoon, the chances of hearing the orchestra in Boston is very small.

But on account of the pension fund at least two concerts are given on each year on Sunday evenings, when most people are free. This gives an extra opportunity for nonsubscribers to hear the splendid organization which has done so much to make Boston famous, and the experience of the past has shown that the opportunity has not been neglected.

The concert tonight has an added interest, in that it is commemorative of the 25th season of the orchestra. And in honor of this event, Mr George Henschel, the first conductor, has consented to come to Boston and conduct the first number, Beethoven's overture, the "Dedication of the House," which was the first number on the program of the first concert in the old Music hall, Oct 22, 1881.

The program for tonight is as follows:

Overture, "Dedication of the House," Beethoven; "Symphonie Pathetique," Tschaikowsky; bacchanale from "Tannhaeuser," Wagner; symphonic poem, "Don Juan," R. Strauss.

D'INDY AT THE SYMPHONY.

This week's Symphony concerts will be in many respects the most interesting that have been given in years. The chief importance and interest lodges in the presence of one of the most distinguished French composers, who has come by invitation to conduct the orchestra for these concerts and for the concerts which will be given on the regular monthly trip next week. M d'Indy is one of the principal leaders of what is known as the younger school of French composers, he is the head of the Schola Cantorum which has made such serious inroads on the prestige of the Paris conservatory, and is generally regarded as the most important leader of the modern world of music in Paris.

The invitation given to M d'Indy is all the more noteworthy since it is the first time any composer or conductor has been asked to conduct the Symphony orchestra at one of its regular concerts. These concerts will appeal most strongly to that large number of admirers of French music that the work of the Symphony orchestra has created in Boston in the past few years. It is interesting always to hear a composer's interpretation of his own work.

Following the prevailing usage of past orchestral concerts in Paris there will be no soloist next week. Three of the works to be presented have already been played here. M d'Indy's second symphonie had its first performance in Boston under Mr Gericke last season, his "Istar" variations were first played under Mr Gericke several years ago and have since been repeated. Faure's Suite "Pelleas et Melisande," written for the performance of Maeterlinck's play, has also been played here. The other two works—a movement of Franck's symphonic poem "Psyche" and Ropartz' "Les Landes" will be new to Boston.

BOSTON SYMPHONY QUARTET.

Tomorrow evening at Jordan hall the second in the series of six chamber music concerts will be given by the Boston Symphony quartet. The first concert, a few weeks ago, attracted a large audience and gave much pleasure. The quartet cannot help but be on the highest plane of artistry and it is getting very loyal support from the patrons of the Boston Symphony orchestra and lovers of chamber music.

The assisting artist at this concert will be Mr Raoul Pugno, than whom there is no more admirable ensemble player now in the country. With Prof Hess he will play Franck's sonata for violin and piano. The program is as follows: Serge Taneiew, quartet in B-flat minor, op 4; Cesar Franck, sonata for violin and piano in A major; Beethoven, quartet in C minor, op 18, No. 4. The third concert will be given Monday evening, Jan 1.

The Boston Journal

LOEFFLER'S WORK

"The Devil's Villanelle" Calls Out Every Resource of Orchestra. The Author Responds.

Charles M. Loeffler's extraordinarily ingenious fantasia for orchestra and organ, "The Devil's Villanelle," was performed for the third time by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the sixth concert of the twenty-fifth season, Saturday night. The composition is widly fantastic and every resource of the orchestra is taxed. The burden of the work is the oft-occurring refrains, "Hell's a burning, burning, burning," and "The devil, prowling, runs about." Weirdly fascinating throughout, the piece was given a vivid performance under Mr. Gericke. Wallace Goodrich was at the organ. Mr. Loeffler was in the audience and was obliged to acknowledge the applause twice.

Busoni's comedy overture, dedicated to Mr. Gericke, was given its first performance. The overture is devoid of interest and borders upon dulness. Comedy is lacking throughout.

Hugo Heermann, violinist, was the soloist. He played the Brahms D major concerto eloquently. He was recalled three times. Schumann's first symphony completed the program.

Vincent D'Indy will conduct the seventh rehearsal and concert Friday and Saturday night.

22 Nov 1902

The Boston Post

SIXTH SYMPHONY CONCERT

Hugo Heermann, violinist, was the soloist at the sixth Symphony concert last evening, the programme being as follows:

Comedy overture, op. 38 ..... Busoni
Concerto for violin, op. 77 ..... Brahms
The Devil's Villanelle, op. 9 ..... Loeffler
Symphony No. 1, B flat ..... Schumann

Busoni's comedy overture was heard at these concerts for the first time. It is dedicated to Mr. Gericke, which probably indicates the reason why the work appeared on the programme. The "comedy" element is not easily apparent, and except for some pages of clever instrumentation the overture is without distinction. It made little if any impression on the audience.

Loeffler's orchestral fantasie on Rollinat's weird poem, "The Devil's Villanelle," has been heard here before, its initial hearing being at a Symphony concert April 12, 1902. The work will please whomsoever is in sympathy with the fantastic poem which suggested Mr. Loeffler's musical picture. To others the work will impress chiefly as a virtuoso piece to show the resources of the modern orchestra. The technical detail is exceedingly clever and the work makes a good "show" piece. It was much applauded; so was the composer, who was present.

Mr. Heermann, the soloist, appeared here about three years ago for the first time. He made a most favorable impression on the former occasion, and last evening he gave further evidence that he is a violinist of very high rank. His playing of the Brahms concerto was superb technically and artistically, and as authoritative as one could well desire. Mr. Heermann was the recipient of a well-deserved ovation and there were several recalls.

The concert ended with a fine performance of Schumann's Symphony No. 1, op. 38.

The rehearsal and concert this coming week will be memorable in that they will be directed by Vincent D'Indy, the eminent French composer-conductor, who will make his first appearance in the United States. The programme will include two of his own compositions, also others by Cesar Franck, Faure and Paul Dukas.

PENSION FUND CONCERT TONIGHT

The eighth concert for the benefit of the pension fund of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Symphony Hall tonight at 8 o'clock. The purpose of this entertainment has become almost self-explanatory. It is to add to the fund which is now being accumulated for the purpose of providing for the members of the orchestra when age or sickness incapacitates them for active duty. All the members of the orchestra contribute to the fund in the shape of annual dues, but the money secured in this way is not sufficient for the purpose, and rather than to make an appeal to the public which patronizes and is interested in the orchestra, the policy has always been, since the movement started three years ago, to give special concerts and devote to the fund the gross proceeds from these.

M. D'INDY

The invitation given to M. d'Indy to conduct the rehearsal and concert of the Symphony Orchestra this week is noteworthy, since it is the first time any composer or conductor has been asked to lead the orchestra at one of its regular concerts. The invitation was intended and was accepted as a compliment to that most interesting movement in France, which for the past 30 years has been seeking to divide the field of music in that country with the opera which for the better part of the last century had the monopoly. Starting with Cesar Franck it has been continued by his followers and pupils, of whom d'Indy is the leader. Much of this music has been heard here at the Symphony concerts; in fact, in the programmes that M. d'Indy has made, which are devoted exclusively to this modern French music, the number of novelties is very small. M. d'Indy himself has expressed surprise that these works are so well known in Boston, for while he keeps track generally of the musical situation in America he did not realize how completely the entire field of modern music has been covered.

Following the prevailing usage of past orchestral concerts in Paris there will be no soloist next week. The programme, devoted as it is entirely to orchestral compositions, gives no place for one. Three of the works to be presented have already been played here. M. d'Indy's second symphonie had its first performance in Boston under Mr. Gericke last season, his "Istar" variations were first played under Mr. Gericke several years ago and have since been repeated, Faure's suite, "Peleas et Melisande," written for the performance of Maeterlinck's play, has also been played here. The other two works—a movement of Franck's symphonic poem, "Psyche," and Ropartz's "Les Landes"—will be new to Boston.

BOSTON SYMPHONY QUARTET

Tomorrow evening brings at Jordan Hall the second in the series of six chamber music concerts to be given this winter by the Boston Symphony Quartet. The first concert a few weeks ago attracted a large audience and gave much pleasure and satisfaction. The quartet, composed as it is of Professor Willy Hess, Mr. Otto Roth, Mr. Emile Ferir and Mr. Heinrich Warnke, cannot help but be on the highest possible plane of artistry, and it is getting very loyal support from the patrons of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and lovers of chamber music.

The assisting artist at this concert will be Mr. Raoul Pugno, than whom there is no more admirable ensemble player now in the country. With Professor Hess he will play Franck's sonata for violin and piano in A major.

[105]

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

Comedy Overture in C major, op. 38.....Busoni
(First time.)
Concerto for Violin and Orchestra, in D major, op 77 .....Brahms Soloist, Mr. Hugo Heermann.
Fantasia for Orchestra and Organ, "The Devil's Villanelle" (After Rollinat's poem), op. 9 .....Loeffler
Symphony No. 1, in B flat major, op. 38.....Schumann

The pendulum swung between very diverse schools of composition in this concert, and the more sedate works lost somewhat because of their fiery companions. The Busoni overture reminds us that another Bostonian once wrote a comedy overture, and we consider Chadwick's "Thalia" more distinctly in the comedy spirit than this number.

Busoni can be tremendously modern when he tries, and some of his scores are very complex; but in this work he is fairly conservative and even his orchestral forces are scarcely beyond the classical demands. The work was clear, the scoring original and brilliant, and if there was no rollicking fun of the modern type in the composition it had something of the Aristophanian sharpness and contrast. Many faint trumpet passages imparted a martial flavor, and the figure treatment was what we should expect from so thorough a musician as Ferruccio Busoni.

Then came Brahms sandwiched in between Busoni and Loeffler, like a church deacon walking between a dancing girl and a case of delirium tremens. Brahms' violin concerto is not a pleasing work, it is too ascetic for that, but every modern violinist who aspires to be known as classical must conquer 3 things—the Beethoven concerto, the Bach Chaconne and the Brahms concerto.

And Mr. Heermann certainly conquered the last-named work. We have never heard the chaste character of the composition so well brought out. One might have wished for a larger tone, but in intonation, in sweetness, in surety of phrasing, the performance was something to remember. Mr. Heermann sank himself into the ensemble with a spirit of self-abnegation which is demanded by the style of this concerto, which is nothing if not orchestral. It was a worthy display of sterling musicianship on the soloist's part.

If there is not the magnetism in the concerto that exists in the first movement of the Beethoven, or the romance of the second movement of the Bruch G minor, that is not to be charged against the performer; yet it is a great work in its own style, though this leans somewhat to the academic vein. Even the cadenza used by Mr. Heermann was modest and brief, consisting chiefly in the display of double-stopping and of trills.

The second movement was given with much effect, and even the Johnsonian jocosity of the finale, marked "Giocoso," was made attractive. And our Brahmins and Bramsites applauded to the echo and recalled Mr. Heermann 4 times! Boston has evidently reached the Brahms stage of its musical culture.

After this there was the devil to play. Rollinat has written up his Satanic Majesty in a manner which would delight that citizen of Detroit who recently erected a statue to the same personage. It is a piquant French jingle full of mockery and surprises. Possibly an Englishman would conceive it thus:—

There is a gentleman in black
And round the earth he goes,
While near him the thermometer
In melting fervor glows.

The folks in his vicinity
Must wear their Summer clothes,
He burns holes in his handkerchief
Whene'er he blows his nose.

He has a band of muted horns
To add to people's woes,
A cloven malformation is Upon his fiery toes.

Add to this a refrain every few lines to the effect that hell "glows, glows, glows," and that the devil "goes, goes, goes," and the central idea of the Loeffler music-poem is acquired.

It received a superb performance. It is the third time that Boston has heard this work. We care but little for the saturnalia of dissonance, the wails of the muted horns, and the general St. Vitus Dance of this peripatetic demon, yet we may acknowledge the genius displayed in some parts of it. The ecclesiastical portion is stronger than Berlioz's similar touch in the last movement of the Symphonie Fantastique, and Mr. Loeffler's orchestral virtuosity is unparalleled on this side of the Atlantic. The composer was forced to bow his acknowledgments twice to the enthusiastic plaudits of the public.

Then the pendulum swung back again. Even after 10 min. of intermission the Schumann symphony sounded weak. The perfume of Spring violets was overcome by the preceding odor of brimstone. Therefore, although it was admirably played, we never found the first movement of the B flat symphony so tame. We wish that it had come at the first of the concert. But the Scherzo was as beautiful as ever, and the finale, with its bold syncopations, was a gem of purest ray serene, to which the excellent flute-playing of the cadenza added an extra gleam. Nevertheless Johannisberger Cabinet loses its flavor after Arrack Punch.

Louis C. Elson.

SUNDAY HERALD
Published Every Day in the Year.
VOL. CXVIII., NO. 149.
SUNDAY, NOV. 26, 1905.

SIXTH SYMPHONY CONCERT GIVEN

New Comedy Overture by F. Busoni Played—Themes Lack Distinction and Development at Times Is Dull.

LOEFFLER'S "DEVIL'S VILLANELLE" AGAIN

Is a Piece of Uncommon Fancy—Hugo Heermann Gives Eloquent Performance of Brahms' Violin Concerto.

The sixth concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Gericke, conductor, was given last night in Symphony Hall. The programme was as follows:

Comedy overture.....Busoni
(First time.)
Concerto for violin.....Brahms
Fantasia "The Devil's Serenade".....Loeffler
Symphony in B flat, No. 1.....Schumann

This is the third composition by Mr. Busoni that has been played here at a Symphony concert. Excerpts from his first suite were performed in 1892, and his Tone Poem was heard for the first time at a concert of the following season. In the early years of his career he was aggressively contrapuntal in his treatment of dance-forms, as in the suite just mentioned, and he seemed to fear the reproach of being frankly and sensuously melodic in the Italian fashion.

We still remember the din of his Tone Poem, and the discussion it excited after ears could receive the ordinary tones of conversation.

Mr. Busoni has always as a piano virtuoso delighted in formidable tasks. Having exhausted the reportory of concert-givers, he wept for more technical worlds to conquer, and then invented feats, chiefly of transcription—as his arrangement of Bach's violin chaconne for the piano—with which to excite the amazement of the constantly open-mouthed.

He, too, has written a concerto, a tremendous procession of difficulties which is, they say, over an hour in passing a given point, and, not content with a large piano and a huge orchestra, he called in the aid of a chorus. But last month excerpts from his latest work, stage music to a fairy drama by Gozzi, were played in Berlin, and the delicacy and the humor of the music were warmly praised.

This comedy overture is a revised version of a composition written and produced eight years ago. When Mr. Busoni was last in Boston he spoke of it to Mr. Gericke who is always searching for overtures. He rewrote it and the new version was published in 1904 with a dedication to Mr. Gericke.

And what, pray, are Mr. Busoni's views concerning a suitable prelude to a comedy? Is his comedy music light and spontaneous or as laboriously contrived and as artificial as the comedy prose of Mr. George Meredith? The first thought is, "What must this overture have been before it was revised?" For it is now so inconsequential, so purposeless; its spirit is so far removed from the lightness and the gayety of the playhouse audience anticipating the curtain's rise.

The themes are without distinction, and the development is for the most part laboriously dull. A man by the name of Auber was far more successful in this manner of overture, nor is it necessary to mention a classic name. Operetta writers of little pretensions have done much better. Mr. Gericke certainly deserved a more musical and spontaneous tribute of regard.

Mr. Loeffler's "Devil's Villanelle" was played here for the third time. It is an extraordinarily ingenious and fantastical work—in spite of the fact that he hampered himself deliberately by his choice of a poem for a programme, a poem in which there is a double refrain or burden: "Hell's a-burning, burning, burning," and "The devil, prowling, runs about." Other modern composers have attempted to use a single refrain in symphonic work, as Sinding in his orchestral "Rondo Infinito."

Furthermore, it is a question whether the publication of Rollinat's poem does not distract the attention of the hearer-reader from the music as an organic composition, whether he does not lose much and appreciate less in his endeavor to discover in a particular section of the fantasia a translation of a particular couplet of the poet.

We speak concerning the poem itself and its strange author in the music page of this morning's Herald. We have now to do only with the music.

Would not the hearer's task be lessened and his pleasure increased if only the refrains had been published as a motto? There are many literal men and women in this world—possibly without them the world would not revolve according to appointment; they read: "There, floating as a bubble, here squirming as a worm, the Devil, prowling, runs about": are they to be blamed if they strain their ears in the endeavor to see Satan in these highly entertaining impersonations in the music itself?

But Mr. Loeffler might answer with justice: "I have not tried to write panorama music. I print the poem that you may read it before you hear my transliteration; reading it, you will be in the mood. Then you can hear as far as it is in your capacity, for no two hear precisely in the same spirit or with the same imaginative receptivity. Do you ask why I explain certain lines of Rollinat's poem by introducing Bruant's [illegible] ditty and the bloodthirsty revolutionary airs when few in an American audience will recognize the tunes? I find pleasure in introducing them; they aid in the expression of my idea of the Villanelle, and remember that I did not compose the music merely for one parish. Do not these introduced tunes make an effect, even when the ironical significance of their appearance is understood only by a few?"

Mr. Loeffler's Villanelle was played here at first with its companion piece, a sonorous love poem of rare beauty inspired by Verlaine's exquisite Aubade in "La Bonne Chanson." To us the latter is the higher flight, by reason of the fact that it is absolute music which needs no programme, music that would make a deep impression even without a signboard title. Furthermore, the subject is nobler, more human, and the appeal is far more direct and elemental. The Villanelle is necessarily a tour de force. It is inevitably both pictorial and narrative. But what ingenuity, what fancy, is displayed in the conception and in the execution of the detail!

Nor has Mr. Loeffler ever composed anything broader or more truly impressive than the episode of the church music, which might have been suggested by the wild mystery of Saint-Pol Roux's "Black Soul of the White Prior."

In this episode there is suggestion both of the mass and of the worship of Satan for the Macabre in which Mr. Loeffler delights is more than once in the Villanelle of close kin to Satanism. Page after page in this composition might justly give to Mr. Loeffler the title to alter slightly the phrase of the discredited gentleman in "Measure for Measure"—"the fantastical composer of dark corners."

Mr. Gericke read the Villanelle with the finest appreciation and the performance was vivid, elastic and of great euphony. Mr. Loeffler, who was present, was twice obliged to acknowledge the applause.

Mr. Heermann delivered an eloquent plea in behalf of the violin concerto of Johannes Brahms, a work which, as played by highly respectable men of routine and by too ambitious young women, reminds one of a New England boiled dinner, it is for the most part so prosaic and so filling. Mr. Heermann played with a breadth and dignity, with a purity of tone and with a musical understanding that would have vitalized even a more laboriously manufactured composition.

The familiar symphony of Schumann was read and performed romantically.

Boston Daily Globe.
MONDAY, NOV 27, 1905.

ITS 25TH YEAR.

Symphony Orchestra Gives Pension Fund Concert.

Occasion of Uncommon Significance and a Wonderful Musical Treat.

The commemoration of the 25th year of the existence of Boston's noblest musical organization, the Symphony orchestra, took the form of a "pension fund concert" of uncommon excellence at Symphony hall last night. There were present a great number of music lovers, not alone from Greater Boston, but from distant centers, Worcester, Springfield, Providence and New York city being generously represented in the audience.

It was an audience made up of many others than regular Symphony subscribers, who testified in this way to their appreciation of the remarkable work being accomplished for musical life in the state by Mr Gericke's magnificent band. The appearance of Georg Henschel, the first conductor, added to the impressiveness of the occasion, and it was appropriate and most interesting that these skilled musicians (every one a solo artist) should play Beethoven's famous overture, "The Dedication of the House," the piece with which commenced the first program in November, 1880.

The joint appearance of the always gracious Mr Gericke, and the cordially greeted Mr Henschel was of course the signal for a great demonstration, and they were both evidently greatly pleased, for somewhat different reasons. The conditions were all of the most favorable for hearing the fine organization at its very best. The very atmosphere seemed charged with the spirit of appreciation. The result was a concert the like of which may not be heard again in a long time. The musicians who have passed away—who have gone to other earthly fields—who, like Mr Nikisch, have taken up residence overseas, all these seemed in spirit to be present. The occasion was one of uncommon significance and reminiscent impressiveness, reminding those who have watched the organization's steady growth of the days of 1879 and later, when Theodore Thomas and his orchestra had stirred the city to its musical depths, and in the unrest which followed the splendid movement—thanks to Maj Higginson—became a reality.

The "Musical Invocation" (played Oct 22, 1881, by 67 performers) made a most appropriate overture, Mr Henschel's conducting having apparently lost none of its old-time delicacy. When he stepped down a great wreath of laurel was given him—almost too big for first violin Hess to hand him, or for the well-nigh-overcome recipient to carry away. Then the stately Mr Gericke's turn came with the Tschaikowsky "Pathetic Symphony" in four delightful movements. The adagio is full of haunting airs, sweeping chords and soothing fervor. In the "vivace," where there is a strident marching theme, and in the finale, filled with rich organ-like melody, the effect of massed strings is something indescribable. In the latter movement, too, the odd "Mime"-like motif was a marked characteristic.

The Richard Strauss number, a "tone poem" from "Don Juan," demonstrated anew the fact that Mr Gericke is a far more satisfactory conductor of this composer's music than is the latter himself. It was as near as anything to being the flower and fragrance of the orchestra's finest work. At times the solo violin soared above the rest of the orchestration like a spirit. Then the harp became dominant, than the oboe, flute, cornet and clarinet in turn had precedence.

It was a beautiful and dignified ending to a notable musical event. But why does not the musical element in Boston, abundantly able to pack the hall to overflowing if it would, see to it that there are no vacant seats at these pension-fund concerts? Here is a case, truly, where charity begins at the home door.

THE PENSION FUND CONCERT.

Beethoven, overture, "Dédication of the House."
Georg Henschel, Conductor.
Tschaikowsky, Symphonic Pathetique.
Wagner, Bacchanale from "Tannhaeuser."
R. Strauss, Symphonic Poem, "Don Juan."

Spite of the fact that there was no soloist on the programme a good sized and enthusiastic audience was in evidence, gathered to celebrate the 25th anniversary of our Orchestra and to help swell its pension fund exchequer. From the time when Gottlieb Graupner established the Philo-Harmonic Orchestra in Pond st. (now Bedford st.) in old Boston, to the epoch when the Henry Siegel Co. started a "Gewandhaus" Orchestra in their department store, there has been nothing so important in Boston's orchestral matters as the work of our Boston symphony orchestra. It has, as Theodore Thomas often acknowledged, elevated orchestral music throughout all America.

On a beneficent occasion, such as this, where almost all of the artists donate their services for the good of the cause, criticism is out of place, yet the evening's performance was "hors concours" also because of the excellence of the work. Mr. Henschel received a cordial greeting when he took the baton and the conductor's stand. Mr. Henschel received a very large and beautiful wreath of laurel.

It made us feel very old when we thought back upon the time when the same conductor conducted the same composition at the first of the symphony concerts. For it was Mr. Henschel's custom to "say grace" at the beginning of the season's musical banquet with Beethoven's "Dedication of the House," and we had it regularly at the first of each series of concerts in those days when American orchestral Music, heavenly maid, was young.

It might have been another souvenir had the eminent conductor but placed his orchestra as he used to set it in the first 2 seasons. He used to divide the strings, so that half of the 1st. violins, 2nd violins, violas, and violoncellos, sat on his right hand, and the other half upon his left. The contrabasses too were at the front of the stage, in 2 divisions, right and left, all save one lonely contrabassist who stood, undivided, at the back of the platform, in the centre, reminding one of James' "solitary horseman.".

We were all glad to welcome our old conductor back at this concert, and to think of how much he has achieved and how great he has grown in the quarter-century since he launched our orchestra.

We have but recently heard the Wagner "Bacchanale" and the "Don Juan" in our orchestral concerts, and the playing of the Tschaikowsky "Symphonie Pathetique" by our band is also well-known. The latter wears less well than Strauss' picture of Death (and Transfiguration) but Coleridge need not abolish Keats and 2 different schools of music may co-exist amicably.

The Tschaikowski symphony was played gloriously. Mr. Gericke was received with much enthusiasm and his interpretations greatly applauded.

As we generally have two Pension Fund concerts each season it may be permissible to make a suggestion for a future programme. Would it not be interesting and profitable for our band to give us a "Concert of Musical Curiosities"? For such a programme one might suggest Mozart's "Musical Joke" which pictures a village Kapellmeister struggling fearfully with a classical composition.

This is chamber-music, but could easily be made orchestra. Then Beethoven's "Battle Symphony" with its two bass-drums pounding on each side of the stage and "We won't go home till Morning" ("Malbrooke") turned into minor. Bach's "Coffee Cantata" could be added if vocal work were desired. And finally Tausch's concerto for Kettle-drum could be given, with its 5 drums and its elevation of the humble instrument into the chief rank of the orchestra.

Louis C. Elson.

The Boston Post

SYMPHONY BENEFIT CONCERT

The eighth concert for the benefit of the pension fund of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was given last evening in Symphony Hall, with the following programme:

Overture, "Dedication of the House"
Beethoven
Pathetic Symphony, op. 74.....Tschaikowsky
Bacchanale from "Tannhauser".....Wagner
Tone Poem, "Don Juan".....Strauss

This concert was in its way commemorative of the 25th year since the orchestra was founded.

On Oct. 22, 1881, the first concert led by Georg Henschel was given in the old Music Hall, the first number of the programme was the Beethoven overture, "Dedication of the House."

Last evening after a lapse of over 24 years, the same overture was heard directed by Mr. Henschel, who came from New York especially for the purpose.

For those in the audience who were present at the opening concert a quarter of a century ago, the sight of Mr. Henschel must have been a reminder of the old days when musically things were very different from what they are now.

Mr. Henschel was warmly received and he directed the overture with his old-time authoritative manner and was presented with a handsome wreath.

Mr. Gericke directed the remaining numbers of the programme.

The Tschaikowsky symphony, now an established favorite was given with exquisite finish and tonal beauty.

The only thing one could have wished was for the symphony to have been last on the programme for after the despair and gloom pictured by the final movement, the listener is in no mood to hear any thing else.

There was a good sized audience present and it is hoped that a substantial sum was realized, as the purpose of these concerts is to add to the pension fund for providing for the members of the orchestra when age or sickness incapacitates them for active duty.

[106]

REDUCTION

RATIO

18x

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A5

A4

A3

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

4.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

3.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

Stranger" Symphony In Pension Fund Concert

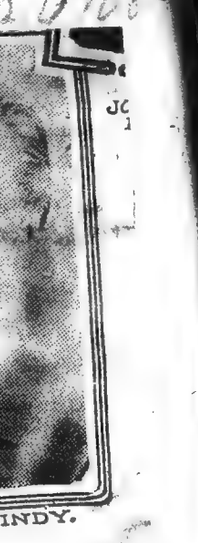
The first of this year's Pension Fund concerts by the Symphony Orchestra was given at Symphony Hall last evening before an audience that, while of goodly size, ought to have been larger. The object was praiseworthy and the concert is one of the most powerful and fascinating of years. The men were in finest form, the program was one of great intensity, if little variety, and Mr. Gericke's reading of everything absolutely superb. There, too, George Henschel, the first conductor of the band, was present and led the players in the first work ever given by the orchestra, Beethoven's "Dedication of the House" overture.

Mr. Henschel read the square-cut and dully formal old composition vigorously, but the breath of life has long since departed from it. The conductor was very warmly recalled and was presented with a great laurel wreath, in which the white ribbon and purple immortelles seemed to be, in part, a memorial of his lost wife. At any rate, he received the tribute with deep emotion.

Tschaikowsky immortal "Pathetique" symphony, its wondrous call to all the deeper emotions of man, had a profoundly stirring and effective performance. Never has Mr. Gericke so brought out the passion and fire of the first movement, while at all points the reading was splendidly virile and the performance full of virtuosity. The "Danse russe" Rachmaniac has better played—in fact, was better played at the Symphony concert of a few weeks ago—but Richard Strauss' great "Don Juan" tone poem was another masterpiece of magnificently free and fiery reading, while the performance showed the orchestra at its highest pinnacle of technical accomplishment.

An audience large and fashionable attested its loyalty to the cause. A conspicuous figure was the French composer, D'Indy, who was a guest of Mrs. Richard Hall. Noticeable in the throng were Mr. Henry L. Higginson, Mr. and Mrs. E. Preble Motley, Mrs. T. Adamowski, with party; Mme. Marius, with friend, and greeted on all sides, she having recently returned from Paris; Mr. and Mrs. Robert M. Morse, with party, from Jamaica Plain; Miss Marianna Guild, aunt of Governor-elect Curtis Guild, accompanied by her old friend, Mrs. Marsh; Jeannette Noyes Rice and Mr. Rice, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Richmond, Mr. Arthur Austin, Mrs. J. C. Phillips, chaperoning a party of young ladies, including her daughter Martha; M. and Mme. Wagniere and friend, Mr. and Mrs. Oliver Crocker Stevens, Mr. George Robinson, Mr. and Mrs. Ernest Newton Bagg and daughter, Mr. Howell Hansell, the actor; Mrs. S. B. Field, Mr. Arthur Foote, Mr. and Mrs. T. Russell Sullivan, Mrs. E. H. Francis, Mr. and Mrs. E. V. R. Crosby, Mr. and Mrs. Neal Rantoul, Miss Rosamond Satterlaill, Miss Ethel Forbes, Mrs. Charles Perkins, with party; Mr. C. A. Ellis, Mr. Louis Elson, Mrs. John Grey, the Misses Mason, Mr. and Mrs. F. A. Livermore and many more.

Herald
Nov 26 1905



VINCENT D'INDY.

PENSION FUND CONCERT.

The [illegible] concert for the benefit of the pension fund of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Symphony Hall this afternoon at 3 o'clock. The purpose of this concert is to add to the [illegible] fund for the purpose of providing [illegible] orchestra when age or sickness incapacitates them for active duty. All the members of the orchestra contribute to the fund in this [illegible] and it is [illegible] but the money secured in this way is not sufficient for the purpose, and for that he makes an appeal to the public which patron-

[illegible] interested in the orchestra, [illegible] since the movement started their doors ago, to make [illegible] Symphony Hall [illegible] Boston is a [illegible] that Boston is a [illegible] to hear the orchestra [illegible] but not [illegible] public concerts is [illegible] esteem in [illegible] said that there [illegible] Friday afternoon [illegible] a very limited number [illegible] Consequently, [illegible] to hear [illegible] the series and a [illegible] in the "pops" [illegible] after the chance [illegible] in Boston is [illegible]

[illegible] pension fund, [illegible] given on such [illegible] was must [illegible] an esteem in [illegible] which has done [illegible] Symphony pur- [illegible] of worthy [illegible] the same time [illegible] to [illegible] are within [illegible]

[illegible] has an added in- [illegible] orchestra. And [illegible] Mr. Hens [illegible] couldn't the [illegible] which was [illegible] programme of [illegible] March Hall [illegible]

[illegible] NT SUNDAY.

[illegible] Pieces [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

Henschel Leads Symphony In Pension Fund Concert

The first of this year's Pension Fund concerts by the Symphony Orchestra was given at Symphony Hall last evening before an audience that, while of goodly size, ought to have been larger. The object was praiseworthy and the concert itself one of the most powerful and fascinating of years. The men were in finest form, the program was one of great intensity, if little variety, and Mr. Gericke's reading of everything absolutely superb. Then, too, George Henschel, the first conducter of the band, was present and led the players in the first work ever given by the orchestra, Beethoven's "Dedication of the House" overture.

Mr. Henschel read the square-cut and dully formal old composition vigorously, but the breath of life has long since departed from it. The conductor was very warmly recalled and was presented with a great laurel wreath, in which the white ribbon and purple immortelles seemed to be, in part, a memorial of his lost wife. At any rate, he received the tribute with deep emotion.

Tschaikowsky immortal "Pathetique" symphony, with its wordrous call to all the deeper emotions of man, had a profoundly stirring and effective performance. Never has Mr. Gericke so brought out the passion and fire of the first movement, while at all points the reading was splendidly virile and the performance full of virtuosity. The "Tannhauser" Bacchanale has been better played—in fact, was better played at the Symphony concert of a few weeks ago—but Richard Strauss' great "Don Juan" tone poem was another masterpiece of magnificently free and fiery reading, while the performance showed the orchestra at its highest pinnacle of technical accomplishment.

An audience large and fashionable attested its loyalty to the cause. A conspicuous figure was the French composer, D'Indy, who was a guest of Mrs. Rachard Hall. Noticeable in the throng were Mr. Henry L. Higginson, Mr. and Mrs. E. Preble Motley, Mrs. T. Adamowski, with party; Mme. Marius, with friend, and greeted on all sides, she having recently returned from Paris; Mr. and Mrs. Robert M. Morse, with party, from Jamaica Plain; Miss Marianna Guild, aunt of Governor-elect Curtis Guild, accompanied by her old friend, Mrs. Marsh; Jeannette Noyes Rice and Mr. Rice, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Richmond, Mr. Arthur Austin, Mrs. John C. Phillips, chaperoning a party of young ladies, including her daughter Martha; M. and Mme. Wagniere and friend, Mr. and Mrs. Oliver Crocker Stevens, Mr. George Robinson, Mr. and Mrs. Ernest Newton Bagg and daughter, Mr. Howell Hansell, the actor; Mrs. S. B. Field, Mr. Arthur Foote, Mr. and Mrs. T. Russell Sullivan, Mrs. E. H. Francis, Mr. and Mrs. E. V. R. Crosby, Mr and Mrs. Neal Rantoul, Miss Rosamond Saltonstall, Miss Ethel Forbes, Mrs. Charles Perkins, with party; Mr. C. A. Ellis, Mr. Louis Elson, Mrs. John Grey, the Misses Mason, Mr. and Mrs. P. A. Livermore and many more.

Herald

VINCENT D'INDY.

PENSION FUND CONCERT.

The [illegible] concert for the benefit of the pension fund of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Symphony Hall tonight at 8 o'clock. The purpose of this concert is to add to the fund for the purpose of providing for the members of the orchestra when age or sickness incapacitates them for active duty. All the members of the orchestra contribute to the fund in the shape of one day's pay, but the money secured in this way is not sufficient for the purpose, and, rather than to make an appeal to the public which patron[illegible]

[illegible] is interested in the orchestra [illegible] public has been [illegible] since the movement started three years ago, to give [illegible] devote to the fund [illegible] gross proceeds from them.

[illegible] that Boston is [illegible] to hear the orches[illegible] that do not subscribe fo[illegible] 24 public rehearsal[illegible] Such is the esteem i[illegible] is held that ther[illegible] on Friday after[illegible] only a very limited numbe[illegible] seats for the rehearsals. Consequently [illegible] which does not fe[illegible] for the series and [illegible] chances in the "rus[illegible] Friday afternoon, the chanc[illegible] of an orchestra in Boston [illegible] very small.

[illegible] of the pension fund [illegible] are given on each [illegible] evenings, when mo[illegible] This gives an extr[illegible] to the riders to hel[illegible] organization which has don[illegible] to make Boston famous. Thu[illegible] two admirable pu[illegible] are to a most worth[illegible] at the same time bring [illegible] concerts which are with[illegible]

[illegible] thought has an added i[illegible] commemorative [illegible] of the orchestra. And [illegible] Mr. Georg Hensch[illegible] director will conduct t[illegible] Beethoven's overture, t[illegible] House," which w[illegible] on the programme [illegible] the old Music Ha[illegible]

VINCENT D'INDY.

[illegible] of Friday a[illegible] ceremony interestin[illegible] in the presence [illegible] distinguished French [illegible] by invitati[illegible] for these co[illegible] which will [illegible] trip ne[illegible] the principa[illegible] as the young[illegible] is th[illegible] which ha[illegible] of the pres[illegible] he [illegible] most import[illegible] world of music[illegible]

Mr. d'Indy is the [illegible] Since it is the LOCAL.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony quartet on Monday night will be one of peculiar interest, for Mr. Raoul Pugno will play with Mr. Hess César Franck's sonata for piano and violin. Mr. Pugno is not only an eminent virtu-

[illegible] so, he is a distinguished player of chamber music, as Bostonians already know.

TRANSCRIPT, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 25, 1905 [illegible]ING TRA

VINCENT D'INDY

THE FRENCH COMPOSER WHO IS VISITING BOSTON

His Origin and Training—A Survey of the Influences That Have Affected His Development as a Musician, and the Influences That He Himself Now Exerts on French Music—His Compositions, Their Chronology, and Some Comment Upon Them

BY EDWARD BURLINGAME HILL

The phrase, "French music," no longer calls up the names of Gounod, Bizet, Massenet and Saint-Saëns, as it once did. While Gounod and Bizet have their individual niches from which nothing can oust them, we admire Massenet chiefly for his graceful fertility in opera that is half French, half Italian, and we respect Saint-Saëns as the valiant architect of much music in a semi-classic style. It is the so-called younger school (which contains artists of maturity though their hearts and minds are young) that is maintaining France in the tide of musical progress, and it is through them that French music of today will pass down to history. In a somewhat heterogeneous group that contains Gabriel Fauré, Henri Duparc, Pierre de Breville, A. de Castillon, Charles Bordes, Gabriel Pierné, Guy Ropartz, Gustave Charpentier, Paul Dukas, Claude Debussy and others (one is tempted to include Ernest Chausson, who died in 1899), Vincent d'Indy is incontestably the leader among his contemporaries by virtue of the clear superiority of his traits, artistic, intellectual and human.

His preëminent qualifications for this position are, first, the intrinsic importance [illegible] During the [illegible] of his [illegible] phony, and a sonata for piano and violin are the most noteworthy of his works. At present d'Indy's interests are divided between composition and his manifold interests at the Schola Cantorium, including his duties as director, as teacher of composition, and as organizer of concerts within the Schola and throughout France.

As a musician, d'Indy has gone through formative influences that were healthy and natural. On one side he has been deeply affected by the German composers Bach, Schumann, Wagner and Brahms; on the other, he has always remained faithful to César Franck and his essentially French methods of expression. As a consequence, d'Indy retains something of German seriousness of substance, while his manner of musical speech is unmistakably French. In the meantime d'Indy has developed a personal idiom of singular force, poetry and sense of beauty, in which scarcely any external sources can be traced. Undoubtedly d'Indy's most important works are his operas, "Fervaal" and "The Stranger," for both of which he has written the text as well as the music. To these might also be added the far-earlier, prize-winning "Song of the Bell," although it represents d'Indy at a much less advanced stage of development. "Fervaal" is obviously Wagnerian in inspiration; both the subject, individual scenes and characters remind one strangely of one or the other of Wagner's operas. Still, in spite of this evident patterning after Wagner, there is so much in the musical treatment of the subject that is strongly French in the clearness and logic of his harmony, in the lucidity with which the drama unfolds. Even the sound of the orchestra is so French in its finesse, its euphonious yet forceful instrumental combinations, that the Wagnerian sources become merely a side issue. In its essence "Fervaal" could have emanated only from a strong and fastidious personality like d'Indy's. It is a drama of great emotions, of vigorous action; a conflict between old and new religions, in which love arrays itself through tragedy on the side of the new religion. One comes away from "Fervaal" elevated, exalted by the depth of sentiment and the purity of its ideals. From the strictly musical standpoint, "Fervaal" is not only full of a high order of beauty and dramatic expression, but its technical achievement is marvellous.

"The Stranger" is a drama of psychological development—the action is comparatively slight. The Stranger, a figure half realistic, half mythical, spends his life in serving others, only to suffer contempt and scorn. He loves Vita, a young girl of the fishing village where the scene is laid. She is betrothed, but comes to sympathize with the lonely, misunderstood Stranger; ultimately loves him, casts off her betrothed, and finally sacrifices herself with the Stranger in an effort to save a ship in distress. Both drama and music are absolutely devoid of any suggestion of Wagnerian influence. The music especially, from beginning to end, is in d'Indy's most individual style; it is distinguished by unusual directness and conciseness, by simplicity of means with which its dramatic efforts are attained. In this economy of resource and mastery of every shade of expression, "The Stranger" is unalterably French.

D'Indy's two symphonies (excluding an early symphony, "Jean Hunyade," op. 5, which the composer has dropped from the list of his works), one "On a Mountain Air," the other without superscription, are in direct accordance with his training and aspirations. They are the natural outcome of a pupil of César Franck, who is endeavoring to preserve the traditions passed on to him by his master. Nevertheless, in the first d'Indy combines two important predilections which deserve later mention, one, the use of folk songs as symphonic material, the other, artistic receptivity towards nature. The second symphony is the ripest expression of his individuality and exhibits not only an extraordinary [illegible] memory is the foundation of the Schola Cantorum. The purpose of the Schola is to present César Franck's principles in art, to perpetuate his theories, and to continue the spirit of his mission toward French music. It aims to cultivate its students in the highest sense, to arouse in them the moral purpose of art, not merely to provide them almost automatically with a superficial knowledge of technique and then cast them off.

This insistence on æsthetic development is the keynote of d'Indy's "Treatise on Composition," of which the first volume only has appeared. At the outset its definitions are not only novel but illuminating, and the thoroughness with which the more elementary topics of rhythm, the growth of harmony, and later the early forms of composition, such as the motet, are discussed show a teacher of superb intellectual equipment for his task, whose perception of artistic truth is of priceless import to the present generation. The whole tendency of this treatise is illustrative also of that of the Schola Cantorum, namely, to exert a wholesome counter influence on the materialistic turn of modern art, to cultivate a sense of proportion and a proper appreciation of the masterpieces of the past.

That d'Indy should also be a musical archæologist is only a natural sequence of the foundation of the Schola. He has prepared editions of Rameau, Destouches, and Salamon de Rossi. During the rehearsals of "The Stranger" at Brussels, he was working at a reconstruction of Monteverde's "Orfeo," which has since been given at the Schola Cantorum. He has also discovered much hitherto unknown Italian church-music dating from the fifteenth to the seventeenth centuries. He is also an admirer of folk-music, of which he has published two collections, one in collaboration with M. Julien Tiersot, the other ninety folk-songs of the Cevennals which he has harmonized. In confirmation of d'Indy's interest in folk-song it is only necessary to recall the admirable effect produced by folk-themes in "Fervaal" and "The Stranger." The symphony "On a mountain air" is built up of ingenious transformations of one pastoral melody. There is also a fantasy for oboe and orchestra on popular themes.

In analyzing M. d'Indy's mental and intellectual traits, there is somewhat the same discrepancy to be explained as in connection with his musical development. Influenced at first by German musicians, he also seemed to feel an affinity for the German poets Goethe, Schiller and Uhland. Yet in his later compositions, their plan and technical handling, in their emotional contents, and above all in his practice of life he shows much more spiritual kinship with César Franck. In spite of his appreciation for German literature, he is inevitably and fundamentally French in his conception of the relation of art to life. His literary gifts are manifest in the lucidity of style and vividness of depiction in which he sets César Franck before us. His "Treatise on Composition" is masterly in clearness and force of exposition. The texts for "Fervaal" and "The Stranger" are imaginative, full of color and well adapted for musical setting.

D'Indy's great distinction, both as a musician and as a man, consists in his innate aristocracy—an aristocracy of mind, as well as of character. His marvellous perception on all problems relating to æsthetics, to matters of technique, his acute mental grasp of the entire history of art development (of literature, sculpture and painting, as well as of music), the power of his own instinct as a creative artist would lose an important element in their value were they not balanced by an equally unusual and penetrating love of humanity, an ardent desire to make his great treasury of knowledge accessible to others. D'Indy is firm in his belief that the composer's work is far from done when he completes his composition; he must also be the fervent apostle of musical truth as he sees it; he must labor unsparingly to help others to acquire the indispensable training in technique; he must sacrifice himself unceasingly in order that others may benefit by this lavish giving of himself. This broad conception of the moral obligation of the artist is one of d'Indy's dominant traits, one which is directly accountable for the commanding influences which he exerts upon French music of today.

To give an example of the personal eloquence with which he expresses himself on this phase of the artist's duty, a quotation from his "Treatise on Compos[illegible]

"Just-the-Right-Size"

Not an over-priced, cumbrous road roller, that burns up money for tires and chauffeur hire.

"Just-the-Right-Size"

Not "too little." Tonneau space not cramped. Riding not "jarry."

"Just-the-Right-Size"

With its 100-inch wheel base, 2000 lbs. weight and 35 H. P. motor.

"Just-the-Right-Size"

BUICK CAR

4 CYLINDER

Motor Car Company.

Autoists Come to Football Game

Boston's garage facilities are being tested to the limit of their capacity today by the [illegible] run or a stopping-place for a longer trip is the idea of the Berkshire [illegible] been abandoned for the winter, although it [illegible] The plan of securing a summer house has

REDUCTION

RATIO

12x

2.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

150 mm

100 mm

A5

A4

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

4.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

3.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

Henschel Leads Symphony In Pension Fund Concert

The first of this year's Pension Fund concerts by the Symphony Orchestra was given at Symphony Hall last evening before an audience that, while of goodly size, ought to have been larger. The object was praiseworthy and the concert itself one of the most powerful and fascinating of years. The men were in finest form, the program was one of great intensity, if little variety, and Mr. Gericke's reading of everything absolutely superb. Then, too, George Henschel, the first conductor of the band, was present and led the players in the first work ever given by the orchestra, Beethoven's "Dedication of the House" overture.

Mr. Henschel read the square-cut and dully formal old composition vigorously, but the breath of life has long since departed from it. The conductor was very warmly recalled and was presented with a great laurel wreath, in which the white ribbon and purple immortelles seemed to be, in part, a memorial of his lost wife. At any rate, he received the tribute with deep emotion.

Tschaikowsky immortal "Pathetique" symphony, with its wondrous call to all the deeper emotions of man, had a profoundly stirring and effective performance. Never has Mr. Gericke so brought out the passion and fire of the first movement, while at all points the reading was splendidly virile and the performance full of virtuosity. The "Tannhauser" Bacchanale has been better played—in fact, was better played at the Symphony concert of a few weeks ago—but Richard Strauss' great "Don Juan" tone poem was another masterpiece of magnificently free and fiery reading, while the performance showed the orchestra at its highest pinnacle of technical accomplishment.

An audience large and fashionable attested its loyalty to the cause. A conspicuous figure was the French composer, D'Indy, who was a guest of Mrs. Richard Hall. Noticeable in the throng were Mr. Henry L. Higginson, Mr. and Mrs. E. Preble Motley, Mrs. T. Adamowski, with party; Mme. Marius, with friend, and greeted on all sides, she having recently returned from Paris; Mr. and Mrs. Robert M. Morse, with party, from Jamaica Plain; Miss Marianna Guild, aunt of Governor-elect Curtis Guild, accompanied by her old friend, Mrs. Marsh; Jeannette Noyes Rice and Mr. Rice, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Richmond, Mr. Arthur Austin, Mrs. John C. Phillips, chaperoning a party of young ladies, including her daughter Martha; M. and Mme. Wagniere and friend, Mr. and Mrs. Oliver Crocker Stevens, Mr. George Robinson, Mr. and Mrs. Ernest Newton Bagg and daughter, Mr. Howell Hansell, the actor; Mrs. S. B. Field, Mr. Arthur Foote, Mr. and Mrs. T. Russell Sullivan, Mrs. E. H. Francis, Mr. and Mrs. E. V. R. Crosby, Mr and Mrs. Neal Rantoul, Miss Rosamond Saltonstall, Miss Ethel Forbes, Mrs. Charles Perkins, with party; Mr. C. A. Ellis, Mr. Louis Elson, Mrs. John Grey, the Misses Mason, Mr. and Mrs. P. A. Livermore and many more.

Herald Nov 26/05

VINCENT D'INDY.

PENSION FUND CONCERT.

The eighth concert for the benefit of the pension fund of the Boston Symphony orchestra will be given in Symphony Hall tonight at 8 o'clock. The purpose of this concert is to add to the fund for the purpose of providing for the members of the orchestra when age or sickness incapacitates them for active duty. All the members of the orchestra contribute to the fund in the shape of annual dues, but the money secured in this way is not sufficient for the purpose, and, rather than to make an appeal to the public which patronizes and is interested in the orchestra, the policy has been, since the movement started, three years ago, to give special concerts and devote to the fund the gross proceeds from them.

It is a curious fact that Boston is a most difficult place to hear the orchestra for all that do not subscribe for the whole series of 24 public rehearsals or 24 concerts. Such is the esteem in which the orchestra is held that there are no seats for sale on Friday afternoons, and only a very limited number for Saturday evenings. Consequently, for the large public which does not feel able to subscribe for the series and is unable to take its chances in the "rush line" on Friday afternoon, the chance of hearing the orchestra in Boston is very small.

But on account of the pension fund, at least two concerts are given on each year on Sunday evenings, when most people are free. This gives an extra opportunity for non-subscribers to hear the splendid organization which has done so much to make Boston famous. Thus the concerts serve two admirable purposes. They contribute to a most worthy cause and at the same time bring to the public concerts which are within the reach of all.

The concert tonight has an added interest in that it is commemorative of the 25th season of the orchestra. And in honor of this event Mr. Georg Henschel, the first conductor, will conduct the first number, Beethoven's overture, the "Dedication of the House," which was the first number on the programme of the first concert in the old Music Hall on Oct. 22, 1881.

VINCENT D'INDY.

The Symphony concerts of Friday and Saturday will be extremely interesting. The chief interest lies in the presence of one of the most distinguished French composers, who has come by invitation to conduct the orchestra for these concerts. [illegible] The concerts which will be given on the regular monthly trip next week. Mr. d'Indy [illegible] one of the principal leaders of what is known as the younger school of French composers; he is the head of the Schola Cantorum, which has made such serious inroads on the prestige of the Paris Conservatory; he is generally regarded as the most important leader of the modern world of music in Paris.

The invitation given to Mr. d'Indy is all the more noteworthy since it is the first time any composer or conductor has been asked to conduct [illegible] Symphony Orchestra at one of [illegible] concerts. The invitation was [illegible] and was accepted as a compliment to that great [illegible] France which for the past 30 years [illegible] been seeking to divide [illegible] field of music in that country with the opera, which for the better part of the last century had the monopoly. Starting with [illegible] Franck it has been continued by his followers and pupils of whom d'Indy is the leader. Much of this music has been heard here at the Symphony concerts, in fact, in the programmes that Monsieur d'Indy has made which are devoted exclusively to this modern French music the number of novelties [illegible] small. Mr. d'Indy himself is a surprise that these works are not known in Boston for what [illegible] track generally [illegible] music in America he did not realize [illegible] pletely the entire field [illegible] has been covered.

Aside from the natural [illegible] pate always has [illegible] man, especially [illegible] these concerts will appeal [illegible] the large number [illegible] French music that the work [illegible] phony orchestra has [illegible] in the last few years [illegible] always to hear a composition [illegible] ton of his own work. [illegible] men it is also interesting [illegible] reading of one who [illegible] touch and sympathy with [illegible] words, a Frenchman. Mr. d'Indy has brought to America the reputation of being a most talented conductor. He conducts regular series of concerts in Paris and as a guest he has conducted in Belgium and Holland, Germany and Russia, and everywhere he has been very well received.

LOCAL.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony quartet on Monday night will be one of peculiar interest, for Mr. Raoul Pugno will play with Mr. Hess Cesar Franck's sonata for piano and violin. Mr. Pugno is not only an eminent virtuoso, he is a distinguished player of chamber music, as Bostonians already know.

167

TRANSCRIPT, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 25, 1905 [illegible]ING [illegible]

VINCENT D'INDY

THE FRENCH COMPOSER WHO IS VISITING BOSTON

His Origin and Training—A Survey of the Influences That Have Affected His Development as a Musician, and the Influences That He Himself Now Exerts on French Music—His Compositions, Their Chronology, and Some Comment Upon Them

BY EDWARD BURLINGAME HILL

The phrase, "French music," no longer calls up the names of Gounod, Bizet, Massenet and Saint-Saëns, as it once did. While Gounod and Bizet have their individual niches from which nothing can oust them, we admire Massenet chiefly for his graceful fertility in opera that is half French, half Italian, and we respect Saint-Saëns as the valiant architect of much music in a semi-classic style. It is the so-called younger school (which contains artists of maturity though their hearts and minds are young) that is maintaining France in the tide of musical progress, and it is through them that French music of today will pass down to history. In a somewhat heterogeneous group that contains Gabriel Fauré, Henri Duparc, Pierre de Breville, A. de Castillon, Charles Bordes, Gabriel Pierné, Guy Ropartz, Gustave Charpentier, Paul Dukas, Claude Debussy and others (one is tempted to include Ernest Chausson, who died in 1899), Vincent d'Indy is incontestably the leader among his contemporaries by virtue of the clear superiority of his traits, artistic, intellectual and human.

His preëminent qualifications for this position are, first, the intrinsic importance and inherent originality of his creative work; second, the actuteness of his æsthetic perceptions and his unusual gift for imparting his vast accumulation of technical and artistic skill; third, his zeal for maintaining the traditions of French music, and more specifically for furthering the ideals for which César Franck stood, his work as an editor and restorer and his services generally as propagandist.

Paul Marie Vincent d'Indy was born at Paris, March 27, 1852, of an aristocratic and wealthy family. D'Indy was brought up by his grandmother, Mme. Théodore d'Indy, who nurtured his growing fondness for music at classical sources only. When he was ten years old he began the study of the piano under the famous Conservatory teacher Louis Diémer, and harmony with Henri Lavignac, also a Conservatory teacher. Two later influences of significance were his acquaintance, in 1867, when he was fifteen, with Berlioz's remarkable and inspiring treatise on instrumentation, and, two years later, his initiation into the Wagnerian principles and practice of art under the guidance of Henri Duparc, himself a pupil of César Franck.

In spite of military service during the Franco-Prussian War, d'Indy found time to meditate an opera-text after Victor Hugo's "Les Burgraves." In 1872 (under the advice of Duparc) he became a pupil of César Franck, first at the Conservatory, later at his house, in his private class. D'Indy's apprenticeship to Franck was the most important event in his student period. He not only learned where he stood technically, he absorbed Franck's remarkable and thorough instruction in everything that pertained to the technique of composition; he became permeated with that spirit of devotion to the cause of a pure symphonic style and to the continuance of specifically French traditions which was so entirely the essence of Franck's mission. Indeed, Franck's unselfish concentration on high and severe standards, irrespective of applause, or hope of self-advancement, impressed d'Indy so powerfully that this example has become the moving influence of his life.

Shortly after becoming a pupil of Franck, d'Indy made two musical pilgrimages, one to Brahms (in consequence of the publication of the German Requiem) which was virtually fruitless, the other to Liszt, with whom he studied for a short time. Later d'Indy took the position of second drummer and chorus-master, under Colonne, in order to become versed in the practicalities of orchestral procedure. In 1875 an overture, "Les Piccolomini" (now a part of the Wallenstein trilogy), was first played at a Pasdeloup concert. In 1880 came "La Mort de Wallenstein," the third in the trilogy of symphonic poems after Schiller. In 1882 a one-act comedy "Attendez-moi Sous l'Armie," was given at the Opera Comique. In 1884 an orchestral piece "Sangefleurie," founded on a French legend, was given. In 1885 d'Indy won the prizes offered by the city of Paris, with "The Song of the Bell," text by himself, after Schiller, for solos, chorus and orchestra. In 1887 d'Indy became chorus-master of the Lamoureux concerts and prepared the choruses for a production of "Lohingrin." In 1888 the young composer went to the Wagner festival at Bayreuth. D'Indy was one of the founders, with Franck, Saint Saëns, Gabriel Fauré, De Castillon, Chausson and Duparc, of the National Society of Music, an important institution, and since César Franck's death he has been its president. In 1893, at Government request, he was ready to reorganize the Conservatory, but the project was defeated. Although offered a professorship at the Conservatory in 1895, he refused in order to be free. In the following year he utilized this freedom to establish a music school with Alexander Guilmant, the organist, and Charles Bordès, conductor of the remarkable chorus, the Singers of St. Gervais." This school, the Schola Cantorum, embodies more fundamental principles of teaching and enforces more lofty standards of art.

D'Indy's opera "Fervaal" was side of the new religion. One comes away from "Fervaal" elevated, exalted by the depth of sentiment and the purity of its ideals. From the strictly musical standpoint, "Fervaal" is not only full of a high order of beauty and dramatic expression, but its technical achievement is marvellous.

"The Stranger" is a drama of psychological development—the action is comparitively slight. The Stranger, a figure half realistic, half mythical, spends his life in serving others, only to suffer contempt and scorn. He loves Vita, a young girl of the fishing village where the scene is laid. She is betrothed, but comes to sympathize with the lonely, misunderstood Stranger; ultimately loves him, casts off her betrothed, and finally sacrifices herself with the Stranger in an effort to save a ship in distress. Both drama and music are absolutely devoid of any suggestion of Wagnerian influence. The music especially, from beginning to end, is in d'Indy's most individual style; it is distinguished by unusual directness and conciseness, by simplicity of means with which its dramatic efforts are attained. In this economy of resource and mastery of every shade of expression, "The Stranger" is unalterably French.

D'Indy's two symphonies (excluding an early symphony, "Jean Hunyade," op. 5, which the composer has dropped from the list of his works), one "On a Mountain Air," the other without superscription, are in direct accordance with his training and aspirations. They are the natural outcome of a pupil of César Franck, who is endeavoring to preserve the traditions passed on to him by his master. Nevertheless, in the first d'Indy combines two important predilections which deserve later mention, one, the use of folk songs as symphonic material, the other, artistic receptivity towards nature. The second symphony is the ripest expression of his individuality and exhibits not only an extraordinary command of technique, but many new harmonic combinations, expressive themes, variety and depth of sentiment. His other orchestral works, including a symphonic poem, "The Enchanted Forest," "Wallenstein," a trilogy of poems after Schiller's drama, the legend "Sange Fleurie," the variations "Istar," the suite "Medée" and the variations on a chorale for saxophone and orchestra show his gradual evolution as a master of musical style and a virtuoso in the use of the orchestra. D'Indy's chamber-music, of which the two string quartets, the trio for clarinet, 'cello and piano, the "Songs and Dances" for wind instruments and the sonata for piano and violin are the ripest examples, show consistent achievement in carrying on the Franckian tradition of chamber-music while giving free play to individuality. They are highly original in treatment of theme and form, and expressive of high idealistic beauty. Space will not permit mention of d'Indy's church music, cantatas, songs or piano music, but reference must be made to the recurrence in them of the trait before mentioned—impressionability to nature.

In one of his earliest orchestral works, "The Enchanted Forest," there is the mystery of deep woods, although the musical representation suggests occasionally the methods of Weber, or César Franck in the "Wild Huntsman." The early "Poem of the Mountains" and the "Pictures of Travel" for piano are tributes to this same sensibility. In the symphony "On a Mountain Air," the "out-door feeling" is even more clearly indicated. In "Fervaal," a Druidical opera, whose scene is laid in the Cevennais region, the element of nature is perhaps the strongest trait in determining its specifically French character. In an article on "French Music" Henri Gauthier-Villars, the eminent critic, says of "Fervaal": "If chance takes you to the Rhone Valley, leave the train or boat at Montelimar, cross the river and ascend the slopes which lead to the small peaks of black basalt and the ruined towers of the old chateau of Rochmaure. Then climb to the neighboring summit of the ancient volcano of Chenavari. There you will see the majestic unfurling of the river at your feet, then far off the august outline of the grandes Alpes, and turning around behold a labyrinthian tangle of sharp and rounding peaks with intercrossing valleys. It is the old land of a thousand peaks, where the signal fires were lighted calling the clans to combat; it is Cravann, the Cevenola Gaul. And if excess of intellectuality has not deprived you of the power of admiration . . . you will feel and understand why 'Fervaal' has been conceived in this country; and could not have been elsewhere. You will realize that this musical poem and its general treatment is as thoroughly Gallic and of the Cevenola region as the "Ring of the Nibelungs" is definitely German and Rheinish.

"From the call of the clans proclaimed by the patriarch, a folksong as old as the rocks of Cravann, to the heroic ascension of the ideal (and real) mountain of Iserlich (the close of the opera), there is not an essential moment of dramatic action, no primal thread of the musical woof of Fervaal, which is not as thoroughly of the Cavenole earth, as the giant chestnut trees which plunge their roots into the soil."

"The Stranger" also, while less definitely of one region, has the indisputable feeling of the French coast and the restlessness of the sea. That this sensitiveness towards the moods of nature is inseparable from d'Indy's musical personality may still further be realized from the character of his latest composition for orchestra, "Summer Hours on the Mountain," in three movements. First, "Morning," a sunrise on distant glaciers; then "Afternoon under the Pines," in mingled sun and shadow, while the sounds of a fete rise spasmodically to the solitary dreamer; finally, "Evening," picturing a joyous return to shelter amidst the last rays of the setting sun, the slow nightfall and the return of the initial theme.

mountain air" is built up of ingenious transformations of one pastoral melody. There is also a fantasy for oboe and orchestra on popular themes.

In analyzing M. d'Indy's mental and intellectual traits, there is somewhat the same discrepancy to be explained as in connection with his musical development. Influenced at first by German musicians, he also seemed to feel an affinity for the German poets Goethe, Schiller and Uhland. Yet in his later compositions, their plan and technical handling, in their emotional contents, and above all in his practice of life he shows much more spiritual kinship with César Franck. In spite of his appreciation for German literature, he is inevitably and fundamentally French in his conception of the relation of art to life. His literary gifts are manifest in the lucidity of style and vividness of depiction in which he sets César Franck before us. His "Treatise on Composition' is masterly in clearness and force of exposition. The texts for "Fervaal" and "The Stranger" are imaginative, full of color and well adapted for musical setting.

D'Indy's great distinction, both as a musician and as a man, consists in his innate aristocracy—an aristocracy of mind, as well as of character. His marvellous perception on all problems relating to æsthetics, to matters of technique, his acute mental grasp of the entire history of art development (of literature, sculpture and painting, as well as of music), the power of his own instinct as a creative artist would lose an important element in their value were they not balanced by an equally unusual and penetrating love of humanity, an ardent desire to make his great treasury of knowledge accessible to others. D'Indy is firm in his belief that the composer's work is far from done when he completes his composition; he must also be the fervent apostle of musical truth as he sees it; he must labor unsparingly to help others to acquire the indispensable training in technique; he must sacrifice himself unceasingly in order that others may benefit by this lavish giving of himself. This broad conception of the moral obligation of the artist is one of d'Indy's dominant traits, one which is directly accountable for the commanding influences which he exerts upon French music of today.

To give an example of the personal eloquence with which he expresses himself on this phase of the artist's duty, a quotation from his "Treatise on Composition" is of singularly illustrative force. "'And now abideth with you Faith, Hope and Charity, these three; but the greatest of these is Charity.'" I. Corinthians, 13, 4. "Above all the artist must have Faith—faith in God, faith in Art; for it is Faith that incites one to learn, and by this knowledge to rise higher and higher on the Ladder of Being, towards its end, which is God. The artist must practise Hope; for he expects nothing from the present; he knows that his mission is to serve and to contribute by his works to the instruction and to the artistic life of those generations which come after him.

"The artist must be actuated by sublime charity, 'the greatest of these'; his purpose is to admire generously, for the one principle of all creation is great, divine and charitable love."

This extract, originally part of an address to the pupils of the Schola Cantorum, indicates the lofty attitude which d'Indy holds towards his art, an exalted standard which in its essence is truly religious, and as such cannot but elevate all those who come within its ardent influence. Indeed, the symbolic intent of "The Stranger" seems so clearly autobiographic that one is tempted to infer that, whether consciously or unconsciously, d'Indy has embodied in this opera the unselfish strivings of his own life. Certain it is that in these grasping, modern times, when the tendency of all artists is to magnify their achievements in every possible manner, d'Indy's example of self-effacement as regards personal distinction in order to secure a higher attitude in musical education is worthy of the highest respect and admiration. Indeed, he has abundantly succeeded in his mission, for not only Franck's music, but his equally lofty and illuminating teachings, have borne fruit as the master himself could scarcely have dreamed. Today Franck's little band of devoted disciples, with d'Indy at their head, have proved by their works the music of which France should be proudest today, the far-reaching influenees of his unselfish and untiring self-sacrifice and the precious truths of his teachings in musical art.

It is always difficult to arrive at any comprehensive rating of the works of a living composer, still more so when circumstances conspire to prevent our hearing his larger and most representative works in their proper framing. Nevertheless, d'Indy's dramatic works cannot yield in dramatic force and poetry to any works of our generation; their strong nationalistic traits make them a lasting ornament to French music. In symphonic and chamber music, d'Indy has given us works of impeccable style, whose utterance is eloquent and poetic to a high degree. In a word, as a composer, he is the worthy exponent of French qualities, French intellect and French emotion at their noblest and greatest. Of his position as an educator in the loftiest sense of the word, of his great mission to continue the best traditions of French music from Rameau to César Franck by his efforts as a teacher (not forgetting his contributions as a composer to the cause), he is a unique figure not only in contemporary music but in well-nigh the whole range of musical history. In France his example is bearing and will continue to bear splendid fruit, and if by his visit to this country we can only absorb some of his lofty enthusiasm and generosity in the use of his great qualities, our musical life and all those who are striving toward its adequate upbuilding will be unspeakably his debtors.

in Pension Fund Concert

The first of this year's Pension Fund concerts by the Symphony Orchestra was given at Symphony Hall last evening before an audience that, while of goodly size, ought to have been larger. The object was praiseworthy and the concert itself one of the most powerful and fascinating of years. The men were in finest form, the program was one of great intensity, if little variety, and Mr. Gericke's reading of everything absolutely superb. Then, too, George Henschel, the first conductor of the band, was present and led the players in the first work ever given by the orchestra, Beethoven's "Dedication of the House" overture.

Mr. Henschel read the square-cut and dully formal old composition vigorously, but the breath of life has long since departed from it. The conductor was very warmly recalled and was presented with a great laurel wreath, in which the white ribbon and purple immortelles seemed to be, in part, a memorial of his lost wife. At any rate, he received the tribute with deep emotion.

Tschaikowsky immortal "Pathetique" symphony, with its wondrous call to all the deeper emotions of man, had a profoundly stirring and effective performance. Never has Mr. Gericke so brought out the passion and fire of the first movement, while at all points the reading was splendidly virile and the performance full of virtuosity. The "Tannhauser" Bacchanale has been better played—in fact, was better played at the Symphony concert of a few weeks ago—but Richard Strauss' great "Don Juan" tone poem was another masterpiece of magnificently free and fiery reading, while the performance showed the orchestra at its highest pinnacle of technical accomplishment.

An audience large and fashionable attested its loyalty to the cause. A conspicuous figure was the French composer, D'Indy, who was a guest of Mrs. Rachard Hall. Noticeable in the throng were Mr. Henry L. Higginson, Mr. and Mrs. E. Preble Motley, Mrs. T. Adamowski, with party; Mme. Marius, with friend, and greeted on all sides, she having recently returned from Paris; Mr. and Mrs. Robert M. Morse, with party, from Jamaica Plain; Miss Marianna Guild, aunt of Governor-elect Curtis Guild, accompanied by her old friend, Mrs. Marsh; Jeannette Noyes Rice and Mr. Rice, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Richmond, Mr. Arthur Austin, Mrs. John C. Phillips, chaperoning a party of young ladies, including her daughter Martha; M. and Mme. Wagniere and friend, Mr. and Mrs. Oliver Crocker Stevens, Mr. George Robinson, Mr. and Mrs. Ernest Newton Bagg and daughter, Mr. Howell Hansell, the actor; Mrs. S. B. Field, Mr. Arthur Foote, Mr. and Mrs. T. Russell Sullivan, Mrs. E. H. Francis, Mr. and Mrs. E. V. R. Crosby, Mr and Mrs. Neal Rantoul, Miss Rosamond Saltonstall, Miss Ethel Forbes, Mrs. Charles Perkins, with party; Mr. C. A. Ellis, Mr. Louis Elson, Mrs. John Grey, the Misses Mason, Mr. and Mrs. P. A. Livermore and many more.

— 1205 —

Apr 1905

Herald Nov 26/05

VINCENT D'INDY.

PENSION FUND CONCERT.

The eighth concert for the benefit of the pension fund of the Boston Symphony orchestra will be given in Symphony Hall tonight at 8 o'clock. The purpose of this concert is to add to the fund for the purpose of providing for the members of the orchestra when age or sickness incapacitates them for active duty. All the members of the orchestra contribute to the fund in the shape of annual dues, but the money secured in this way is not sufficient for the purpose, and, rather than to make an appeal to the public which patronizes and is interested in the orchestra, the policy has been, since the movement started three years ago, to give special concerts and devote to the fund the gross proceeds from them.

It is a curious fact that Boston is a most difficult place to hear the orchestra for all that do not subscribe for the whole series of 24 public rehearsals or 24 concerts. Such is the esteem in which the orchestra is held that there are no seats for sale on Friday afternoons, and only a very limited number for Saturday evenings. Consequently, for the large public which does not feel able to subscribe for the series and is unable to take its chances in the "rush line" on Friday afternoon, the chance of hearing the orchestra in Boston is very small.

But on account of the pension fund, at least two concerts are given on each year on Sunday evenings, when most people are free. This gives an extra opportunity for non-subscribers to hear the splendid organization which has done so much to make Boston famous. Thus the concerts serve two admirable purposes. They contribute to a most worthy cause and at the same time bring to the public concerts which are within the reach of all.

The concert tonight has an added interest in that it is commemorative of the 25th season of the orchestra. And in honor of this event Mr. Georg Henschel, the first conductor, will conduct the first number, Beethoven's overture, the "Dedication of the House," which was the first number on the programme of the first concert in the old Music Hall on Oct. 22, 1881.

VINCENT D'INDY.

The Symphony concerts of Friday and Saturday will be extremely interesting. The chief interest lies in the presence of one of the most distinguished French composers, who has come by invitation to conduct the orchestra for these concerts and for the concerts which will be given on the regular monthly trip next week. Mr. d'Indy is one of the principal writers of what is known as the younger school of French composers; he is the head of the Schola Cantorum, which has made such serious inroads on the prestige of the Paris Conservatory; he is generally regarded as the most important leader of the modern world of music in Paris.

The invitation given to Mr. d'Indy is all the more noteworthy since it is the first time any composer or conductor has been asked to conduct the Symphony Orchestra at one of its regular concerts. The invitation was accepted and was accepted as a compliment to that most interesting movement in France which for the past 30 years has been seeking to divide the field of music in that country with the opera, which for the better part of the last century had the monopoly. Starting with César Franck it has been continued by his followers and pupils of whom d'Indy is the leader. Much of this music has been heard here at the Symphony concerts; in fact, in the programmes that Monsieur d'Indy has made which are devoted exclusively to this modern French music the number of novelties is very small. Mr. d'Indy himself has expressed surprise that these works are so well known in Boston, for while he keeps track generally of the musical situation in America he did not realize how completely the entire field of modern music has been covered.

Aside from the natural curiosity the public always has to see distinguished men, especially if he be a musician, these concerts will appeal most strongly to the large number of admirers of French music that the work of the Symphony orchestra has created in its seven years of the past few years. It is always interesting always to hear a composer interpret one of his own work. In such cases as that written by these "young" Frenchmen it is also interesting to have a reading of one who is thoroughly in touch and sympathy with them, to other words, a Frenchman. Mr. d'Indy has brought to America the reputation of being a most talented conductor. He conducts regular series of concerts in Holland, Germany and Belgium, wherever he has been heard.

LOCAL.

Concert of the Boston Symphony on Monday night will be of interest, for Mr. Raoul Pugno, assisted by with Mr. Hess Cesar Thomson for piano and violin. Mr. Pugno is not only an eminent virtuoso, he is a distinguished player of chamber music, as Bostonians already know.

167

TRANSCRIPT, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 25, 1905 [illegible]ING TRE

VINCENT D'INDY

THE FRENCH COMPOSER WHO IS VISITING BOSTON

His Origin and Training—A Survey of the Influences That Have Affected His Development as a Musician, and the Influences That He Himself Now Exerts on French Music—His Compositions, Their Chronology, and Some Comment Upon Them

BY EDWARD BURLINGAME HILL

The phrase, "French music," no longer calls up the names of Gounod, Bizet, Massenet and Saint-Saëns, as it once did. While Gounod and Bizet have their individual niches from which nothing can oust them, we admire Massenet chiefly for his graceful fertility in opera that is half French, half Italian, and we respect Saint-Saëns as the valiant architect of much music in a semi-classic style. It is the so-called younger school (which contains artists of maturity though their hearts and minds are young) that is maintaining France in the tide of musical progress, and it is through them that French music of today will pass down to history. In a somewhat heterogeneous group that contains Gabriel Fauré, Henri Duparc, Pierre de Breville, A. de Castillon, Charles Bordes, Gabriel Pierné, Guy Ropartz, Gustave Charpentier, Paul Dukas, Claude Debussy and others (one is tempted to include Ernest Chausson, who died in 1899), Vincent d'Indy is incontestably the leader among his contemporaries by virtue of the clear superiority of his traits, artistic, intellectual and human.

His preëminent qualifications for this position are, first, the intrinsic importance and inherent originality of his creative work; second, the actuteness of his æsthetic perceptions and his unusual gift for imparting his vast accumulation of technical and artistic skill; third, his zeal for maintaining the traditions of French music, and more specifically for furthering the ideals for which César Franck stood, his work as an editor and restorer and his services generally as propagandist.

Paul Marie Vincent d'Indy was born at Paris, March 27, 1852, of an aristocratic and wealthy family. D'Indy was brought up by his grandmother, Mme. Theodore d'Indy, who nurtured his growing fondness for music at classical sources only. When he was ten years old he began the study of the piano under the famous Conservatory teacher Louis Diémer, and harmony with Henri Lavignac, also a Conservatory teacher. Two later influences of significance were his acquaintance, in 1867, when he was fifteen, with Berlioz's remarkable and inspiring treatise on instrumentation, and, two years later, his initiation into the Wagnerian principles and practice of art under the guidance of Henri Duparc, himself a pupil of César Franck.

In spite of military service during the Franco-Prussian War, d'Indy found time to meditate an opera-text after Victor Hugo's "Les Burgraves." In 1872 (under the advice of Duparc) he became a pupil of César Franck, first at the Conservatory, later at his house, in his private class. D'Indy's apprenticeship to Franck was the most important [illegible] his student period. [illegible] stood technically [illegible] and the Schiller, for [illegible] and orchestra. In 1887 d'Indy became chorus-master of the Lamoureux concerts and prepared the choruses for a production of "Lohingrin." In 1888 the young composer went to the Wagner festival at Bayreuth. D'Indy was one of the founders, with Franck, Saint Saëns, Gabriel Fauré, De Castillon, Chausson and Duparc, of the National Society of Music, an important institution, and since César Franck's death he has been its president. In 1893, at Government request, he was ready to reorganize the Conservatory, but the project was defeated. Although offered a professorship at the Conservatory in 1895, he refused in order to be free. In the following year he utilized this freedom to establish a music school with Alexander Guilmant, the organist, and Charles Bordès, the conductor of the remarkable chorus, "The Singers of St. Gervais." This school, called the Schola Cantorum, embodies more fundamental principles of teaching and encourages more lofty standards of art.

In 1897 d'Indy's opera "Fervaal" was produced at the Théatre de la Monnaie in Brussels. Next year it was given at the Opéra Comique in Paris. In 1903 his opera "The Stranger" was given at Brussels, with subsequent performances in Paris. In the interval between these operas d'Indy produced some important orchestral works, such as his variations entitled "Istar," incidental music to Catulle Mendès's drama "Medée," from which an orchestral suite has been arranged. He also brought forward a masterly string quartet, his second. During the last few years a second symphony, and a sonata for piano and violin are the most noteworthy of his works. At present d'Indy's interests are divided between composition and his manifold interests at the Schola Cantorium, including his duties as director, as teacher of composition, and as organizer of concerts within the Schola and throughout France.

As a musician, d'Indy has gone through formative influences that were healthy and natural. On one side he has been deeply affected by the German composers Bach, Schumann, Wagner and Brahms; on the other, he has always remained faithful to César Franck and his essentially French methods of expression. As a consequence, d'Indy retains something of German seriousness of substance, while his manner of musical speech is unmistakably French. In the meantime d'Indy has developed a personal idiom of singular force, poetry and sense of beauty, in which scarcely any external sources can be traced. Undoubtedly d'Indy's most important works are his operas "Fervaal" and "The Stranger," for both of which he has written the text as well as the music. To these might be added the far-earlier, prize-winning song of the Bell," although it represents d'Indy at a much less advanced stage of development. "Fervaal" is obviously Wagnerian in inspiration; both the subject, the [illegible] scenes and characters remind one strangely of one or the other of Wagner's [illegible]. Still, in spite of this evident [illegible] Wagner, there is so [illegible] will combine in the holding of a [illegible] near future. [illegible] which Mr. H. A. Gilmore is [illegible] himself, after side of the new religion. One comes away from "Fervaal" elevated, exalted by the depth of sentiment and the purity of its ideals. From the strictly musical standpoint, "Fervaal" is not only full of a high order of beauty and dramatic expression, but its technical achievement is marvellous.

"The Stranger" is a drama of psychological development—the action is comparitively slight. The Stranger, a figure half realistic, half mythical, spends his life in serving others, only to suffer contempt and scorn. He loves Vita, a young girl of the fishing village where the scene is laid. She is betrothed, but comes to sympathize with the lonely, misunderstood Stranger; ultimately loves him, casts off her betrothed, and finally sacrifices herself with the Stranger in an effort to save a ship in distress. Both drama and music are absolutely devoid of any suggestion of Wagnerian influence. The music especially, from beginning to end, is in d'Indy's most individual style; it is distinguished by unusual directness and conciseness, by simplicity of means with which its dramatic efforts are attained. In this economy of resource and mastery of every shade of expression, "The Stranger" is unalterably French.

D'Indy's two symphonies (excluding an early symphony, "Jean Hunyade," op. 5, which the composer has dropped from the list of his works), one "On a Mountain Air," the other without superscription, are in direct accordance with his training and aspirations. They are the natural outcome of a pupil of César Franck, who is endeavoring to preserve the traditions passed on to him by his master. Nevertheless, in the first d'Indy combines two important predilections which deserve later mention, one, the use of folk songs as symphonic material, the other, artistic receptivity towards nature. The second symphony is the ripest expression of his individuality and exhibits not only an extraordinary command of technique, but many new harmonic combinations, expressive themes, variety and depth of sentiment. His other orchestral works, including a symphonic poem, "The Enchanted Forest," "Wallenstein," a trilogy of poems after Schiller's drama, the legend "Sange Fleurie," the variations "Istar," the suite "Medée" and the variations on a chorale for saxophone and orchestra show his gradual evolution as a master of musical style and a virtuoso in the use of the orchestra. D'Indy's chamber-music, of which the two string quartets, the trio for clarinet, 'cello and piano, the "Songs and Dances" for wind instruments and the sonata for piano and violin are the ripest examples, show consistent achievement in carrying on the Franckian tradition of chamber-music while giving free play to individuality. They are highly original in treatment of theme and form, and expressive of high idealistic beauty. Space will not permit mention of d'Indy's church music, cantatas, songs or piano music, but reference must be made to the recurrence in them of the trait before mentioned—impressionability to nature.

In one of his earliest orchestral works, "The Enchanted Forest," there is the mystery of deep woods, although the musical representation suggests occasionally the methods of Weber, or César Franck in the "Wild Huntsman." The early "Poem of the Mountains" and the "Pictures of Travel" for piano are tributes to this same sensibility. In the symphony "On a Mountain Air," the "out-door feeling" is even more clearly indicated. In "Fervaal," a Drumore clearly indicated. In "Fervaal," a Dru- [illegible] whose scene is laid in the [illegible] from the call of the Gaels prohibiting [illegible] the patriarch, a folksong as old as the rocks of Cravann, to the heroic ascension of the ideal (and real) mountain of Iserlich (the close of the opera), there is not an essential moment of dramatic action, no primal thread of the musical woof of Fervaal, which is not as thoroughly of the Cavenole earth, as the giant chestnut trees which plunge their roots into the soil."

"The Stranger" also, while less definitely of one region, has the indisputable feeling of the French coast and the restlessness of the sea. That this sensitiveness towards the moods of nature is inseparable from d'Indy's musical personality may still further be realized from the character of his latest composition for orchestra, "Summer Hours on the Mountain," in three movements. First, "Morning," a sunrise on distant glaciers; then "Afternoon under the Pines," in mingled sun and shadow, while the sounds of a fete rise spasmodically to the solitary dreamer; finally, "Evening," picturing a joyous return to shelter amidst the last rays of the setting sun, the slow nightfall and the return of the initial theme.

It is difficult to praise sufficiently the work of M. d'Indy as a teacher. The earnest and devoted pupil of César Franck, whom he admired and loved not only as a teacher, but for the purity and unselfishness of his character as a man, he has done everything within his power to spread Franck's musical gospel. He has written sympathetic and discriminating articles on César Franck, his works, teaching and character; he has promoted performances of his works, but perhaps the greatest tribute to his memory is the foundation of the Schola Cantorum. The purpose of the Schola is to present César Franck's principles in art, to perpetuate his theories, and to continue the spirit of his mission toward French music. It aims to cultivate its students in the highest sense, to arouse in them the moral purpose of art, not merely to provide them almost automatically with a superficial knowledge of technique and then cast them off.

This insistence on æsthetic development is the keynote of d'Indy's "Treatise on Composition," of which the first volume only has appeared. At the outset its definitions are not only novel but illuminating, and the thoroughness with which the more elementary topics of rhythm, the growth of harmony, and later the early forms of composition, such as the motet, are discussed show a teacher of superb intellectual equipment for his task, whose perception of artistic truth is of priceless import to the present generation. The whole tendency of this treatise is illustrative also of that of the Schola Cantorum, namely, to exert a wholesome counter influence on the materialistic turn of modern art, to cultivate a sense of proportion and a proper appreciation of the masterpieces of the past.

That d'Indy should also be a musical archæologist is only a natural sequence of the foundation of the Schola. He has prepared editions of Rameau, Destouches, and Salamon de Rossi. During the rehearsals of "The Stranger" at Brussels, he was working at a reconstruction of Montemountain air" is built up of ingenious transformations of one pastoral melody. There is also a fantasy for oboe and orchestra on popular themes.

In analyzing M. d'Indy's mental and intellectual traits, there is somewhat the same discrepancy to be explained as in connection with his musical development. Influenced at first by German musicians, he also seemed to feel an affinity for the German poets Goethe, Schiller and Uhland. Yet in his later compositions, their plan and technical handling, in their emotional contents, and above all in his practice of life he shows much more spiritual kinship with César Franck. In spite of his appreciation for German literature, he is inevitably and fundamentally French in his conception of the relation of art to life. His literary gifts are manifest in the lucidity of style and vividness of depiction in which he sets César Franck before us. His "Treatise on Composition' is masterly in clearness and force of exposition. The texts for "Fervaal" and "The Stranger" are imaginative, full of color and well adapted for musical setting.

D'Indy's great distinction, both as a musician and as a man, consists in his innate aristocracy—an aristocracy of mind, as well as of character. His marvellous perception on all problems relating to æsthetics, to matters of technique, his acute mental grasp of the entire history of art development (of literature, sculpture and painting, as well as of music), the power of his own instinct as a creative artist would lose an important element in their value were they not balanced by an equally unusual and penetrating love of humanity, an ardent desire to make his great treasury of knowledge accessible to others. D'Indy is firm in his belief that the composer's work is far from done when he completes his composition; he must also be the fervent apostle of musical truth as he sees it; he must labor unsparingly to help others to acquire the indispensable training in technique; he must sacrifice himself unceasingly in order that others may benefit by this lavish giving of himself. This broad conception of the moral obligation of the artist is one of d'Indy's dominant traits, one which is directly accountable for the commanding influences which he exerts upon French music of today.

To give an example of the personal eloquence with which he expresses himself on this phase of the artist's duty, a quotation from his "Treatise on Composition" is of singularly illustrative force. "'And now abideth with you Faith, Hope and Charity, these three; but the greatest of these is Charity.'" I. Corinthians, 13, 4. "Above all the artist must have Faith—faith in God, faith in Art; for it is Faith that incites one to learn, and by this knowledge to rise higher and higher on the Ladder of Being, towards its end, which is God. The artist must practise Hope; for he expects nothing from the present; he knows that his mission is to serve and to contribute by his works to the instruction and to the artistic life of those generations which come after him.

"The artist must be actuated by sublime charity, 'the greatest of these'; his purpose is to admire generously, for the one principle of all creation is great, divine and charitable love."

This extract, originally part of an address to the pupils of the Schola Cantorum, indicates the lofty attitude which d'Indy holds towards his art, an exalted standard which in its essence is truly religious, and as such cannot but elevate all those who come within its ardent influence. Indeed, the symphony of "The Stranger" seems so [illegible] their strong nationalistic traits make them a lasting ornament to French music. In symphonic and chamber music d'Indy has given us works of impeccable style, whose utterance is eloquent and poetic to a high degree. In a word, as a composer, he is the worthy exponent of French qualities, French intellect and French emotion at their noblest and greatest. Of his position as an educator in the loftiest sense of the word, of his great mission to continue the best traditions of French music from Rameau to César Franck by his efforts as a teacher (not forgetting his contributions as a composer to the cause), he is a unique figure not only in contemporary music but in well-nigh the whole range of musical history. In France his example is bearing and will continue to bear splendid fruit, and if by his visit to this country we can only absorb some of his lofty enthusiasm and generosity in the use of his great qualities, our musical life and all those who are striving toward its adequate upbuilding will be unspeakably his debtors.

In Pension Fund Concert

The first of this year's Pension Fund concerts by the Symphony Orchestra was given at Symphony Hall last evening before an audience that, while of goodly size, ought to have been larger. The object was praiseworthy and the concert itself one of the most powerful and fascinating of years. The men were in finest form, the program was one of great intensity, if little variety, and Mr. Gericke's reading of everything absolutely superb. Then, too, George Henschel, the first conductor of the band, was present and led the players in the first work ever given by the orchestra, Beethoven's "Dedication of the House" overture.

Mr. Henschel read the square-cut and dully formal old composition vigorously, but the breath of life has long since departed from it. The conductor was very warmly recalled and was presented with a great laurel wreath, in which the white ribbon and purple immortelles seemed to be, in part, a memorial of his lost wife. At any rate, he received the tribute with deep emotion.

Tschaikowsky immortal "Pathetique" symphony, with its wondrous call to all the deeper emotions of man, had a profoundly stirring and effective performance. Never has Mr. Gericke so brought out the passion and fire of the first movement, while at all points the reading was splendidly virile and the performance full of virtuosity. The "Tannhauser" Bacchanale has been better played—in fact, was better played at the Symphony concert of a few weeks ago—but Richard Strauss' great "Don Juan" tone poem was another masterpiece of magnificently free and fiery reading, while the performance showed the orchestra at its highest pinnacle of technical accomplishment.

An audience large and fashionable attested its loyalty to the cause. A conspicuous figure was the French composer, D'Indy, who was a guest of Mrs. Rachard Hall. Noticeable in the throng were Mr. Henry L. Higginson, Mr. and Mrs. E. Preble Motley, Mrs. T. Adamowski, with party; Mme. Marius, with friend, and greeted on all sides, she having recently returned from Paris; Mr. and Mrs. Robert M. Morse, with party, from Jamaica Plain; Miss Marianna Guild, aunt of Governor-elect Curtis Guild, accompanied by her old friend, Mrs. Marsh; Jeannette Noyes Rice and Mr. Rice, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Richmond, Mr. Arthur Austin, Mrs. John C. Phillips, chaperoning a party of young ladies, including her daughter Martha; M. and Mme. Wagniere and friend, Mr. and Mrs. Oliver Crocker Stevens, Mr. George Robinson, Mr. and Mrs. Ernest Newton Bagg and daughter, Mr. Howell Hansell, the actor; Mrs. S. B. Field, Mr. Arthur Foote, Mr. and Mrs. T. Russell Sullivan, Mrs. E. H. Francis, Mr. and Mrs. E. V. R. Crosby, Mr and Mrs. Neal Rantoul, Miss Rosamond Saltonstall, Miss Ethel Forbes, Mrs. Charles Perkins, with party; Mr. C. A. Ellis, Mr. Louis Elson, Mrs. John Grey, the Misses Mason, Mr. and Mrs. P. A. Livermore and many more.

— 1905 —

VINCENT D'INDY.

PENSION FUND CONCERT.

The eighth concert for the benefit of the pension fund of the Boston Symphony orchestra will be given in Symphony Hall tonight at 8 o'clock. The purpose of this concert is to add to the fund for the purpose of providing for the members of the orchestra when age or sickness incapacitates them for active duty. All the members of the orchestra contribute to the fund in the shape of annual dues, but the money secured in this way is not sufficient for the purpose, and, rather than to make an appeal to the public which patronizes and is interested in the orchestra, the policy has been, since the movement started, three years ago, to give special concerts and devote to the fund the gross proceeds from them.

It is a curious fact that Boston is a most difficult place to hear the orchestra for all that do not subscribe for the whole series of 24 public rehearsals or 24 concerts. Such is the esteem in which the orchestra is held that there are no seats for sale on Friday afternoons, and only a very limited number for Saturday evenings. Consequently, for the large public which does not feel able to subscribe for the series and is unable to take its chances in the "rush line" on Friday afternoon, the chance of hearing the orchestra in Boston is very small.

But on account of the pension fund, at least two concerts are given on each year on Sunday evenings, when most people are free. This gives an extra opportunity for non-subscribers to hear the splendid organization which has done so much to make Boston famous. Thus the concerts serve two admirable purposes. They contribute to a most worthy cause and at the same time bring to the public concerts which are within the reach of all.

The concert tonight has an added interest in that it is commemorative of the 25th season of the orchestra. And in honor of this event Mr. Georg Henschel, the first conductor, will conduct the first number, Beethoven's overture, the "Dedication of the House," which was the first number on the programme of the first concert in the old Music Hall on Oct. 22, 1881.

VINCENT D'INDY.

The Symphony concerts of Friday and Saturday will be extremely interesting. The chief interest lies in the presence of one of the most distinguished French composers, who has come by invitation to conduct the orchestra for these concerts and for the concerts which will be given on the regular monthly trip next week. Mr. d'Indy is one of the principal leaders of what is known as the younger school of French composers; he is the head of the Schola Cantorum, which has made such serious inroads on the prestige of the Paris Conservatory; he is generally regarded as the most important leader of the modern world of music in Paris.

The invitation given to Mr. d'Indy is all the more noteworthy since it is the first time any composer or conductor has been asked to conduct the Symphony Orchestra at one of its regular concerts. The invitation was intended and was accepted as a compliment to that most interesting movement in France which for the past 30 years has been seeking to divide the field of music in that country with the opera, which for the better part of the last century had the monopoly. Starting with Cesar Franck it has been continued by his followers and pupils of whom d'Indy is the leader. Much of this music has been heard here at the Symphony concerts; in fact, in the programmes that Monsieur d'Indy has made which of devoted exclusively to this modern French music the number of novelties is very small. Mr. d'Indy himself has expressed surprise that these works are so well known in Boston, for while he keeps track generally of the musical situation in America he did not realize how completely the entire field of modern music has been covered.

Aside from the natural curiosity the public always has to see [illegible] man, especially if he be [illegible] these concerts will appeal most strongly to the large number of admirers of French music that the work of the Symphony orchestra has created in Boston in the past few years. It is interesting always to hear a composer's interpretation of his own work. In such instances that written by these "young" men it is also interesting to have a reading of one who is thoroughly in touch and sympathy with them, in other words, a Frenchman. Mr. d'Indy has brought to America the reputation of being a most talented conductor. He conducts regular series of concerts in Paris and as a guest he has conducted in Belgium and Holland, Germany and Russia, and everywhere he has been very well received.

LOCAL.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony quartet on Monday night will be one of peculiar interest, for Mr. Raoul Pugno will play with Mr. Hess Cesar Franck's sonata for piano and violin. Mr. Pugno is not only an eminent virtuoso, he is a distinguished player of chamber music, as Bostonians already know.

VINCENT D'INDY

THE FRENCH COMPOSER WHO IS VISITING BOSTON

His Origin and Training—A Survey of the Influences That Have Affected His Development as a Musician, and the Influences That He Himself Now Exerts on French Music—His Compositions, Their Chronology, and Some Comment Upon Them

BY EDWARD BURLINGAME HILL

The phrase, "French music," no longer calls up the names of Gounod, Bizet, Massenet and Saint-Saëns, as it once did. While Gounod and Bizet have their individual niches from which nothing can oust them, we admire Massenet chiefly for his graceful fertility in opera that is half French, half Italian, and we respect Saint-Saëns as the valiant architect of much music in a semi-classic style. It is the so-called younger school (which contains artists of maturity though their hearts and minds are young) that is maintaining France in the tide of musical progress, and it is through them that French music of today will pass down to history. In a somewhat heterogeneous group that contains Gabriel Fauré, Henri Duparc, Pierre de Breville, A. de Castillon, Charles Bordes, Gabriel Pierné, Guy Ropartz, Gustave Charpentier, Paul Dukas, Claude Debussy and others (one is tempted to include Ernest Chausson, who died in 1899), Vincent d'Indy is incontestably the leader among his contemporaries by virtue of the clear superiority of his traits, artistic, intellectual and human.

His preëminent qualifications for this position are, first, the intrinsic importance [illegible] During the [illegible] phony, and a sonata for piano and violin are the most noteworthy of his works. At present d'Indy's interests are divided between composition and his manifold interests at the Schola Cantorium, including his duties as director, as teacher of composition, and as organizer of concerts within the Schola and throughout France.

As a musician, d'Indy has gone through formative influences that were healthy and natural. On one side he has been deeply affected by the German composers Bach, Schumann, Wagner and Brahms; on the other, he has always remained faithful to César Franck and his essentially French methods of expression. As a consequence, d'Indy retains something of German seriousness of substance, while his manner of musical speech is unmistakably French. In the meantime d'Indy has developed a personal idiom of singular force, poetry and sense of beauty, in which scarcely any external sources can be traced. Undoubtedly d'Indy's most important works are his operas "Fervaal" and "The Stranger," for both of which he has written the text as well as the music. To these might also be added the far-earlier, prize-winning "Song of the Bell," although it represents d'Indy at a much less advanced stage of development. "Fervaal" is obviously Wagnerian in inspiration; both the subject, individual scenes and characters remind one strangely of one or the other of Wagner's operas. Still, in spite of this evident patterning after Wagner, there is so much in the musical treatment of the subject that is strongly French in the clearness and logic of his harmony, in the lucidity with which the drama unfolds. Even the sound of the orchestra is so French in its finesse, its euphonious yet forceful instrumental combinations, that the Wagnerian sources become merely a side issue. In its essence "Fervaal" could have emanated only from a strong and fastidious personality like d'Indy's. It is a drama of great emotions, of vigorous action; a conflict between old and new religions, in which love arrays itself through tragedy on the side of the new religion. One comes away from "Fervaal" elevated, exalted by the depth of sentiment and the purity of its ideals. From the strictly musical standpoint, "Fervaal" is not only full of a high order of beauty and dramatic expression, but its technical achievement is marvellous.

"The Stranger" is a drama of psychological development—the action is comparatively slight. The Stranger, a figure half realistic, half mythical, spends his life in serving others, only to suffer contempt and scorn. He loves Vita, a young girl of the fishing village where the scene is laid. She is betrothed, but comes to sympathize with the lonely, misunderstood Stranger; ultimately loves him, casts off her betrothed, and finally sacrifices herself with the Stranger in an effort to save a ship in distress. Both drama and music are absolutely devoid of any suggestion of Wagnerian influence. The music especially, from beginning to end, is in d'Indy's most individual style; it is distinguished by unusual directness and conciseness, by simplicity of means with which its dramatic efforts are attained. In this economy of resource and mastery of every shade of expression, "The Stranger" is unalterably French.

D'Indy's two symphonies (excluding an early symphony, "Jean Hunyade," op. 5, which the composer has dropped from the list of his works), one "On a Mountain Air," the other without superscription, are in direct accordance with his training and aspirations. They are the natural outcome of a pupil of César Franck, who is endeavoring to preserve the traditions passed on to him by his master. Nevertheless, in the first d'Indy combines two important predilections which deserve later mention, one, the use of folk songs as symphonic material, the other, artistic receptivity towards nature. The second symphony is the ripest expression of his individuality and exhibits not only an extraordinary com[illegible] memory is the foundation of the Schola Cantorum. The purpose of the Schola is to present César Franck's principles in art, to perpetuate his theories, and to continue the spirit of his mission toward French music. It aims to cultivate its students in the highest sense, to arouse in them the moral purpose of art, not merely to provide them almost automatically with a superficial knowledge of technique and then cast them off.

This insistence on æsthetic development is the keynote of d'Indy's "Treatise on Composition," of which the first volume only has appeared. At the outset its definitions are not only novel but illuminating, and the thoroughness with which the more elementary topics of rhythm, the growth of harmony, and later the early forms of composition, such as the motet, are discussed show a teacher of superb intellectual equipment for his task, whose perception of artistic truth is of priceless import to the present generation. The whole tendency of this treatise is illustrative also of that of the Schola Cantorum, namely, to exert a wholesome counter influence on the materialistic turn of modern art, to cultivate a sense of proportion and a proper appreciation of the masterpieces of the past.

That d'Indy should also be a musical archæologist is only a natural sequence of the foundation of the Schola. He has prepared editions of Rameau, Destouches, and Salamon de Rossi. During the rehearsals of "The Stranger" at Brussels, he was working at a reconstruction of Monteverde's "Orfeo," which has since been given at the Schola Cantorum. He has also discovered much hitherto unknown Italian church-music dating from the fifteenth to the seventeenth centuries. He is also an admirer of folk-music, of which he has published two collections, one in collaboration with M. Julien Tiersot, the other ninety folk-songs of the Cevennais which he has harmonized. In confirmation of d'Indy's interest in folk-song it is only necessary to recall the admirable effect produced by folk-themes in "Fervaal" and "The Stranger." The symphony "On a mountain air" is built up of ingenious transformations of one pastoral melody. There is also a fantasy for oboe and orchestra on popular themes.

In analyzing M. d'Indy's mental and intellectual traits, there is somewhat the same discrepancy to be explained as in connection with his musical development. Influenced at first by German musicians, he also seemed to feel an affinity for the German poets Goethe, Schiller and Uhland. Yet in his later compositions, their plan and technical handling, in their emotional contents, and above all in his practice of life he shows much more spiritual kinship with César Franck. In spite of his appreciation for German literature, he is inevitably and fundamentally French in his conception of the relation of art to life. His literary gifts are manifest in the lucidity of style and vividness of depiction in which he sets César Franck before us. His "Treatise on Composition" is masterly in clearness and force of exposition. The texts for "Fervaal" and "The Stranger" are imaginative, full of color and well adapted for musical setting.

D'Indy's great distinction, both as a musician and as a man, consists in his innate aristocracy—an aristocracy of mind, as well as of character. His marvellous perception on all problems relating to æsthetics, to matters of technique, his acute mental grasp of the entire history of art development (of literature, sculpture and painting, as well as of music), the power of his own instinct as a creative artist would lose an important element in their value were they not balanced by an equally unusual and penetrating love of humanity, an ardent desire to make his great treasury of knowledge accessible to others. D'Indy is firm in his belief that the composer's work is far from done when he completes his composition; he must also be the fervent apostle of musical truth as he sees it; he must labor unsparingly to help others to acquire the indispensable training in technique; he must sacrifice himself unceasingly in order that others may benefit by this lavish giving of himself. This broad conception of the moral obligation of the artist is one of d'Indy's dominant traits, one which is directly accountable for the commanding influences which he exerts upon French music of today.

To give an example of the personal eloquence with which he expresses himself on this phase of the artist's duty, a quotation from his "Treatise on Compos[illegible]

"Just-the-Right-Size"

Not an over-priced, cumbrous road roller, that burns up money for tires and chauffeur hire.

"Just-the-Right-Size"

Not "too [illegible] space not ore
"Jarry."

"Just-the-R[illegible]

With its 10[illegible]
2000 lbs. w
motor.

BUICK CAR
4 CYLINDER

"Just-the-Right-Size"

Motor Car Company.

Autoists Come to Football Game
Boston's garage facilities are being tested to the limit of their capacity today by the run or a stopping-place for a longer trip. [illegible] desirable destination for a [illegible] been abandoned for the winter, although it is the idea of the board of directors [illegible] The plan of securing a summer house has

Boston Transcript
SATURDAY DECEMBER 2, 1905

IN THE WORLD OF MUSIC

D'INDY CONDUCTS AT THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

His Personality and His Methods—How Far Can He Make Music Intellectual Expression?—Concerts of Next Week and Weeks to Come—A Little Conversation with Mme. Eames—Musical Miscellany

The burst of applause when Mr. d'Indy came across the stage at the Symphony concert yesterday afternoon struck the note of novelty at the start. We take Mr. Gericke for granted, and unless we are in a particularly sympathetic mood, we no more think of applauding him from week to week than we should any other honored musical institution. For the first time in years another conductor—and he an eminent composer—was taking the orchestra at a regular concert and expectancy quivered in the air. There was the band, familiar of face and aspect, but it did not seem quite the same as usual. The most diligent reader of the programme book forgot, for once, to rustle its leaves. Everyone sat up, looked and listened, and Mr. d'Indy's second symphony, with which the programme began, is by no means easy listening. Perhaps, therefore, some of us looked the more. We saw a tall, squarely-built man, well settled in middle age, of self-possessed, unpretentious, dignified bearing. A gentleman clearly, and so many composers do not give precisely that impression. A fine head crowned the stalwart shoulders, distinctly the head of a man of mental force and weight. There were fortitude and resolution in the firm jaw and chin; a suggestion of contemplative abstraction in the eyes. A man of convictions, you were sure, ready to prove his faith, and steadfastly, by his works. It was not difficult to guess, if most of us had not known, Mr. d'Indy's fondness for a rather solitary life among the mountains of his Cévennes. Of the Paris that most of us know and of the French temperament, as most of us fancy it, there was not a hint in his outward aspect. He was more English in his self-contained dignity, more German in his suggestion of a mind quietly busy with itself and its work. He lacked mobile animation. He seemed even to want nervous vigor. Yet somehow you felt the intellectual strength of the man, and a high detachment in him from little, common, daily things. His appearance suggested his own music.

Mr. d'Indy's conducting was as quiet, as impersonal, as unmagnetic in the ordinary sense of a sorry word, as he is to see. He was all for the music in hand and for the band before him, and not for display of himself. There was no mere physical emphasis, no leaping to meet salient details, no ostentatious beckoning of instruments or groups of instruments. His right hand quietly guided his men, pointed a detail, or threw a summoning hint. His left suggested rhythms and contours. Now and then both lifted the band through a sharp transition. His own symphony he seemed to conduct least freely. His eyes followed the score closely. Had he been only a conductor, and not the composer, you would have said he might have been more familiar with it. Perhaps the very consciousness of his own music hampered him. He seemed a man that might honestly be so hindered. His older tone-poem, "Istar," he seemed to take much more spontaneously. But he was best as a conductor in music not his own.

In Franck's or Fauré's or Dukas's, that made the rest of his programme, two of his characteristic traits were clearest—his mastery of climax, especially of the ebb and flow, the advance and the recession of excited sound, that make our modern orchestral climaxes what they are; and his feeling for fine and undulating texture of tone. The listening ear seemed sometimes to touch rather than hear the music. Color there was, but more the conductor was seeking line and texture, now rich, thick and deep, now clear, firm and transparent. His proportioning was admirable. A large sense of design, as became a man of mental force, shaped it, adjusting details and transitions, yet keeping them incisive. At moments he showed something of Richard Strauss's keen understanding and personal sympathy, so to say, for groups of instruments. Now and then his conducting might have been more pliant. Once and again, especially with Fauré, it seemed to be trying to inflate the mood and contents of the music when the composer would keep them of a more subdued and smaller, but not less piercing, intensity. Always d'Indy worked his will with his men. Our orchestra was alert to meet him. Always, too, it seemed intellectual conducting. His mind apprehended the moods of the music more than the intangible thing called temperament felt them.

Mr. d'Indy is not sensuous. No more is he simple. No more is he impassioned, except with a thoughtful passion of the brain. And perhaps Milton's trite qualification of great poetry holds as truly of great music. To judge him by his second symphony, which made the first half of the concert yesterday, and by his tone-poem in the form of variations and a theme that followed, he is all for the development of music on its intellectual side. The romantic composers, from Weber and Schubert through Liszt and Wagner, have carried the emotional responsiveness and the emotional expressiveness of music far and high. We who follow them are spent with futile effort to carry these things further. It is time to pause, Mr. d'Indy seems to be saying in his compositions; to turn in a new direction; to develop the intellectual responsiveness and expressiveness of music. Here in a measure he is at one with Richard Strauss. There can hardly be more intellectual music than "Zarathustra," for example, and "Til Eulenspiegel," with all its humor and irony, is like to it. But Strauss is equally concerned with the pictorial and descriptive development of music. He must [illegible] mirror things alike the red ha[illegible] mills. Into that path Mr. d'Indy has not wandered. He is for the advance of music as the mirror of thought and ideas, their relation, contrast and contest. He is in no sense the mere maker of geometrical patterns in tones, like a certain sort of dry composers. But it is less emotion that gives his music life and meaning than the thought and the play of intellect behind.

Try to hear Mr. d'Indy's second symphony as a whole in spite of its complex and perplexing details. Listen to his intimate friend, Mr. Calvocoressi's, explanation of it: "The putting into play of two principal themes, which present themselves at the beginning side by side, follow each other, war against each other, or, on the contrary, are each developed separately, associate themselves with new ideas which complete or serve as commentary, and at the end of the work are blended in an immense triumphal chant." In spite of the "triumphal chant," all this is purely an intellectual process, and the struggle of the themes and all their offspring is purely a contest of musical thoughts. The symphony sounds like a sublimated mental exercise charged, so absorbing is it to the composer, with a sublimated mental passion.

Consider also the general design and structure of "Istar." Behind is the Babylonian legend—how Istar, the life-giving goddess, descended into the changeless land, where the dead abide, and whence there is no return; how at every gate the warder stripped her of some jewel or some veil, until at the last gate she stood forth in all the marvel and glory of her unclad beauty; and how to earth she bore back her lover, the Son of Life. The tale has moved d'Indy to a tone-poem, a theme and variations in reverse order. At seven gates was Istar stripped of garment or gem, and there are seven variations. Only at the end with the naked Istar does the theme come as nakedly forth. All this is delightfully ingenious in conception and execution. Call it imaginative even. But it is an intellectual ingenuity and imagination, a mental exercise in music dealing with sensuous things, but not dealing with them sensuously. In symphony and variations d'Indy is pure intellect applied to music and expressing itself in music. He apprehends the sensuous impressions of the legend of "Istar," and thoughtfully transmutes them into tones. He does not seem to feel them.

"The dramatic element is more and more introduced into absolute music," Mr. d'Indy wrote a few years ago, "in such a way that form is here, as a rule, absolutely submissive to the incidents of a veritable action." In the composer's own music that "action" seems purely an intellectual "action." Its "incidents" in the symphony are the association, the divergence, the contrast and contest, the relations and interplay generally of his warring themes. We all know how Wagner translates every "incident" in the "action" of his dramas into their music. That indeed is the intent and function of such music of the theatre. Mr. d'Indy would similarly translate every "incident" in this "action" within his brain, and every detail of the musical thoughts therein, into the absolute music of his symphony. Hence spring its bewildering complexity and intricacy. Yet it sounded clearer yesterday than it did last winter at a first hearing Heard often enough, it may be very clear indeed. After all d'Indy is French and therefore lucid. One does not usually understand Locke or Descartes at a single reading. No more in music does one grasp at a single hearing the intellectual and philosophic d'Indy. But he has also one form of the family trait of these younger French composers—their intense sensitiveness to impressions. (Recall Debussy's "Clouds" and "Fetes," for example). Only d'Indy's is a sensitiveness to mental rather than to purely sensuous images. Hence, again, come the piercing vividness of many details of the symphony. Perhaps, even, the succession of these intense impressions helps to give it a form of its own. Hence, too, is the inspiration of such vivid passages as that in "Istar" where the music seems to grow hollower and hollower as the last veil is stripped from the goddess and then swells and warms with the glow of her discovered beauty.

Again, to judge by the second symphony, this music of thought and intellect requires new means of expression. The romantics and their emotions have measurably exhausted the power of melody. New and strange harmonies shall better serve this new music. Dissonances shall point it. Rhythms, as strange and intricate as the harmonies, shall reveal and emphasize it. There shall be new and bizarre combinations of instruments for it. These instruments shall range often in their highest registers or be persistently muted. Instrumental transition and contrast shall be of the swiftest and sharpest. In the quest of new means of expression d'Indy has left Strauss well behind. A folk-tune in broad progressions now and then contents the German. If music can express pure intellectual "actions" and the "incidents" of thought, d'Indy is contriving the means to make it do so. With them, more than once yesterday, he gained his end, and was justified by it.

H. T. P.

SUNDAY HERALD
Published Every Day in the Year.
VOL. CXVIII., NO. 156.
SUNDAY, DEC. 3, 1905.

D'INDY AS GUEST LEADS SYMPHONY

First Instance in History of the Orchestra That Foreign Conductor Has Been so Invited.

MODERN FRENCH MUSIC COMPRISES PROGRAMME

Two of Visitor's Own Compositions Among Them—Conducts Quietly, but with Force.

The seventh concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra was given last night at Symphony Hall. The orchestra was conducted as at the public rehearsal on Friday afternoon by Mr. Vincent d'Indy of Paris, who made his first appearance in this country as a conductor. The programme was as follows:

Symphony in B-flat, No. 2.....D'Indy
"Pelleas and Melisande" suite.....Faure
"Istar," symphonic variations.....D'Indy
"Psyche and Cupid".....Franck
"The Sorcerer's Apprentice".....Dukas

For the first time in the history of this orchestra a foreign conductor was invited to lead it as a guest. The innovation was a tribute both to Mr. d'Indy, the composer, and to the younger school of French composers whom he so worthily represents. This school is "young" in the freshness and vigor and modernity of its musical views, opinions, tendencies, rather than in the respective ages of its most distinguished members. It is characterized by the purity and the nobility of its artisitic aims and purposes.

Mr. d'Indy, it should be understood, is not one of the tribe of virtuoso conductors, who go from European city to city, as in a triumphal car, who excite popular interest as that aroused by any bejewelled prima donna with warranted cascades of bravura, or by any tenor with a well authenticated high chest C. Trumpets proclaim their terrible approach; they rehearse hastily; in the concert they give an original and startling interpretation of a familiar symphony or symphonic poem; they then leave melodramatically, as though caught up in the whirlwind of applause.

Mr. d'Indy, who has the modesty and the simplicity of the truly distinguished, has conducted in the leading cities of various European countries for the chief purpose of acquainting audiences with the works of this younger French school, the ultra-modern, the hypo-modern school, call it what you will. To exclude rigorously any one of his own compositions would be false modesty, and it would be unfair to the school which he represents and of which he is the head. His own musical life is that of a composer and also that of a teacher, for he takes great pride in the Schola Cantorum, of which he was one of the founders. As an instructor or lecturer on composition he thus exerts an influence that cannot be estimated too highly. He thus hands down the sane and beneficent precepts of his master, Cesar Franck.

As an honored visitor in this city Mr. d'Indy finds many music lovers who have a deep interest in the works of the modern French school. Nor is this interest, this acquaintanceship, something sudden. Boston has always been willing to hear what composers of any nation had to say. Its German population is not so great that by showing a chauvinistic spirit it succeeded in Germanizing thoroughly and narrowly the musical taste. Nor did the Germans, who did the pioneer work here, and to whom we owe much, display an illiberal spirit. The "Waverly" overture, by Berlioz, who is still a modern among the moderns, was played here 54 years ago, and this great master was applauded in Boston long before the Berlioz cult was fashionable in Paris. The conductors who brought out these works were for the most part Germans, as were the members of the orchestras that played them.

Of late years Mr. Loeffler and after him Mr. Kneisel, Mr. Lang, local pianists and singers, Mr. Longy, Mr. Paur and above all Mr. Wilhelm Gericke have made us acquainted with compositions of this modern school. The programme of last night included only one piece that was not known to symphony audiences—the excerpt from Franck's "Psyche," and Mr. Gericke announced this symphonic poem at the beginning of the season. It may here be said that certain Parisian publishers prevent a still wider acquaintanceship with modern compositions. In cases where the orchestral parts are not published, these publishers are not inclined to let them out on hire, either through indifference or because they fear lest some advantage be taken of them when the work is not protected by a rigorous copyright.

The programme last night included compositions by acknowledged masters, Franck, D'Indy, Faure and by Dukas, a composer of indisputable skill and no little imagination, if he is to be judged fairly by his "Sorcerer's Apprentice." It was a pleasure to hear again the charming music that Faure wrote for Mrs. Patrick Campbell's production of Maeterlinck's tragedy, although the peculiar genius of Faure is revealed in his songs and chamber music more fully than in his incidental music to three or four plays. The excerpt from Franck's "Psyche" awakened a desire to hear the whole work. This movement portrays the bliss of the lovers, after the voices of the invisible ones in the garden of Cupid warn her against curiosity and before she is tempted, as was Elsa, to wreck her happiness. The music is both ecstatic and passionate, yet noble in its expression of a sensuousness which [illegible]

[illegible] blended of [illegible] are of near[illegible] yet [illegible] theme which [illegible] with full orchestra [illegible] end of the movement [illegible] is a [illegible] amorous chant of tr[illegible] ump[illegible]

Mr. d'Indy [illegible] from his own works the second symphony and his orchestral variations "Istar," which is practically a symphonic poem to illustrate the old Babylonian legend of Istar's descent to the land of No-Return, her adventures at the gates, at each of which some ornament or garment is taken from her, until, as she is about to enter the presence of the Queen, she stands revealed and unabashed in her dazzling udity. His choice was a wise one, for the Symphony on a Mountain Air, which has been performed here, will be played later in the season, as will, no doubt, the legend "Saugefleurl," which is on the programme of the concerts to be given on the trip of the orchestra with Mr. d'Indy this week. "Istar" has already been heard twice at these concerts, and then, as last night, it excited admiration by the display of the composer's technical skill, ingenuity and imagination, by the brilliance of the orchestration and by the majesty with which the full and complete theme is proclaimed when Istar stands at last before the warder in her glory.

The symphony perplexed even some of the composer's warmest admirers when Mr. Gericke performed it here with infinite care and almost personal affection early in last January. To them it seemed after one hearing chiefly a marvel of constructive skill. Here is music without any programme, without a suggestive title. Yet the symbolist may find this symphony a symbol as Sir Thomas Browne found quincunxes in the heavens, on the earth, in the waters, in the bowels of the earth, in the optic nerve of man, in everything. Two themes are presented at the beginning; they are developed separately or together throughout the work; they war against each other; themes of lesser importance are shed from them or are struck from them in the violence of the contest; at the end one of these two themes conquers and soars above the defeated and fettered rival. In this lies the dramatic action of the symphony. There is nothing that is purely narrative; there is nothing that is obviously pictorial.

Let it be said at once that this symphony is a work of uncommon strength and importance. It contains deep and impressive thoughts, pages of a beauty that is almost unearthly, passages that are intensely dramatic. The music is clothed in festal orchestral robes. On the other hand, the speech that conveys the thought is peculiarly idiomatic. It is as though Mr. d'Indy had fashioned it with the greatest care lest there should here and there be commonplaces that have not been despised even by the greatest masters. There is white heat in the passion; the average audience asks for red. There is no keener emotion than that which may be called cerebral; the average audience wishes to share in the emotion which is purely physical and often only epidermic.

Then there is the peculiar austerity which often distinguishes Mr. d'Indy's thought. The Herald has before this alluded to this loftiness of thought, which is as a high peak or the rarified air of the mountain chain that has been so dear to him since boyhood. It is not given to every one to breathe freely this air. There are some who would not fain climb, who prefer to dream idle dreams in lush vegetation far down in the valley.

Again, the boldness of many of Mr. d'Indy's harmonic progressions, the audacity of his dissonances and his rhythms shock ears that believe the sole mission of music to be this: To sooth the process of digestion or to encourage a gentlemanlike joy. What have such ears to do with the orgies of the muse? And at times Mr. d'Indy is a debauchee in his austerity.

It would seem as though in his righteous contempt for all that which makes for immediate and easy popularity, Mr. d'Indy has deliberately avoided anything that would at once win the favor of the average music lover, one that is sensitive to conventional and expected impressions. There are passages in this symphony that perplex the trained musician, one willing, eager to admire. We well remember when the prelude to "Lohengrin" was regarded in this country as dangerously radical music, when the prelude to "The Mastersingers" was even in Boston declared to be hideous cacophony, when Brahms and Tschaikowsky were looked at askew by learned professors and assiduous concertgoers. The time will undoubtedly come when the younger generation that heard Mr. d'Indy's symphony last night will smile as they remember vaguely that this music was at first a mystery to many in the audience. His idioms will then seem simple and inevitable; the logic of his musical thought will be considered perhaps too apparent.

Yet who that knows the purity of this composer's artistic life and is acquainted with his growth and development in the course of a long and honorable career would have him speak today a more vulgar language, the use of which would be hypocrisy? His is no ordinary appetite for fame. He may well say with Walter Savage Landor: "I shall dine late; but the dining room will be well lighted, the guests few and select."

We believe this symphony to be one of the most important works of modern times. We believe that it will constantly grow in beauty and power to the hearer that listens willingly and intelligently. We believe that certain passages which now seem cryptic or without definite purpose will in time be as significant as the first and second movements and the superbly broad and overpowering finale were last night.

Mr. d'Indy conducted quietly, but with force, and with the perfect understanding of what he wished to express. The magnificent orchestra seconded his wishes in every way as a tribute of respect and admiration. He was most warmly greeted, and applause was hearty and long continued after the various numbers of the programme.

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

D'Indy. Symphony in B flat major, No. 2, op. 57.
Faure. "Pelleas et Melisande," Suite from Stage music to Maeterlinck's Tragedy, op. 80.
D'Indy. "Istar," Symphony Variations, op. 42.
Franck. "Psyche and Cupid" excerpt from "Psyche," a Symphonic Poem.
(First time.)
Dukas. The Sorcerer's Apprentice.

M. Vincent D'Indy conducted the orchestra. It was certainly an event of much importance to hear a prominent composer conduct not only his own works, but a composition of his teacher, and other numbers representing his Parisian colleagues. There is always a lurking danger, on such an occasion, of the public mistaking the novel for the great, and imagining each new effect an artistic advance. We read, for example, in Mr. Gilman's article in "The Review of Reviews" that for D'Indy, Wagner was a mere "point of departure" in the matter of harmonic novelty or flexibility of form and also that—

"He goes even further beyond Wagner in such matters than Wagner went beyond Gluck, Weber, and his immediate forerunners. Compared with such a work as D'Indy's B-flat symphony, for example, Wagner's "Tristan," which a quarter of a century ago seemed to touch the furthest limits of musical radicalism, sounds as simple and comprehensible as a score by Mozart or Haydn would have sounded beside what was then Wagner's most adventurous achievement."

Mr. Philip Hale, speaking of the symphony, says:—

"It contains deep and impressive thoughts, pages of beauty that is almost unearthly, passages that are intensely dramatic. * * *

"We believe this symphony to be one of the most important works of modern times."

We cannot join this enthusiastic procession. We heard the work admirably performed by Mr. Gericke 11 mos. ago, and then found it replete with the most repellant ugliness. Since then we have studied its pages more closely and can do homage to the ingenuity of development and the subtleties of form which are to be discovered in its measures.

But it is all the profound skill of the mathematician. Wagner accused Berlioz of "ciphering with notes," but Berlioz's works are the acme of poetry when compared with the musical arithmetic here displayed.

Such music, properly studied, could at the best only produce a headache; it certainly could not soothe a heartache. The scoring is of course very advanced. Yet we believe that the works of Loeffler achieve greater results in this direction. The constant intermingling of opposing rhythms is another modern touch, yet none of the musical problem-makers has been as convincing as Tschaikowsky or Wagner in this matter.

There are certain formulas of ugliness which recur again and again in the symphony. The skip of an upward seventh, the use of the augmented fifth (both with and without the seventh), the passages of major seconds, do not lose their ugliness by repetition, but they cease to surprise. The work is as ascetic as the compositions of the time of "pure counterpoint," as the choruses of Dufay or Des Pres, but with a different kind of intellectuality.

The form becomes more clear with study. It is intricate yet not without symmetry and logic. The transference of figures from movement to movement is something we can find in Beethoven and Schumann in a simpler way, but distinctly better done in the C minor symphony of Brahms. There is some of the most profound figure treatment ever perpetrated, to be studied in this work. But at the end of it all one is left unsatisfied. One turns to music for something different from this artificial complexity.

Much better than this symphony was the set of symphonic variations called "Istar." The gradual despoiling of the Assyrian heroine, the taking away of her trombones, her chromatics, her diminished seventh chords, by 7 successive subterranean grafters, is quite a novel way of undressing a melody, but there is coherency in the plan and dignity in its treatment.

M. D'Indy is undoubtedly a composer of great possibilities. We believe him to be upon a wrong path. It is easy enough for his admirers to cry out—"All geniuses in music have been misunderstood at first,"—and quote the battles of Beethoven, Brahms, Wagner or Richard Strauss. But there is something to cite on the other side of musical history as well. Burney thought Philipp Em. Bach much greater than John Sebastian; Hummel was thought greater than Beethoven by his admirers; Kalkbrenner was deemed a greater pianist than Chopin for a little while; Schumann was deemed the inferior of Mendelssohn, and one might multiply cases of over, as well as of under-appreciation.

Faure's Suite was an unpretentious yet tender setting of the Maeterlinck subject. The second movement, "La Fileuse," in which Melisande is spinning in the dark room, with Pelleas beside her, while Yniold has his first presentiment of coming evil, as his mother sings him to sleep, was the most attractive. The first violins were very delicate in the spinning figure, and the oboe solo was beautiful in its pathos.

But the loftiest impression of the entire programme was made by Cesar Franck's "Psyche and Cupid." Here there was a surety of touch and beauty of treatment. If D'Indy only possessed more of the poetic inspiration which existed in his master he might be one of the foremost composers of the present time. The true union of emotion and intellect is always achieved in Franck's works.

Dukas' "Sorcerer's Apprentice" is as successful a bit of musical humor as Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel," and is more easy of comprehension than the German work. In the matter of orchestration we consider this to have been the best work of the concert. The sorcerer's apprentice has succeeded in turning a broomstick into a servant to carry water to the house, but forgets how to dissolve the spell. Rendered desperate by the threatened [illegible] he seizes the broomstick and [illegible] All in vain, for now there is [illegible] bringing water in dan[illegible] the master m[illegible] perfection. It was a fine opportunity fo[illegible] bassoon work, and these instrument[illegible] played excellently. The bass clarinet[illegible] had also an important part in the scor[illegible] and the canonic work where 2 broomstick[illegible] are working, instead of one, is a ver[illegible] effective touch. The work is written fo[illegible] the largest kind of orchestra, which [illegible] handled with excellent results.

Orchestra and audience were evidently most friendly to M. D'Indy. Applause a[illegible] the first appearance and after each numbe[illegible] proved the "entente cordiale," which wa[illegible] accentuated by a floral tribute with a tri[illegible] color attached.

We do not think that any stranger could take our orchestra and at once achieve Mr Gericke's results. We have had most o[illegible] the works of this programme at these concerts within a year, or 15 mos., and they have all received admirable performance. But M. D'Indy was a most intelligent leader, with a firm and unmistakable beat and, of course, he knew his scores thoroughly. Everyone appreciated the fact that an important visitor was among us, and that his direction of our orchestra was a memorable event. Louis C. Elson.

MUSICAL NOTES.

The Boston Post
The Representative Democratic Paper

VINCENT D'INDY DIRECTS SYMPHONY CONCERT

The seventh Symphony concert last evening was a memorable occasion, for it served to introduce Mr. Vincent D'Indy, the eminent French composer-conductor, who made his first appearance in the United States. The programme, exclusively French, two of the works being by Mr. D'Indy, was as follows:

Symphony No. 2, op. 57.....D'Indy
Suite, "Pelleas and Melisande".....Faure
Symphonic variations, "Istar".....D'Indy
Excerpt from "Psyche," symphonic poem..Franck
"The Sorcerer's Apprentice".....Dukas

There was no soloist, and none was needed, for Mr. D'Indy in the dual role of composer-conductor was a sufficient attraction in himself. Engaged especially for this concert, and also to direct the tour of the orchestra next week, his coming has been anticipated with great interest, for such an engagement for an outside attraction has not been known since the establishment of the orchestra.

It will not at this time be necessary to give mention of the career of Mr. D'Indy, but to briefly describe the first impressions of him as a conductor, and also the works performed.

Of these, only the excerpt from Cesar Franck's "Psyche" was new to this city, the others having had at least one performance at these concerts under Mr. Gericke. The incidental music set by Faure to Maeterlinck's "Pelleas and Melisande" is pleasing in every way, and the excerpt by Cesar Franck, while not perhaps among this composer's best thoughts, is nevertheless full of originality and power. The work of Paul Dukas is not of much interest.

Mr. D'Indy's symphony on a second hearing does not impress under the composer's direction any more than it did under the baton of Mr. Gericke, although the reading of the composer may have been more authoritative. The work is highly erudite, ingenious in every way, and is an effective illustration of what can be done with the whole tone scale, so much in vogue by French and some other composers. It has an interest to the trained musician, but the average listener, while hearing the symphony with respect, will still enjoy Beethoven, Schubert and even Tschaikowsky with infinitely greater relish.

The symphonic poem "Istar," although of a rhapsodical nature, is more grateful to the ear and is more of an inspiration. Mr. D'Indy as a conductor is quiet and unassuming in manner and with a thorough knowledge of the various works; his interpretation was convincing, if at times lacking in the fiery temperamental qualities that one associates with French musicians.

What Mr. D'Indy would accomplish in a whole season, directing the performances of works of many schools, is a matter of conjecture. But he is evidently more a composer than a conductor.

Mr. D'Indy received a great ovation, and after the performance of his symphony he was presented with an immense wreath decorated with the tri-color. There will be no rehearsal and concert the coming week.

Boston Sunday Globe.
SUNDAY, DEC 3. 1905.

MUSICAL MATTERS

D'Indy Leads Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Famous Composer Conducts Performance of Own Works.

Emma Eames Concert—Other Coming Events.

Vincent d'Indy, composer and pupil of Cesar Franck, who came to this country at the invitation of the Boston Symphony management, led his own symphony in B flat major (opus 57) last night and Friday afternoon, the program containing also his symphonic variations on "Istar," and music by his contemporaries, Dukas, Faure, and his teacher Franck. The result was a concert intensely moving and interesting, but one in which the modernity of the music made wall-paper designs instead of paintings for the general public. M d'Indy came to the platform quietly, and was received with the gentle hail of tapping bows on violin-backs, and a rapturous, but not overloud handclapping from the audience. He is a well-built Frenchman, perhaps 50 years old, with a fine head, a noble forehead, high, round and fronting a capacious skull; eyes hidden entirely in the shadow of a brow that forms a heavy ledge, barely curved at its outer ends and a straight line across, a rather heavy nose, and the mouth of a man able to persuade himself of the truth of that which is not so.

At the conductor's desk he is graceful, most polite, and more suggesting to the players by pantomime the tempo, the character of attack, the climaxes of the music, than commanding these things from the musicians. His hand was always in advance of the baton's tip, his beat always thus a staccato, and his reading shaded by measures, taking cognizance of the tiniest details of his tone-pictures.

The symphony was composed in 1903-1904, and was played in Boston by the symphony orchestra last January. It is "without a program of any sort," its themes mere cell-forms of the simplest sort, combined ingeniously, but having no story to tell that is intelligible except to the advanced student of music. It is the calculus of musical mathematics. The Faure number was a suite from the stage music to Maeterlinck's tragedy of "Pelleas and Melisande," the three movements including a noble prelude to the play, an entr'acte called "La Fileuse," and a third movement associated with the tragic final act.

"Psyche and Eros," an excerpt from Franck's symphony "Psyche," was played for the first time in Boston. To hear it provoked the thought that after all, those other fellows could get as monotonous with their six-hole scale as the older bores with the diatonic, or somebody else with the Chinese, doubtless. Its sweetness wrings the heart, its very simplicity is a charm greater than all the tangles of the ultra-modern school

The concert ended happily with the scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," the story of the fellow who set the broomstick a-carrying water, but lost the combination and couldn't shut off the flow. It tickled Goethe, and his ballad inspired Dukas to a most vivid musical description of the clown monkeying with the powers of darkness, and finding in comic dismay and terror that they had the best of him. Wherever Saint-Saens got his "danse macabre" effects, Dukas was not far away. He robbed the same shop for some of his weird rhythms and imitative clomps and bumps in "L'Apprenti Sorcier."

The orchestra will be away this week on its second trip. Mr Alfred Reisenauer, pianist, will play Weber's "Concertstuck" at the concerts Dec 15 and 16.

RECORD
PHILA., PA
DEC 3- 1905

THE WORLD OF MUSIC

Boston Symphony Orchestra to Play Modern French Music.

VINCENT D'INDY TO CONDUCT

The Leader of the New Gallic School Founded by Cesar Franck. Works by Chausson, Debussy and D'Indy Himself.

The Academy of Music will at tomorrow evening's Boston Symphony concert be graced by the presence of one of the most potent factors in the development of twentieth century music with which America has as yet come directly in contact. Vincent D'Indy, who will direct the Boston players in place of Wilhelm Gericke, belongs to the newest and one of the most vital of musical schools. He is at once an ardent admirer of Cesar Franck, that great Belgian mystic who stemmed the tide of frivolity on the one hand and ornate operatic pageantry on the other in French music, and the apostle of such poets as Paul Verlaine, Charles Baudelaire, Stephen Mallaune and our own Edgar Allan Poe. There are curious influences to play upon the artistic conscience of a man of genius, and such Vincent D'Indy assuredly is. The result has been vastly interesting. Some people, even those who can tolerate Strauss (in moderation), pronounce D'Indy exceedingly mystifying. On the other hand, his supporters are highly enthusiastic and constantly growing in numbers. Beyond question the influence that the D'Indy school is bound to have upon modern music cannot be overestimated.

In France the new cult, as has been said, began with Cesar Franck, but who, nevertheless, might not be wholly in sympathy with the Verlaine-like qualities of his successors. It was about a score of years ago that the great Gallic musical reaction began. At that time nearly all the music written in France was for the theatre. This was due not only to the fact that French genius tends naturally to the stage, but also to the encouragement given by the two subsidized opera houses which made it generally worth the while of French composers to work only in opera. In the later sixties and early seventies Cesar Franck gathered about himself a group of young, ardent, enthusiastic musicians, who drew their inspiration from his genius and from his courageous efforts to restore absolute music to its proper place in France. These younger men continued the work begun by him, with the result that some of the most brilliant compositions for the orchestra and for the smaller combinations of instruments that have been written in modern times may be credited to France, and few orchestras think that the work of the season is complete without having some of this new music on its program.

Among the young men who were in the Franck group was Vincent d'Indy. The son of wealthy and noble parents, intended originally for the law, he had finally responded to the imperative call of music and was brought under the influence of Franck, shortly after the Franco-Prussian war. His career has been one long courageous struggle against hostile influences for the sake of pure art. While he has written two operas that met with considerable success his chief fame rests upon his works for the orchestra. Only less than this is his fame as a teacher and conductor. By his talent, his energy and his persistence he has won for himself the position of undisputed leader in the French musical world and therefore he brings to America an authority which no other Frenchman could. The pupil of France, the colleague of such men as Faure, Chausson, Bruneau and the patron of such younger men as Debussy, Magnard and Roparts, for whom he performed for the first time many of their works, Monsieur d'Indy is a most interesting personality.

It is Monsieur d'Indy's first visit to America and he has been looking forward to the Philadelphia concert with much eagerness, for here he will give for the first time in America a most interesting work by the lamented Ernest Chausson, a symphony in b-flat. The other works will comprise a movement from Franck's "Psyche," two Nocturnes by Debussy, Magnard's "Chant Funebre," and his own "Istar" symphonic variations. There will be no soloist and the programme in full will be as follows:

Symphonie (in B flat), Op. 20....Ernest Chausson
I.—Lent. Allegro vivo.
II.—Tres lent.
III.—Anime.

Psyche et Eros, extrait de Psyche.....Cesar Franck
Poeme symphonique .....Claude Debussy
Nocturnes .....
I.—Nuages.
II.—Fetes.
Chant funebre .....Alberic Magnard
Istar, variations symphoniques...Vincent d'Indy

VINCENT D'INDY.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
PHILA., PA
DEC 3- 1905

The second of the series of five concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music to-morrow evening at 8.15 o'clock. In several respects this will be the most interesting concert that Philadelphia has had in many years. Like the last concert, which was devoted to Wagner, there will be also this time a special program, but very different, as it will comprise exclusively the works of modern French composers and the conductor will be Monsieur Vincent d'Indy, who has come to this country by special invitation to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a series of its concerts.

One of the most interesting features in the development of modern music in France has been the revival of music for the orchestra and for the chamber. After the death of Berlioz and up to practically twenty years ago, nearly all the music written in France was for the theater. This was due not only to the fact that French genius tends naturally to the stage, but also to the encouragement given by the two subsidized opera houses, which made it generally worth the while of French composers to work only in opera. The man who signalled the revolt against this state of affairs was Cesar Franck. Among the young men who were in the Franck group was Vincent d'Indy. The son of wealthy and noble parents, intended originally for law, he had finally responded to the imperative call of music and was brought under the influence of Franck shortly after the Franco-Prussian war. His career has been one long courageous struggle against hostile influences for the sake of pure art. While he has written two operas that met with considerable success, his chief fame rests upon his works for the orchestra.

It is Monsieur d'Indy's first visit to America, and he has been looking forward to the Philadelphia concert with much eagerness, for here he will give for the first time in America a most interesting work, by the lamented Ernest Chausson, a symphony in B-flat. The other works will compromise a movement from Franck's "Psyche," two Nocturnes by Debussy, Magnard's "Chant Funebre" and his own "Istar" symphonic variations.

* * *

M. d'Indy is now visiting this country on the invitation of Mr. Higginson, the generous patron of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and will conduct that great organization in its monthly concert at the Academy of Music tomorrow evening in a programme entirely representative of the recent development of orchestral music in France. It opens with the unpublished symphony in B flat, by Ernest Chausson, a highly talented pupil of Cesar Franck, whose career was prematurely cut short by a bicycle accident a few years ago. This work, which is regarded in France as of great importance, will be played for the first time in America from the manuscript score which M. d'Indy has brought with him. It will be followed by a movement, "Psyche et Eros," from Franck's symphonic poem, "Psyche"; two nocturnes by Debussy, called "Nuages" and "Fetes," and a "Chant Funebre," by Alberic Magnard, which also is new here. The final number is M. d'Indy's own "Istar," a curious series of symphonic variations illustrating the Babylonian legend of the woman who goes to seek her lover in the Dread Abode, successively dropping her garments as she passes through the seven doors. It is an exceedingly characteristic and interesting programme, and Vincent d'Indy's distinction as a composer and his reputation as a conductor and a teacher add extraordinary importance to this unusual concert.

BULLETIN
PHILA., PA
NOV 18 1905

Probably the most distinguished person in the musical world who will visit America this season is Vincent d'Indy, the French composer and conductor. M. d'Indy will be in America about three weeks, during which time he will be fully occupied with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which he will direct in eight of its concerts. He will make his American debut in Boston December 1 and 2, and on Monday evening, the 4th will replace Mr. Gericke as conductor of the orchestra's second concert in the Academy of Music in this city. D'Indy, who was born in Paris March 27, 1852, comes of an aristocratic and wealthy family. He was intended for the law, but the making of a great musician was in him, and after serving as a volunteer in the Franco-Prussian War, he dropped the law business, and, against the will of his family, started upon his musical career. Today he stands among the leaders of his profession—first as composer, then as teacher and then as conductor. He has composed two operas which have been produced, "Fervaal" and "The Stranger;" two symphonies and many smaller works, such as sonatas, suites, quartets, waltzes, songs, etc. He has also written an elaborate treatise on musical composition, the first part of which has been published, and has collaborated with Tiersot in editions of folk songs of certain French provinces. The coming of such a prominent personage is sure to be one of the notable events of the present musical season.

NORTH AMERICAN.
PHILA., PA
NOV 26 1905

Vincent D'Indy is Coming.

Monsieur Vincent d'Indy, the distinguished French composer and conductor, who reached America last Tuesday from Paris, has begun his rehearsals with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston preparatory to conducting that organization in a series of concerts in modern French music. The first of these concerts outside of Boston is to be given in Philadelphia on Monday evening, December 4. There will be no soloists, but the programme is none the less interesting.

Philadelphia is to be the first city in America to hear what is heralded as one of the most important musical works that France has produced in the last half century, the symphony in B flat, by Ernest Chausson. This symphony has never been printed, and it will be played from a manuscript score, which Monsieur d'Indy brought with him from Paris. The other works on the programme are a movement from Franck's "Psyche," two nocturnes by Debussy; the "Chant Funebre," by Alberic Magnard, and Monsieur d'Indy's own "Istar" variations. The Magnard number is new to Philadelphia concert-goers.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
LEDGER
PHILA., PA
DEC 3- 1905

RECORD
PHILA., PA
NOV 26 1905

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Vincent D'Indy to Lead German Men Here Next Week.

AN ERNEST CHAUSSON WORK

Long-Sought Orchestral Novelty. Famous French Composer on the Future of Symphonic Music. Tone Versus Melody.

Monsieur Vincent d'Indy, the distinguished French composer and conductor, who reached America last Tuesday from Paris, has begun his rehearsals with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston, preparatory to conducting that organization in a series of concerts in modern French music. The first of these concerts outside of Boston will be given in Philadelphia on Monday evening, December 4. Following the best usage of Paris, there will be no soloists, but the program is most interesting and is expected to attract widespread attention.

Philadelphia is to have the good fortune to be the first city in America to hear one of the most important works that France has produced in the last half-century the symphony in B-flat by Ernest Chausson. All conductors in America have tried from time to time to get hold of this work for performance, but none have succeeded. The symphony has never been printed and it will be played from a manuscript score which Monsieur d'Indy brought with him from Paris. The other works in the program are a movement from Franck's "Psyche," two Nocturnes by Debussy, the "Chant funebre" by Alberic Magnard and Monsieur d'Indy's own "Istar" variations. The Magnard number is also new to Philadelphia.

Curiously enough M. d'Indy crossed the ocean on the same steamer with Engelbert Humperdinck, who came to witness yesterday afternoon's performance of "Haensel and Gretel" at the Metropolitan Opera House. The German composer was indisposed, however, all the way over with a serious cold, so the two musicians did not fraternize. Arrived in New York Herr Humperdinck went directly to his hotel, but M. d'Indy graciously permitted himself to be interviewed upon the modern musical drift. "There are three elements in music," he said, "melody, harmony and rhythm. The resources of melody and harmony I believe to be well-nigh exhausted, so eccentricities of rhythm will probably be the next element of music to be experimented upon."

To the question why America and England had produced no great composers, though both countries had given birth to such commanding geniuses in other departments of creative art, he answered: "I have only the explanation that music is the last of the arts to be developed in a national art life. The national art life of England and of America is younger than that of France or Italy, consequently their music is to come, and assuredly it will come."

om TELEGRAPH.
dress PHILA., PA
NOV 25 1905

The concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on December 4, promises to be an intensely interesting one, for it will be a revelation of the modern French school of music. The admitted leader of that school, Vincent d'Indy, will conduct the orchestra. Following the best usage of Paris, there will be no soloist, the concert being an orchestral one, and this, as we have often said in these columns, is just as it should be. The programme will introduce one of the latest and most important works of the French school of composition. It will be the symphony in B flat by Ernest Chausson, which will be played from manuscript, as it is not yet published.

The other works in the programme are a movement from Franck's "Psyche," two nocturnes by Debussy, the "Chant Funebre," by Alberic Magnard, and Monsieur d'Indy's own "Istar" variations. The Magnard number is also new to Philadelphia.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
NEWS
NEW Y.
DEC 3- 1905

Mr. Vincent d'Indy made his American debut in Boston last week directing the two concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday and Saturday.

Mr. d'Indy is one of the most important of the French composers of the day. He has been brought to this country this season to direct eight of the Boston Symphony concerts, and while he is conducting, no soloists will appear.

He will conduct the orchestra on its regular trip which includes appearances in Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington, Brooklyn and New York.

NORTH AMERICAN.
DEC 3- 1905

Composer d'Indy is Coming.

Vincent d'Indy, a distinguished French composer, is to conduct the Boston Orchestra to-morrow evening at the Academy of Music in a programme of modern music of the French school, including a new symphony by Ernest Chausson—its first performance in America, by the way. The works of Debussy, who really is first among modern French composers, are represented on the programme, as well as Bruneau and others not so well known here.

Following is the programme arranged by M. d'Indy:

Symphonie (in B flat), op. 20—Ernest Chausson
I.—Lent. Allegro vivo.
II.—Tres lent.
III.—Anime.

Psyche et Eros, extrait de Psyche.....Cesar Franck
Poeme symphonique .....Claude Debussy
Nocturnes .....
I.—Nuages.
II.—Fetes.
Chant funebre .....Alberic Magnard
Istar, variations symphoniques...Vincent d'Indy

The Magnard "Funeral Dirge" is a novelty here, as also is the music from Cesar Franck's "Psyche."

During fifteen years past but four composers of high international repute have visited America—Tschaikowsky, Dvorak, Richard Strauss and now d'Indy. The [illegible] composer comes as a missionary [illegible] of modern music of the [illegible] school [illegible]

INQUIRER.
PHILA., PA
DEC 3- 1905

Vincent D'Indy With the Boston

The second of the series of five concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music to-morrow evening at 8.15 o'clock. Like the last concert, which was devoted to Wagner, there will be also this time a special program, but very different, as it will be given up entirely to the works of modern French composers and the conductor will be Monsieur Vincent d'Indy, who has come to this country by special invitation to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a series of its concerts.

This is Monsieur d'Indy's first visit to America, and he has been looking forward to the Philadelphia concert with much eagerness, for here he will give for the first time in America a most interesting work by the lamented Ernest Chausson, a symphony in B flat. The other works will comprise a movement from Franck's "Psyche," two Nocturnes by Debussy, Magnard's "Chant funebre" and his own "Istar" symphonic variations.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
BULLETIN
PHILA., PA
DEC 2- 1905

Vincent d'Indy, who will conduct the second of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's series of five concerts at the Academy of Music next Monday evening, is one of the most notable figures in the musical world to-day. The son of wealthy and noble parents, and intended originally for the law, d'Indy finally responded to the imperative call of music and was brought under the influence of Franck shortly after the Franco-Russian war. His career has been one of long courageous struggle against hostile influences for the sake of pure art. While he has been a teacher and conductor, and as the composer of two operas that have met with considerable success, his chief fame rests upon his works for the orchestra. Monsieur d'Indy's first visit to America and next Monday evening he will give for the first time in this country an interesting work by Ernest Chausson, the symphony in B-flat. The other works will comprise a movement from Franck's "Psyche," two Nocturnes by Debussy, Magnard's "Chant Funebre" and his own "Istar" symphonic

RECORD
PHILA., PA.

THE WORLD OF MUSIC

Boston Symphony Orchestra to Play Modern French Music.

VINCENT D'INDY TO CONDUCT

The Leader of the New Gallic School Founded by Cesar Franck. Works by Chausson, Debussy and D'Indy Himself.

The Academy of Music will at to-morrow evening's Boston Symphony concert be graced by the presence of one of the most potent factors in the development of twentieth century music with which America has as yet come directly in contact. Vincent D'Indy, who will direct the Boston players in place of Wilhelm Gericke, belongs to the newest and one of the most vital of musical schools. He is at once an ardent admirer of Cesar Franck, that great Belgian mystic who stemmed the tide of frivolity on the one hand and ornate operatic pageantry on the other in French music, and the apostle of such poets as Paul Verlaine, Charles Baudelaire, Stephen Mallaune and our own Edgar Allan Poe. There are curious influences to play upon the artistic conscience of a man of genius, and such Vincent D'Indy assuredly is. The result has been vastly interesting. Some people, even those who can tolerate Strauss (in moderation), pronounce D'Indy exceedingly mystifying. On the other hand, his supporters are highly enthusiastic and constantly growing in numbers. Beyond question the influence that the D'Indy school is bound to have upon modern music cannot be overestimated.

In France the new cult, as has been said, began with Cesar Franck, but who, nevertheless, might not be wholly in sympathy with the Verlaine-like qualities of his successors. It was about a score of years ago that the great Gallic musical reaction began. At that time nearly all the music written in France was for the theatre. This was due not only to the fact that French genius tends naturally to the stage, but also to the encouragement given by the two subsidized opera houses which made it generally worth the while of French composers to work only in opera. In the later sixties and early seventies Cesar Franck gathered about himself a group of young, ardent, enthusiastic musicians, who drew their inspiration from his genius and from his courageous efforts to restore absolute music to its proper place in France. These younger men continued the work begun by him, with the result that some of the most brilliant compositions for the orchestra and for the smaller combinations of instruments that have been written in modern times may be credited to France, and few orchestras think that the work of the season is complete without having some of this new music on its program.

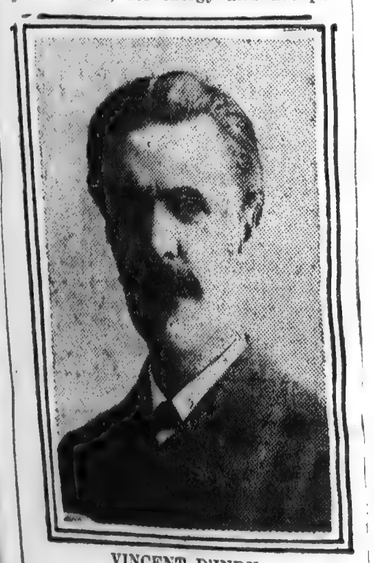
Among the young men who were in the Franck group was Vincent d'Indy. The son of wealthy and noble parents, intended originally for the law, he had finally responded to the imperative call of music and was brought under the influence of Franck, shortly after the Franco-Prussian war. His career has been one long courageous struggle against hostile influences for the sake of pure art. While he has written two operas that met with considerable success his chief fame rests upon his works for the orchestra. Only less than this is his fame as a teacher and conductor. By his talent, his energy and his persistence he has won for himself the position of undisputed leader in the French musical world and therefore he brings to America an authority which no other Frenchman could. The pupil of France, the colleague of such men as Faure, Chausson, Bruneau and the patron of such younger men as Debussy, Magnard and Ropartz, for whom he performed for the first time many of their works, Monsieur d'Indy is a most interesting personality.

It is Monsieur d'Indy's first visit to America and he has been looking forward to the Philadelphia concert with much eagerness, for here he will give for the first time in America a most interesting work by the lamented Ernest Chausson, a symphony in b-flat. The other works will comprise a movement from Franck's "Psyche," two Nocturnes by Debussy, Magnard's "Chant funebre" and his own "Istar" symphonic variations. There will be no soloist. The program in full will be as follows:

Symphonie (in B-flat), Op. 20...Ernest Chausson
I. Lent. Allegro vivo.
II. Tres lent.
III. Anime.
Psyche et Eros, extrait de Psyche.
Poeme symphonique.....César Franck
Nocturnes.....Claude Debussy
I. Nuages.
II. Fetes.
Chant funebre.....Alberic Magnard
Istar, variations symphoniques...Vincent d'Indy

The Magnard "Funeral Dirge" is a novelty here, as also is the music from Cesar Franck's "Psyche."

During fifteen years past but four composers of high international repute have visited America—Tschaikowsky, Dvorak, Richard Strauss and now d'Indy. The French composer comes as a missionary in the interest of modern music of the later Parisian school, to the promotion of which in America his visit will be exclusively devoted.



VINCENT D'INDY.

Established and Leading Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
PRESS
PHILA., PA.

The second of the series of five concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music to-morrow evening at 8.15 o'clock. In several respects this will be the most interesting concert that Philadelphia has had in many years. Like the last concert, which was devoted to Wagner, there will be also this time a special program, but very different, as it will comprise exclusively the works of modern French composers and the conductor will be Monsieur Vincent d'Indy, who has come to this country by special invitation to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a series of its concerts.

One of the most interesting features in the development of modern music in France has been the revival of music for the orchestra and for the chamber. After the death of Berlioz and up to practically twenty years ago, nearly all the music written in France was for the theater. This was due not only to the fact that French genius tends naturally to the stage, but also to the encouragement given by the two subsidized opera houses, which made it generally worth the while of French composers to work only in opera. The man who signalled the revolt against this state of affairs was Cesar Franck. Among the young men who were in the Franck group was Vincent d'Indy. The son of wealthy and noble parents, intended originally for law, he had finally responded to the imperative call of music and was brought under the influence of Franck shortly after the Franco-Prussian war. His career has been one long courageous struggle against hostile influences for the sake of pure art. While he has written two operas that met with considerable success, his chief fame rests upon his works for the orchestra.

It is Monsieur d'Indy's first visit to America, and he has been looking forward to the Philadelphia concert with much eagerness, for here he will give for the first time in America a most interesting work, by the lamented Ernest Chausson, a symphony in B-flat. The other works will compromise a movement from Franck's "Psyche," two Nocturnes by Debussy, Magnard's "Chant Funebre" and his own "Istar" symphonic variations.

* * *

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
LEDGER
PHILA., PA.

* * *

M. d'Indy is now visiting this country on the invitation of Mr. Higginson, the generous patron of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and will conduct that great organization in its monthly concert at the Academy of Music tomorrow evening in a programme entirely representative of the recent development of orchestral music in France. It opens with the unpublished symphony in B flat, by Ernest Chausson, a highly talented pupil of Cesar Franck, whose career was prematurely cut short by a bicycle accident a few years ago. This work, which is regarded in France as of great importance, will be played for the first time in America from the manuscript score which M. d'Indy has brought with him. It will be followed by a movement, "Psyche et Eros," from Franck's symphonic poem, "Psyche"; two nocturnes by Debussy, called "Nuages" and "Fetes," and a "Chant Funebre," by Alberic Magnard, which also is new here. The final number is M. d'Indy's own "Istar," a curious series of symphonic variations illustrating the Babylonian legend of the woman who goes to seek her lover in the Dread Abode, successively dropping her garments as she passes through the seven doors. It is an exceedingly characteristic and interesting programme, and Vincent d'Indy's distinction as a composer and his reputation as a conductor and a teacher add extraordinary importance to this unusual concert.

PUBLIC LEDGER

Composer d'Indy is Coming.

Vincent d'Indy, a distinguished French composer, is to conduct the Boston Orchestra to-morrow evening at the Academy of Music in a programme of modern music of the French school, including a new symphony by Ernest Chausson—its first performance in America, by the way. The works of Debussy, who really is first among modern French composers, are represented on the programme, as well as Bruneau and others not so well known here.

Following is the programme arranged by M. d'Indy:

Symphonie (in B flat), op. 20—Ernest Chausson
I.—Lent. Allegro vive.
II.—Tres lent.
III.—Anime.
Psyche et Eros, extrait de Psyche.
Poeme symphonique.....Cesar Franck
Nocturnes.....Claude Debussy
I.—Nuages.
II.—Fetes.
Chant funebre.....Alberic Magnard
Istar, variations symphoniques...Vincent d'Indy

The Magnard "Funeral Dirge" is a novelty here, as also is the music from Cesar Franck's "Psyche."

During fifteen years past but four composers of high international repute have visited America—Tschaikowsky, Dvorak, Richard Strauss and now d'Indy. The French composer comes as a missionary in the interest of modern music of the later Parisian school, to the promotion of which in America his visit will be exclusively devoted.

BULLETIN
PHILA., PA.

Probably the most distinguished person in the musical world who will visit America this season is Vincent d'Indy, the French composer and conductor. M. d'Indy will be in America about three weeks, during which time he will be fully occupied with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which he will direct in eight of its concerts. He will make his American debut in Boston December 1 and 2, and on Monday evening, the 4th will replace Mr. Gericke as conductor of the orchestra's second concert in the Academy of Music in this city. D'Indy, who was born in Paris March 27, 1852, comes of an aristocratic and wealthy family. He was intended for the law, but the making of a great musician was in him, and after serving as a volunteer in the Franco-Prussian War, he dropped the law business, and, against the will of his family, started upon his musical career. Today he stands among the leaders of his profession—first as composer, then as teacher and then as conductor. He has composed two operas which have been produced, "Fervaal" and "The Stranger;" two symphonies and many smaller works, such as sonatas, suites, quartets, waltzes, songs, etc. He has also written an elaborate treatise on musical composition, the first part of which has been published, and has collaborated with Tiersot in editions of folk songs of certain French provinces. The coming of such a prominent personage is sure to be one of the notable events of the present musical season.

—o—

PHILA., PA.

Italian music.

Vincent D'Indy is Coming.

Monsieur Vincent d'Indy, the distinguished French composer and conductor, who reached America last Tuesday from Paris, has begun his rehearsals with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston preparatory to conducting that organization in a series of concerts in modern French music. The first of these concerts outside of Boston is to be given in Philadelphia on Monday evening, December 4. There will be no soloists, but the programme is none the less interesting.

Philadelphia is to be the first city in America to hear what is heralded as one of the most important musical works that France has produced in the last half century, the symphony in B flat, by Ernest Chausson. This symphony has never been printed, and it will be played from a manuscript score, which Monsieur d'Indy brought with him from Paris. The other works on the programme are a movement from Franck's "Psyche," two nocturnes by Debussy; the "Chant Funebre," by Alberic Magnard, and Monsieur d'Indy's own "Istar" variations. The Magnard number is new to Philadelphia concert-goers.

—

om.....

dress.....

The concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on December 4, promises to be an intensely interesting one, for it will be a revelation of the modern French school of music. The admitted leader of that school, Vincent d'Indy, will conduct the orchestra. Following the best usage of Paris, there will be no soloist, the concert being an orchestral one, and this, as we have often said in these columns, is just as it should be. The programme will introduce one of the latest and most important works of the French school of composition. It will be the symphony in B flat by Ernest Chausson, which will be played from manuscript, as it is not yet published.

The other works in the programme are a movement from Franck's "Psyche," two nocturnes by Debussy, the "Chant Funebre," by Alberic Magnard, and Monsieur d'Indy's own "Istar" variations. The Magnard number is also new to Philadelphia.

ENQUIRER

Vincent D'Indy With the Boston

The second of the series of five concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music to-morrow evening at 8.15 o'clock. Like the last concert, which was devoted to Wagner, there will be also this time a special program, but very different, as it will be given up entirely to the works of modern French composers and the conductor will be Monsieur Vincent d'Indy, who has come to this country by special invitation to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a series of its concerts.

This is Monsieur d'Indy's first visit to America and he has been looking forward to the Philadelphia concert with much eagerness, for here he will give for the first time in America a most interesting work by the lamented Ernest Chausson, a symphony in B flat. The other works will comprise a movement from Franck's "Psyche," two Nocturnes by Debussy, Magnard's "Chant funebre" and his own "Istar" symphonic variations.

RECORD
PHILA., PA.
NOV 26 1905

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Vincent D'Indy to Lead Gericke's Men Here Next Week.

AN ERNEST CHAUSSON WORK

Long-Sought Orchestral Novelty. Famous French Composer on the Future of Symphonic Music. Tone Versus Melody.

Monsieur Vincent d'Indy, the distinguished French composer and conductor, who reached America last Tuesday from Paris, has begun his rehearsals with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston, preparatory to conducting that organization in a series of concerts in modern French music. The first of these concerts outside of Boston will be given in Philadelphia on Monday evening, December 4. Following the best usage of Paris, there will be no soloist, but the program is most interesting and is expected to attract widespread attention.

Philadelphia is to have the good fortune to be the first city in America to hear one of the most important works that France has produced in the last half-century the symphony in B-flat by Ernest Chausson. All conductors in America have tried from time to time to get hold of this work for performance, but none have succeeded. The symphony has never been printed and it will be played from a manuscript score which Monsieur d'Indy brought with him from Paris. The other works in the program are a movement from Franck's "Psyche," two Nocturnes by Debussy, the "Chant funebre" by Alberic Magnard and Monsieur d'Indy's own "Istar" variations. The Magnard number is also new to Philadelphia.

Curiously enough M. d'Indy crossed the ocean on the same steamer with Engelbert Hunperdinck, who came to witness yesterday afternoon's performance of "Haensel and Gretel" at the Metropolitan Opera House. The German composer was indisposed, however, all the way over with a serious cold, so the two musicians did not fraternize. Arrived in New York Herr Humperdinck went directly to his hotel, but M. d'Indy graciously permitted himself to be interviewed upon the modern musical drift. "There are three elements in music," he said, "melody, harmony and rhythm. The resources of melody and harmony I believe to be well-nigh exhausted, so eccentricities of rhythm will probably be the next element of music to be experimented upon."

To the question why America and England had produced no great composers, though both countries had given birth to such commanding geniuses in other departments of creative art, he answered: "I have only the explanation that music is the last of the arts to be developed in a national art life. The national art life of England and of America is younger than that of France or Italy, consequently their music is to come, and assuredly it will come."

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

ss.....

Mr. Vincent d'Indy made his American debut in Boston last week directing the two concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday and Saturday.

Mr. d'Indy is one of the most important of the French composers of the day. He has been brought to this country this season to direct eight of the Boston Symphony concerts, and while he is conducting, no soloists will appear.

He will conduct the orchestra on its regular trip which includes appearances in Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington, Brooklyn and New York.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

—o—

Vincent d'Indy, who will conduct the second of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's series of five concerts at the Academy of Music next Monday evening, is one of the most notable figures in the musical world to-day. The son of wealthy and noble parents, and intended originally for the law, d'Indy finally responded to the imperative call of music and was brought under the influence of Franck shortly after the Franco-Russian war. His career has been one of long, courageous struggle against hostile influences for the sake of pure art. While noted as teacher and conductor, and as the composer of two operas that have met with considerable success, his chief fame rests upon his works for the orchestra. This is Monsieur d'Indy's first visit to America, and next Monday evening he will give for the first time in this country an interesting work by Ernest Chausson, a symphony in B-flat. The other works will comprise a movement from Franck's "Psyche," two Nocturnes by Debussy, Magnard's "Chant Funebre," and d'Indy's own "Istar" symphonic variations.

[110]

ECTION ORCHESTRA

PROGRAMME OF THE MOST MODERN FRENCH MUSIC

The Distinguished Composer Presents the Works of His Countrymen in the Academy of Music

Vincent d'Indy, leader and exponent of school of modern French composers, ...ually recognized as the followers of ... Franck, conducted the Boston Sym... Orchestra in its monthly concert at ... Academy of Music last evening in this ...characteristic programme:

...symphonie, en bemol, Op. 20—Ernest Chausson
1. Lent. Allegro vive.
2. Tres lent.
3. Anime.
...sche et Eros," extrait de "Psyche," poeme ...phonie .....Cesar Franck
...rnes .....Claude Debussy
1. Nuages.
2. Fetes.
...t funebre.....Alberic Magnard
..., variations symphoniques..Vincent d'Indy

Mr. Gericke has played a great deal of this recent French music, and M. d'Indy himself is especially well known in Philadelphia by his great symphony, as interpreted here by Mr. Scheel. He has come to this country on the invitation of Mr. Higginson on purpose to present the work of his countrymen and associates, through the unexcelled medium of the Boston Orchestra. He conducted the house concerts on last Friday and Saturday, when he gave his own symphony. Last night's programme was prepared for the orchestra's monthly visit to other cities, and the Chausson symphony was played for the first time in America. To speak frankly, it was the least interesting feature of the programme.

Conductor Makes Good Impression.

M. d'Indy himself made an agreeable impression on his entrance, which deepened as the concert went on. He is a tall, well-built man, of quiet and dignified demeanor, without self-assertion, but carrying the conviction of knowledge and certainty. He might be called an intellectual rather than an emotional conductor. He is thoughtful, well-balanced, distinct, carrying his purpose clearly and moving surely to his climaxes with a kind of dispassionate understanding that inspires confidence rather than enthusiasm. But the audience liked him and grew warmer in its recognition as his quiet mastery was better understood. The splendid orchestra responded instantly to his every intimation. And it must have been a pleasure to him to play upon so fine an instrument. The symphony was probably less carefully prepared than the other numbers, but in these there could be no doubt of the full expression of the musical intent.

The difficulty about such a programme is that the music has all very much the same value and sounds very much alike. One who came in late at night might not immediately recognize what point of the programme had been reached. Chausson is especially "alike." He was one of the young Frenchmen of a few years back who were entirely "Wagnerized," and his symphony, with all its French precision and delicately tasteful ornamentation, is too reminiscent of Wagner to be taken as seriously as it seems to have been taken in Paris. Nikisch played it there, and one could not help thinking that a more temperamental conductor might have read more into it. It has the effect of atmosphere that all these composers give, but it suggests ideas that are never quite formulated, and with all its changes of moods it remains melancholy.

Franck Number Well Received.

With Cesar Franck we come to a larger musical personality. The extract from the "Psyche," a noble poem of love, was profoundly significant and beautiful, and it was played with a large grasp and a splendid richness. The two little tone-pictures by Dubussy, one suggesting a winter landscape and the other some kind of military festival, were also charming. The "chant funebre" by Magnard, a son of the late editor of Figaro and a pupil of d'Indy, had beginning but no end, and scarcely justified the space it occupied.

But M. d'Indy's "Istar"—a descriptive and suggestive tone-poem, in which the variations precede the clear emergence of the fundamental theme—closed the programme with a display of symphonic invention and of glittering brilliancy and boldness of orchestration that would suffice to justify the conductor's reputation. Any one of these compositions would have made a great impression alone; but the family likeness among them obscured the individuality, so that music which is in itself very intense in its effects left a general impression of monotony. It was, nevertheless, a privilege to hear it under conditions that carried complete authority.

...DECEMBER 5, 19...

...NDY AT THE ACADEMY

Vincent D'Indy Conducts the Second Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The distinctive feature of the second concert for the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which took place at the Academy of Music last evening, was the first public appearance in this city of Mr. Vincent D'Indy, the distinguished French composer, who directed the performance of a program consisting exclusively of music of the modern French school and including nothing which possessed the recommendation of being familiar.

There was a symphony in B-flat by Chausson, which had not previously been given in this country; an extract from a symphonic poem by Cesar Franck on the subject of "Psyche and Eros;" two nocturnes by Claude Debussy; a funeral chant by Alberic Magnard, and a set of symphonic variations by Mr. D'Indy himself. Perhaps not many in the audience would care for that kind of thing as a steady diet, but by way of variety it was worth while. It included many points of interest and value, and it was edifying and illuminative as illustrating and interpreting a musical movement of which in this country we have little knowledge and less hearing. Probably most of those who heard it received the impression that it would not be amiss to diversify the current programs with more frequent selections from the same source.

There is about the same kind of difference between the symphonic music whose composers were to the front last night, and the works of the German masters with which we are best acquainted as there is between the water color and the painting in oil, and an impressionist water color must be understood at that. There is some body and substance in the symphony of Chausson, which does not essentially diverge from the classic models. It is really a beautiful though not an extraordinary production, poetic in its inspiration, sincere in its sentiment, ingenious in its developments and appealingly melodious in its expression. The score of it is singularly rich in ideas, which are evolved and exhibited with a curiously felicitous effectiveness, and although the tenuity of its texture is extreme, the whole thing is vital, animated, spontaneous and artistically intelligible. It generally charms if it does not always convince, and it may fairly be assumed that it would be found more agreeably effective upon a second hearing.

VINCENT D'INDY,

But it is music which communicates a strange sense of sublimated unreality and unearthliness, and this remark applies with even greater force to the other numbers on the program. The nocturnes of Dubussy are as ethereal and evanescent as the poetry of Shelley. It would not be true to say of them that they are without form and void, but they are as nebulous and elusive as the clouds which one of them reflected. They are exquisite after their manner, while they last, but somehow or other they leave the musical appetite unsatisfied. It is as though one were to undertake to make a dinner on a dish of whipped cream.

It is unnecessary to say more than a word of Mr. D'Indy. He did not display any exceptional abilities as a conductor, and while the orchestra played with consummate elegance and brilliancy, it would doubtless have done as well, or better, had Mr. Gericke been in command.

The [illegible] Press.

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 5, 1905.

D'INDY AND THE FRENCH

The Works of the Moderns Heard at the Academy of Music.

It is said that an endeavor to understand the intimate jokes of another nation is the greatest strain that an effort at cosmopolitanism puts on one. This is also true of an effort to be appreciative of the idiomatic musical extravaganzas of a school foreign to one's usual musical experiences. Music, it is true, speaks a universal language; but at the same time there are always certain racial groups, who, like the Laputans in "Gulliver's Travels," prefer to be unobvious for the sake of it. So last evening, at the Academy of Music, that familiar and ever-welcome virtuoso organization, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, went through its paces under the guidance of the baton of Vincent D'Indy, of Paris, one of the ultra-modern French composers specially brought over for a brief season with the orchestra, in a program that ran the whole gamut of French eccentricity and musical pose, as follows:—

...Claude Debussy
...Alberic Magnard
...Vincent d'Indy

The Chausson symphony no doubt strikes Parisians who are just now getting acquainted with their later Liszt-Wagner, and who have never taken Berlioz very seriously, as very wonderful, but to ears accustomed to the music of all the moderns the work sounded a trifle thin and very reflective. It was a sort of faded, pallid Wagner, the "human, active joy" of the first movement as well as the "grief" of the second, which is a sort of French adagietta, not getting you very far into the heights or the depths, while the last movement, "animated," seemed a rarefied version of the Valkyries with the redoubtable visitants not particularly heavily sandaled or possessed of horses of fire and fury.

And so with the other numbers. Whether one floated in the clouds of Debussy, said to be "gray agonies tinted with white," or took Cesar Franck's very frank Psyche by the hand or wept with Magnard or listened to D'Indy's very new music set to a very old Babylonian myth, the meaning of which scholars are still fighting about in that delicious way that archaeologists have, it was all pretty much the same. The music is too much pose and the affectations of genius annoy. Though it must be said that Monsieur D'Indy, who very modestly put his own work last, came out quite on top indeed, for in the string and horn effects and other striking bits in his variations, whatever merit the new touches of color that the new school stands for, was fully set forth and very effectively. Moreover, D'Indy proved a scholarly conductor contained and with no predilection for violence in contrast, aiming at getting at the heart of the work interpreted.

Naturally the interpretation by the orchestra was superb, for D'Indy never had such a body of men before him in all his experience, and in consequence he was supported in all his efforts, never strenuous, to reveal the school of which he is so prominent a member. But sometimes revelation is not always happy; it may be a two-edged sword which cuts both ways.

...wspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

PRESS

DEC 5 - 1905

D'INDY AND THE FRENCH

The Works of the Moderns Heard at the Academy of Music.

It is said that an endeavor to understand the intimate jokes of another nation is the greatest strain that an effort at cosmopolitanism puts on one. This is also true of an effort to be appreciative of the idiomatic musical extravaganzas of a school foreign to one's usual musical experiences. Music, it is true, speaks a universal language; but at the same time there are always certain racial groups, who, like the Laputans in "Gulliver's Travels," prefer to be unobvious for the sake of it. So last evening, at the Academy of Music, that familiar and ever-welcome virtuoso organization, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, went through its paces under the guidance of the baton of Vincent D'Indy, of Paris, one of the ultra-modern French composers specially brought over for a brief season with the orchestra, in a program that ran the whole gamut of French eccentricity and musical pose, as follows:—

Symphonie (in B flat), Op. 20 ..Ernest Chausson
"Psyche et Eros," extrait de "Psyche," Poeme symphonique .....Cesar Franck
Nocturnes .....Claude Debussy
I. Nuages.
II. Fetes.
Chant funebre .....Alberic Magnard
"Istar" (Variations symphoniques) .....Vincent d'Indy

The Chausson symphony no doubt strikes Parisians who are just now getting acquainted with their later Liszt-Wagner, and who have never taken Berlioz very seriously, as very wonderful, but to ears accustomed to the music of all the moderns the work sounded a trifle thin and very reflective. It was a sort of faded, pallid Wagner, the "human, active joy" of the first movement as well as the "grief" of the second, which is a sort of French adagietta, not getting you very far into the heights or the depths, while the last movement, "animated," seemed a rarefied version of the Valkyries with the redoubtable visitants not particularly heavily sandaled or possessed of horses of fire and fury.

And so with the other numbers. Whether one floated in the clouds of Debussy, said to be "gray agonies tinted with white," or took Cesar Franck's very frank Psyche by the hand or wept with Magnard or listened to D'Indy's very new music set to a very old Babylonian myth, the meaning of which scholars are still fighting about in that delicious way that archaeologists have, it was all pretty much the same. The music is too much pose and the affectations of genius annoy. Though it must be said that Monsieur D'Indy, who very modestly put his own work last, came out quite on top indeed, for in the string and horn effects and other striking bits in his variations, whatever merit the new touches of color that the new school stands for, was fully set forth and very effectively. Moreover, D'Indy proved a scholarly conductor contained and with no predilection for violence in contrast, aiming at getting at the heart of the work interpreted.

Naturally the interpretation by the orchestra was superb, for D'Indy never had such a body of men before him in all his experience, and in consequence he was supported in all his efforts, never strenuous, to reveal the school of which he is so prominent a member. But sometimes revelation is not always happy; it may be a two-edged sword which cuts both ways.

...wspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

BULLETIN

PHILA. PA.

DEC 5- 1905

VINCENT D'INDY

The Distinguished French Composer Conducts the Boston Orchestra.

The second of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's series of five Monday night concerts in the Academy of Music last evening was made an occasion of especial note and interest by the appearance of the French composer, Vincent d'Indy, who conducted the orchestra in a notable program, concluding with one of his own compositions.

D'Indy's fame rests more upon the music he has written and his success as a teacher than upon his accomplishments as an orchestral leader. He is a sedate, unassuming man of fifty-three years, tall, well-built, with a good head of hair worn medium long, and a mustache. He has no eccentricities of manner, and in appearance suggests the practical business man more than the great musician. In conducting, his gestures are free, easy and rather graceful, never extravagant or meaningless, though he does not show much personal magnetism, and his movements seem to follow the music rather than to act as any great aid or inspiration to the musicians.

The program last night was one of novelties, the selections being all new here, or comparatively so. The first was a symphony by Ernest Chausson (B-flat, op. 20), which was played for the first time in this country. This is a noble composition, almost wholly sombre in tone. If it shows no great flashes of inspiration and falls short of the standard of the great symphonies, its simplicity is to be commended, its melancholy is appealing, and there are many evidences of genius in its working out. It proved a composition well worth hearing, musicianly, if not profound, and of sufficient charm to emphasize the sadness of Chausson's untimely death by accident at the early age of forty-four.

"Psyche and Eros," from Cesar Franck's symphonic poem, "Psyche," was the second number, and the beautiful tone-poem gave the orchestra an opportunity to do some of its finest work. This was followed by two "Nocturnes," by Claude Debussy. The first, "Nuages," is a peculiar conception, a dreary monotone of mournful melody, subdued throughout, with a melancholy, weird sound, like the moaning of deep waters. It was wonderfully played, with impressive effect. The second movement, "Fetes," was in vivid contrast, and was one of the bright spots of a program that was, as a whole, almost too solemn. In it is a dance-theme measure, gypsy-like in movement, which was quite entrancing. The composition shows Debussy's originality and tendency toward the unusual and bizarre, and there was revealed much beauty and poetic value, thanks largely to the exquisite rendition. There was also the "Chant Funebre" of Alberic Magnard, a dirge which added to the solemnity of the program. Its principal note was one of monotony, and the work as a whole was the least interesting of the evening. It might well have given place to something of a more exhilarating nature, that the concert might not have been so much of one color.

D'Indy placed his own composition last. The number was his "Istar," variations symphoniques, founded on a famous Babylonian poem, describing the descent to the "land of the No-Return" of Istar, daughter of Sin. D'Indy shows in this work poetic imagination and descriptive power, his music being graphic and colorful. It might be said that he had been influenced by Richard Strauss, were it not just as fair to say that Strauss might have been influenced by him. At any rate, there is a bond of sympathy and a similarity of method between the two composers. The Frenchman may not use his instruments so freely nor with quite so much spectacular showiness, but he is akin to Strauss in some respects. His coloring is more subdued, perhaps, but it is often vivid and striking in effect. "Istar" is a composition of rare beauty, of marked mysticism, quite worthy the fame of its composer.

...Cutting Bureau in the World

TELEGRAPH

om.....

ldress.....

PHILA. PA.
DEC 5- 1905

ate.....

D'Indy and the Boston Orchestra.

If the programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening was intended, as generally supposed, to illustrate the character and tendencies of modern French music, the new departures in that country are diametrically opposite to all ideals we have heretofore entertained. Instead of that blithe spirit, gay and debonair, we have held to be "the light and life of laughing France," we are instructed that the modern movement is toward the dark shades where melancholy and woe hold undisputed sway. The concert, on the whole, produced the most lugubrious impression, only emphasized by an occasional suggestion of cheering fantasies. The symphony in B flat, by Ernest Chausson has for its main theme, that of the second movement, a song of grief which might serve as a score for the Lamentations of Jeremiah. In somewhat lighter vein, but still sufficiently sober, is the sad story of "Psyche," interpreted by Cesar Franck. Next is a nocturne entitled "Clouds," followed by a contrasting number, "The Fete," both by Claude Debussy. Then comes a "Funeral Chant," mournful, of course, by Alberic Magnard. The final number, by Vincent D'Indy, is based on a "Babylonian Poem" descriptive of Istar's descent through the seven gates of Hades to the land of no return.

This is a matter of more than passing moment, from a musical point of view, as M. D'Indy is the successor of Caesar Franck as the recognized leader of the modern school. He conducted the orchestra himself throughout, and no doubt arranged the programme to afford a fair illustration of the ideas and methods of the living composers of his country. This illustration indicates that the moderns are given over to morbid sentimentalism. Like Zola and Daudet in literature, they descend into the depths of the abnormal and find their inspiration in themes of tribulation. Remarkably ingenious, they elaborate their conceptions through the most intricate modulations with clarity of expression only attained by masters of composition, but only to plunge further downward away from all that [illegible] the joy of life. In [illegible] they fairly abun-

DECEMBER 5, 1905

VINCENT D'INDY LEADS BOSTON ORCHESTRA

A PROGRAMME OF THE MOST MODERN FRENCH MUSIC

The Distinguished Composer Presents the Works of His Countrymen in the Academy of Music

Vincent d'Indy, leader and exponent of the school of modern French composers, generally recognized as the followers of Cesar Franck, conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its monthly concert at the Academy of Music last evening in this characteristic programme:

Symphonie, en bemol, Op. 20—Ernest Chausson
1. Lent. Allegro vive.
2. Tres lent.
3. Anime.
"Psyche et Eros," extrait de "Psyche," poeme symphonie .....Cesar Franck
Nocturnes .....Claude Debussy
1. Nuages.
2. Fetes.
Chant funebre.....Alberic Magnard
Istar, variations symphoniques..Vincent d'Indy

Mr. Gericke has played a great deal of this recent French music, and M. d'Indy himself is especially well known in Philadelphia by his great symphony, as interpreted here by Mr. Scheel. He has come to this country on the invitation of Mr. Higginson on purpose to present the work of his countrymen and associates, through the unexcelled medium of the Boston Orchestra. He conducted the house concerts on last Friday and Saturday, when he gave his own symphony. Last night's programme was prepared for the orchestra's monthly visit to other cities, and the Chausson symphony was played for the first time in America. To speak frankly, it was the least interesting feature of the programme.

Conductor Makes Good Impression.

M. d'Indy himself made an agreeable impression on his entrance, which deepened as the concert went on. He is a tall, well-built man, of quiet and dignified demeanor, without self-assertion, but carrying the conviction of knowledge and certainty. He might be called an intellectual rather than an emotional conductor. He is thoughtful, well-balanced, distinct, carrying his purpose clearly and moving surely to his climaxes with a kind of dispassionate understanding that inspires confidence rather than enthusiasm. But the audience liked him and grew warmer in its recognition as his quiet mastery was better understood. The splendid orchestra responded instantly to his every intimation and it must have been a pleasure to him to play upon so fine an instrument. The symphony was probably less carefully prepared than the other numbers, but in these there could be no doubt of the full expression of the musical intent.

The difficulty about such a programme is that the music has all very much the same value and sounds very much alike. One who came in late at night might not immediately recognize what point of the programme had been reached. Chausson is especially "alike." He was one of the young Frenchmen of a few years back who were entirely "Wagnerized," and his symphony, with all its French precision and delicately tasteful ornamentation, is too reminiscent of Wagner to be taken as seriously as it seems to have been taken in Paris. Nikisch played it there, and one could not help thinking that a more temperamental conductor might have read more into it. It has the effect of atmosphere that all these composers give, but it suggests ideas that are never quite formulated, and with all its changes of moods it remains melancholy.

Franck Number Well Received.

With Cesar Franck we come to a larger musical personality. The extract from the "Psyche," a noble poem of love, was profoundly significant and beautiful, and it was played with a large grasp and a splendid richness. The two little tone-pictures by Dubussy, one suggesting a winter landscape and the other some kind of military festival, were also charming. The "chant funebre" by Magnard, a son of the late editor of Figaro and a pupil of D'Indy, had beginning but no end, and scarcely justified the space it occupied.

But M. d'Indy's "Istar"—a descriptive or suggestive tone-poem, in which the variations precede the clear emergence of the fundamental theme—closed the programme with a display of symphonic invention and of glittering brilliancy and richness of orchestration that would suffice to justify the conductor's reputation.

Any one of these compositions would have made a great impression alone; but the family likeness among them obscured their individuality, so that music which is really very intense in its effects left a general impression of monotony. It was, nevertheless, a privilege to hear it under conditions that carried complete authority.

The Philadelphia Inquirer

TUESDAY - DECEMBER 5, 1905

MUSIC AT THE ACADEMY

Vincent D'Indy Conducts the Second Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra

The distinctive feature of the second concert for the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which took place at the Academy of Music last evening, was the first public appearance in this city of Mr. Vincent D'Indy, the distinguished French composer, who directed the performance of a program consisting exclusively of music of the modern French school and including nothing which possessed the recommendation of being familiar.

There was a symphony in B-flat by Chausson, which had not previously been given in this country; an extract from a symphonic poem by Cesar Franck on the subject of "Psyche and Eros;" two nocturnes by Claude Debussy; a funeral chant by Alberic Magnard, and a set of symphonic variations by Mr. D'Indy himself. Perhaps not many in the audience would care for that kind of thing as a steady diet, but by way of variety it was worth while. It included many points of interest and value, and it was edifying and illuminative as illustrating and interpreting a musical movement of which in this country we have little knowledge and less hearing. Probably most of those who heard it received the impression that it would not be amiss to diversify the current programs with more frequent selections from the same source.

There is about the same kind of difference between the symphonic music whose composers were to the front last night, and the works of the German masters with which we are best acquainted as there is between the water color and the painting in oil, and an impressionist water color must be understood at that. There is some body and substance in the symphony of Chausson, which does not essentially diverge from the classic models. It is really a beautiful though not an extraordinary production, poetic in its inspiration, sincere in its sentiment, ingenious in its developments and appealingly melodious in its expression. The score of it is singularly rich in ideas, which are evolved and exhibited with a curiously felicitous effectiveness, and although the tenuity of its texture is extreme, the whole thing is vital, animated, spontaneous and artistically intelligible. It generally charms if it does not always convince, and it may fairly be assumed that it would be found more agreeably effective upon a second hearing.

VINCENT d'INDY,

But it is music which communicates a strange sense of sublimated unreality and unearthliness, and this remark applies with even greater force to the other numbers on the program. The nocturnes of Dubussy are as ethereal and evanescent as the poetry of Shelley. It would not be true to say of them that they are without form and void, but they are as nebulous and elusive as the clouds which one of them reflected. They are exquisite after their manner, while they last, but somehow or other they leave the musical appetite unsatisfied. It is as though one were to undertake to make a dinner on a dish of whipped cream.

It is unnecessary to say more than a word of Mr. D'Indy. He did not display any exceptional abilities as a conductor, and while the orchestra played with consummate elegance and brilliancy, it would doubtless have done as well, or better, had Mr. Gericke been in command.

The Press.

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 5, 1905.

D'INDY AND THE FRENCH

The Works of the Moderns Heard at the Academy of Music.

It is said that an endeavor to understand the intimate jokes of another nation is the greatest strain that an effort at cosmopolitanism puts on one. This is also true of an effort to be appreciative of the idiomatic musical extravaganzas of a school foreign to one's usual musical experiences. Music, it is true, speaks a universal language; but at the same time there are always certain racial groups, who, like the Laputans in "Gulliver's Travels," prefer to be unobvious for the sake of it. So last evening, at the Academy of Music, that familiar and ever-welcome virtuoso organization, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, went through its paces under the guidance of the baton of Vincent D'Indy, of Paris, one of the ultra-modern French composers specially brought over for a brief season with the orchestra, in a program that ran the whole gamut of French eccentricity and musical pose, as follows:—

Symphonie (in B flat), Op. 20 ..Ernest Chausson
"Psyche et Eros," extrait de "Psyche." Poeme symphonique .....Cesar Franck
Nocturnes .....Claude Debussy
I. Nuages.
II. Fetes.
Chant funebre .....Alberic Magnard
"Istar" (Variations symphoniques) .....Vincent d'Indy

The Chausson symphony no doubt strikes Parisians who are just now getting acquainted with their later Liszt-Wagner, and who have never taken Berlioz very seriously, as very wonderful, but to ears accustomed to the music of all the moderns the work sounded a trifle thin and very reflective. It was a sort of faded, pallid Wagner, the "human, active joy" of the first movement as well as the "grief" of the second, which is a sort of French adagietta, not getting you very far into the heights or the depths, while the last movement, "animated," seemed a rarefied version of the Valkyries with the redoubtable visitants not particularly heavily sandaled or possessed of horses of fire and fury.

And so with the other numbers. Whether one floated in the clouds of Debussy, said to be "gray agonies tinted with white," or took Cesar Franck's very frank Psyche by the hand or wept with Magnard or listened to D'Indy's very new music set to a very old Babylonian myth, the meaning of which scholars are still fighting about in that delicious way that archaeologists have, it was all pretty much the same. The music is too much pose and the affectations of genius annoy. Though it must be said that Monsieur D'Indy, who very modestly put his own work last, came out quite on top indeed, for in the string and horn effects and other striking bits in his variations, whatever merit the new touches of color that the new school stands for, was fully set forth and very effectively. Moreover, D'Indy proved a scholarly conductor contained and with no predilection for violence in contrast, aiming at getting at the heart of the work interpreted.

Naturally the interpretation by the orchestra was superb, for D'Indy never had such a body of men before him in all his experience, and in consequence he was supported in all his efforts, never strenuous, to reveal the school of which he is so prominent a member. But sometimes revelation is not always happy; it may be a two-edged sword which cuts both ways.

Symphonie (in B flat), Op. 20 ..Ernest Chausson
"Psyche et Eros," extrait de "Psyche." Poeme symphonique .....Cesar Franck
Nocturnes .....Claude Debussy
I. Nuages.
II. Fetes.
Chant funebre .....Alberic Magnard
"Istar" (Variations symphoniques) .....Vincent d'Indy

The Chausson symphony no doubt strikes Parisians who are just now getting acquainted with their later Liszt-Wagner, and who have never taken Berlioz very seriously, as very wonderful, but to ears accustomed to the music of all the moderns the work sounded a trifle thin and very reflective. It was a sort of faded, pallid Wagner, the "human, active joy" of the first movement as well as the "grief" of the second, which is a sort of French adagietta, not getting you very far into the heights or the depths, while the last movement, "animated," seemed a rarefied version of the Valkyries with the redoubtable visitants not particularly heavily sandaled or possessed of horses of fire and fury.

And so with the other numbers. Whether one floated in the clouds of Debussy, said to be "gray agonies tinted with white," or took Cesar Franck's very frank Psyche by the hand or wept with Magnard or listened to D'Indy's very new music set to a very old Babylonian myth, the meaning of which scholars are still fighting about in that delicious way that archaeologists have, it was all pretty much the same. The music is too much pose and the affectations of genius annoy. Though it must be said that Monsieur D'Indy, who very modestly put his own work last, came out quite on top indeed, for in the string and horn effects and other striking bits in his variations, whatever merit the new touches of color that the new school stands for, was fully set forth and very effectively. Moreover, D'Indy proved a scholarly conductor contained and with no predilection for violence in contrast, aiming at getting at the heart of the work interpreted.

Naturally the interpretation by the orchestra was superb, for D'Indy never had such a body of men before him in all his experience, and in consequence he was supported in all his efforts, never strenuous, to reveal the school of which he is so prominent a member. But sometimes revelation is not always happy; it may be a two-edged sword which cuts both ways.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

PRESS

DEC 5 - 1905

D'INDY AND THE FRENCH

The Works of the Moderns Heard at the Academy of Music.

It is said that an endeavor to understand the intimate jokes of another nation is the greatest strain that an effort at cosmopolitanism puts on one. This is also true of an effort to be appreciative of the idiomatic musical extravaganzas of a school foreign to one's usual musical experiences. Music, it is true, speaks a universal language; but at the same time there are always certain racial groups, who, like the Laputans in "Gulliver's Travels," prefer to be unobvious for the sake of it. So last evening, at the Academy of Music, that familiar and ever-welcome virtuoso organization, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, went through its paces under the guidance of the baton of Vincent D'Indy, of Paris, one of the ultra-modern French composers specially brought over for a brief season with the orchestra, in a program that ran the whole gamut of French eccentricity and musical pose, as follows:—

Symphonie (in B flat), Op. 20 ..Ernest Chausson
"Psyche et Eros," extrait de "Psyche." Poeme symphonique .....Cesar Franck
Nocturnes .....Claude Debussy
I. Nuages.
II. Fetes.
Chant funebre .....Alberic Magnard
"Istar" (Variations symphoniques) .....Vincent d'Indy

The Chausson symphony no doubt strikes Parisians who are just now getting acquainted with their later Liszt-Wagner, and who have never taken Berlioz very seriously, as very wonderful, but to ears accustomed to the music of all the moderns the work sounded a trifle thin and very reflective. It was a sort of faded, pallid Wagner, the "human, active joy" of the first movement as well as the "grief" of the second, which is a sort of French adagietta, not getting you very far into the heights or the depths, while the last movement, "animated," seemed a rarefied version of the Valkyries with the redoubtable visitants not particularly heavily sandaled or possessed of horses of fire and fury.

And so with the other numbers. Whether one floated in the clouds of Debussy, said to be "gray agonies tinted with white," or took Cesar Franck's very frank Psyche by the hand or wept with Magnard or listened to D'Indy's very new music set to a very old Babylonian myth, the meaning of which scholars are still fighting about in that delicious way that archaeologists have, it was all pretty much the same. The music is too much pose and the affectations of genius annoy. Though it must be said that Monsieur D'Indy, who very modestly put his own work last, came out quite on top indeed, for in the string and horn effects and other striking bits in his variations, whatever merit the new touches of color that the new school stands for, was fully set forth and very effectively. Moreover, D'Indy proved a scholarly conductor contained and with no predilection for violence in contrast, aiming at getting at the heart of the work interpreted.

Naturally the interpretation by the orchestra was superb, for D'Indy never had such a body of men before him in all his experience, and in consequence he was supported in all his efforts, never strenuous, to reveal the school of which he is so prominent a member. But sometimes revelation is not always happy; it may be a two-edged sword which cuts both ways.

[111]

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

BULLETIN

om .....

ldress .....

ate .....

VINCENT D'INDY

The Distinguished French Composer Conducts the Boston Orchestra.

The second of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's series of five Monday night concerts in the Academy of Music last evening was made an occasion of especial note and interest by the appearance of the French composer, Vincent d'Indy, who conducted the orchestra in a notable program, concluding with one of his own compositions.

D'Indy's fame rests more upon the music he has written and his success as a teacher than upon his accomplishments as an orchestral leader. He is a sedate, unassuming man of fifty-three years, tall, well-built, with a good head of hair worn medium long, and a mustache. He has no eccentricities of manner, and in appearance suggests the practical business man more than the great musician. In conducting, his gestures are free, easy and rather graceful, never extravagant or meaningless, though he does not show much personal magnetism, and his movements seem to follow the music rather than to act as any great aid or inspiration to the musicians.

The program last night was one of novelties, the selections being all new here, or comparatively so. The first was a symphony by Ernest Chausson (B-flat, op. 20), which was played for the first time in this country. This is a noble composition, almost wholly sombre in tone. If it shows no great flashes of inspiration and falls short of the standard of the great symphonies, its simplicity is to be commended, its melancholy is appealing, and there are many evidences of genius in its working out. It proved a composition well worth hearing, musicianly, if not profound, and of sufficient charm to emphasize the sadness of Chausson's untimely death by accident at the early age of forty-four.

"Psyche and Eros," from Cesar Franck's symphonic poem, "Psyche," was the second number, and the beautiful tone-poem gave the orchestra an opportunity to do some of its finest work. This was followed by two "Nocturnes," by Claude Debussy. The first, "Nuages," is a peculiar conception, a dreary monotone of mournful melody, subdued throughout, with a melancholy, weird sound like the moaning of deep waters. It was wonderfully played, with impressive effect. The second movement, "Fetes," was in vivid contrast, and was one of the bright spots of a program that was, as a whole, almost too solemn. In it is a dance-theme measure, gypsy-like in movement, which was quite entrancing. The composition shows Debussy's originality and tendency toward the unusual and bizarre, and there was revealed much beauty and poetic value, thanks largely to the exquisite rendition. There was also the "Chant Funebre" of Alberic Magnard, a dirge which added to the solemnity of the program. Its principal note was one of monotony, and the work as a whole was the least interesting of the evening. It might well have given place to something of a more exhilarating nature, that the concert might not have been so much of one color.

D'Indy placed his own composition last. The number was his "Istar," Variations symphoniques, founded on a famous Babylonian poem, describing the descent to the "Land of the No-Return" of Istar, daughter of Sin. D'Indy shows in this work poetic imagination and descriptive power, his music being graphic and colorful. It might be said that he had been influenced by Richard Strauss, were it not just as fair to say that Strauss might have been influenced by him. At any rate, there is a bond of sympathy and a similarity of method between the two composers. The Frenchman may not use his instruments so freely nor with quite so much spectacular showiness, but he is akin to Strauss in some respects. His coloring is more subdued, perhaps, but it is often vivid and strikes a perfect chord. "Istar" is a composition of rare beauty and marked mysticism, quite worthy the talent of its composer.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

D'Indy and the Boston Orchestra.

If the programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening was intended, as generally supposed, to illustrate the character and tendencies of modern French music, the new departures in that country are diametrically opposite to all ideals we have heretofore entertained. Instead of that blithe spirit, gay and debonair, we have held to be "the light and life of laughing France," we are instructed that the modern movement is toward the dark shades where melancholy and woe hold undisputed sway. The concert, on the whole, produced the most lugubrious impression, only emphasized by an occasional suggestion of cheering fantasies. The symphony in B flat by Ernest Chausson has for its main theme, that of the second movement, a song of grief which might serve as a score for the Lamentations of Jeremiah. In somewhat lighter vein, but still sufficiently sober, is the sad story of "Psyche," interpreted by Cesar Franck. Next is a nocturne entitled "Clouds," followed by a contrasting number, "The Fete," both by Claude Debussy. Then comes a "Funeral Chant," mournful, of course, by Alberic Magnard. The final number, by Vincent D'Indy, is based on a "Babylonian Poem" descriptive of Istar's descent through the seven gates of Hades to the land of no return.

This is a matter of more than passing moment, from a musical point of view, as M. D'Indy is the successor of Caesar Franck as the recognized leader of the modern school. He conducted the orchestra himself throughout, and no doubt arranged the programme to afford a fair illustration of the ideas and methods of the living composers of his country. This illustration indicates that the moderns are given over to morbid sentimentalism. Like Zola and Daudet in literature, they descend into the depths of the abnormal and find their inspiration in themes of tribulation. Remarkably ingenious, they elaborate their conceptions through the most intricate modulations with clarity of expression only attained by masters of composition, but only to plunge further downward away from all that makes for the joy of life. In passionate passages they fairly aban-

...received a hearty greeting ... and appreciative audience ... rance can rightly be regarded ... successful. His presence is ... his gesture significant and grace... his assured command of the re... of the orchestra fully evident from ... Whether our music-lovers ever ... a taste for the dismal and doleful ... of the moderns or not, M. D'Indy ... always be regarded here with admira... and respect.

NORTH AMERICAN
PHILA.,
DEC 5- 1905

VINCENT D'INDY

He conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert last evening at the Academy of Music.

COMPOSER D'INDY IN FRENCH COMPOSITIONS

Conducting Boston Orchestra's Concert, eH Brings Rare Skill Into Movements.

HIS OWN WORKS BEST

By William R. Lester

Composer Vincent d'Indy waved the conductor's baton at the Boston Orchestra's concert last evening in the Academy of Music—his first appearance here as leader. Although his compositions have been heretofore made known to Philadelphia audiences by Conductors Gericke and Scheel.

M. d'Indy's programme was composed entirely of music of the modern French school, which aims rather at orchestral virtuosity than the broad and sweeping sentimentality of the earlier German composers.

This was illustrated in Chasessou's symphony in B flat, a work given for the first time in America. The music is restrained, almost sombre, at times, in the first movement, the themes being developed with great skill and ingenuity.

The second movement is a persistent note of grief, slow and haunting, while the finale, after an animated development of an impressive theme, dies away in a reprise of the first themes of the work.

Of larger and more vital musical import than this Chausson symphony were the other numbers—an extract from Cesar Franck's romantic "Psyche and Eros"—Debussy's first and second "Nocturnes"—beautifully played by the orchestra under M. d'Indy—a new and finely scored "Funeral Dirge" by Albene Magnard, and last, but not least, d'Indy's own "Istar" symphonic variations, which proved to be the most interesting and acceptable feature of the programme.

M. d'Indy conducted quietly and with reserved power, and impressed the audience with the value and dignity of French music, notwithstanding its apparent monotony.

STAR
MONTREAL, QUE.
NOV 25 1905

Vincent d'Indie, the most modern and unintelligible of the modern French composers, arrived in New York last week. He will conduct several performances of the New York Symphony Orchestra.

BY London.

...paper Cutting Bureau
...QUIRER
PHILA., PA
DEC 5- 1905

MUSIC AT THE ACADEMY

Vincent D'Indy Conducts the Second Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra

The distinctive feature of the second concert for the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which took place at the Academy of Music last evening, was the first public appearance in this city of M. Vincent D'Indy, the distinguished French composer, who directed the performance of a program consisting exclusively of music of the modern French school and including nothing which possessed the recommendation of being familiar.

There was a symphony in B-flat by Chausson, which had not previously been given in this country; an extract from a symphonic poem by Cesar Franck on the subject of "Psyche and Eros;" two nocturnes by Claude Debussy; a funeral chant by Alberic Magnard, and a set of symphonic variations by Mr. D'Indy himself. Perhaps not many in the audience would care for that kind of thing as a steady diet, but by way of variety it was worth while. It included many points of interest and value, and it was edifying and illuminative as illustrating and interpreting a musical movement of which in this country we have little knowledge and less hearing. Probably most of those who heard it received the impression that it would not be amiss to diversify the current programs with more frequent selections from the same source.

There is about the same kind of difference between the symphonic music whose composers were to the front last night, and the works of the German masters with which we are best acquainted as there is between the water color and the painting in oil, and an impressionist water color must be understood at that. There is some body and substance in the symphony of Chausson, which does not essentially diverge from the classic models. It is really a beautiful though not an extraordinary production, poetic in its inspiration, sincere in its sentiment, ingenious in its developments and appealingly melodious in its expression. The score of it is singularly rich in ideas, which are evolved and exhibited with a curiously felicitous effectiveness, and although the tenuity of its texture is extreme, the whole thing is vital, animated, spontaneous and artistically intelligible. It generally charms if it does not always convince, and it may fairly be assumed that it would be found more agreeably effective upon a second hearing.

VINCENT d'INDY.

But it is music which communicates a strange sense of sublimated unreality and unearthliness, and this remark applies with even greater force to the other numbers on the program. The nocturnes of Dubussy are as ethereal and evanescent as the poetry of Shelley. It would not be true to say of them that they are without form and void, but they are as nebulous and elusive as the clouds which one of them reflected. They are exquisite after their manner, while they last, but somehow or other they leave the musical appetite unsatisfied. It is as though one were to undertake to make a dinner on a dish of whipped cream.

It is unnecessary to say more than a word of Mr. D'Indy. He did not display any exceptional abilities as a conductor, and while the orchestra played with consummate elegance and brilliancy, it would doubtless have done as well, or better, had Mr. Gericke been in command.

...spaper Cutting Bureau
COMMERCIAL
BUFFALO, N. Y.
NOV 18 1905

One of the most brilliantly successful concerts ever given in New York took place this week at Carnegie Hall, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which gives its second concert in Buffalo at Convention Hall on Monday evening, February 19th, played a program devoted entirely to the works of Richard Wagner. One of the New York critics declared that no other musical organization in America could have done it, and another said that it was a triumph in orchestral work. Mme. Gadski was chief soloist and with Ellison Van Hoose sang the superb duet of parting which opens the first act of "Die Gotterdammerung." "But even Gadski's splendid singing could not push into the second place of interest the magnificent [illegible] of the [illegible]

...m BULLETIN
...ress PHILA., PA
...e DEC 9 - 1905

The appearance of so distinguished a foreign musician as Vincent d'Indy, a conductor, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music last Monday evening, was naturally an occasion to be chronicled as one of the most interesting and important musical events of the season. D'Indy is one of the prominent figures of the musical world of to-day, having won recognition as standing among the few living great composers. His principal work to precede him here was a symphony, played by the Boston Orchestra last season. In Paris, where he was born fifty-three years ago and still resides, he is said to be known more for his success as composer and teacher than as a conductor, although he has also won distinction in this respect. He was found, last Monday night, to be a sedate man of rather practical and unassuming appearance, of no great personal magnetism, nor to any noticeable extent an enthusiast. He wields the baton firmly, with no uncertainty of the meaning he wishes to convey, and with gestures that show ease and grace. But there appears to be little that is inspirational or electrifying in d'Indy's conducting, nor much that is strikingly interesting in his personality. It was, of course, a privilege to see so famous a musician, to study his methods, and to listen to the superb Boston Orchestra under his leadership, but, on the whole, his visit will remain a pleasant memory, more than a serious regret at its briefness. We are still content to have Mr. Gericke and our own Scheel.

...spaper Cutting Bureau in the World
PHILA., PA
DEC 10 1905

Vincent l'Indy, the French musical Impressionist, appeared in Philadelphia. His compositions were played by the Philadelphia Orchestra. They were incomprehensible.

In France they write very seriously of Vincent d'Indy, and some of the learned commentators seem to look upon him as the evangelist of a new gospel of beauty.

"Fascinated by the new formulae of 'musical art,' says M. Hughes Imbert 'he had the courage from an early youthage to proclaim at the top of his voice the character of his preferences and to break with the past.'"

It will be recalled that the past included such figures as Bach, Beethoven and Mozart, Glas included Hector Berlioz, Bizet and a few others with whom Mr. d'Indy was perhaps less inclined to break.

In New York d'Indy was not admired. Indeed, he was received with a skeptical smile. The New York Sun says:

The symphony heard last night was produced here by the Boston Orchestra under Mr. Gericke on January 12, 1904. We were moved to say of it at that time that it was the work of the altogether utter modern school which eschews all harmonies not afflicted with strabismus. It apears to bring comfort to what M. Schure has called the dreamy imagination of M. l'Indy to seize two or more inoffensive minor seconds in different keys and incite them to mortal combat with one another. At least such music keeps one awake.

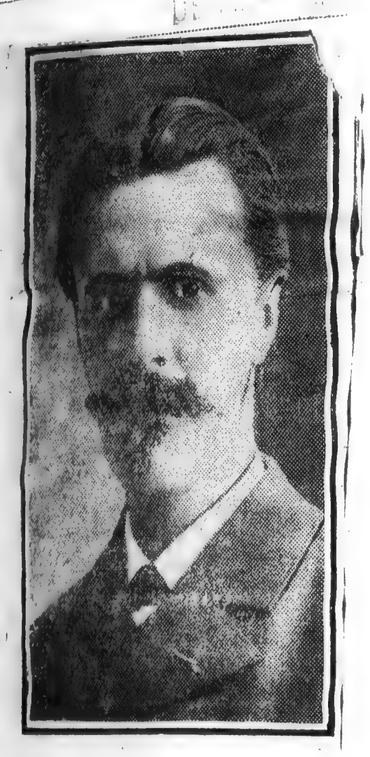
But there is another aspect of this symphony which must not escape notice. We must consider the world-wide view of the composer over the field of thematic invention. He counts nothing lost which had had its day. For him the "Sakuntala" of Goldmark, the "Carmen" of Bizet, the "Fantastic Symphony" of Berlioz, and anything and everything of Wagner have their sweet uses. With these and a few less significant ingredients from the home laboratory, this composer has wrought a symphony which would puzzle a Philadelphia lawyer.

[illegible]

...ould hardly have added to the surprises ...e evening had the composer, conductor ...d choir leaders fallen on each other's ...cks and wailed out their emotions in con...lusive weeping.

...M. D'Indy received a hearty greeting ...rom a large and appreciative audience, ...nd his appearance can rightly be regarded ...s eminently successful. His presence is ...dignified, his gesture significant and grace...ful, and his assured command of the re...sources of the orchestra fully evident from ...the outset. Whether our music-lovers ever ...acquire a taste for the dismal and doleful ...music of the moderns or not, M. D'Indy ...will always be regarded here with admira...tion and respect.

...NORTH AMERICAN
PHI...
DE...



VINCENT D'INDY

He conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert last evening at the Academy of Music.

COMPOSER D'INDY IN FRENCH COMPOSITIONS

Conducting Boston Orchestra's Concert, eH Brings Rare Skill Into Movements.

HIS OWN WORKS BEST

By William R. Lester

Composer Vincent d'Iudy waved the conductor's baton at the Boston Orchestra's concert last evening in the Academy of Music—his first appearance here as leader, although his compositions have been heretofore made known to Philadelphia audiences by Conductors Gericke and Scheel.

M. d'Iudy's programme was composed entirely of music of the modern French school, which aims rather at orchestral virtuosity than the broad and sweeping sentimentality of the earlier German composers.

This was illustrated in Chasessou's symphony in B flat, a work given for the first time in America. The music is restrained, almost sombre, at times, in the first movement, the themes being developed with great skill and ingenuity.

The second movement is a persistent note of grief, slow and haunting, while the finale, after an animated development of an impressive theme, dies away in a reprise of the first themes of the work.

Of larger and more vital musical import than this Chausson symphony were the other numbers—an extract from Cesar Franck's romantic "Psyche and Eros", Debussy's first and second "Nocturnes"—beautifully played by the orchestra under M. d'Indy—a new and finely scored "Funeral Dirge" by Albene Magnard, and last, but not least, d'Indy's own "Istar" symphonic variations, which proved to be the most interesting and acceptable feature of the programme.

M. d'Indy conducted quietly and with reserved power, and impressed the audience with the value and dignity of French music, notwithstanding its apparent monotony.

...PRESS
...1904

Vincent d'Indie, the most modern and unintelligible of the modern French composers, arrived in New York last week. He will conduct several performances of the New York Symphony Orchestra.

...London, ...

...paper Cutting Bureau in the World
...INQUIRER.
...PHILA., PA
DEC 5- 1909

MUSIC AT THE ACADEMY

Vincent D'Indy Conducts the Second Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra

The distinctive feature of the second concert for the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which took place at the Academy of Music last evening, was the first public appearance in this city of Mr. Vincent D'Indy, the distinguished French composer, who directed the performance of a program consisting exclusively of music of the modern French school and including nothing which possessed the recommendation of being familiar.

There was a symphony in B-flat by Chausson, which had not previously been given in this country; an extract from a symphonic poem by Cesar Franck on the subject of "Psyche and Eros;" two nocturnes by Claude Debussy; a funeral chant by Alberic Magnard, and a set of symphonic variations by Mr. D'Indy himself. Perhaps not many in the audience would care for that kind of thing as a steady diet, but by way of variety it was worth while. It included many points of interest and value, and it was edifying and illuminative as illustrating and interpreting a musical movement of which in this country we have little knowledge and less hearing. Probably most of those who heard it received the impression that it would not be amiss to diversify the current programs with more frequent selections from the same source.

There is about the same kind of difference between the symphonic music whose composers were to the front last night, and the works of the German masters with which we are best acquainted as there is between the water color and the painting in oil, and an impressionist water color must be understood at that. There is some body and substance in the symphony of Chausson, which does not essentially diverge from the classic models. It is really a beautiful though not an extraordinary production, poetic in its inspiration, sincere in its sentiment, ingenious in its developments and appealingly melodious in its expression. The score of it is singularly rich in ideas, which are evolved and exhibited with a curiously felicitous effectiveness, and although the tenuity of its texture is extreme, the whole thing is vital, animated, spontaneous and artistically intelligible. It generally charms if it does not always convince, and it may fairly be assumed that it would be found more agreeably effective upon a second hearing.

VINCENT d'INDY,

But it is music which communicates a strange sense of sublimated unreality and unearthliness, and this remark applies with even greater force to the other numbers on the program. The nocturnes of Dubussy are as ethereal and evanescent as the poetry of Shelley. It would not be true to say of them that they are without form and void, but they are as nebulous and elusive as the clouds which one of them reflected. They are exquisite after their manner, while they last, but somehow or other they leave the musical appetite unsatisfied. It is as though one were to undertake to make a dinner on a dish of whipped cream.

It is unnecessary to say more than a word of Mr. D'Indy. He did not display any exceptional abilities as a conductor, and while the orchestra played with consummate elegance and brilliancy, it would doubtless have done as well, or better, had Mr. Gericke been in command.

...spaper Cutting Bureau ...MERCIAL
NOV 18 1905

One of the most brilliantly successful concerts ever given in New York took place this week at Carnegie Hall, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which gives its second concert in Buffalo at Convention Hall on Monday evening, February 19th, played a program devoted entirely to the works of Richard Wagner. One of the New York critics declared that no other musical organization in America could have done it, and another said that it was a triumph in orchestral work. Mme. Gadski was chief soloist and with Ellison Von Hoose sang the superb duet of parting which opens the first act of "Die Gotterdammerung." "But even Gadski's splendid singing could not push into the second place of interest the magnificent playing of the virtuoso orchestra," declared one of the best-known metropolitan critics.

...m BULLETIN
...ress PHI...
...e DEC 2 ...

The appearance of so distinguished a foreign musician as Vincent d'Indy, as conductor, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music last Monday evening, was naturally an occasion to be chronicled as one of the most interesting and important musical events of the season. D'Indy is one of the prominent figures of the musical world of to-day, having won recognition as standing among the few living great composers. His principal work to precede him here was a symphony, played by the Boston Orchestra last season. In Paris, where he was born fifty-three years ago and still resides, he is said to be known more for his success as composer and teacher than as a conductor, although he has also won distinction in this respect. He was found, last Monday night, to be a sedate man of rather practical and unassuming appearance, of no great personal magnetism, nor to any noticeable extent an enthusiast. He wields the baton firmly, with no uncertainty of the meaning he wishes to convey, and with gestures that show ease and grace. But there appears to be little that is inspirational or electrifying in d'Indy's conducting, nor much that is strikingly interesting in his personality. It was, of course, a privilege to see so famous a musician, to study his methods, and to listen to the superb Boston Orchestra under his leadership, but, on the whole, his visit will remain a pleasant memory, more than a serious regret at its briefness. We are still content to have Mr. Gericke and our own Scheel.

...spaper Cutting Bureau in the World

Vincent l'Indy, the French musical Impressionist, appeared in Philadelphia. His compositions were played by the Philadelphia Orchestra. They were incomprehensible.

In France they write very seriously of Vincent d'Indy, and some of the learned commentators seem to look upon him as the evangelist of a new gospel of beauty.

"Fascinated by the new formulae of "musical art," says M. Hughes Imbert "he had the courage from an early youthage to proclaim at the top of his voice the character of his preferences and to break with the past."

It will be recalled that the past included such figures as Bach, Beethoven and Mozart, Glas included Hector Berlioz, Bizet and a few others with whom Mr. d'Indy was perhaps less inclined to break.

In New York d'Indy was not admired. Indeed, he was received with a skeptical smile. The New York Sun says:

The symphony heard last night was produced here by the Boston Orchestra under Mr. Gericke on January 12, 1904. We were moved to say of it at that time that it was the work of the altogether utter modern school which eschews all harmonies not afflicted with strabismus. It apears to bring comfort to what M. Schure has called the dreamy imagination of M. I'Indy to seize two or more inoffensive minor seconds in different keys and incite them to mortal combat with one another. At least such music keeps one awake.

But there is another aspect of this symphony which must not escape notice. We must consider the world-wide view of the composer over the field of thematic invention. He counts nothing lost which had had its day. For him the "Sakuntala" of Goldmark, the "Carmen" of Bizet, the "Fantastic Symphony" of Berlioz, and anything and everything of Wagner have their sweet uses. With these and a few less significant ingredients from the home laboratory, this composer has wrought a symphony which would puzzle a Philadelphia lawyer.

[11 2]

rom WASHINGTON, D. C
ddress
DEC 2 - 1905
ate

An Advance Criticism

ONE OF THE GREATEST musical events in Washington last season was the arrival here of the pianist and composer, Eugene D'Albert. The greatest event of the previous season was the appearance here of Richard Strauss. Next week will bring Vincent D'Indy, the Frenchman. He is one of the most eminent of living composers and conductors, and his participation in the Boston Symphony concert next Tuesday makes of that occasion a red-letter day in our history.

Judging from previous experience, however, subscribers may know in advance how the daily newspapers will not handle this important news happening. Washington readers may feel reasonably certain that none of the daily papers will send a reporter to interview D'Indy, or that if they do, they will be careful to select for this mission the very highest authorities on base ball or the most expert political satirists on their staffs.

Unless there be a sudden revolution in the methods of Washington daily newspapers the public may rest assured that there will be no account in their columns of Albèric Magnard (said to be son of one of the editors of Figaro and pupil of D'Indy), whose "Chant funèbre" is to be performed next Tuesday. Magnard is practically unknown in this country, although he has composed an orchestral suite; three, or possibly more than three, symphonies, a quintet for piano and wood instruments, a violin sonata, songs, pianoforte pieces, a string quartet, and at least two operas. His name does not appear in the dictionaries, nor has it figured, so far as can be learned, on any of the programs of our important orchestras. Both his name and his works are absolute novelties to this public. There is hardly any danger, however, that any of this information will be conveyed to Washingtonians in the Sunday papers, it being contrary to the policy of those sheets to furnish their readers with musical news of any importance which might possibly advertise a concert, or a composer, or the author of a umsical book.

Mr, SIDNEY LLOY
Who Sang in Recital at t

Here is some information which in all probability will not be found in any of the newspapers to-morrow regarding Chausson, another French composer, practically unknown in America, whose symphony in B Flat, Op. 20, heads the program on Tuesday: Chausson died a few years ago as the result of an accident which befell him while riding a bicycle. His opera, "Le Roi Arthus," has been written and talked of extensively in Europe, where it has had several performances. His works include songs, piano pieces, an instrumental trio, a concerto, a symphonic poem and a lyric drama, "Hélène."

It might be too much of an advertisement for next Tuesday's concert were any of the daily papers to state to-morrow that the two of the set of three "Nocturnes" by Debussy, which we are invited to hear, enjoy the distinction of having confounded Boston and Boston critics at their performance in that city in February, 1904. The nocturnes were performed twice during the one concert on this occasion. They were considered too difficult to be understood from a first rendition, and it was thought that a repetition would assist the audience towards a comprehension of the music. Debussy is the man who has tried to put into musical notation the overtones which are present in all music but which are most distinctly heard in chimes and huge-mouthed bells.

It would be unjust to accuse any of the newspaper in advance of forgetting their advertising principles long enough to mention on Sunday that the symphonic variations, "Istar," by D'Indy, were brought out in Brussels by Ysaye on January 10, 1887, and performed in this country under Theodore Thomas on April 23, 1898. Neither would it be fair for us to suppose that these papers would waste any of their valuable space for the purpose of quoting what Philip Hale wrote on December 9, 1900, to the Musical Courier, concerning this work: "'Istar' is one of the striking works of the modern French school. . . . D'Indy was never a melodist of the first, or even the second rank. There is no gushing fountain in his garden; I see him with a divining rod; he searches for melody; he sinks artesian wells. . . . 'Istar' made so little impression on Mr. Finck that in his notes in the Evening Post of December 1, he spoke of it as though it had never been played in New York: "I regret to say that some of my colleagues in your city (New York) are disposed to shy whenever they see the name of a Frenchman on a program. I remember the should have known better to Chausson's shabby treatment awarded by one who 'Viviane,' Charpentier's 'Impressions d'Italie,' and D'Indy's 'Istar.'"

[redacted]

Newspaper MES.
WASHINGTON, D. C
ss
NOV 26 1905

Boston Symphony Quartet.

No concerts that Washington has had in many years have been so successful from every point of view as the series which is being given this winter by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It will therefore be good news to the musical public of this city that arrangements have been made whereby the chief subsidiary organization of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—the Boston Symphony Quaytet—will give a series of three evening of chamber music in the New Willard on Mondays, December 18, January 22, and March 26. These concerts will give perfect symmetry to the musical season, for as the Boston Symphony Orchestra is leader in orchestral music, so the Boston Symphony Quartet is in the more intimate form of chamber music.

As the name implies, the quartet is an integral part of the orchestra. Its members are members of the orchestra, and its management is the same. Its leader and first violin, Prof. Willy Hess, is the concert master of the orchestra. Its second violin, Otto Roth, occupies the second desk among the first violins of the orchestra, and its viola, Emile Ferir, and 'cello, Heinrich Warnke, are the principal players of their respective instruments in the parent organization.

The assisting artists will be on a plane with the quartet. At the first concert Washington will make the acquaintance of a new pianist, Mr. Stojesky, who this fall came to America to become head of the piano department in the new Loeb Conservatory of New York. Miss Susan Metcalf, who will assist at the second concert, is an American singer who, in a few seasons has earned for herself the right to be placed among the few artistic interpreters of songs in the world.

The assisting artist at the last concert will be Mme Olga Samaroff, the Russo-American pianist whose career in this country, though short has been most successful.

POST
ASHINGTON, D. C
NOV 26 1905

FUTURE MUSICAL EVENTS.

It will be good news to the musical public of this city that arrangements have been made whereby the chief subsidiary organization of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—the Boston Symphony Quartet—will give a series of three evenings of chamber music in the New Willard on Mondays, December 18, January 22, and March 26. As the name implies, the quartet is an integral part of the orchestra. Its members are members of the orchestra, and its management is the same. Its leader and first violin, Prof. Willy Hess, is the concert master of the orchestra. Its second violin, Mr. Otto Roth, occupies the second desk among the first violins of the orchestra, and its viola, Mr. Emile Ferir, and 'cello, Mr. Heinrich Warnke, are the principal players of their respective instruments in the parent organization.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the second concert in the course of five at the National Theater Tuesday afternoon, December 5, at 4:30.

This concert will introduce as conductor the famous French composer, M. Vincent d'Indy, who comes to this country by special invitation to conduct a series of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

STAR
ASHINGTON, D. C
NO. 26 1905

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the second concert in the course of five at the National Theater Tuesday afternoon, December 5, at 4:30. Mr. Gericke will conduct four of the five concerts, the first, third, fourth and fifth. The second will serve to introduce M. Vincent d'Indy, the eminent French composer, who has been invited to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a series of its concerts. His program will consist entirely of works of the modern French school. Seats now on sale at T. Arthur Smith's, 1327 F street.

spaper Cutting Bureau in the World
TIMES.
WASHINGTON, D. C
NOV 26 1905

Among the important arrivals this week was the famous French composer Vincent d'Indy, who comes to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a series of concerts. He will make his first appearance in New York on Thursday evening, December 7. M. d'Indy is one of the leading musicians in France. He will be in America about three weeks.

[113]

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
STAR.
WASHINGTON, D. C
NOV 26 1905

Boston Symphony Quartet.

Arrangements have been made by which the famous Boston Symphony Quartet will give three evenings of chamber music in the New Willard Hotel on December 18, January 22 and March 26. As the name implies, the Boston Symphony Quartet is an integral part of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and is the chief subsidiary organization of the remarkable body of artists, its members being the principal players of string instruments in the orchestra. The leader and first violin is Prof. Willy Hess, concert master of the orchestra. Its second violin, Mr. Otto Roth, occupies the second desk among the first violins of the orchestra. Mr. Emile Ferir, viola, is the principal player of that instrument in the parent organization, as is Mr. Heinrich Warnke, the 'cello.

TIMES.
WASHINGTON, D. C
NOV 26 1905

Boston Symphony.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its second concert in the course of five at the National Theater Tuesday afternoon, December 5, at 4:30. Mr. Gericke will conduct four of the concerts, the first, third, fourth, and fifth. The second will serve to introduce as conductor M. Vincent d'Indy, one of France's greatest living composers, who has been invited to come to America to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a series of its concerts. His program will consist entirely of new works of the modern French school.

POST
ASHINGTON, D. C
NOV 26 1905

M. d'Indy Will Direct Here.

Monsieur Vincent d'Indy, the distinguished French composer and conductor, who reached America last Tuesday from Paris, has begun his rehealsals with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston, preparatory to conducting that organization in a series of concerts in French music. The concert in Washington will be given in the New National Theater on Tuesday afternoon, December 5. Following the best usage of Paris, there will be no soloist, but the programme is most interesting, and is expected to attract widespread attention.

The first number will be a symphony which Washington will hear for the second time in America, the symphony in B flat by Chausson, which is still in manuscript, despite the fact that its composer has been dead for several years. The rest of the programme includes a movement from Franck's "Psyche," two Nocturnes by Debussy, the "Chant Funebre," by Alberic Magnard and Monsieur d'Indy's own "Istar" variations. It is a question if all of these works are not new to Washington. Certainly they are representative of the best that has been done in French music for a generation.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
POST
WASHINGTON, D. C
DEC 3 - 1905

Noisy Seat-takers.

This department of The Post has repeatedly of late been receiving complaints from concert-goers of disturbances caused by the late arrival of ticket-holders to musical entertainments. The following protest is published as an example of several of the same character.

The Emma Eames concert was so beautiful and the "support" so musically good, that it would have been an afternoon of undiluted pleasure but for the disturbance caused by the late comers and the noise consequent on seating them.

We are soon to have a Boston Symphony concert, led by a distinguished French composer, his first appearance here, if I mistake not, and would not this be a fitting occasion to practice a little self-restraint and show him that we Washingtonians are not quite so uncivilized as we must appear to those who come among us as strangers? I allude to the practice of seating late-comers during the singing or playing of a number and the consequent annoyance and disturbance caused by the slamming open of seats and crowding past those people who have taken the pains to arrive on time. It would seem to be an easy matter to instruct the ushers that no one may be led to a seat during the music and to direct that all persons who arrive late should remain standing in the rear aisles until the next intermission.

rom WASHINGTON, D. C
ddress
ate

An Advance Criticism

ONE OF THE GREATEST musical events in Washington last season was the arrival here of the pianist and composer, Eugene D'Albert. The greatest event of the previous season was the appearance here of Richard Strauss. Next week will bring Vincent D'Indy, the Frenchman. He is one of the most eminent of living composers and conductors, and his participation in the Boston Symphony concert next Tuesday makes of that occasion a red-letter day in our history.

Mr. SIDNEY LLOY
Who Sang in Recital at t

Judging from previous experience, however, subscribers may know in advance how the daily newspapers will not handle this important news happening. Washington readers may feel reasonably certain that none of the daily papers will send a reporter to interview D'Indy, or that if they do, they will be careful to select for this mission the very highest authorities on base ball or the most expert political satirists on their staffs.

Unless there be a sudden revolution in the methods of Washington daily newspapers the public may rest assured that there will be no account in their columns of Albèric Magnard (said to be son of one of the editors of Figaro and pupil of D'Indy), whose "Chant funèbre" is to be performed next Tuesday. Magnard is practically unknown in this country, although he has composed an orchestral suite; three, or possibly more than three, symphonies, a quintet for piano and wood instruments, a violin sonata, songs, pianoforte pieces, a string quartet, and at least two operas. His name does not appear in the dictionaries, nor has it figured, so far as can be learned, on any of the programs of our important orchestras. Both his name and his works are absolute novelties to this public. There is hardly any danger, however, that any of this information will be conveyed to Washingtonians in the Sunday papers, it being contrary to the policy of those sheets to furnish their readers with musical news of any importance which might possibly advertise a concert, or a composer, or the author of a umsical book.

Here is some information which in all probability will not be found in any of the newspapers to-morrow regarding Chausson, another French composer, practically unknown in America, whose symphony in B Flat, Op. 20, heads the program on Tuesday: Chausson died a few years ago as the result of an accident which befell him while riding a bicycle. His opera, "Le Roi Arthus," has been written and talked of extensively in Europe, where it has had several performances. His works include songs, piano pieces, an instrumental trio, a concerto, a symphonic poem and a lyric drama, "Hélène."

It might be too much of an advertisement for next Tuesday's concert were any of the daily papers to state to-morrow that the two of the set of three "Nocturnes" by Debussy, which we are invited to hear, enjoy the distinction of having confounded Boston and Boston critics at their performance in that city in February, 1904. The nocturnes were performed twice during the one concert on this occasion. They were considered too difficult to be understood from a first rendition, and it was thought that a repetition would assist the audience towards a comprehension of the music. Debussy is the man who has tried to put into musical notation the overtones which are present in all music but which are most distinctly heard in chimes and huge-mouthed bells.

It would be unjust to accuse any of the newspaper in advance of forgetting their advertising principles long enough to mention on Sunday that the symphonic variations, "Istar," by D'Indy, were brought out in Brussels by Ysaye on January 10, 1887, and performed in this country under Theodore Thomas on April 23, 1898. Neither would it be fair for us to suppose that these papers would waste any of their valuable space for the purpose of quoting what Philip Hale wrote on December 9, 1900, to the Musical Courier, concerning this work: "'Istar' is one of the striking works of the modern French school. . . . D'Indy was never a melodist of the first, or even the second rank. There is no gushing fountain in his garden; I see him with a divining rod; he searches for melody; he sinks artesian wells. . . . 'Istar' made so little impression on Mr. Finck that in his notes in the Evening Post of December 1, he spoke of it as though it had never been played in New York: "I regret to say that some of my colleagues in your city (New York) are disposed to shy whenever they see the name of a Frenchman on a program. I remember the should have known better to Chausson's shabby treatment awarded by one who 'Viviane,' Charpentier's 'Impressions d'Italie,' and D'Indy's 'Istar.'"

[redacted]

Newspaper Cutting Bureau of the World
TIMES.
WASHINGTON, D. C
ss
NOV 26 1905

Boston Symphony Quartet.

No concerts that Washington has had in many years have been so successful from every point of view as the series which is being given this winter by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It will therefore be good news to the musical public of this city that arrangements have been made whereby the chief subsidiary organization of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—the Boston Symphony Quartet—will give a series of three evening of chamber music in the New Willard on Mondays, December 18, January 22, and March 26. These concerts will give perfect symmetry to the musical season, for as the Boston Symphony Orchestra is leader in orchestral music, so the Boston Symphony Quartet is in the more intimate form of chamber music.

As the name implies, the quartet is an integral part of the orchestra. Its members are members of the orchestra, and its management is the same. Its leader and first violin, Prof. Willy Hess, is the concert master of the orchestra. Its second violin, Otto Roth, occupies the second desk among the first violins of the orchestra, and its viola, Emile Ferir, and 'cello, Heinrich Warnke, are the principal players of their respective instruments in the parent organization.

The assisting artists will be on a plane with the quartet. At the first concert Washington will make the acquaintance of a new pianist, Mr. Stojesky, who this fall came to America to become head of the piano department in the new Loeb Conservatory of New York. Miss Susan Metcalf, who will assist at the second concert, is an American singer who, in a few seasons has earned for herself the right to be placed among the few artistic interpreters of songs in the world.

The assisting artist at the last concert will be Mme Olga Samarof, the Russo-American pianist whose career in this country, though short has been most successful.

POST
s
NOV 26 1905

FUTURE MUSICAL EVENTS.

It will be good news to the musical public of this city that arrangements have been made whereby the chief subsidiary organization of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—the Boston Symphony Quartet—will give a series of three evenings of chamber music in the New Willard on Mondays, December 18, January 22, and March 26. As the name implies, the quartet is an integral part of the orchestra. Its members are members of the orchestra, and its management is the same. Its leader and first violin, Prof. Willy Hess, is the concert master of the orchestra. Its second violin, Mr. Otto Roth, occupies the second desk among the first violins of the orchestra, and its viola, Mr. Emile Ferir, and 'cello, Mr. Heinrich Warnke, are the principal players of their respective instruments in the parent organization.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the second concert in the course of five at the National Theater Tuesday afternoon, December 5, at 4:30.

This concert will introduce as conductor the famous French composer, M. Vincent d'Indy, who comes to this country by special invitation to conduct a series of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

STAR

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the second concert in the course of five at the National Theater Tuesday afternoon, December 5, at 4:30. Mr. Gericke will conduct four of the five concerts, the first, third, fourth and fifth. The second will serve to introduce M. Vincent d'Indy, the eminent French composer, who has been invited to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a series of its concerts. His program will consist entirely of works of the modern French school. Seats now on sale at T. Arthur Smith's, 1327 F street.

TIMES.
WASHINGTON, D. C
NOV 26 1905

Among the important arrivals this week was the famous French composer Vincent d'Indy, who comes to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a series of concerts. He will make his first appearance in New York on Thursday evening, December 7. M. d'Indy is one of the leading musicians in France. He will be in America about three weeks.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau of the World
TIMES.
WASHINGTON, D. C
NOV 26 1905

Boston Symphony Quartet.

Arrangements have been made by which the famous Boston Symphony Quartet will give three evenings of chamber music in the New Willard Hotel on December 18, January 22 and March 26. As the name implies, the Boston Symphony Quartet is an integral part of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and is the chief subsidiary organization of the remarkable body of artists, its members being the principal players of string instruments in the orchestra. The leader and first violin is Prof. Willy Hess, concert master of the orchestra. Its second violin, Mr. Otto Roth, occupies the second desk among the first violins of the orchestra. Mr. Emile Ferir, viola, is the principal player of that instrument in the parent organization, as is Mr. Heinrich Warnke, the 'cello.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
TIMES.
WASHINGTON, D. C
s
NOV 26 1905

Boston Symphony.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its second concert in the course of five at the National Theater Tuesday afternoon, December 5, at 4:30. Mr. Gericke will conduct four of the concerts, the first, third, fourth, and fifth. The second will serve to introduce as conductor M. Vincent d'Indy, one of France's greatest living composers, who has been invited to come to America to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a series of its concerts. His program will consist entirely of new works of the modern French school.

POST
NOV 26 1905

M. d'Indy Will Direct Here.

Monsieur Vincent d'Indy, the distinguished French composer and conductor, who reached America last Tuesday from Paris, has begun his rehealsals with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston, preparatory to conducting that organization in a series of concerts in French music. The concert in Washington will be given in the New National Theater on Tuesday afternoon, December 5. Following the best usage of Paris, there will be no soloist, but the programme is most interesting, and is expected to attract widespread attention.

The first number will be a symphony which Washington will hear for the second time in America, the symphony in B flat by Chausson, which is still in manuscript, despite the fact that its composer has been dead for several years. The rest of the programme includes a movement from Franck's "Psyche," two Nocturnes by Debussy, the "Chant Funebre," by Alberic Magnard and Monsieur d'Indy's own "Istar" variations. It is a question if all of these works are not new to Washington. Certainly they are representative of the best that has been done in French music for a generation.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau of the World
POST
ss
DEC 3 1905

Noisy Seat-takers.

This department of The Post has repeatedly of late been receiving complaints from concert-goers of disturbances caused by the late arrival of ticket-holders to musical entertainments. The following protest is published as an example of several of the same character.

The Emma Eames concert was so beautiful and the "support" so musically good, that it would have been an afternoon of undiluted pleasure but for the disturbance caused by the late comers and the noise consequent on seating them.

We are soon to have a Boston Symphony concert, led by a distinguished French composer, his first appearance here, if I mistake not, and would not this be a fitting occasion to practice a little self-restraint and show him that we Washingtonians are not quite so uncivilized as we must appear to those who come among us as strangers? I allude to the practice of seating late-comers during the singing or playing of a number and the consequent annoyance and disturbance caused by the slamming open of seats and crowding past those people who have taken the pains to arrive on time. It would seem to be an easy matter to instruct the ushers that no one may be led to a seat during the music and to direct that all persons who arrive late should remain standing in the rear aisles until the next intermission.

POST
WASHINGTON, D. C
DEC 2 - 1905

NOTED COMPOSER WILL DIRECT.

M. d'Indy Will Wield Baton of Boston Symphony Orchestra Tuesday.

The second of the series of five concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the New National Theater Tuesday afternoon at 4:30. The management of the orchestra is much gratified with the way in which Washington welcomed the great band after its absence of seven years. Its concerts here henceforth are certain to be fixtures of the musical season.

The next concert brings to this city the leading composer of France, M. Vincent d'Indy, who will conduct the orchestra in a programme made up entirely of French music of the "new" school. M. d'Indy, the head of the celebrated Schola Cantorum of Paris, a man of noble birth and great wealth—to him belongs the title of marquis, although he does not use it—the most powerful influence in the French musical world of to-day, was invited last summer to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a series of its concerts. He accepted the invitation in the spirit in which it was given—as a compliment to that school of "younger" Frenchmen, followers and pupils of Cesar Franck, one of the undoubted geniuses of the last century, who have done so much to restore symphonic music to its proper place in France. Since Berlioz was young, the theater seemed to have monopolized all the musical talent of the country.

It is M. d'Indy's first visit to America, and Washington will be the second place in America to hear Ernest Chausson's symphony, the honor of the first performance having been given to Philadelphia, where it will be played to-morrow night. This work, which shows all the genius of its lamented composer, has never been printed and is played from a manuscript score which M. d'Indy brought with him from Paris.

The other works will comprise a movement from Franck's "Psyche," two nocturnes by Debussy, Magnard's "Chant Funebre," and d'Indy's symphonic variations, "Istar."

After the best usage which prevails in Paris there will be no soloist, for the programme provides no place for one. Despite this fact, however, it is certain that the New National Theater will be crowded to its utmost capacity, for applications have already been received for nearly all the seats left unsold at the season's sale.

TIMES.
WASHINGTON, D. C
DEC 6 - 1905

D'INDY'S DEBUT HERE HARDLY IMPRESSIVE

Boston Symphony Plays Under Leadership of Interpreter of Modern French School of Music.

If modern French music is to become standard, which is hardly apparent now, it will require a still greater infusion of the latter-day Allemanic idea and decidedly a more aggressive interpretation than that of D'Indy.

This was demonstrated at the National Theater yesterday afternoon, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, packed into a small space, with acoustics in keeping, presented a program of the compositions referred to.

It was but natural that a study of the conductor, new to musical Washington, should come in for the main portion of the audience's attention, and to many he was a disappointment. In all three movements of the Chatusson symphony, which was the opening number, it could easily be seen that he was hardly en rapport with the subjects in "Leit Motif," the characteristics of which made manifest the fact that the writer had been a good student in the Wagner school. His dashes, however, turned the "Gounodish" rhythm into German climaxes with brass concussion here and there that seemed almost too much for the conductor, whose mainstay in these trying instances seemed to be the rhythmic regularity of the wood, wind, and brass section.

Cesar Frank's "Psyche" poem did appeal to d'Indy to a greater extent. The tone picture suggestion demonstrated the later German school, but in concerted sections one could easily discern the old French harmony, now termed modern.

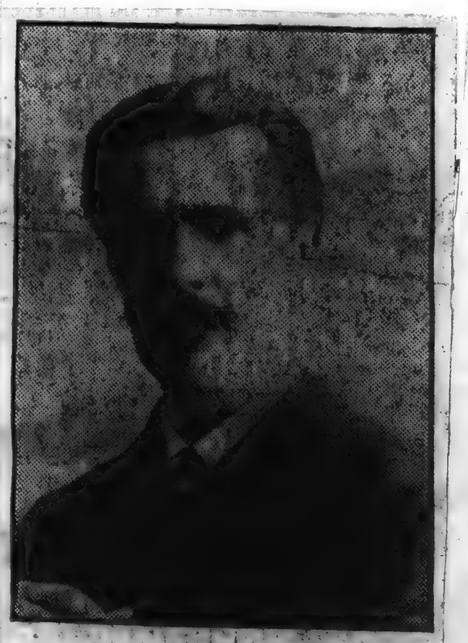
The two plaintive nocturnes of Debussy with their unity of strings and light brass interpolations were acceptable, but hardly impressive, and the same might be said of "Chant Funebre," of Magnard.

It was only at the last, when d'Indy presented his delineation of "Istar," his own writing on a Babylonian poem of many possibilities, that the director seemed to arise to the occasion. He was then reading himself, as it were, and it was not long before the French soul with new melodic embroidery was on the surface.

For the first time it seemed that his orchestra was with him to a man. As scored, the composition, despite weak spots in symphony, gives great opportunity to the concerted possibility of such an organization as the Boston Symphony. D'Indy directed with vigor, as well as dignity, and his band read with him as he interpreted.

But all in all, modern French has some distance yet to rise before the tone finish is reached particularly in proper contrapuntal effect.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
POST
WASHINGTON, D. C
DEC 3 - 1905



M. Vincent d'Indy,
Who will wield the baton of the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Tuesday.

TIMES.
WASHINGTON, D. C.
DEC 6 - 1905

In the distinguished audience at the National yesterday afternoon to hear the Boston Symphony, were the French ambassador, the Brazilian Ambassador and Mme. Nabuco and members of their staff with their wives; the Russian Ambassador and Baroness Rosen, and Baroness Elizabeth Rosen; the Mexican Ambassador and Mme. Casasus, Senor Godoy and Mme. Godoy, with almost all of the [illegible] people [illegible] well as [illegible] lovers present.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
STAR
WASHINGTON, D. C
DEC 6 - 1905

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the National Theater yesterday afternoon was attended by a large and brilliant audience, including the President and Mrs. Roosevelt. The program offered was of the extreme French school and there was not a number that was familiar to any in the audience except the musicians. As Mr. Vincent d'Indy was the conductor, it was but natural that such should be the case if he had the making of the program, and it is but justice to the organization to say that the numbers could not have been better played and to the conductor that they each received the best interpretation.

It is a question as to what rank the French school of composition shall take in the musical world. Some of the effects resulting from the combination of instruments are remarkably fine, notably the idea of exploiting a theme upon the woodwind or brass with a background of delicate embroidery of figurework on the strings, but the climaxes are usually mere noise without definite purpose or irrelevant to the subject under treatment. There was yesterday first a symphony in B flat by Ernest Chaussen in three movements, parts of which were interesting, but in comparison with a Beethoven or Schubert or even a Tschaickowsky symphony it was tame and weak.

The second number was Cesar Franck's "Psyche et Eros," from the "Psyche" suite of that composer, and it was listened to with pleasure and at its conclusion was loudly applauded. It is one of the best expressions of the founder of the French school and was played in faultless style by the orchestra. The two nocturnes by Claude Debussy, "Clouds" and "Fetes," which came next, did not attract much attention, although the latter presented some rhythmic dancing movements that were pleasant and the processional effect was good. The "Chant Funebre," by Alberic Magnard, was a doleful expression of grief, long drawn out, and the hearers were relieved when it was finished.

The last number was M. d'Indy's "Istar" (variations symphoniques), which is practically a symphonic poem and in which the composer displayed all his musical resources, and, as he held the baton, he got from the orchestra the full effect of his score. It was by far the best work of the afternoon, and at the close the conductor-composer was applauded so that he had to return again and again to bow his acknowledgments.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
STAR
WASHINGTON, D. C
DEC 3 - 1905

Boston Symphony Quartet.

The first Washington concert by the Boston Symphony Quartet will be given in the New Willard Hotel, under the local management of Mrs. Katie Wilson Greene, Monday evening, December 18. Three concerts in all will be given here this winter, the second being on Monday, January 22, and the third on Monday, March 26. This quartet, consisting of Prof. Willy Hess and Mr. Otto Roth, violins; Mr. Emile Ferir, viola, and Mr. Heinrich Warnke, 'cello, is now in the second year of its existence and is reckoned among the best organizations of its kind in the world.

The assisting artist at the first concert will be Mr. Sigismond Stojowski, a Polish pianist, who is at the head of the piano department of the new institute of musical art in New York. The program for the first concert comprises Beethoven's B-flat quartet, opus. 18, No. 6; Mr. Sigismond Stojowswi's sonata for violin and piano in G major and Schubert's posthumus quartet in D minor.

TIMES
WASHINGTON, D. C
DEC 6 - 1905

ROOSEVELTS HEAR BOSTON SYMPHONY

President Gave Family Box Party.

FAIRBANKS SEE JOHN DREW

Forakers Entertain at Dinner for Miss McAdoo, Daughter of Ex-Assistant Secretary of the Navy.

The President and Mrs. Roosevelt were in a box at the National yesterday afternoon to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra. With them were Miss Roosevelt, Mrs. Douglas Robinson, the President's sister; Miss Carow, Mrs. Roosevelt's sister, and Senator and Mrs. Lodge. Mrs. Roosevelt wore a gown of cadet blue and a black hat, while Miss Roosevelt wore a gown of deep heliotrope color and a toque of the same shade trimmed with shaded plumes.

POST
WASHINGTON, D. C
DEC 6 - 1905

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

It is a well-known fact that after a certain number of vibrations sound ceases to be musical, and it depends largely upon the ears of persons whether it is so even up to this point. It is also tolerably plain to most observers that the Gallic race in its mad pursuit of the new in anything is generally carried to extremes by its zeal.

These facts were forcibly brought to mind by the music of the modern French composers, which was presented in the National Theater yesterday afternoon by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of one of the most distinguished representatives of the cult, Mr. Vincent d'Indy.

The French moderns have caused the musical world to vibrate with their efforts considerably beyond the point where their compositions are music for the average ear. The audience, which included the President, with Mrs. and Miss Roosevelt, was in a rather receptive mood yesterday, and gave evidence of doing its best to digest what was set before it. The struggle, however, was somewhat apparent, and doubtless there are many cases of acute musical indigestion this morning. It cannot be laid at the door of this school that it was due to any great diversity of offerings. The composers on the programme all have the proper school spirit, and rigidly follow the precepts of their instructor and prophet Cesar Franck. That he is in danger of being supplanted by any of his followers was not shown yesterday.

That there is much in the music given yesterday to justify the enthusiasm of its followers is happily true. The composers have aimed at and reached many telling combinations of instruments in their orchestration. In this respect Mr. d'Indy's "Istar," a very up-to-date setting of an old Babylonian poem, was the most shining example.

Some of the new ideas have been carried to the point where they are merely an affectation and pose. The aristocrats of the classical period have been as ruthlessly put to death as were those of the old regime by the citizens of the republic. There is one effect which seems to be dear to the whole school, that of a theme in the brass or woodwinds against a swirling figure on the strings. And it is not so very advanced, either. Wagner used it in "Tannhauser." In fact, there was more than one reminder of Richard during the programme.

The symphony of Ernest Chasson suggested what Wagner might have been if he had not been what he was. This symphony, given for the second time in this country yesterday, was disappointing. It is in three movements, and none of them reached the heights which their markings demand. The second movement, the title of which should be 'Grief,' was more characteristic of melancholy than of any deep-seated grief. It was beautiful and it was superficial. The whole symphony sounded thin and seemed like so much diluted Wagner. The concluding movement, "Anime," recalled the "Ride of the Valkyries." Their call was even present to heighten the illusion. It was, however, a very gentle ride: the horses were not shod with fire, and behaved most beautifully.

The "Psyche and Eros," from Cesar Franck's symphonic poem, was by far the best expression of the attempts of the French school to have music tell of different moods. It is a very frank representation of the joy of Cupid and Psyche, and indicates all the complexities of love. It was played by the orchestra in a manner that would make its Beacon street admirers sit up and take notice. Long has been the time since so much emotion was displayed by this orchestra. Mr. Gericke was off having his holiday, and his men, with Mr. d'Indy, plunged into the sea of Franck's love music. After which they had to give their attention to some of the most advanced of all the advanced music.

Claude Debussy is credited with putting into musical notation the overtones. At the conclusion of his "Clouds," one could believe him capable of anything. These clouds are described as "gray agonies tinted with white." They certainly are gray, but the white tints are not so easily discernable. Is it possible that "Clouds" is to be the music of the future?

The "Festivals," by the same composer, presented nature in a more pleasing aspect. There were lots of white tints here and even more highly colored ones. Let it be hoped that Debussy's muse will not affect a gray cloak, for he is still living and we will doubtless hear much from him.

The "Chant Funebre," by Alberic Magnard, was a very sad and very long expression of grief, composed in memory of his father. No one, after hearing the piece, could possibly accuse this composer of being anything but the most devoted of sons.

Mr. d'Indy was decidedly pleasing as a conductor. His methods are quiet and unobtrusive. He probably never had a finer medium than the Boston orchestra to express the ideas of the school in which he believes. There was nothing lacking in the playing of these ideas or in the conducting of that playing. The shortcomings were in the ideas themselves.

H. B.

POST
WASHINGTON, D. C
DEC 2 - 1905

Boston Symphony Quartet.

The first Washington concert by the celebrated Boston Symphony Quartet will be given in the ballroom of the New Willard under the local management of Mrs. Katie Wilson Greene, Monday evening, December 18. Three concerts will be given here this winter, the second being on Monday, January 22 and the third on Monday, March 26.

The quartet consisting of Prof. Will Hess and Otto Roth, violins; Emile Ferir, viola, and Heinrich Warnkes, 'cello, is now in the second years of its existence and is reckoned among the best organizations of its kind in the world. All of its members are principal players of their several instruments in the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Prof. Hess is concermaster and one of the favorite soloists of that organization. The four men have had long experience in chamber music work in Europe before they came to America.

The assisting artist at the first concert will be Sigismond Stojowski, a famous Polish pianist, who is at the head of the piano department of the new institute of musical art in New York. The program for the first concert comprices Beethoven's B flat quartet, opus 18, No. 6; Sigismond Stojowski's sonata for violin and piano in G major, and Schubert's posthumus quartet in D minor.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
STAR
WASHINGTON, D. C
DEC 3 - 1905

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The second of the series of five concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the New National Theater Tuesday afternoon at 4:30. The next concert brings to this city the eminent French composer, M. Vincent d'Indy, who will conduct the orchestra in a program made up entirely of French music of the "new" school. M. d'Indy is the head of the celebrated Schola Cantorum of Paris, the most powerful influences in the French musical world of today. It is M. d'Indy's first visit to America, and he has been looking forward to the Washington concert with even more eagerness than he did toward Boston and New York. and for Washington he chose what seems to be the most interesting of the three programs he has arranged. Washington will be the second place in America to hear Ernest Chausson's symphony, the honor of the first performance having been given to Philadelphia, where it will be played to-morrow night. This work has never been printed and is played from a manuscript score which M. d'Indy brought with him from Paris.

The other works will comprise a move- [illegible] two noc- [illegible] Magnard's "Chant [illegible] symphonic varia- [illegible] usage which [illegible] no soloist [illegible] for one

The first Washington concert by the Boston Symphony Quartet will be given in the New Willard Hotel under the local management of Mrs. Katie Wilson Greene, on Monday evening, December 18. Three concerts in all will be given here this winter, the second being on Monday, January 22, and the third on Monday, March 26. The sale of season tickets is now in progress and applications should be made to Mrs. Greene, 1214 F street.

[114]

POST
WASHINGTON D C
DEC 3- 1903

NOTED COMPOSER WILL DIRECT.

M. d'Indy Will Wield Baton of Boston Symphony Orchestra Tuesday.

The second of the series of five concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the New National Theater Tuesday afternoon at 4:30. The management of the orchestra is much gratified with the way in which Washington welcomed the great band after its absence of seven years. Its concerts here henceforth are certain to be fixtures of the musical season.

The next concert brings to this city the leading composer of France, M. Vincent d'Indy, who will conduct the orchestra in a programme made up entirely of French music of the "new" school. M. d'Indy, the head of the celebrated Schola Cantorum of Paris, a man of noble birth and great wealth—to him belongs the title of marquis, although he does not use it—the most powerful influence in the French musical world of to-day, was invited last summer to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a series of its concerts. He accepted the invitation in the spirit in which it was given—as a compliment to that school of "younger" Frenchmen, followers and pupils of Cesar Franck, one of the undoubted geniuses of the last century, who have done so much to restore symphonic music to its proper place in France. Since Berlioz was young, the theater seemed to have monopolized all the musical talent of the country.

It is M. d'Indy's first visit to America, and Washington will be the second place in America to hear Ernest Chausson's symphony, the honor of the first performance having been given to Philadelphia, where it will be played to-morrow night. This work, which shows all the genius of its lamented composer, has never been printed and is played from a manuscript score which M. d'Indy brought with him from Paris.

The other works will comprise a movement from Franck's "Psyche," two nocturnes by Debussy, Magnard's "Chant Funebre," and d'Indy's symphonic variations, "Istar."

After the best usage which prevails in Paris there will be no soloist, for the programme provides no place for one. Despite this fact, however, it is certain that the New National Theater will be crowded to its utmost capacity, for applications have already been received for nearly all the seats left unsold at the season's sale.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
POST
WASHINGTON D C
DEC 3- 1903

Boston Symphony Quartet.

The first Washington concert by the celebrated Boston Symphony Quartet will be given in the ballroom of the New Willard under the local management of Mrs. Katie Wilson Greene, Monday evening, December 18. Three concerts will be given here this winter, the second being on Monday, January 22 and the third on Monday, March 26.

The quartet consisting of Prof. Will Hess and Otto Roth, violins; Emile Ferir, viola, and Heinrich Warnkes, 'cello, is now in the second years of its existence and is reckoned among the best organizations of its kind in the world. All of its members are principal players of their several instruments in the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Prof. Hess is concermaster and one of the favorite soloists of that organization. The four men have had long experience in chamber music work in Europe before they came to America.

The assisting artist at the first concert will be Sigismond Stojowski, a famous Polish pianist, who is at the head of the piano department of the new institute of musical art in New York. The program for the first concert comprices Beethoven's B flat quartet, opus 18, No. 6; Sigismond Stojowski's sonata for violin and piano in G major, and Schubert's posthumus quartet in D minor.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The second of the series of five concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the New National Theater Tuesday afternoon at 4:30. The next concert brings to this city the eminent French composer, M. Vincent d'Indy, who will conduct the orchestra in a program made up entirely of French music of the "new" school. M. d'Indy is the head of the celebrated Schola Cantorum of Paris, the most powerful influence in the French musical world of today. It is M. d'Indy's first visit to America, and he has been looking forward to the Washington concert with even more eagerness than he did toward Boston and New York, and for Washington he chose what seems to be the most interesting of the three programs he has arranged. Washington will be the second place in America to hear Ernest Chausson's symphony, the honor of the first performance having been given to Philadelphia, where it will be played to-morrow night. This work has never been printed and is played from a manuscript score which M. d'Indy brought with him from Paris.

The other works will comprise a movement from Franck's "Psyche," two nocturnes by Debussy, Magnard's "Chant Funebre" and d'Indy's symphonic variations, "Istar." After the best usage which prevails in Paris, there will be no soloist, for the program provides no place for one.

TIMES
WASHINGTON, D. C.
DEC 6- 1903

D'INDY'S DEBUT HERE HARDLY IMPRESSIVE

Boston Symphony Plays Under Leadership of Interpreter of Modern French School of Music.

If modern French music is to become standard, which is hardly apparent now, it will require a still greater infusion of the latter-day Allemanic idea and decidedly a more aggressive interpretation than that of D'Indy.

This was demonstrated at the National Theater yesterday afternoon, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, packed into a small space, with acoustics in keeping, presented a program of the compositions referred to.

It was but natural that a study of the conductor, new to musical Washington, should come in for the main portion of the audience's attention, and to many he was a disappointment. In all three movements of the Chausson symphony, which was the opening number, it could easily be seen that he was hardly en rapport with the subjects in "Leit Motif," the characteristics of which made manifest the fact that the writer had been a good student in the Wagner school. His dashes, however, turned the "Gounodish" rhythm into German climaxes with brass concussion here and there that seemed almost too much for the conductor, whose mainstay in these trying instances seemed to be the rhythmic regularity of the wood, wind, and brass section.

Cesar Frank's "Psyche" poem did appeal to d'Indy to a greater extent. The tone picture suggestion demonstrated the later German school, but in concerted sections one could easily discern the old French harmony, now termed modern.

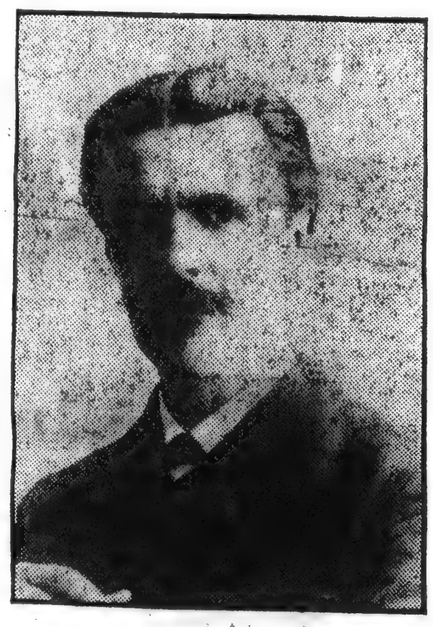
The two plaintive nocturnes of Debussy with their unity of strings and light brass interpolations were acceptable, but hardly impressive, and the same might be said of "Chant Funebre," of Magnard.

It was only at the last, when d'Indy presented his delineation of "Istar," his own writing on a Babylonian poem of many possibilities, that the director seemed to arise to the occasion. He was then reading himself, as it were, and it was not long before the French soul with new melodie embroidery was on the surface.

For the first time it seemed that his orchestra was with him to a man. As scored, the composition, despite weak spots in symphony, gives great opportunity to the concerted possibility of such an organization as the Boston Symphony. D'Indy directed with vigor, as well as dignity, and his band read with him as he interpreted.

But all in all, modern French has some distance yet to rise before the tone finish is reached, particularly in proper contrapuntal effect.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
POST
DEC 3- 1903



M. Vincent d'Indy,
Who will wield the baton of the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Tuesday.

TIMES.
WASHINGTON, D. C.
DEC 3- 1903

In the distinguished audience at the National yesterday afternoon to hear the Boston Symphony, were the French ambassador, the Brazilian Ambassador and Mme. Nabuco and members of their staff with their wives; the Russian Ambassador and Baroness Rosen, and Baroness Elizabeth Rosen; the Mexican Ambassador and Mme. Casasus, Senor Godoy and Mme. Godoy, with almost all of the society people of the city as well as music lovers present.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
STAR.
DEC 3- 1903

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the National Theater yesterday afternoon was attended by a large and brilliant audience, including the President and Mrs. Roosevelt. The program offered was of the extreme French school and there was not a number that was familiar to any in the audience except the musicians. As Mr. Vincent d'Indy was the conductor, it was but natural that such should be the case if he had the making of the program, and it is but justice to the organization to say that the unmbers could not have been better played and to the conductor that they each received the best interpretation.

It is a question as to what rank the French school of composition shall take in the musical world. Some of the effects resulting from the combination of instruments are remarkably fine, notably the idea of exploiting a theme upon the woodwind or brass with a background of delicate embroidery of figurework on the strings, but the climaxes are usually mere noise without definite purpose or irrelevant to the subject under treatment. There was yesterday first a symphony in B flat by Ernest Chaussen in three movements, parts of which were interesting, but in comparison with a Beethoven or Schubert or even a Tschaickowsky symphony it was tame and weak.

The second number was Cesar Franck's "Psyche et Eros," from the "Psyche" suite of that composer, and it was listened to with pleasure and at its conclusion was loudly applauded. It is one of the best expressions of the founder of the French school and was played in faultless style by the orchestra. The two nocturnes by Claude Debussy, "Clouds" and "Fetes," which came next, did not attract much attention, although the latter presented some rhythmic dancing movements that were pleasant and the processional effect was good. The "Chant Funebre," by Alberic Magnard, was a doleful expression of grief, long drawn out, and the hearers were relieved when it was finished.

The last number was M. d'Indy's "Istar" (variations symphoniques), which is practically a symphonic poem and in which the composer displayed all his musical resources, and, as he held the baton, he got from the orchestra the full effect of his score. It was by far the best work of the afternoon, and at the close the conductor-composer was applauded so that he had to return again and again to bow his acknowledgments.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
STAR.
WASHINGTON, D. C.

Boston Symphony Quartet.

The first Washington concert by the Boston Symphony Quartet will be given in the New Willard Hotel, under the local management of Mrs. Katie Wilson Greene, Monday evening, December 18. Three concerts in all will be given here this winter, the second being on Monday, January 22, and the third on Monday, March 26. This quartet, consisting of Prof. Willy Hess and Mr. Otto Roth, violins; Mr. Emile Ferir, viola, and Mr. Heinrich Warnke, 'cello, is now in the second year of its existence and is reckoned among the best organizations of its kind in the world.

The assisting artist at the first concert will be Mr. Sigismond Stojowski, a Polish pianist, who is at the head of the piano department of the new institute of musical art in New York. The program for the first concert comprises Beethoven's B-flat quartet, opus. 18, No. 6; Mr. Sigismond Stojowswi's sonata for violin and piano in G major and Schubert's posthumus quartet in D minor.

TIMES
WASHINGTON, D. C.

ROOSEVELTS HEAR BOSTON SYMPHONY

President Gave Family Box Party.

FAIRBANKS SEE JOHN DREW

Forakers Entertain at Dinner for Miss McAdoo, Daughter of Ex-Assistant Secretary of the Navy.

The President and Mrs. Roosevelt were in a box at the National yesterday afternoon to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra. With them were Miss Roosevelt, Mrs. Douglas Robinson, the President's sister; Miss Carow, Mrs. Roosevelt's sister, and Senator and Mrs. Lodge. Mrs. Roosevelt wore a gown of cadet blue and a black hat, while Miss Roosevelt wore a gown of deep heliotrope color and a toque of the same shade trimmed with shaded plumes.

POST
WASHINGTON, D. C.
DEC 6- 1903

CONCERT BY THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

It is a well-known fact that after a certain number of vibrations sound ceases to be musical, and it depends largely upon the ears of persons whether it is so even up to this point. It is also tolerably plain to most observers that the Gallic race in its mad pursuit of the new in anything is generally carried to extremes by its zeal.

These facts were forcibly brought to mind by the music of the modern French composers, which was presented in the National Theater yesterday afternoon by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of one of the most distinguished representatives of the cult, Mr. Vincent d'Indy.

The French moderns have caused the musical world to vibrate with their efforts considerably beyond the point where their compositions are music for the average ear. The audience, which included the President, with Mrs. and Miss Roosevelt, was in a rather receptive mood yesterday, and gave evidence of doing its best to digest what was set before it. The struggle, however, was somewhat apparent, and doubtless there are many cases of acute musical indigestion this morning. It cannot be laid at the door of this school that it was due to any great diversity of offerings. The composers on the programme all have the proper school spirit, and rigidly follow the precepts of their instructor and prophet Cesar Franck. That he is in danger of being supplanted by any of his followers was not shown yesterday.

That there is much in the music given yesterday to justify the enthusiasm of its followers is happily true. The composers have aimed at and reached many telling combinations of instruments in their orchestration. In this respect Mr. d'Indy's "Istar," a very up-to-date setting of an old Babylonian poem, was the most shining example.

Some of the new ideas have been carried to the point where they are merely an affectation and pose. The aristocrats of the classical period have been as ruthlessly put to death as were those of the old regime by the citizens of the republic. There is one effect which seems to be dear to the whole school, that of a theme in the brass or woodwinds against a swirling figure on the strings. And it is not so very advanced, either. Wagner used it in "Tannhauser." In fact, there was more than one reminder of Richard during the programme.

The symphony of Ernest Chasson suggested what Wagner might have been if he had not been what he was. This symphony, given for the second time in this country yesterday, was disappointing. It is in three movements, and none of them reached the heights which their markings demand. The second movement, "the title of which should be 'Grief,'" was more characteristic of melancholy than of any deep-seated grief. It was beautiful and it was superficial. The whole symphony sounded thin and seemed like so much diluted Wagner. The concluding movement, "Anime," recalled the "Ride of the Valkyries." Their call was even present to heighten the illusion. It was, however, a very gentle ride: the horses were not shod with fire, and behaved most beautifully.

The "Psyche and Eros," from Cesar Franck's symphonic poem, was by far the best expression of the attempts of the French school to have music tell of different moods. It is a very frank representation of the joy of Cupid and Psyche, and indicates all the complexities of love. It was played by the orchestra in a manner that would make its Beacon street admirers sit up and take notice. Long has been the time since so much emotion was displayed by this orchestra. Mr. Gericke was off having his holiday, and his men, with Mr. d'Indy, plunged into the sea of Franck's love music. After which they had to give their attention to some of the most advanced of all the advanced music.

Claude Debussy is credited with putting into musical notation the overtones. At the conclusion of his "Clouds," one could believe him capable of anything. These clouds are described as "gray agonies tinted with white." They certainly are gray, but the white tints are not so easily discernable. Is it possible that "Clouds" is to be the music of the future?

The "Festivals," by the same composer, presented nature in a more pleasing aspect. There were lots of white tints here, and even more highly colored ones. Let it be hoped that Debussy's muse will not affect a gray cloak, for he is still living, and we will doubtless hear much from him.

The "Chant Funebre," by Alberic Magnard, was a very sad and very long expression of grief, composed in memory of his father. No one, after hearing the piece, could possibly accuse this composer of being anything but the most devoted of sons.

Mr. d'Indy was decidedly pleasing as a conductor. His methods are quiet and unobtrusive. He probably never had a finer medium than the Boston orchestra to express the ideas of the school in which he believes. There was nothing lacking in the playing of these ideas or in the conducting of that playing. The shortcomings were in the ideas themselves.

H. R. A.

The first Washington concert by the Boston Symphony Quartet will be given in the New Willard Hotel under the local management of Mrs. Katie Wilson Greene, on Monday evening, December 18. Three concerts in all will be given here this winter, the second being on Monday, January 22, and the third on Monday, March 26. The sale of season tickets is now in progress and applications should be made to Mrs. Greene, 1214 F street.

[114]

From LIFE
Address WASHINGTON, D. C.
Date DEC - 9 1905

"Little by little," wrote Alfred Bruneau, the critic and composer, "the public will lose what it can of its bad habits—if it became perfect we should have to give up fighting, which would be a pity, for contradiction is the best stimulant; it will allow itself to be lulled, consoled, raised, carried away by the chorus, murmuring and caressing, now terrible and formidable of ...sal poetry; and the artistic sincerity of progress, daring, ...strength, and of genius, will be once again the conqueror of the world."

Two Opinions of the French School

THE PARISIAN public has been gradually educated to a high degree of musical appreciation. It has come to accept the works of the advanced school of French composers, readjusting its ideals from the Wagnerian plane to the more exacting demands of Cèsar Franck and his followers now headed by Vincent D'Indy. No criticism written from Washington can affect the standing of D'Indy and the French school one iota; but superficial or derogatory comment upon the man and the school he represents is capable of doing the greatest possible injury to the writer of such and to the reputation of the city in which that writer lives. The three daily papers of this city suffered great injury through their criticisms of last Tuesday's Boston Symphony Orchestra concert printed in their columns, and the city of Washington, through them, may be made the object of ridicule in Boston and elsewhere.

Vincent D'Indy is the dominant spirit of a great art movement which has been growing in Paris for a quarter century or more. Paris is a fitting laboratory for the creation and culture of just such a movement. She has two subventioned theaters in which the works of native composers are welcomed. Around the famous Paris conservatory the names of great composers have clustered for a long period of years. They have been working for the musical preëminence of France, have drawn to themselves the talented young men of the country and have nurtured them into being. In England, one man, Elgar, has come to wear the crown of musical kingship; in Germany, Strauss, alone, of the younger men, has climbed to the highest achievements in the art; Russia brought forth but one Tschaikowsky and a host of smaller men; but France can boast of a modern school of composers, all more or less on equal footing. It is her aim and expectation to wrest from Germany the musical chieftainship of the world and to ride at the head of the world's columns the champion of artistic accomplishment.

Already she has progressed so far that she is no longer in the position of an unrecognized applicant for honors, but has become so dangerous an artistic rival of Germany that the majority of votes seem already to have been cast in her favor.

For years the works of the new school of French composers have been performed and written of in Boston and other musical centers of this country; but Washington, peculiarly tardy and unsophisticated in such matters, has heard little of these important world-movements. The Washington newspapers have suppressed all facts concerning the new French school and its art campaign, refusing to accept articles dealing with Debussy and other Frenchmen whose names will go down into history, on the ground that no advertisements were to be gained by allegiance to such composers. It was considered fair to their readers and subscribers for the newspapers to deprive the Washington public of a knowledge of all the great world-movements in music and to feed that public upon the chaff of local studio gossip. Is it any wonder, then, with such small opportunity for education and enlightenment, that the local newspaper critics should have found so little to praise or admire in judging of these patriotic Frenchmen whose orchestral work they listened to for the first time. The Boston Transcript of December 2 devoted a column and a half to the first appearance of D'Indy in Boston, and all of this article was penned in a sympathetic vein with no condemnation or derogatory opinion. The man who wrote the article has had years of preparation for the hearing and understanding of this music, which the critics of the local Washington papers have not had. Which of the two diverse opinions will have the greater influence upon the world of music, that of the Boston Transcript commending D'Indy and French music or that of the combined daily newspaper critics of Washington who depreciated them?

MARGARET
Contralto with the S
Company at the Co

STAR
WASHINGTON, D. C.
ess
DEC 13 1905

Boston Symphony Quartet.

The first concert in Washington of the Boston Symphony Quartet, which will be given in the ball room of the New Willard on next Monday (December 18) evening, will bring to this city a distinguished company of musicians, including Prof. Wully Hess, the first violin and leader; Mr. Otto Roth, second violin; Mr. Emile Ferir, viola, and Mr. Heinrich Warnke, 'cellist. The assisting artist will be Mr. Sigismun stojowsky, a Polish pianist and composer of eminence.

BALTIMORE
NOV 28 1905

Mr. Gericke to Retire.

According to the weekly paper, Musical America, Wilhelm Gericke may retire as conducter of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of the present season. "The story is afloat," it says, "that the management of the orchestra has made an offer to Gustav Mahler, director of the Vienna Opera. Mahler is one of the famous conducters in Europe, besides having full artistic control of the Vienna Opera House. Herr Mahler's present contract in Vienna expires soon. Other men who have been mentioned as possible candidates for the post are Felix Weingartner and Vincent d'Indy.

"Mahler was born July 7, 1860, in Kalitsch, Bohemia. Without a teacher he developed himself into a masterly conductor, good pianist, and individual poet. He began his work at the Court Theater at Cassel, and was then conductor at Leipsic, Prague, and Budapest, and later Jahn's successor at Vienna. From the first he had to contend with difficulties, plots and intrigues of various sorts, and there is every appearance that he will not renew his contract, which soon expires.

"Mahler has also a reputation as a composer, his fourth symphony having received its first performance in England, October 25, at London."

HERALD
BALTIMORE, MD.
NOV 24 1905

Monsieur Vincent d'Indy, the distinguished French composer and conductor, who reached America last Tuesday from Paris, has begun his rehearsals with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston preparatory to conducting that organization in a series of modern French music. The concert in Baltimore will be given in the Lyric on Wednesday evening, December 6. Following the best usage of Paris, there will be no soloist. The program is most interesting and is expected to attract widespread attention.

The first work on the program will be Monsieur d'Indy's own second symphony in B flat, which has been played both by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Philadelphia Orchestra in this country with very great success. It will be most instructive to observe the composer's own reading of the work. Other numbers will be Franck's suite, "Pelleas et Melisande," written for Maeterlinck's play of the same name; D'Indy's "Saugefleurie," a legende, and Paul Dukas' "L'Apprenti Sorcier."

AMERICAN
ess
1905

D'Indy Leads Boston Symphony.

M. Vincent d'Indy, the distinguished French composer and conductor, who reached America last Tuesday from Paris, has begun his rehearsals with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Boston, preparatory to conducting that organization in a series of modern French music. The concert in Baltimore will be given in the Lyric, Wednesday evening, December 6.

The first work will be Monsieur d'Indy's second symphony in B-flat, which has been played both by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Philadelphia Orchestra in this country with great success. It will be instructive to observe the composer's own reading of the work. Other numbers will be Franck's Suite "Pelleas et Melisande," written for Maeterlinck's play of the same name; D'Indy's "Saugefleurie," a legend, and Paul Dukas' "L'Apprenti Sorcier."

AMERICAN
ess
NOV 24 1905

D'Indy With Boston Symphony.

Monsieur Vincent d'Indy, the distinguished French composer and conductor, who reached America last Tuesday from Paris, has begun his rehearsals with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston preparatory to conducting that organization in a series of concerts of modern French music. The concert in Baltimore will be given in the Lyric on Wednesday evening, December 6. Following the best customs of Paris there will be no soloist. The program is most interesting and is expected to attract widespread attention.

The first work on the program will be Monsieur d'Indy's own second symphony in B-flat, which has been played both by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Philadelphia Orchestra in this country with very great success. It will be most instructive to observe the composer's own reading of the work. Other numbers will be Franck's Suite "Pelleas et Melisande," written for Maeterlinck's play of the same name; d'Indy's "Saugefleurie," a legende, and Paul Dukas' "L'Apprenti Sorcier."

From ..... Life.

Address ..... Washington, D. C.

Date .....

"Little by little," wrote Alfred Bruneau, the critic and composer, "the public will lose what it can of its bad habits—if it became perfect we should have to give up fighting, which would be a pity, for contradiction is the best stimulant; it will allow itself to be lulled, consoled, raised, carried away by the chorus, murmuring and caressing, now terrible and formidable of real poetry; and the artistic sincerity of progress, daring, strength, and of genius, will be once again the conqueror of the world."

Two Opinions of the French School

THE PARISIAN public has been gradually educated to a high degree of musical appreciation. It has come to accept the works of the advanced school of French composers, readjusting its ideals from the Wagnerian plane to the more exacting demands of César Franck and his followers now headed by Vincent D'Indy. No criticism written from Washington can affect the standing of D'Indy and the French school one iota; but superficial or derogatory comment upon the man and the school he represents is capable of doing the greatest possible injury to the writer of such and to the reputation of the city in which that writer lives. The three daily papers of this city suffered great injury through their criticisms of last Tuesday's Boston Symphony Orchestra concert printed in their columns, and the city of Washington, through them, may be made the object of ridicule in Boston and elsewhere.

MARGARET
Contralto with the S
Company at the Co

Vincent D'Indy is the dominant spirit of a great art movement which has been growing in Paris for a quarter century or more. Paris is a fitting laboratory for the creation and culture of just such a movement. She has two subventioned theaters in which the works of native composers are welcomed. Around the famous Paris conservatory the names of great composers have clustered for a long period of years. They have been working for the musical preëminence of France, have drawn to themselves the talented young men of the country and have nurtured them into being. In England, one man, Elgar, has come to wear the crown of musical kingship; in Germany, Strauss, alone, of the younger men, has climbed to the highest achievements in the art; Russia brought forth but one Tschaikowsky and a host of smaller men; but France can boast of a modern school of composers, all more or less on equal footing. It is her aim and expectation to wrest from Germany the musical chieftainship of the world and to ride at the head of the world's columns the champion of artistic accomplishment.

Already she has progressed so far that she is no longer in the position of an unrecognized applicant for honors, but has become so dangerous an artistic rival of Germany that the majority of votes seem already to have been cast in her favor.

For years the works of the new school of French composers have been performed and written of in Boston and other musical centers of this country; but Washington, peculiarly tardy and unsophisticated in such matters, has heard little of these important world-movements. The Washington newspapers have suppressed all facts concerning the new French school and its art campaign, refusing to accept articles dealing with Debussy and other Frenchmen whose names will go down into history, on the ground that no advertisements were to be gained by allegiance to such composers. It was considered fair to their readers and subscribers for the newspapers to deprive the Washington public of a knowledge of all the great world-movements in music and to feed that public upon the chaff of local studio gossip. Is it any wonder, then, with such small opportunity for education and enlightenment, that the local newspaper critics should have found so little to praise or admire in judging of these patriotic Frenchmen whose orchestral work they listened to for the first time. The Boston Transcript of December 2 devoted a column and a half to the first appearance of D'Indy in Boston, and all of this article was penned in a sympathetic vein with no condemnation or derogatory opinion. The man who wrote the article has had years of preparation for the hearing and understanding of this music, which the critics of the local Washington papers have not had. Which of the two diverse opinions will have the greater influence upon the world of music, that of the Boston Transcript commending D'Indy and French music or that of the combined daily newspaper critics of Washington who depreciated them?

...ess .....

STAR

Boston Symphony Quartet.

The first concert in Washington of the Boston Symphony Quartet, which will be given in the ball room of the New Willard on next Monday (December 18) evening, will bring to this city a distinguished company of musicians, including Prof. Willy Hess, the first violin and leader; Mr. Otto Roth, second violin; Mr. Emile Ferir, viola, and Mr. Heinrich Warnke, 'cellist. The assisting artist will be Mr. Sigismun Stojowsky, a Polish pianist and composer of eminence.

BALTIMORE, ... HERALD

NOV 22 1905

Mr. Gericke to Retire?

According to the weekly paper, Musical America, Wilhelm Gericke may retire as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of the present season. "The story is afloat," it says, "that the management of the orchestra has made an offer to Gustav Mahler, director of the Vienna Opera. Mahler is one of the famous conductors in Europe, besides having full artistic control of the Vienna Opera House. Herr Mahler's present contract in Vienna expires soon. Other men who have been mentioned as possible candidates for the post are Felix Weingartner and Vincent d'Indy.

"Mahler was born July 7, 1860, in Kalitsch, Bohemia. Without a teacher he developed himself into a masterly conductor, good pianist, and individual poet. He began his work at the Court Theater at Cassel, and was then conductor at Leipsig, Prague, and Budapest, and later Jahn's successor at Vienna. From the first he had to contend with difficulties, plots and intrigues of various sorts, and there is every appearance that he will not renew his contract, which soon expires.

"Mahler has also a reputation as a composer, his fourth symphony having received its first performance in England, October 25, at London."

HERALD

...

s .....

Monsieur Vincent d'Indy, the distinguished French composer and conductor, who reached America last Tuesday from Paris, has begun his rehearsals with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston preparatory to conducting that organization in a series of modern French music. The concert in Baltimore will be given in the Lyric on Wednesday evening, December 6. Following the best usage of Paris, there will be no soloist. The program is most interesting and is expected to attract widespread attention.

The first work on the program will be Monsieur d'Indy's own second symphony in B flat, which has been played both by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Philadelphia Orchestra in this country with very great success. It will be most instructive to observe the composer's own reading of the work. Other numbers will be Franck's suite, "Pelleas et Melisande," written for Maeterlinck's play of the same name; D'Indy's "Saugefleurie," a legende, and Paul Dukas' "L'Apprenti Sorcier."

...

ess .....

D'Indy Leads Boston Symphony.

M. Vincent d'Indy, the distinguished French composer and conductor, who reached America last Tuesday from Paris, has begun his rehearsals with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Boston, preparatory to conducting that organization in a series of modern French music. The concert in Baltimore will be given in the Lyric, Wednesday evening, December 6.

The first work will be Monsieur d'Indy's second symphony in B-flat, which has been played both by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Philadelphia Orchestra in this country with great success. It will be instructive to observe the composer's own reading of the work. Other numbers will be Franck's Suite "Pelleas et Melisande," written for Maeterlinck's play of the same name; D'Indy's "Saugefleurie," a legend, and Paul Dukas' "L'Apprenti Sorcier."

ss .....

D'Indy With Boston Symphony.

Monsieur Vincent d'Indy, the distinguished French composer and conductor, who reached America last Tuesday from Paris, has begun his rehearsals with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston preparatory to conducting that organization in a series of concerts of modern French music. The concert in Baltimore will be given in the Lyric on Wednesday evening, December 6. Following the best customs of Paris there will be no soloist. The program is most interesting and is expected to attract widespread attention.

The first work on the program will be Monsieur d'Indy's own second symphony in B-flat, which has been played both by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Philadelphia Orchestra in this country with very great success. It will be most instructive to observe the composer's own reading of the work. Other numbers will be Franck's Suite "Pelleas et Melisande," written for Maeterlinck's play of the same name; d'Indy's "Saugefleurie," a legende, and Paul Dukas' "L'Apprenti Sorcier."

HERALD

BALTIMORE, MD.

NOV 28 1905

The second of the series of five concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Lyric on Wednesday evening, December 6, at 8.15 o'clock. In many respects this will be the most interesting concert that Baltimore has had in many years. Like the last concert, which had the Wagner program, there will be also this time a special program, but very different, for it will be devoted entirely to the works of modern French composers, and the conductor will be Monsieur Vincent d'Indy, who has come to this country by special invitation to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a series of concerts.

One of the most interesting features in the development of modern music has been in France the revival of music for orchestra and for the chamber. After the death of Berlioz up to practically twenty years ago nearly all the music written in France was for the theater. This was due not only to the fact that French genius tends naturally to the stage, but also to the fact that the encouragement given by the two subsidized opera houses made it generally worth the while of French composers to work only in opera. The man who signaled the revolt against this state of affairs was Ceasar Franck, a musician of highest worth, a composer of genius, yet one of those unfortunate men who had to wait until the last years of a long life to get even partial recognition from the public, and did not receive his full mead of glory until his death. In the later sixties and early seventies he had gathered about himself a group of young, ardent, enthusiastic musicians, who drew their inspiration from his genius and from his courageous efforts to restore absolute music to its proper place in France. These younger men continued the work begun by him, with the result that some of the most brilliant compositions for the orchestra and for the smaller combinations of instruments that have been written in modern times are cast up to the credit of Franck, and no orchestras think that the work of the season is complete without having some of this new music on its programs.

Among the young men who were in the Franck group was Vincent d'Indy. The son of wealthy and noble parents, intended originally for the law, he had finally responded to the imperative call of music and was brought under the influence of Franck shortly after the Franco-Prussian war. His career has been one long courageous struggle against hostile influences for the sake of pure art. While he has written two operas that met with considerable success, his chief aim rests upon his works for the orchestra. Only less than this is his claim as a teacher and conductor. By his talent, his energy and his persistence he has won for himself the position of undisputed leader in the French musical world, and therefore he brings to America an authority which no other Frenchman could. The public of France, the colleague of such men as Faure, Chausson, Bruneau and the patron of such younger men as Debussy, Magnard and Roparts, for whom he performed for the first time many of their works, Monsier d'Indy is a most interesting personality.

For the Baltimore concert he has chosen a most interesting program. The first number will be his own symphony in B flat, which had its first performance in America last year both by the Boston Symphony and the Philadelphia Orchestras, meeting with very great success. Then will come the beautiful incidental music to Materlinck's "Pelleas et Melisande," by Faure. Following this is his own legende "Saugefleurie," and finally the particularly fascinating work called "L'Apprenti Sorcier," by Paul Dukas. After the best usage of Paris, there will be no soloist, for this music gives no place for one. The program in full is as follows:

Vincent d'Indy—
Fifteenth Symphony in B flat, opus 57.
I. Extremely slow; very lively.
II. Moderately slow.
III. Moderate; very animated; moderato.
IV. Very slow; with life; slowly.

Suite "Pelleas and Melisande," from Materlink.

Vincent d'Indy—
"Saugefleurie" legend, after Count Robert de Bonnieres.

"L'Apprenti Sorcier," after a

NEWS

BALTIMORE, MD.

DEC 2 - 1905

M. D'INDY TO CONDUCT

Programme For The Next Boston Symphony Concert.

The second of the series of five concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Lyric on Wednesday evening, December 6, at 8.15 o'clock. In many respects this will be the most interesting concert that Baltimore has had in many years. Like the last concert, which had the Wagner programme, there will be also this time a special programme, but very different, for it will be devoted entirely to the works of modern French composers and the conductor will be Monsieur Vincent d'Indy, who has come to this country by special invitation to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a series of concerts.

M. D'Indy's career has been one of long, continuous struggle against hostile influences for the sake of pure art. While he has written two operas that met with considerable success, his chief fame rests upon his works for the orchestra. Only less than this is his reputation as a teacher and conductor. By his talent, his energy and his persistence he has won for himself the position of undisputed leader in the French musical world, and therefore he brings to America an authority which no other Frenchman could. The pupil of Franck, the colleague of such men as Faure, Chausson, Bruneau, and the patron of such younger men as Debussy, Magnard and Ropartz, for whom he has performed for the first time many of their works, Monsieur D'Indy is a most interesting personality.

The programme will be as follows:

Deuxieme symphonie (in B flat) Op. 57.
Vincent d'Indy.
I. Extrement lent; Tres vif.
II. Moderement lent.
III. Modere; Tres anime; Modere.
IV. Tres lent; Assez vif; Largement.

Suite Pelleas et Melisande, de Maeterlinck
Gabriel Faure.

Saugefleurie, Legende, d'apres un conte de Robert de Bonnieres..Vincent d'Indy

L'Apprenti sorcier, d'apres une ballade de Goethe.....Paul Dukas.

SUN.

BALTIMORE, MD

DEC 3 - 1905

M. D'INDY TO DIRECT

Second Boston Symphony Concert Tuesday Evening.

The second of the series of five concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given at the Lyric Wednesday evening. The program will consist of the works of modern French composers, and the conductor will be M. Vincent d'Indy, who has come to this country by special invitation of the orchestra.

M. d'Indy is one of that group of brilliant young composers who sprang up around Cæsar Franck, who did so much to restore orchestra and chamber music to its proper place in France. The son of wealthy and prominent parents, d'Indy was intended for the law, but he finally responded to Music's call and was brought under the influence of Franck shortly after the Franco-Prussian war. His career has been a long struggle against hostile influences. While he has written two operas that met with considerable success, his fame rests largely upon his works for orchestra. Less than this by a degree is his reputation as a teacher and a conductor. By his talent, energy and persistence he has won for himself a high position of leadership in the French musical world.

For the Baltimore concert he has chosen an interesting program.

Deuxieme symphonie (in B flat), Op. 57.
Vincent d'Indy
I. Extremement lent; Tres vif.
II. Moderement lent.
III. Modere; Tres anime; Modere.
IV. Tres lent; Assez vif; Largement.

Suite—Pelleas et Melisande, de Maeterlinck.
Gabriel Faure

Saugefleurie Legende, d'apres un conte de Robert de Bonnieres.....Vincent d'Indy

L'Apprenti Sorcier, d'apres une ballade de Goethe.....Paul Dukas

SUN

BALTIMORE, MD.

DEC - 7 1905

D'INDY WARMLY RECEIVED

A Large Audience Enjoys Boston Symphony Concert At Lyric.

VINCENT D'INDY

Musical Baltimore turned out in force last evening to attend the second of the series of Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts at the Lyric, but probably more particularly to see M. Vincent d'Indy, the eminent French composer, who made his initial appearance before a Baltimore audience, directing two of his own compositions, and to hear his work.

If first impressions are lasting ones, M. d'Indy will always find a hearty welcome here when he chooses to come to Baltimore, for both as director and composer he was given a reception which was richly deserved. Much was expected of D'Indy, anad probably still more of his compositions, and in neither was the audience disappointed.

While the hall was not thronged, it was comfortably filled, nearly every seat in the gallery being taken.

Following was the program:

Deuxieme Symphonie (in B flat), Op. 57, Vincent d'Indy
(a) Extrement lent; Tres vif.
(b) Modrerement lent.
(c) Modere; Tres anime; Modere.
(d) Tres lent; Asses vif; Largement.

Suite, "Pelleas et Melisande," de Maeterlinck.....Gabriel Faure

"Saugefleurie," Legende d'apres un Conte de Robert de Bonnieres.....Vincent d'Indy

"L'Apprenti Sorcier," d'apres une Ballade de Goethe.....Paul Dukas

That D'Indy's compositions, as has already been frequently asserted, are inclined toward the radical; that the composer is determined to give to the world that which is new and still old in the development of his conceptions and ideals, became manifest during the first few bars of the first movement of his second symphony.

This work, which formed the first half of the concert, gave unmistakable evidence that D'Indy's fundamental aim is for the development of that which is most intellectual in music. It is as the exponent of a new cult, of which Cæsar Franck is said to have been the originator, that D'Indy's personality stands out most prominently.

The second symphony is a tone-poem of the highest order, in which the variations and theme treatment were given with emotional expressiveness that reflect as much credit upon the man as director as composer. In spite of this there was not so much of the feverish emotion behind the composition and its rendition as of thought and well-directed, convincing intelligence.

Aside from the symphony there was much of the program that delighted the audience. Both Maeterlinck's "Pelleas et Melisande" and Dukas' "L'Apprenti Sorcier" were given in a brilliant manner, the theme of the latter, especially, forming a pleasant diversion from the heavy, dramatic style of most of the program.

M. D'Indy's conducting, probably as much as his compositions, bespeaks the personality of the man. He is quiet, unostentatious in his movements, gesticulating in an easy, smooth manner, apparently oblivious of everything but the music in front of him and the orchestra about him. While his right hand is in continual motion, he uses the left only occasionally to emphasize some sharp transition.

HERALD

BALTIMORE, MD.

DEC 7 -

The second [illegible] Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last evening at the Lyric, furnishing an example in the history of the [illegible] tion—at least, so far as the [illegible] portion of its history is concerned—of a concert given by the [illegible] ly, it was a concert given by the [illegible] under the conductorship [illegible] especially engaged for the [illegible] The conductor was Monsieur [illegible] D'Indy, a well known French [illegible] That a stranger should [illegible] wield the baton over the [illegible] evidence of a desire to pay pe[illegible] and respect to Monsieur D'Indy [illegible] haps, so much as a man, a [illegible] or a composer, but rather as a [illegible] tive of the modern French school [illegible] position. The program consisted [illegible] of works by modern French [illegible] namely, the symphony op. 57 in [illegible] "Saugefleurie," a legend for [illegible] written upon a tale by Robert [illegible] nieres, both composed by [illegible] Orchestral Suite in three [illegible] taken from the incidental music [illegible] terlinck's play of "Pelleas and [illegible] landes" by Gabriel Faure; and [illegible] chestral scherzo by Paul Dukas [illegible] upon Goethe's ballad of "The Sorcerer's Apprentice."

The legend that art knows no nationality and is essentially cosmopolitan [illegible] never better confirmed than [illegible] night's program, for without [illegible] names of the composers were [illegible] French, yet could any have been [illegible] typical of their nation than the [illegible] itself? Indeed, the strong German influence of Wagner was the predominating characteristic, and when French composers submit to the influence of the [illegible] Wagner, does it not seem that the [illegible] has indeed made progress? All [illegible] modern music must of necessity be [illegible] tifully tinged with Wagnerian [illegible] did not the great German [illegible] poser bring music to its very [illegible] elevation, to its culminating point, [illegible] which there is nothing left but a [illegible] ion to the old forms and style? [illegible] in his work, embodied the highest [illegible] of melody, harmony and rhythm, [illegible] spoke to the world in the most [illegible] ing tones ever heard, using his orchestra as a medium of expression never before known.

D'Indy is a devout follower of Wagner, especially in obtaining his orchestral effects, but he lacks Wagner's creative genius. His symphonic work revealed some ideas of great strength and some passages of extreme beauty, but taken as a whole the symphony was rather tiresome than otherwise. A continual striving after originality, a certain want of spontaneity and a restless shifting of tonality rendered the work anything but gratifying to the musical sense of the hearer. A grafting of German ideas on a French stem is not a very successful attempt at musical horticulture. The only consoling thought attendant upon all this modern music is that there always remain the pure melodic and unadulterated compositions of masters like Beethoven, Mozart and Hayden to fall back upon. They will last, as also will Wagner, but it is doubtful if the [illegible] modernists will be heard of or remembered two or three decades hence.

Parisians, however, owe a debt of gratitude to the Boston organization for the opportunity granted them of hearing the ultra modern music given in the most perfect manner possible.

The suite of Faure revealed somewhat similar tendencies as were remarked in the D'Indy compositions, but greater interest was aroused and sustained throughout the second movement, "La Fileuse," being particularly attractive.

The work that appealed most to the hearer, however, was "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," by Dukas. From the first note until the end the attention was [illegible] field. The thematic invention and [illegible] treatment, especially the contrapuntal work, bespoke the fresh, spontaneous and ingenuous musician, who used [illegible] not as an end, but rather as a [illegible] The composer has something of [illegible] to say, and he knows well how to [illegible] it in the most telling and effective [illegible] ner.

AMERICAN.

BALTIMORE

DEC [illegible] 1905

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The second of the series of five concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Lyric on Wednesday evening, December 6, at 8:15 o'clock. In many respects this will be the most interesting concert that Baltimore has had in many years. Like the last concert, which had the Wagner program, there will be also this time a special program, but very different, for it will be devoted entirely to the works of modern French composers, and the conductor will be Monsieur Vincent d'Indy, who has come to this country by special invitation to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a series of concerts.

For the Baltimore concert he has chosen a most interesting program. The first number will be his own symphony in B flat, which had its first performance in America last year both by the Boston Symphony and the Philadelphia Orchestras, meeting with very great success. Then will come the beautiful incidental music to Materlinck's "Pelleas et Melisande," by Faure. Following this is his own legende "Saugefleurie" and finally the particularly fascinating work called "L'Apprenti Sorcier," by Paul Dukas. After the best usage of Paris there will be no soloist, for this music gives no place for one. The program in full is as follows:

Vincent d'Indy—
Fifteenth Symphony in B flat, opus 57.
I. Extremely slow; very lively.
II. Moderately slow.
III. Moderate; very animated; moderato.
IV. Very slow; with life; slowly.
Maeterlinck.

Suite "Pelleas and Melisande," from Materlink.

Vincent d'Indy—
"Saugefleurie" legend, after Count Robert de Bonnieres.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

AMERICAN.

BALTIMORE MD.

NOV 30 1905

M. Vincent d'Indy, who is to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyric Wednesday evening, December 6, is, first of all, a composer, then a teacher and then a conductor. He comes of an aristocratic and wealthy family, and against his wishes studied to become a lawyer, but at the same time studied music. During the Franco-Prussian war he served as volunteer in the One Hundred and Fifth Regiment and took part in the defense of Paris. After the war he gave up the idea of becoming a lawyer and devoted himself to music, his career in the musical field beginning in 1852.

[116]

The second of the series of five concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Lyric on Wednesday evening, December 6, at 8.15 o'clock. In many respects this will be the most interesting concert that Baltimore has had in many years. Like the last concert, which had the Wagner program, there will be also this time a special program, but very different, for it will be devoted entirely to the works of modern French composers, and the conductor will be Monsieur Vincent d'Indy, who has come to this country by special invitation to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a series of concerts.

One of the most interesting features in the development of modern music has been in France the revival of music for orchestra and for the chamber. After the death of Berlioz up to practically twenty years ago nearly all the music written in France was for the theater. This was due not only to the fact that French genius tends naturally to the stage, but also to the fact that the encouragement given by the two subsidized opera houses made it generally worth the while of French composers to work only in opera. The man who signaled the revolt against this state of affairs was Ceasar Franck, a musician of highest worth, a composer of genius, yet one of those unfortunate men who had to wait until the last years of a long life to get even partial recognition from the public, and did not receive his full mead of glory until his death. In the later sixties and early seventies he had gathered about himself a group of young, ardent, enthusiastic musicians, who drew their inspiration from his genius and from his courageous efforts to restore absolute music to its proper place in France. These younger men continued the work begun by him, with the result that some of the most brilliant compositions for the orchestra and for the smaller combinations of instruments that have been written in modern times are cast up to the credit of Franck, and no orchestras think that the work of the season is complete without having some of this new music on its programs.

Among the young men who were in the Franck group was Vincent d'Indy. The son of wealthy and noble parents, intended originally for the law, he had finally responded to the imperative call of music and was brought under the influence of Franck shortly after the Franco-Prussian war. His career has been one long courageous struggle against hostile influences for the sake of pure art. While he has written two operas that met with considerable success, his chief aim rests upon his works for the orchestra. Only less than this is his claim as a teacher and conductor. By his talent, his energy and his persistence he has won for himself the position of undisputed leader in the French musical world, and therefore he brings to America an authority which no other Frenchman could. The public of France, the colleague of such men as Faure, Chausson, Bruneau and the patron of such younger men as Debussy, Magnard and Roparts, for whom he performed for the first time many of their works, Monsier d'Indy is a most interesting personality.

For the Baltimore concert he has chosen a most interesting program. The first number will be his own symphony in B flat, which had its first performance in America last year both by the Boston Symphony and the Philadelphia orchestras, meeting with very great success. Then will come the beautiful incidental music to Maeterlinck's "Pelleas et Melisande," by Faure. Following this is his own legende "Saugefleurie," and finally the particularly fascinating work called "L'Apprenti Sorcier," by Paul Dukas. After the best usage of Paris, there will be no soloist, for this music gives no place for one.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The second of the series of five concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Lyric on Wednesday evening, December 6, at 8:15 o'clock. In many respects this will be the most interesting concert that Baltimore has had in many years. Like the last concert, which had the Wagner program there will be also this time a special program, but very different, for it will be devoted entirely to the works of modern French composers, and the conductor will be Monsieur Vincent d'Indy, who has come to this country by special invitation to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a series of concerts.

For the Baltimore concert he has chosen a most interesting program. The first number will be his own symphony in B flat, which had its first performance in America last year both by the Boston Symphony and the Philadelphia Orchestras, meeting with very great success. Then will come the beautiful incidental music to Maeterlinck's "Pelleas et Melisande," by Faure. Following this is his own legende "Saugefleurie" and finally the particularly fascinating work called "L'Apprenti Sorcier," by Paul Dukas. After the best usage of Paris there will be no soloist, for this music gives no place for one. The program in full is as follows:

Vincent d'Indy—
Fifteenth Symphony in B flat, opus. 57.
1. Extremely slow; very lively.
2. Moderately slow.
3. Moderato; very animated; moderato.
4. Very slow; with life; slowly.

Maeterlinck.
Suite, "Pelleas and Melisande," from Materlink.

Vincent d'Indy—
"Saugefleurie," legend, after Count Robert de Bonnieres.

Paul Dukas—
"The Sorcerer's Apprentice," after a ballad of Goethe.

NEWS
BALTIMORE, MD
DEC 7 - 1904

M. D'INDY TO CONDUCT.

Programme For The Next Boston Symphony Concert.

The second of the series of five concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Lyric on Wednesday evening, December 6, at 8.15 o'clock. In many respects this will be the most interesting concert that Baltimore has had in many years. Like the last concert, which had the Wagner programme, there will be also this time a special programme, but very different, for it will be devoted entirely to the works of modern French composers and the conductor will be Monsieur Vincent d'Indy, who has come to this country by special invitation to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a series of concerts.

M. D'Indy's career has been one of long, continuous struggle against hostile influences for the sake of pure art. While he has written two operas that met with considerable success, his chief fame rests upon his works for the orchestra. Only less than this is his reputation as a teacher and conductor. By his talent, his energy and his persistence he has won for himself the position of undisputed leader in the French musical world, and therefore he brings to America an authority which no other Frenchman could. The pupil of Franck, the colleague of such men as Faure, Chausson, Bruneau, and the patron of such younger men as Debussy, Magnard and Ropartz, for whom he has performed for the first time many of their works, Monsieur D'Indy is a most interesting personality.

The programme will be as follows:
Deuxieme symphonie (in B flat) Op. 57.
Vincent d'Indy.
I. Extrement lent; Tres vif.
II. Moderement lent.
III. Modere; Tres anime; Modere.
IV. Tres lent; Assez vif; Largement.
Suite Pelleas et Melisande, de Maeterlinck
Gabriel Faure.
Saugefleurie, Legende, d'apres un conte de Robert de Bonnieres..Vincent d'Indy
L'Apprenti sorcier, d'apres une ballade de Goethe.....Paul Dukas.

SUN

M. D'INDY TO DIRECT

Second Boston Symphony Concert Tuesday Evening.

The second of the series of five concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given at the Lyric Wednesday evening. The program will consist of the works of modern French composers, and the conductor will be M. Vincent d'Indy, who has come to this country by special invitation of the orchestra.

M. d'Indy is one of that group of brilliant young composers who sprang up around Cæsar Franck, who did so much to restore orchestra and chamber music to its proper place in France. The son of wealthy and prominent parents, d'Indy was intended for the law, but he finally responded to Music's call and was brought under the influence of Franck shortly after the Franco-Prussian war. His career has been a long struggle against hostile influences. While he has written two operas that met with considerable success, his fame rests largely upon his works for orchestra. Less than this by a degree is his reputation as a teacher and a conductor. By his talent, energy and persistence he has won for himself a high position of leadership in the French musical world.

For the Baltimore concert he has chosen an interesting program.

Deuxieme symphonie (in B flat), Op. 57,
Vincent d'Indy
I. Extremement lent; Tres vif.
II. Moderement lent.
III. Modere; Tres anime; Modere.
IV. Tres lent; Assez vif; Largement.
Suite—Pelleas et Melisande, de Maeterlinck,
Gabriel Faure
Saugefleurie Legende, d'apres un conte de
Robert de Bonnieres.....Vincent d'Indy
L'Apprenti Sorcier, d'apres une ballade de
Goethe.....Paul Dukas

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

AMERICAN

BALTIMORE MD

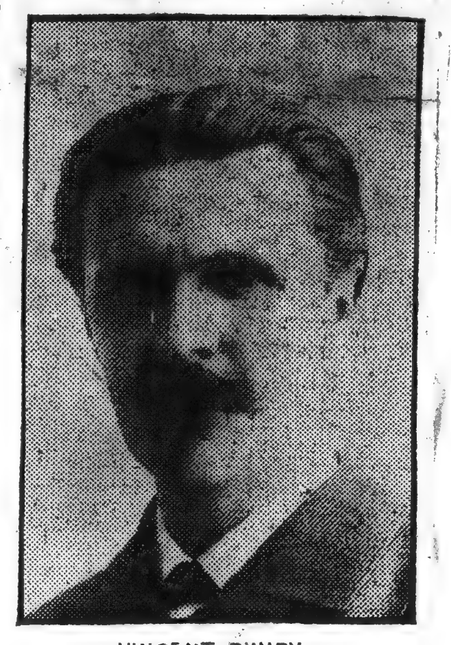
DEC 30 1905

M. Vincent d'Indy, who is to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyric Wednesday evening, December 6, is, first of all, a composer, then a teacher and then a conductor. He comes of an aristocratic and wealthy family, and against his wishes studied to become a lawyer, but at the same time studied music. During the Franco-Prussian war he served as volunteer in the One Hundred and Fifth Regiment and took part in the defense of Paris. After the war he gave up the idea of becoming a lawyer and devoted himself to music, his career in the musical field beginning in 1852.

SUN
BALTIMORE, MD
DEC 7 1904

D'INDY WARMLY RECEIVED

A Large Audience Enjoys Boston Symphony Concert At Lyric.



VINCENT D'INDY

Musical Baltimore turned out in force last evening to attend the second of the series of Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts at the Lyric, but probably more particularly to see M. Vincent d'Indy, the eminent French composer, who made his initial appearance before a Baltimore audience, directing two of his own compositions, and to hear his work.

If first impressions are lasting ones, M. d'Indy will always find a hearty welcome here when he chooses to come to Baltimore, for both as director and composer he was given a reception which was richly deserved. Much was expected of D'Indy, anad probably still more of his compositions, and in neither was the audience disappointed.

While the hall was not thronged, it was comfortably filled, nearly every seat in the gallery being taken.

Following was the program:

Deuxieme Symphonie (in B flat), Op. 57,
Vincent d'Indy
(a) Extrement lent; Tres vif.
(b) Modrerement lent.
(c) Modere; Tres anime; Modere.
(d) Tres lent; Assez vif; Largement.
Suite, "Pelleas et Melisande," de Maeterlinck.....Gabriel Faure
"Saugefleurie," Legende d'apres un Conte de Robert de Bonnieres.....Vincent d'Indy
"L'Apprenti Sorcier," d'apres une Ballade de Goethe.....Paul Dukas

That D'Indy's compositions, as has already been frequently asserted, are inclined toward the radical; that the composer is determined to give to the world that which is new and still old in the development of his conceptions and ideals, became manifest during the first few bars of the first movement of his second symphony.

This work, which formed the first half of the concert, gave unmistakable evidence that D'Indy's fundamental aim is for the development of that which is most intellectual in music. It is as the exponent of a new cult, of which Cæsar Franck is said to have been the originator, that D'Indy's personality stands out most prominently.

The second symphony is a tone-poem of the highest order, in which the variations and theme treatment were given with emotional expressiveness that reflect as much credit upon the man as director as composer. In spite of this there was not so much of the feverish emotion behind the composition and its rendition as of thought and well-directed, convincing intelligence.

Aside from the symphony there was much of the program that delighted the audience. Both Mæterlinck's "Pelleas et Melisande" and Dukas' "L'Apprenti Sorcier" were given in a brilliant manner, the theme of the latter, especially, forming a pleasant diversion from the heavy, dramatic style of most of the program.

M. D'Indy's conducting, probably as much as his compositions, bespeaks the personality of the man. He is quiet, unostentatious in his movements, gesticulating in an easy, smooth manner, apparently oblivious of everything but the music in front of him and the orchestra about him. While his right hand is in continual motion, he uses the left only occasionally to emphasize some sharp transition.

HERALD
BALTIMORE, MD
DEC 7 -

The Boston Orchestra.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which was given last evening at the Lyric, furnished an unique example in the history of the organization at least, so far as the Baltimore portion of its history is concerned—namely, it was a concert given by the orchestra under the conductorship of a director specially engaged for the performance. The conductor was Monsieur Vincent D'Indy, a well known French composer. That a stranger should be invited to wield the baton over the orchestra is evidence of a desire to pay peculiar honor and respect to Monsieur D'Indy, not perhaps, so much as a man, a Frenchman or a composer, but rather as a representative of the modern French school of composition. The program consisted entirely of works by modern French composers, namely, the symphony op. 57 in B flat, and "Saugefleurie," a legend for orchestra written upon a tale by Robert de Bonnieres, both composed by D'Indy; an orchestral suite in three movements, taken from the incidental music to Maeterlinck's play of "Pelleas and Melisande" by Gabriel Faure, and an orchestral scherzo by Paul Dukas, founded upon Goethe's ballad of "The Sorcerer's Apprentice."

The legend that art knows no nationality and is essentially cosmopolitan was never better confirmed than by last night's program, for without doubt the names of the composers were thoroughly French—yet could any have been less typical of their nation than the music itself? Indeed, the strong German influence of Wagner was the predominating characteristic, and when French composers submit to the influence of the German Wagner, does it not seem that the world has indeed made progress? All essentially modern music must of necessity be powerfully tinged with Wagnerian ideals, for did not the great German operatic composer bring music to its very highest elevation, to its culminating point, beyond which there is nothing left but a reversion to the old forms and style? Wagner, in his work, embodied the highest ideals of melody, harmony and rhythm, and spoke to the world in the most commanding tones ever heard, using his orchestra as a medium of expression never before known.

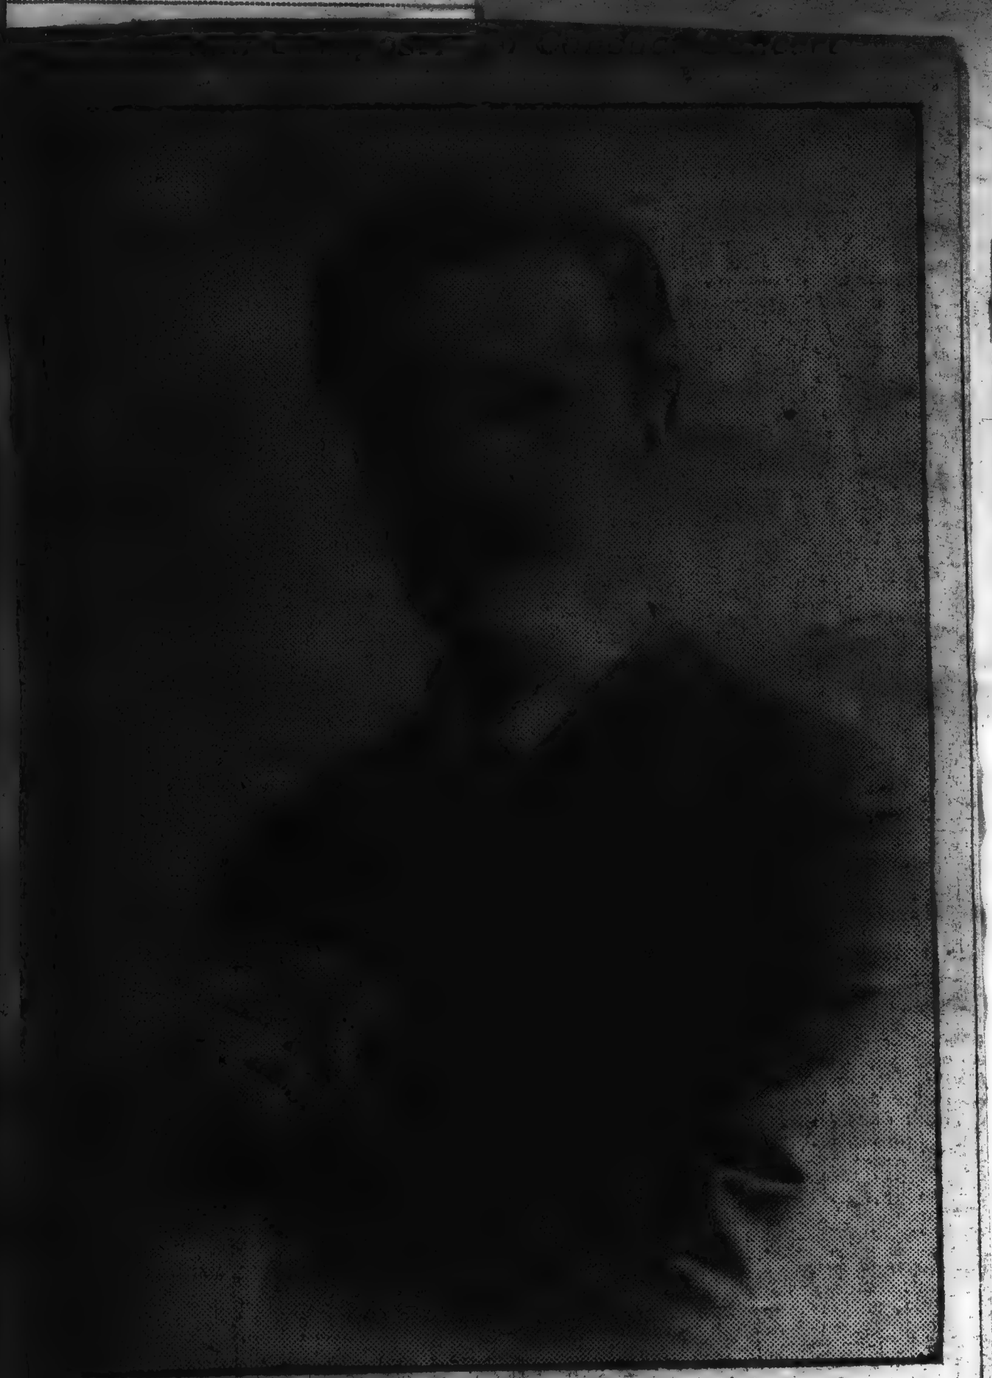
D'Indy is a devout follower of Wagner, especially in obtaining his orchestral effects, but he lacks Wagner's creative genius. His symphonic work revealed some ideas of great strength and some passages of extreme beauty, but taken as a whole the symphony was rather tiresome than otherwise. A continual striving after originality, a certain want of spontaneity and a restless shifting of tonality rendered the work anything but gratifying to the musical sense of the hearer. A grafting of German ideas on to a French stem is not a very successful attempt at musical horticulture. The one consoling thought attendant upon all this modern music is that there always remain the pure melodic and unadulterated compositions of masters like Beethoven, Mozart and Hayden to fall back upon. They will last, as also will Wagner, but it is doubtful if the ultra modernists will be heard of or remembered two or three decades hence. Baltimoreans, however, owe a debt of gratitude to the Boston organization for the opportunity granted them of hearing this ultra modern music given in the most perfect manner possible.

The suite of Faure revealed somewhat similar tendencies as were remarked in the D'Indy compositions, but greater interest was aroused and sustained throughout, the second movement, "La Fileuse," being particularly attractive.

The work that appealed most to the hearer, however, was "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," by Dukas. From the first note until the end the attention was firmly held. The thematic invention and its treatment, especially the contrapuntal work, bespoke the fresh, spontaneous and ingenuous musician, who used his skill not as an end, but rather as a means. The composer has something of interest to say, and he knows well how to say it in the most telling and effective manner.

[116]

DEC - 5 1905



M. VINCENT D'INDY,

Who will wield the baton at the Lyric tonight, instead of Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, the distinguished conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

INDEPENDENT.

rom

ddress NEW YORK CITY.

ate NOV 23 1905

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Boston Symphony Orchestra began its twentieth season in New York auspiciously on November 9th, with a fine concert in Carnegie Hall, the program of which was the best that Mr. Gericke has put to his credit—in New York at least—in a long while.

The Dvorák concerto in B minor, for violoncello served to introduce as the soloist Mr. Heinrich Warnke, the new principal 'cellist of the orchestra, who comes to it from the same position in the Kaim Orchestra of Munich. It is an extremely difficult concerto, in writing parts of which the composer had the help of that rarely gifted player of "the grand-ducal instrument," Mr. Alwin Schroeder. Mr. Warnke played it skillfully and intelligently and, when the composer permitted, made his instrument sing sweet luscious melodies. His tone is pure, ound, full; his style virile, and his taste excellent. If he is not yet the consummate artist that Mr. Schroeder is, he is nevertheless a not unworthy successor to him, and Mr. Gericke may well be proud of his acquisition.

The playing of the orchestra thruout the concert was a marvel of euphonious beauty and precision. Its superlative achievement in this respect was in the dainty tinkling "Pizzicato ostinato" of the third movement in Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony. In the direction of pure tone and unity and polish no playing could b more absolutely flawless.

Yet while the estimable Mr. Gericke, whom Mr. Henderson aptly characterizes as "our Bostonian Arbiter Elegantiarum," conducts the old classics with loving tenderness his interpretation of the ultra-modern in music is not notable for breadth of sympathy or largeness of comprehension. The feet of the young men travel a path that has little lure for him.

N. Y. EVG. TELEGRAM

ess

NOV 23 1905

THE announcement that the Longy Club, of Boston, will give a concert in Mendelssohn Hall on Tuesday evening, December 19, has interest for the lovers of the curious in music. This is the only organization of its kind in this country and in New York and such concerts as it gives may be regarded as being absolute novelties.

There is a very considerable literature of music for wind instruments, much of it belonging to the eighteenth century, but in recent years the younger school of French composers have given much attention to writing for wind instruments, not only because they realize the possibilities of such music, but because French is particularly rich in artists of this kind. The great majority of the wood wind choir of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of which the Longy Club is an integral part, are Frenchmen or are French taught.

Mr. Longy, the leader of the club, need no introduction to New York, for in the several years that he has been the first bow of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the wonderfully beautiful tone of his instrument and his surpassing mastery of the difficult technique have been recognized by all patrons of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, even if they do not know him by sight. And the same is true of M. Andre Maquarre, the first flute. From Mr. Sadony, the new first bassoon of the orchestra and the club, music lovers may look for a revelation of beauty from this ungainly looking instrument.

N. Y. EV'G SUN

ss DEC 1 - 1905

Vincent d'Indy makes his American début in Boston to-day. He is here on a flying trip and will conduct eight concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, radiating from the Hub of the Universe down to Philadelphia, Washington and Baltimore. D'Indy's New York programmes will be representative of his best associates. Following the u[illegible] of Paris, there will be no soloist. The conductor is also to appear here as pianist in his own chamber music on Dec. 12 with the Kneisel Quartet.

[117]

NEW YORK CITY.

DEC 2 - 1905

Vincent d'Indy will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon at Carnegie Hall, and music of the progressive Frenchmen, of whom Mr. d'Indy is one of the leaders, will make up both programmes. At neither concert will there be a soloist. The programmes are as follows:

THURSDAY EVENING, DECEMBER 7.
Deuxieme symphonie (in B flat) op. 57,
Vincent d'Indy
Suite, "Pelleas et Melisande," de Maeterlinck.....Gabriel Faure
"Saugefleurie," Legende, d'apres un conte de Robert de Bonnieres,
Vincent d'Indy
"L'Apprenti sorcier," d'apres une ballade de Goethe.....Paul Dukas

SATURDAY AFTERNOON, DECEMBER 9.
Symphonie (in B flat) op. 20,
Ernest Chausson
"Psythe et Eros," extrait de "Psyche," poeme symphonique.....Cesar Franck
Nocturnes, "Nuages," "Fetes,"
Claude Debussy
"Chant funebre".....Alberic Magnard
"Istar," variations symphoniques,
Vincent d'Indy

While the only absolute novelties in these lists are d'Indy's "Saugefleurie" the Chausson symphony, and Magnard's "Chant Funebre," none of this music has been much played here, and it is expected to make a new impression under the baton of the French conductor.

Ernest Chausson is thought by some to have been the most talented of that group of interesting men who surrounded Cesar Franck. Like his master, he found little appreciation during his life, and it is only since his sudden death in 1899 that his works have found much appreciation. Born in Paris in 1855, of wealthy parents, and, like his friend, d'Indy, destined for the law, it was not until he had been admitted to the bar that he was allowed to give serious study to music.

He was twenty-five years old when he became a pupil of Massenet in the Conservatory, where he was associated with Vidal, Bruneau, Leroux and Pierne. Before the end of two years he went to Franck, and joining the Society Nationale, he was constantly with d'Indy, Bordes, Faure, Duparc and de Breville. He was killed June 12, 1899, by being thrown from a bicycle.

ess

There will be no soloists at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Carnegie Hall concerts next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, and none will be needed. The great attraction will be the appearance as conductor of these concerts of Vincent d'Indy, who might be called the Richard Strauss of France, who has come over by invitation from Mr. H. L. Higginson. In the spring of 1898 Theodore Thomas and his orchestra, assisted by Guilmant, Pugno, and Ysaye, gave a French concert in Carnegie Hall. That was the last important concert of this description New York has had, although the names of the leading composers of the modern school have appeared of late very often on New York orchestral programmes. And, as a matter of fact, the number of actual novelties which M. d'Indy will present is not very large, so thoroughly have conductors in this country covered the field. At the first concert on Thursday evening the only novelty will be M. d'Indy's own "Saugefleurie," a "Legende" after a story by Robert de Bonnieres. M. d'Indy's second symphony (in B flat) was played here last season by Mr. Gericke, and the other two works, Faure's "Pelleas et Melisande" suite and Dukas's "L'Apprenti sorcier," after a ballade by Goethe, have also been played here.

From the point of view of novelties, the concert on next Saturday afternoon will be the more important, as it will bring a symphony which is quite new in New York; in fact, which will have its first performance in American in Philadelphia Monday night. This is by Ernest Chausson, his symphony in B flat, opus 20. This work was written in 1891, and was performed for the first time in Paris by Arthur Nikisch, at the Cirque d'Hiver, on May 3, 1897. Another novelty at Saturday's concert will be a "Chant Funebre," by Alberic Magnard. Magnard is a rich man, a pupil of d'Indy, who has written considerable music, including three symphonies. His music is very highly spoken of by those who have heard it. The other three works on the programme have been played in New York—a movement from Franck's "Psyche," two nocturnes by Debussy, and M. d'Indy's "Istar" symphonic variations.

BALTIMORE
DEC - 5 1912

French Composer To Conduct Concert

M. VINCENT D'INDY,

Who will wield the baton at the Lyric tonight, instead of Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, the distinguished conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

rom ENTERPRISE
ddress NEW YORK CITY
Date

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Boston Symphony Orchestra began its twentieth season in New York auspiciously on November 9th, with a fine concert in Carnegie Hall, the program of which was the best that Mr. Gericke has put to his credit—in New York at least—in a long while.

The Dvorák concerto in B minor, for violoncello served to introduce as the soloist Mr. Heinrich Warnke, the new principal 'cellist of the orchestra, who comes to it from the same position in the Kaim Orchestra of Munich. It is an extremely difficult concerto, in writing parts of which the composer had the help of that rarely gifted player of "the grand-ducal instrument," Mr. Alwin Schroeder. Mr. Warnke played it skillfully and intelligently and, when the composer permitted, made his instrument sing sweet, luscious melodies. His tone is pure, sound, full; his style virile, and his taste excellent. If he is not yet the consummate artist that Mr. Schroeder is, he is nevertheless a not unworthy successor to him, and Mr. Gericke may well be proud of his acquisition.

The playing of the orchestra thruout the concert was a marvel of euphonious beauty and precision. Its superlative achievement in this respect was in the dainty tinkling "Pizzicato ostinato" of the third movement in Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony. In the direction of pure tone and unity and polish no playing could be more absolutely flawless.

Yet while the estimable Mr. Gericke, whom Mr. Henderson aptly characterizes as "our Bostonian Arbiter Elegantiarum," conducts the old classics with loving tenderness his interpretation of the ultra-modern in music is not notable for breadth of sympathy or largeness of comprehension. The feet of the young men travel a path that has little lure for him.

ess

THE announcement that the Longy Club, of Boston, will give a concert in Mendelssohn Hall on Tuesday evening, December 19, has interest for the lovers of the curious in music. This is the only organization of its kind in this country and in New York and such concerts as it gives may be regarded as being absolute novelties.

There is a very considerable literature of music for wind instruments, much of it belonging to the eighteenth century, but in recent years the younger school of French composers have given much attention to writing for wind instruments, not only because they realize the possibilities of such music, but because French is particularly rich in artists of this kind. The great majority of the wood wind choir of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of which the Longy Club is an integral part, are Frenchmen or are French taught.

Mr. Longy, the leader of the club, need no introduction to New York, for in the several years that he has been the first bow of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the wonderfully beautiful tone of his instrument and his surpassing mastery of the difficult technique have been recognized by all patrons of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, even if they do not know him by sight. And the same is true of M. Andre Maquarre, the first flute. From Mr. Sadony, the new first bassoon of the orchestra and the club, music lovers may look for a revelation of beauty from this ungainly looking instrument.

N Y EV'G SUN
;s

Vincent d'Indy makes his American début in Boston to-day. He is here on a flying trip and will conduct eight concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, radiating from the Hub of the Universe down to Philadelphia, Washington and Baltimore.

D'Indy's New York programmes will be representative of his best associates. Following the usage of Paris, there will be no soloist. The conductor is also to appear here as pianist in his own chamber music on Dec. 12 with the Kneisel Quartet.

[11 7]

NEW YORK CITY

Vincent d'Indy will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon at Carnegie Hall, and music of the progressive Frenchmen, of whom Mr. d'Indy is one of the leaders, will make up both programmes. At neither concert will there be a soloist. The programmes are as follows:

THURSDAY EVENING, DECEMBER 7.
Deuxieme symphonie (in B flat) op. 57, Vincent d'Indy
Suite, "Pelleas et Melisande," de Maeterlinck.....Gabriel Faure
"Saugefleurie," Legende, d'apres un conte de Robert de Bonnieres, Vincent d'Indy
"L'Apprenti sorcier," d'apres une ballade de Goethe.....Paul Dukas

SATURDAY AFTERNOON, DECEMBER 9.
Symphonie (in B flat) op. 20, Ernest Chausson
"Psythe et Eros," extrait de "Psyche," poeme symphonique.....Cesar Franck
Nocturnes, "Nuages," "Fetes," Claude Debussy
"Chant funebre".....Alberic Magnard
"Istar," variations symphoniques, Vincent d'Indy

While the only absolute novelties in these lists are d'Indy's "Saugefleurie" the Chausson symphony, and Magnard's "Chant Funebre," none of this music has been much played here, and it is expected to make a new impression under the baton of the French conductor.

Ernest Chausson is thought by some to have been the most talented of that group of interesting men who surrounded Cesar Franck. Like his master, he found little appreciation during his life, and it is only since his sudden death in 1899 that his works have found much appreciation. Born in Paris in 1855, of wealthy parents, and, like his friend, d'Indy, destined for the law, it was not until he had been admitted to the bar that he was allowed to give serious study to music.

He was twenty-five years old when he became a pupil of Massenet in the Conservatory, where he was associated with Vidal, Bruneau, Leroux and Pierne. Before the end of two years he went to Franck, and joining the Society Nationale, he was constantly with d'Indy, Bordes, Faure, Dupare and de Breville. He was killed June 12, 1899, by being thrown from a bicycle.

ess

There will be no soloists at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Carnegie Hall concerts next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, and none will be needed. The great attraction will be the appearance as conductor of these concerts of Vincent d'Indy, who might be called the Richard Strauss of France, who has come over by invitation from Mr. H. L. Higginson. In the spring of 1898 Theodore Thomas and his orchestra, assisted by Guilmant, Pugno, and Ysaye, gave a French concert in Carnegie Hall. That was the last important concert of this description New York has had, although the names of the leading composers of the modern school have appeared of late very often on New York orchestral programmes. And, as a matter of fact, the number of actual novelties which M. d'Indy will present is not very large, so thoroughly have conductors in this country covered the field. At the first concert on Thursday evening the only novelty will be M. d'Indy's own "Saugefleurie," a "Legende" after a story by Robert de Bonnieres. M. d'Indy's second symphony (in B flat) was played here last season by Mr. Gericke, and the other two works, Faure's "Pelleas et Melisande" suite and Dukas's "L'Apprenti sorcier," after a ballade by Goethe, have also been played here.

From the point of view of novelties, the concert on next Saturday afternoon will be the more important, as it will bring a symphony which is quite new in New York; in fact, which will have its first performance in American in Philadelphia Monday night. This is by Ernest Chausson, his symphony in B flat, opus 20. This work was written in 1891, and was performed for the first time in Paris by Arthur Nikisch, at the Cirque d'Hiver, on May 3, 1897. Another novelty at Saturday's concert will be a "Chant Funebre," by Alberic Magnard. Magnard is a rich man, a pupil of d'Indy, who has written considerable music, including three symphonies. His music is very highly spoken of by those who have heard it. The other three works on the programme have been played in New York—a movement from Franck's "Psyche," two nocturnes by Debussy, and M. d'Indy's "Istar" symphonic variations.

HARPERS WEEKLY.

NEW YORK CITY.

DEC 2 - 1905

Strauss and the Boston Orchestra

The Boston Symphony Orchestra began its twentieth season in New York on November 9 at Carnegie Hall, Mr. Gericke conducting. Mr. Heinrich Warnke, the orchestra's new first 'cellist, appeared as soloist, playing Dvořák's concerto, Opus 104, in a dignified, artistic, and entirely competent style, although with no remarkable display of virtuosity. The concert was chiefly notable in that it furnished an opportunity of hearing Richard Strauss's tone-poem, "Tod und Verklärung," for the first time in almost two years. Mr. Gericke has given us more moving performances of "Tod und Verklärung." His reading on November 9 seemed deficient in the eloquence with which he has proven that he knows how to invest it. It is music that must convey irresistibly the emotions of terror, pity, and exaltation, or it fails of its intended effect. These emotions have been uttered in the music with incomparable poignancy, and Mr. Gericke and the Boston Orchestra know how to make them manifest if they will.

Vincent d'Indy conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra in two French programmes at Carnegie Hall. On Thursday evening next he presents his own symphony in B-flat, Faure's suite "Pelleas et Melisande," a D'Indy novelty called "Saugefleurie" and Paul Dukas's "L'Apprenti Sorcier." For the Saturday matinée he has a new Chausson symphony in B-flat, a movement from Franck's "Psyche," two nocturnes by Debussy, a new "Chant Funèbre," by Alberic Magnard, and his own "Istar" variations. The symphony is played in Philadelphia on Monday evening for the first time in America.

Brooklyn's Friday programme will be the Thursday list over again.

M. d'Indy in Boston is now presenting the French programmes in which he will conduct Mr. Gericke's Boston Symphony Orchestra on the tour to Baltimore and New York next week.

Established: London, 1881; New York,

Für diese Woche wird wiederum kein Mangel an Konzerten zu beklagen sein, und manche von den Konzerten dürften sich als ungewöhnlich interessant erweisen. So werden uns zum Beispiel die Bostoner, d. h. das Boston Symphony Orchestra, am Donnerstag Abend und Samstag Nachmittag in Carnegie Hall die persönliche Bekanntschaft mit einem vielgenannten französischen Komponisten und Dirigenten, Vincent d'Indy, vermitteln, der eigens zu diesem Zweck von Paris herübergekommen ist. D'Indy ist dreiundfünfzig Jahre alt und gehört zu der jüngeren französischen Komponistenschule, die ihren Ausgang von César Franck nahm. D'Indy war ein langjähriger Schüler César Franck's. Entgegen den meisten seiner französischen Kollegen hat sich d'Indy um die Oper fast garnicht gekümmert, sondern vor Allem Orchestermusik, desgleichen Chor-, Kammer- und Klaviermusik komponirt. Einige seiner Kompositionen sind auch dem New Yorker Publikum nicht unbekannt geblieben; so spielte zum Beispiel das Bostoner Symphonieorchester im letzten Winter seine zweite Symphonie unter Wilhelm Gericke's Leitung. Wie nun aber die Programme der beiden nächsten Konzerte ersehen lassen, wird d'Indy hier nicht nur seine eigenen, sondern auch die Werke seiner engeren französischen Kollegen vorführen. Mit jener zweiten d'Indy'schen Symphonie wird das erste Konzert, am Donnerstag Abend, beginnen, dann folgt eine Suite Pelleas et Melisande von Faure, eine Legende, „Saugefleurie" genannt, von d'Indy, und die Orchesterballade „Der Zauberlehrling" von Dukas. Am Samstag wird eine dreisätzige Symphonie von Chausson, César Franck's „Psyche et Eros", Claude Debussy's zwei Nocturnes, ein Lobgesang von Alberic Magnard und die bekannten symphonischen Variationen

---

Established: London, 1881; New York,

NEW YORK SUN

DEC 3 1905

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Its Coming Concerts to Be Conducted by Vincent d'Indy, the Composer.

The December pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be in some respects the most interesting that famous band has ever given in New York. Both of them will be devoted entirely to modern French music of the "younger" school, and at both of them the conductor will be M. Vincent d'Indy, the distinguished representative of this school, who has come to America at the invitation of Mr. H. L. Higginson to conduct a series of concerts of this music.

In the spring of 1898 Theodore Thomas and his orchestra, assisted by Guilmant, Pugno and Ysaye, gave a French concert in Carnegie Hall. That was the last important concert of this description New York has had, although the names of the leading composers of the modern school have appeared of late very often on New York orchestral programmes. And as a matter of fact the number of actual novelties which M. d'Indy will present is not very large, so thoroughly have conductors in this country covered the field. At the first concert, on Thursday evening next, the only novelty will be M. d'Indy's own "Saugefleurie," a "légende," after a story by Robert de Bonnieres. M. d'Indy's second symphony (in B flat) was played here last season by Mr. Gericke, and the other two works, Faure's "Pélléas et Mélisande" suite and Dukas's "L'Apprenti Sorcier," after a ballade by Goethe, have also been played here.

From the point of view of novelties the concert on next Saturday afternoon will be the more important, as it will bring a symphony which is quite new in New York, in fact which will have its first performance in America in Philadelphia to-morrow (Monday) night. This is by Ernest Chausson, his symphony in B flat, opus 20. This work was written in 1891 and was performed for the first time in Paris by Arthur Nikisch, at the Cirque d'Hiver on May 3, 1897. The full score has been printed, but the orchestral parts are still in manuscript and were brought to this country by M. d'Indy.

Ernest Chausson is regarded by many as having been the most talented of that group of interesting men who surrounded César Franck and looked to him as to a prophet. Like his master, he found little appreciation during his life, and it is only since his tragic death, in 1899, that his works have found the appreciation which their merit warrants. Born in Paris in 1855 of wealthy parents, and, like his friend d'Indy, destined for the law, it was not until he had been admitted to the bar that he was allowed to give serious study to music. He was 25 years old when he became a pupil of Massenet in the Conservatory, where he was associated with Vidal, Bruneau, Leroux and Pierné. Before the end of two years he went to Franck, and, joining the Société Nationale, he was thrown constantly with d'Indy, Bordes, Fauré, Duparc and De Bréville. He was killed June 12, 1899, by being thrown from a bicycle while coasting down hill at Limay.

Another novelty at Saturday's concert will be a "Chant Funèbre" by Albéric Magnard. Magnard is a rich man, a pupil of d'Indy, and has written considerable music, including three symphonies. His music is very highly spoken of by those who have heard it.

The three other works on the programme have been played in New York—a movement from Franck's "Psyche," two nocturnes by Debussy and M. d'Indy's "Istar" symphonic variations. At neither concert will there be a soloist.

REVUE.

NEW YORK CITY

DEC 3 - 1905

Donnerstag Abend und Samstag Nachmittag finden die zweiten Conzerte des Boston Symphonie-Orchester statt.

Das 3. Cello-Recital Carl Grienauers findet am Freitag Abend in College Hall statt. Frl. Flora Sherwood wird gesanglich mitwirken. Eine Cello-Suite von Victor Herbert steht auf Programm.

In den dritten Concerten des N. Y. Symphonie Orchesters nächsten Samstag und folgenden Dienstag wird Kubelik als Solist mitwirken und „die Schottische Fantasie" von Bruch und „Zigeunerweisen" von Sarasate vortragen. Die Orchesternummern sind die 5. Symphonie von Tschaikowsky und die Italienische Serenade von Hugo Wolff.

NEW YORK STAATS-ZEITUNG.

DEC 3 - 1905

In der nächsten Woche wird sich unser französischer Gast, Herr Vincent d'Indy, auch als Klavierspieler hören lassen, nämlich in seinem eigenen Klavierquartett op. 7, das er mit den Kneiselianern in deren Konzert am 12. Dezember in Mendels-

[illegible]

[118]

NEW YORK

DEC 3 - 1905

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Vincent D'Indy to Conduct Two Concerts of French Music.

The two December concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon will be devoted entirely to modern French music of the "younger" school, and at both of them the conductor will be M. Vincent d'Indy, the distinguished representative of this school, who has come to America by invitation from Mr. H. L. Higginson to conduct a series of concerts of this music.

The number of actual novelties which M. d'Indy will present is not large, so thoroughly have conductors in this country covered the field. At the first concert on Thursday evening the only novelty will be M. d'Indy's own "Saugefleurie," a legende after a story by Robert de Bonnières. M. d'Indy's second symphony (in B flat) was played here last season by Mr. Gericke, and the other two works, Faure's "Pelleas et Mellisande" suite and Dukas's "L'Apprenti sorcier," after a ballade by Goethe, has also been played here.

The concert on next Saturday afternoon will bring a symphony which is quite new in New York, in fact which will have its first performance in America in Philadelphia to-morrow night. This is by Ernest Chausson, his symphony in B flat, Opus 20. This work was written in 1891 and was performed for the first time in Paris by Arthur Nikisch at the Cirque d'Hiver on May 3, 1897. The full score has been printed, but the orchestral parts are still in manuscript and were brought to this country by M. d'Indy.

Ernest Chausson is thought by many to have been the most talented of that group of interesting men who surrounded César Franck and looked to him as to a prophet. Like his master, he found little appreciation during his life, and it is only since his tragic death in 1899 that his works have found the appreciation which their merit warrants. Born in Paris in 1855, and like d'Indy destined for the law, it was not until he had been admitted to the bar that he was allowed to give serious study to music. He was twenty-five years old when he became a pupil of Massenet in the Conservatory, where he was associated with Vidal, Bruneau, Leroux, and Pierné. Before the end of two years he went to Franck, and joining the Société Nationale he was thrown constantly with d'Indy, Bordes, Faure, Dupard, and de Bréville. He was killed June 12, 1899, by being thrown from a bicycle while coasting down a hill at Limay.

Another novelty at Saturday's concert will be a "Chant Funèbre," by Albéric Magnard. Magnard is a pupil of d'Indy who has written considerable music, including three symphonies. His music is highly spoken of by those who have heard it. At neither concert will there be a soloist. The programmes are as follows:

THURSDAY EVENING.

Second symphonie, Op. 57.....Vincent d'Indy
Suite, "Pelleas et Melisande," Maeterlinck.....Gabriel Faure
Saugefleurie, Legende.....Vincent d'Indy
L'Apprenti sorcier.....Paul Dukas

SATURDAY AFTERNOON.

Symphony, Op. 20.....Ernest Chausson
Psyche et Eros, from "Psyche," symphonic poem.....Cesar Franck
Necturnes—I., "Nuages"; II., "Fetes."...Claude Debussy
Chant funebre.....Alberic Magnard
Istar, variations symphoniques.....Vincent d'Indy

New York Times

DEC 3 - 1905

MR. HENSCHEL AGAIN CONDUCTS

He Leads the Boston Orchestra at the Pension Fund Concert.

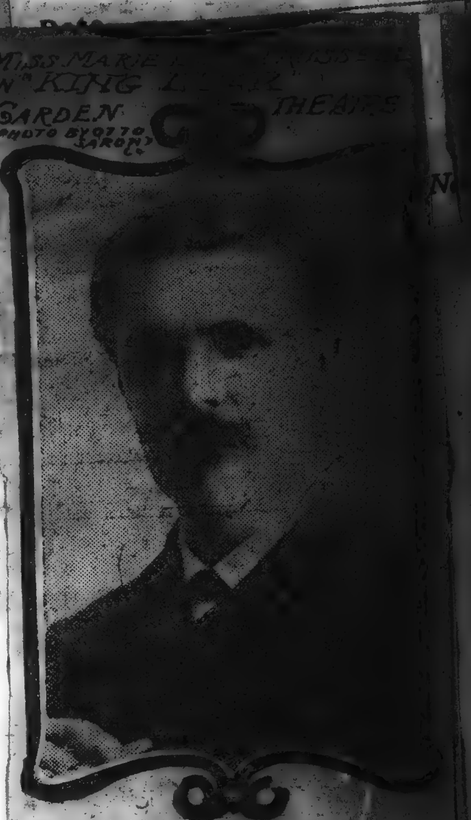
There was an interesting occasion in Boston last week at the Pension Fund concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. For this concert Mr. Georg Henschel was invited to come to New York, where he now lives, and conduct again the orchestra which he organized at the beginning of its career, in 1881. Mr. Henschel conducted it for three years, till the Autumn of 1884, when Mr. Gericke succeeded him. Since then he has conducted an orchestra in London that had an existence of only a few years, but has otherwise devoted himself to singing, teaching, and composing. On last Sunday evening Mr. Henschel conducted Beethoven's overture, "The Dedication of the House," the opening number of the programme, which was also the opening number of the first concert of the Symphony Orchestra in 1881.

Mr. Henschel met with a most cordial reception when he appeared. After he had conducted the overture he was applauded for several minutes, and Mr. Hess stepped forward and presented him with a large wreath of orchids, the gift of the members of the orchestra. Mr. Henschel has sent the flowers to Scotland to be placed on his wife's grave in Inverness. Mr. Henschel remarked on the great progress made by the orchestra since its foundation twenty-five years ago. He found several familiar faces among the players, men who were in the orchestra when he was its leader. The requiem mass composed by Mr. Henschel is to be performed under his direction in Philadelphia on March 15 by the Gilchrist Philharmonic Choir and the Philadelphia Orchestra.

From NEW YORK HE

Address

DEC 3, 1905



MISS MARIE [illegible] IN "KING [illegible] GARDEN." [illegible] THEATRE. PHOTO BY OTTO SAROLY

MR VINCENT D'INDY CONDUCTOR OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA CARNEGIE HALL PHOTO BY ELINOR CHICKERING

MUSIC NOTES.

THE two forthcoming concerts which the Boston Orchestra will give in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon of this week can be considered in some respects as the most interesting which this organization has ever given locally. At both of them the conductor will be Mr. Vincent d'Indy, a distinguished French composer, who has come to America at the invitation of Colonel Higginson to conduct a series of concerts of modern French music.

At Thursday evening's concert the only novelty will be Mr. d'Indy's own "Sauge Fleurie," a "Legende," after a story by Robert de Bonnieres.

In pursuance of plans formulated last winter, the Musurgia Society, for many years one of the two leading male singing societies of New York, has doubled its membership by adding over sixty women's voices. It will make its formal début as a mixed chorus in Carnegie Hall on Wednesday evening.

Mr. Walter Henry Hall, the society's conductor, presents an admirable programme, the most important feature of which is Liszt's "St. Elizabeth." Miss Isabel Bouton, soprano, and Mr. Claude Cunningham and Mr. Eric V. Goodwin, bassos, are the soloists. A large orchestra, with Mr. Gustav Dannreuther as concert master, will provide the accompaniments.

From NEW YORK PRESS

Address

Date DEC 3 - 1905

This week's pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be among the most interesting that band ever has given in New York. They will be devoted entirely to new French music, and at both the conductor will be Vincent d'Indy, the distinguished representative of this school. The programme of Thursday night's concert will comprise these works: Symphonie in B flat, d'Indy; suite, "Pelleas et Melisande," Gabriel Faure; "Saugefleurie," Legende, d'apres un conte de Robert de Bonnieres, Vincent d'Indy; "L'Apprenti Sorcier," d'apres une ballade de Goethe, Paul Dukas. This is Saturday afternoon's programme: Symphonie in B flat, opus 20, Ernest Chausson; "Psyche et Eros," Poeme Symphonique, Cesar Franck; Nocturnes, "Nuages" and Fetes, Claude Debussy; Chant funebre, Alberic Magnard; "Istar," variations symphoniques, Vincent d'Indy.

Some of these works never have been heard in New York.

---

om NEW YORK WORLD

ldress

ate DEC 3 - 1905

The Boston Symphony will give a brace of concerts this week at Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday matinee. These occasions will be notable in that the orchestra will be conducted by Vincent D'Indy, the celebrated French composer, who has been invited to visit this country and conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra. There will be no soloists engaged for these concerts. The programme will be devoted to French music. The programme on Thursday evening will be made up of D'Indy's Second Symphony, Faure's Suite, "Pelleas et Melisande," D'Indy's "Sangefleurie" and Dukas' "L'Apprenti Sorcier." For the Saturday matinee, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra D'Indy will conduct Chausson's Symphony in B-flat, Cesar Franck's "Psyche et Eros," De Bussy's Nocturnes, Magnard's Chant Funebre and D'Indy's "Istar."

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

NEW YORK CITY.

DEC - 1905

Strauss and the Boston Orchestra

The Boston Symphony Orchestra began its twenty-fifth season in New York on November 9 in Carnegie Hall. Mr. Gericke conducting. Mr. Heinrich Warnke, the [illegible] first 'cellist, appeared as soloist, playing Dvorák's concerto. [illegible] dignified, artistic, and entirely [illegible] style, although with no remarkable [illegible] of virtuosity. The concert was [illegible] the method in regard to an opportunity of hearing Richard Strauss's tone-poem "Tod und Verklärung," for the first [illegible] most two years. Mr. Gericke [illegible] more moving performance of "Tod und Verklärung." His reading on November 9 seemed deficient in the eloquence which he has proven that he knows how to invest it. It is music that must convey its [illegible] the emotions of terror, pity, and [illegible] or it fails of its intended [illegible] emotions have been uttered [illegible] with incomparable poignancy. [illegible] Gericke and the Boston Orchestra [illegible] to make them manifest if they will

Vincent d'Indy conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra in two French programmes at Carnegie Hall. On Thursday evening next he presents his own symphony in B-flat, Faure's suite "Pelleas et Melisande," a D'Indy novelty called "Saugefleurie" and Paul Dukas's "L'Apprenti Sorcier." For the Saturday matinée he has a new Chausson symphony in B-flat, a movement from Franck's "Psyche," two nocturnes by Debussy, a new "Chant Funèbre," by Alberic Magnard, and his own "Istar" variations. The symphony is played in Philadelphia on Monday evening for the first time in America.

Brooklyn's Friday programme will be the Thursday list over again.

M. d'Indy in Boston is now presenting the French programmes in which he will conduct Mr. Gericke's Boston Symphony Orchestra on the tour to Baltimore and New York next week.

Established: London, 1881; New York,

Für diese Woche wird wiederum kein Mangel an Konzerten zu beklagen sein, und manche von den Konzerten dürften sich als ungewöhnlich interessant erweisen. So werden uns zum Beispiel die Bostoner, d. h. das Boston Symphony Orchestra, am Donnerstag Abend und Samstag Nachmittag in Carnegie Hall die persönliche Bekanntschaft mit einem vielgenannten französischen Komponisten und Dirigenten, Vincent d'Indy, vermitteln, der eigens zu diesem Zweck von Paris herübergekommen ist. D'Indy ist dreiundfünfzig Jahre alt und gehört zu der jüngeren französischen Komponistenschule, die ihren Ausgang von César Franck nahm. D'Indy war ein langjähriger Schüler César Franck's. Entgegen den meisten seiner französischen Kollegen hat sich d'Indy um die Oper fast garnicht gekümmert, sondern vor Allem Orchestermusik, desgleichen Chor-, Kammer- und Klaviermusik komponirt. Einige seiner Kompositionen sind auch dem New Yorker Publikum nicht unbekannt geblieben; so spielte zum Beispiel das Bostoner Symphonieorchester im letzten Winter seine zweite Symphonie unter Wilhelm Gericke's Leitung. Wie nun aber die Programme der beiden nächsten Konzerte ersehen lassen, wird d'Indy hier nicht nur seine eigenen, sondern auch die Werke seiner engeren französischen Kollegen vorführen. Mit jener zweiten d'Indy'schen Symphonie wird das erste Konzert, am Donnerstag Abend, beginnen, dann folgt eine Suite Pelleas et Melisande von Fauré, eine Legende, „Saugefleurie" genannt, von d'Indy, und die Orchesterballade „Der Zauberlehrling" von Dukas. Am Samstag wird eine dreisätzige Symphonie von Chausson, César Franck's „Psyche et Eros", Claude Debussy's zwei Nocturnes, ein Todtengesang von Alberic Magnard und die bekannten symphonischen Variationen „Istar" von d'Indy zum Vortrag gelangen. Man sieht, Solisten werden in diesen beiden Konzerten überhaupt nicht auftreten; man wünscht offenbar, die ganze Aufmerksamkeit des Publikums auf die

NEW YORK SUN

DEC 3 1905

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Its Coming Concerts to Be Conducted by Vincent d'Indy, the Composer.

The December pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be in some respects the most interesting that famous band has ever given in New York. Both of them will be devoted entirely to modern French music of the "younger" school, and at both of them the conductor will be M. Vincent d'Indy, the distinguished representative of this school, who has come to America at the invitation of Mr. H. L. Higginson to conduct a series of concerts of this music.

In the spring of 1898 Theodore Thomas and his orchestra, assisted by Guilmant, Pugno and Ysaye, gave a French concert in Carnegie Hall. That was the last important concert of this description New York has had, although the names of the leading composers of the modern school have appeared of late very often on New York orchestral programmes. And as a matter of fact the number of actual novelties which M. d'Indy will present is not very large, so thoroughly have conductors in this country covered the field. At the first concert, on Thursday evening next, the only novelty will be M. d'Indy's own "Saugefleurie," a "légende," after a story by Robert de Bonnieres. M. d'Indy's second symphony (in B flat) was played here last season by Mr. Gericke, and the other two works, Faure's "Pélléas et Mélisande" suite and Dukas's "L'Apprenti Sorcier," after a ballade by Goethe, have also been played here.

From the point of view of novelties the concert on next Saturday afternoon will be the more important, as it will bring a symphony which is quite new in New York, in fact which will have its first performance in America in Philadelphia to-morrow (Monday) night. This is by Ernest Chausson, his symphony in B flat, opus 20. This work was written in 1891 and was performed for the first time in Paris by Arthur Nikisch, at the Cirque d'Hiver on May 3, 1897. The full score has been printed, but the orchestral parts are still in manuscript and were brought to this country by M. d'Indy.

Ernest Chausson is regarded by many as having been the most talented of that group of interesting men who surrounded César Franck and looked to him as to a prophet. Like his master, he found little appreciation during his life, and it is only since his tragic death, in 1899, that his works have found the appreciation which their merit warrants. Born in Paris in 1855 of wealthy parents, and, like his friend d'Indy, destined for the law, it was not until he had been admitted to the bar that he was allowed to give serious study to music. He was 25 years old when he became a pupil of Massenet in the Conservatory, where he was associated with Vidal, Bruneau, Leroux and Pierné. Before the end of two years he went to Franck, and, joining the Société Nationale, he was thrown constantly with d'Indy, Bordes, Fauré, Duparc and De Bréville. He was killed June 12, 1899, by being thrown from a bicycle while coasting down hill at Limay.

Another novelty at Saturday's concert will be a "Chant Funèbre" by Albéric Magnard. Magnard is a rich man, a pupil of d'Indy, and has written considerable music, including three symphonies. His music is very highly spoken of by those who have heard it.

The three other works on the programme have been played in New York—a movement from Franck's "Psyche," two nocturnes by Debussy and M. d'Indy's "Istar" symphonic variations. At neither concert will there be a soloist.

Donnerstag Abend und Samstag Nachmittag finden die zweiten Conzerte des Boston Symphonie-Orchester statt.

Das 3. Cello-Recital Carl Grienauers findet am Freitag Abend in College Hall statt. Frl. Flora Sherwood wird gesanglich mitwirken. Eine Cello-Suite von Victor Herbert steht am Programm.

In den dritten Concerten des N. Y. Symphonie Orchesters nächsten Sonntag und folgenden Dienstag wird Kubelik als Solist mitwirken und „die Schottische Fantasie" von Bruch und „Zigeunerweisen" von Sarasate vortragen. Die Orchesternummern sind die 5. Symphonie von Tschaikowsky und die Italienische Serenade von Hugo Wolff.

DEC 3 - 1905

In der nächsten Woche wird sich unser französischer Gast, Herr Vincent d'Indy, auch als Klavierspieler hören lassen, nämlich in seinem eigenen Klavierquartett op. 7, das er mit den Kneiselianern in deren Konzert am 12. Dezember in Mendelssohn Hall spielen wird. — Am 18. Dezember giebt der sehr junge [illegible]-Pianist

[118]

DEC 3 - 1905

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Vincent D'Indy to Conduct Two Concerts of French Music.

The two December concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon will be devoted entirely to modern French music of the "younger" school, and at both of them the conductor will be M. Vincent d'Indy, the distinguished representative of this school, who has come to America by invitation from Mr. H. L. Higginson to conduct a series of concerts of this music.

The number of actual novelties which M. d'Indy will present is not large, so thoroughly have conductors in this country covered the field. At the first concert on Thursday evening the only novelty will be M. d'Indy's own "Saugefleurie," a legende after a story by Robert de Bonnières. M. d'Indy's second symphony (in B flat) was played here last season by Mr. Gericke, and the other two works, Faure's "Pelleas et Melisande" suite and Dukas's "L'Apprenti sorcier," after a ballade by Goethe, has also been played here.

The concert on next Saturday afternoon will bring a symphony which is quite new in New York, in fact which will have its first performance in America in Philadelphia to-morrow night. This is by Ernest Chausson, his symphony in B flat, Opus 20. This work was written in 1891 and was performed for the first time in Paris by Arthur Nikisch at the Cirque d'Hiver on May 3, 1897. The full score has been printed, but the orchestral parts are still in manuscript and were brought to this country by M. d'Indy.

Ernest Chausson is thought by many to have been the most talented of that group of interesting men who surrounded César Franck and looked to him as to a prophet. Like his master, he found little appreciation during his life, and it is only since his tragic death in 1899 that his works have found the appreciation which their merit warrants. Born in Paris in 1855, and like d'Indy destined for the law, it was not until he had been admitted to the bar that he was allowed to give serious study to music. He was twenty-five years old when he became a pupil of Massenet in the Conservatory, where he was associated with Vidal, Bruneau, Leroux, and Pierné. Before the end of two years he went to Franck, and joining the Société Nationale he was thrown constantly with d'Indy, Bordes, Faure, Dupard, and de Bréville. He was killed June 12, 1899, by being thrown from a bicycle while coasting down a hill at Limay.

Another novelty at Saturday's concert will be a "Chant Funèbre," by Albéric Magnard. Magnard is a pupil of d'Indy who has written considerable music, including three symphonies. His music is highly spoken of by those who have heard it. At neither concert will there be a soloist. The programmes are as follows:

THURSDAY EVENING.

Second symphonie, Op. 57.....Vincent d'Indy
Suite, "Pelleas et Melisande," Maeterlinck.....Gabriel Faure
Saugefleurie, Legende.....Vincent d'Indy
L'Apprenti sorcier.....Paul Dukas

SATURDAY AFTERNOON.

Symphony, Op. 20.....Ernest Chausson
Psyche et Eros, from "Psyche," symphonic poem.....Cesar Franck
Necturnes—I., "Nuages"; II., "Fetes."..
Claude Debussy
Chant funebre.....Alberic Magnard
Istar, variations symphoniques.....
Vincent d'Indy

DEC 3 - 1905

MR. HENSCHEL AGAIN CONDUCTS

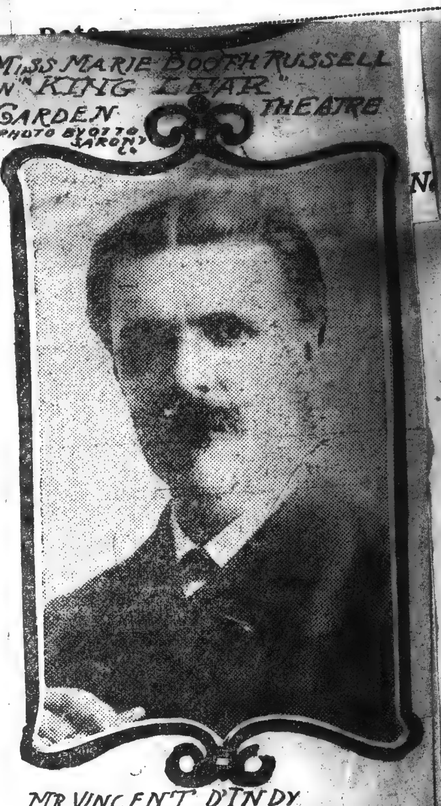
He Leads the Boston Orchestra at the Pension Fund Concert.

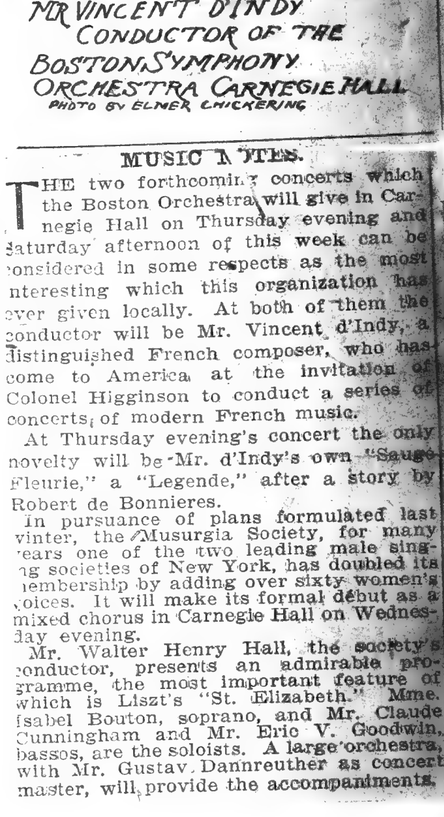
There was an interesting occasion in Boston last week at the Pension Fund concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. For this concert Mr. Georg Henschel was invited to come to New York, where he now lives, and conduct again the orchestra which he organized at the beginning of its career, in 1881. Mr. Henschel conducted it for three years, till the Autumn of 1884, when Mr. Gericke succeeded him. Since then he has conducted an orchestra in London that had an existence of only a few years, but has otherwise devoted himself to singing, teaching, and composing. On last Sunday evening Mr. Henschel conducted Beethoven's overture, "The Dedication of the House," the opening number of the programme, which was also the opening number of the first concert of the Symphony Orchestra in 1881.

Mr. Henschel met with a most cordial reception when he appeared. After he had conducted the overture he was applauded for several minutes, and Mr. Hess stepped forward and presented him with a large wreath of orchids, the gift of the members of the orchestra. Mr. Henschel has sent the flowers to Scotland to be placed on his wife's grave in Inverness. Mr. Henschel remarked on the great progress made by the orchestra since its foundation twenty-five years ago. He found several familiar faces among the players, men who were in the orchestra when he was its leader. The requiem mass composed by Mr. Henschel is to be performed under his direction in Philadelphia on March 15 by the Gilchrist Philharmonic Choir and the Philadelphia Orchestra.

NEW YORK HE[illegible]

DEC 3 1905





MR VINCENT D'INDY
CONDUCTOR OF THE
BOSTON SYMPHONY
ORCHESTRA CARNEGIE HALL
PHOTO BY ELMER CHICKERING

MUSIC NOTES.

THE two forthcoming concerts which the Boston Orchestra will give in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon of this week can be considered in some respects as the most interesting which this organization has ever given locally. At both of them the conductor will be Mr. Vincent d'Indy, a distinguished French composer, who has come to America at the invitation of Colonel Higginson to conduct a series of concerts of modern French music.

At Thursday evening's concert the only novelty will be Mr. d'Indy's own "Saugefleurie," a "Legende," after a story by Robert de Bonnieres.

In pursuance of plans formulated last winter, the Musurgia Society, for many years one of the two leading male singing societies of New York, has doubled its membership by adding over sixty women's voices. It will make its formal début as a mixed chorus in Carnegie Hall on Wednesday evening.

Mr. Walter Henry Hall, the society's conductor, presents an admirable programme, the most important feature of which is Liszt's "St. Elizabeth." Mme. Isabel Bouton, soprano, and Mr. Claude Cunningham and Mr. Eric V. Goodwin, bassos, are the soloists. A large orchestra, with Mr. Gustav Dannreuther as concert master, will provide the accompaniments.

This week's pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be among the most interesting that band ever has given in New York. They will be devoted entirely to new French music, and at both the conductor will be Vincent d'Indy, the distinguished representative of this school. The programme of Thursday night's concert will comprise these works: Symphonie, in B flat, Ernest Chausson; suite, "Pelleas et Melisande," Gabriel Faure; "Saugefleurie," Legende, d'apres un conte de Robert de Bonnieres; Vincent d'Indy; "L'Apprenti Sorciet," d'apres une ballade de Goethe, Paul Dukas. This is Saturday afternoon's programme: Symphonie in B flat, opus 20, Ernest Chausson; "Psyche et Eros," Poeme Symphonique, César Franck; Nocturnes, "Naugus" and Fetes, Claude Debussy; Chant funèbre, Alberic Magnard; "Istar," variations symphoniques, Vincent d'Indy.

Some of these works never have been heard in New York.

NEW YORK WORLD

DEC 3 - 1905

The Boston Symphony will give a brace of concerts this week at Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday matinee. These occasions will be notable in that the orchestra will be conducted by Vincent D'Indy, the celebrated French composer, who has been invited to visit this country and conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra. There will be no soloists engaged for these concerts. The programme will be devoted to French music. The programme on Thursday evening will be made up of D'Indy's Second Symphony, Faure's Suite, "Pelleas et Melisande," D'Indy's "Sangefleurie" and Dukas' "L'Apprenti Sorcier." For the Saturday matinee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra D'Indy will conduct Chausson's Symphony in B-flat, Cesar Franck's "Psyche et Eros," De Bussy's Nocturnes, Magnard's Chant Funebre, and D'Indy's "Istar."

DEC 3 - 1905

...onduct the Boston Symphony ...estra this month will bring ... the front more prominently ...ion over the music of the modern ...ch school. His programmes will ...nsiste up entirely of that music, ...ding, naturally enough, several ...his own compositions. Further- ...re, the Kneisel Quartet will do ...m the honor of playing two of his ...orks at their next concert, one of ...ich has not before appeared on their ...ogrammes in this city, and the New ...rk Symphony Orchestra next Sun- ...y will play his symphony with piano ...d a mountaineer's song. It is ...y of note, however, that, com- ...ough he does fresh from the hot- ...of the new French art, he brings ...r little that has not already been ...ard in this country. Herein is shown, ...s has often been shown before, the ...enterprise of our conductors in seek- ...g out all that may have significance ...n contemporary music, and their hos- ...pitality toward every style and artistic ...movement that can make any claim ...to importance.

+ + +

The modern French movement is making a large claim to importance, and in the view of many music lovers has already done much to validate its claims. Whatever else may be said of its representatives they are working on lines of their own, and have established a style, a mode of expression, a musical idiom that is instantly recognizable as their own. Their individuality, as a body, is much more sharply defined than that of their brethren across the Rhine, who are rather developing, in one way or another, what has come down to them, than cultivating distinctively new ideas. It was a representative of this French school who observed to Richard Strauss not long ago—and he was an admirer and student of the German composer's work—that he did not understand how he, Strauss, could go on writing in such an old-fashioned way! The remark, considering Strauss's recognized position as the leader in what Germany is doing in orchestral music to-day, seems paradoxical at first. Yet it is evident, at least from the point of view of the one who represented the French art, there is truth in it.

What Strauss and his followers have been devoting themselves to is the development of literary rather than pure musical ideas. Strauss has shown himself a musician of extraordinary resources and technical accomplishment in pushing to its extreme the assumption of the power of music to speak definite, detailed language that will describe all sorts of material things. But while he has often shown much ingenuity in devising the means to do this, he has worked with a musical tissue, a thematic structure, a kind of harmony, that are obviously derived from what he found already existing. And there are those who find themselves continually confronted with commonplaces in Strauss.

The young Frenchmen are programme musicians in a different sense, when they are programme musicians, for they are by no means such exclusively. There is something else for them than programme music—they are also symphonists and absolute musicians. When they write programme music it is generally with a subtler conception than that of representing a definite series of objects, events, and material concepts. They seek for a definition of moods, of atmosphere, of harmony of color, of embodying indefinable states of the soul, haunting memories of things not always exactly to be expressed. And in their music, both absolute and impressionistic, they have developed a new musical dialect. They have explored new paths in harmony, imagined new contours of melody, and have endeavored to set up a new basis of intervals and tonal relationships. It is a new and strange language which they speak in general, and the new and strange language in music is always imposed upon unwilling ears with difficulty and danger.

+ + +

Hugues Imbert suggests the application to the modern French music (of which, however, he was an ardent supporter) of the tirade put by the brothers de Goncourt into the mouth of the stranger who came to the supper, in the romance of "La Faustin":

"The French language impresses me as a kind of instrument in which the inventors, in their wholesome way, sought for clearness, logic, the rough approximation of the definitive. And now it seems that this instrument, at the present time, is being wielded by the most nervous, the most sensitive people, the most anxious searchers after the expression of indescribable sensations, the people least capable of finding satisfaction in the rough approximations of their good predecessors."

And he adds that whatever exaggerations may have come in through their "Franckist" training, added to those which still more urgently were imposed through "the dazzling invasion of the Wagnerian leit motive," there is no need to insist on the fact that the French school, if it has lost a little in clearness, has on the other hand gained both in poesy and knowledge.

+ + +

There is a subtlety of conception in this music of the young Frenchmen and a complexity of structure that of themselves oppose a barrier to the anxious or the indifferent listener. They have carried the art of thematic development and the derivation of one theme from another, of combination and opposition, and rhythmic elaboration, to the furthest extreme. Of these tendencies M. d'Indy is perhaps the most conspicuous representative. His music has an austerity that to a certain degree separates it from that of his compatriots. Some of his commentators have dwelt upon this phase of his nature:

"In painting he prefers the masters of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, and he confesses frankly that he experiences a greater and more artistic stimulus in the presence of the Assyrian art long before Christ than in the presence of the art known to Pericles. Imbert says that d'Indy will remain for hours in contemplation before pictures of certain primitive German or Flemish painters, while the marvelous compositions of the Italian painters of the Renaissance leave him cold. So that one may well trace in his preference for the colossal and rude works of earlier times, and in his disdain for the charming creations of the Renaissance the determination to keep from his music all that seems to him to have the least affectation, or that which is merely graceful or tender."

RICHARD ALDRICH.

N. Y. TRIBUNE
DEC 3 - 1905

...phony Orchestra will be devoted entirely to ...modern French music of the "younger" school, and at both of them the conductor will be M. Vincent d'Indy, the distinguished representative of this school who has come to America by invitation from Mr. H. L. Higginson to conduct a series of concerts of this music. In the spring of 1898 Theodore Thomas and his orchestra, assisted by Guilmant, Pugno and Ysaye, gave a French concert in Carnegie Hall. That was the last important concert of this description New-York has had, although the names of the leading composers of the modern school have appeared of late very often on New-York orchestral programmes. And as a matter of fact, the number of actual novelties which M. d'Indy will present is not very large, so thoroughly have conductors in this country covered the field. At the first concert on Thursday evening the only novelty will be M. d'Indy's own "Saugefleurie," a "Legende" after a story by Robert de Bonnières. M. d'Indy's second symphony (in B flat) was played here last season under Mr. Gericke, and the two other works, Faure's "Pelléas et Mélisande" suite and Dukas's "L'Apprenti Sorcier," have also been played here. From the point of view of novelties, the concert on next Saturday afternoon will be the more important, as it will bring a symphony which is quite new in New-York; in fact, which will have its first performance in America in Philadelphia to-morrow night. This is by Ernest Chausson, his symphony in B flat, opus 20. This work was written in 1891, and was performed for the first time in Paris by Arthur Nikisch, at the Cirque d'Hiver, on May 3, 1897. The full score has been printed, but the orchestral parts are still in manuscript, and were brought to this country by M. d'Indy. Ernest Chausson is thought by many to have been the most talented of that group of interesting men who surrounded César Franck and looked to him as to a prophet. Like his master, he found little appreciation during his life, and it has been only since his tragic death, in 1899, that his works have found the appreciation which their merit warrants. Born in Paris in 1855 of wealthy parents, and, like his friend d'Indy, destined for the law, it was not until he had been admitted to the bar that he was allowed to give serious study to music. He was twenty-five years old when he became a pupil of Massenet in the Conservatory, where he was associated with Vidal, Bruneau, Leroux and Pierne. Before the end of two years he went to Franck, and, joining the Societe Nationale, he was thrown constantly with d'Indy, Bordes, Faure, Dupard and de Breville. He was killed June 12, 1899, by being thrown from a bicycle while coasting down a hill at Limay. Another novelty at Saturday's concert will be a "Chant Funèbre," by Alberic Magnard. Magnard is a rich man, a pupil of d'Indy, who has written considerable music, including three symphonies. His music is very highly spoken of by those who have heard it. The other three works on the programme have been played in New-York—a movement from Franck's "Psyche," two Nocturnes by Debussy and M. d'Indy's "Istar" symphonic variations. At neither concert will there be a solo performer. The programmes in full are as follows:

CARNEGIE HALL, THURSDAY EVENING.

Symphony No. 2, in B flat, Op. 57.....Vincent d'Indy
Suite, "Pelléas et Melisande".....Gabriel Fauré
"Saugefleurie," Légende, d'apres un conte de Robert de Bonnières.....Vincent d'Indy
"L'Apprenti sorcier," d'apres une ballade de Goethe.....Paul Dukas

CARNEGIE HALL, SATURDAY AFTERNOON.

Symphony in B flat, Op. 20.....Ernest Chausson
"Psyché et Eros," extrait de "Psyché," poème symphonique.....César Franck
Nocturnes: (a) Nuages; (b) Fêtes.....Claude Debussy
Chant funèbre.....Alberic Magnard
"Istar," variations symphoniques.....Vincent d'Indy

NEW YORK PRESS
DEC 4 - 1905

Vincent D'Indy, the distinguished French composer who will appear as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon of this week, was born in Paris on March 27, 1851. Contrary to the usual arrangements of the Fates he was not forced to contend with poverty, for his father was a man of wealth. Soon after Vincent's debut in this world his mother died. The boy's father then entered matrimony for the second time and Vincent was put into the care of his grandmother, Therese D'Indy, who, being a good musician, gave to her ward his first instruction in music. Young D'Indy also had the benefit at that time of the advice and influence of his uncle, Saint Ange Wilfred D'Indy, an amateur composer of fair attainments. Like many another musician, Vincent D'Indy had law in mind as a profession and studied for that career. At the same time, however, he pursued the study of music diligently. Between 1862 and 1865 he took piano lessons from Diemer and harmony instruction from Lavignac. Two years later he became associated with Henri Duparc, who introduced him to the music of Richard Wagner, of which master D'Indy forthwith became an ardent champion. After serving in the Franco-Prussian War and taking part in the defense of Paris, D'Indy abandoned all thought of the law and devoted himself entirely to music. Duparc made him acquainted with Cesar Franck, who at that time had only a small coterie of admirers. D'Indy became a member of this fraternity of enthusiasts. He studied composition thoroughly with the master, and from 1873 to 1875 was a pupil in Franck's organ class in the Conservatory. After that he became a private pupil of the older composer. It was in 1873 that D'Indy made a trip to Germany in search of Brahms, whose "Deutsches Requiem" had called forth his unbounded admiration. Staying for a time in Weimar, he met Liszt and thus won the title of Liszt pupil. When D'Indy arrived in Vienna Brahms had started for Bavaria. The young Frenchman found him in Tutzing, but the visit proved unsatisfactory, it seems.

In order that he might make himself at home in the orchestra, D'Indy enrolled as chorus master and second drummer of the Society of the Chatelet Concerts in Paris, a position he held until 1878, when he had a difference with Colonne, the conductor. D'Indy's first work to attract attention was his "Piccolomini" overture—now incorporated in the "Wallenstein" Symphony—which had its first performance in 1874 at a Pasdeloupe concert. That composition soon carried his name beyond the French boundary. In 1882 a one-act comic opera, "Attendez-moi sous L'Orme," was put on the boards of the Opera Comique, but proved too unconventional in character for the Paris public. D'Indy became chorus master of the Lamoureux concerts in 1887, and in that capacity shared in preparing the first Parisian performance of "Lohengrin," which took place in the Eden Theatre on May 3, 1887. He busied himself particularly in these years with original work; yet he found time to make several visits to Bayreuth, where, with many other Wagner enthusiasts, he assisted in preparing the first production of the "Ring" and the first performance of "Parsifal."

D'Indy was one of the founders of the National School of Music in Paris, of which institution he became president after Franck's death. In 1896 he founded with Alexander Guilmant and Charles Bordes the "Schola Cantorum," a music school of which he now is director. Since 1903 he also has been giving courses of lectures in the Ecole des Hautes Etudes Sociales. D'Indy's catalogue of compositions includes the "Jean Hunyady" symphony; two Symphonies without programme—G major, opus 25, with accompanying piano, and B flat major, opus 57; an overture, "Antony and Cleopatra"; a Legend, "Saugefleurie"; a Ballad, "La Foret Enchantee"; orchestral variations, "Istar"; many chamber music works, both for string instruments alone and for string and wind instruments combined; a choral work, "The Song of the Bell" (after Schiller); dramatic scenes—"The Ride of the Cid" and "Mary Magdalen"; the operas "Fervaal" (Brussels, 1897) and "L'Etranger" (Brussels, 1903), and music for Alexander's "Karadek" and Mendes's "Medea." D'Indy has written also a work on musical composition—"Cours de Composition Musicale."

MAX SMITH.

NEW YORK PRESS
DEC 3 - 1905

Willy Hess, leader of the Boston Symphony Quartet, which will give its first concert of the season on January 2 in Mendelssohn Hall, announces the following programme: Beethoven, quartet in B flat major, opus 18, No. 6; Sigismond Stojowski, sonata for piano and violin in G major, opus 13, and Brahms, sextet for strings, in B flat major, opus 18. Stojowski will be the assistant pianist in his own composition. The work will have its first performance in America. In the Brahms sextet the quartet will have the assistance of Max Zach and Josef Kaller of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau of the World
THE MORNING TELEGRAPH
DEC 4 1905
NEW YORK CITY.

There will be two concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week. Both will be conducted by M. Vincent d'Indy, who comes to America as a representative of the younger school of French musicians.

The programme will be entirely French and will include a symphony by M. d'Indy himself.

On Saturday afternoon there will be performed a symphony by Ernest Chausson, another member of the hitherto none too illustrious Parisian clique of classic composers to which M. d'Indy's engagement has given such startling prominence.

NEW YORK TIMES.
NOV 26 1905

Vincent d'Indy, the distinguished French composer and conductor, who reached America last Tuesday from Paris, has begun his rehearsals with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston, preparatory to conducting that organization in a series of concerts of modern French music. Two of these concerts will be given in New York on Thursday evening, Dec. 7, and Saturday afternoon, Dec. 9. There will be no soloists at these concerts. For the first concert Mr. d'Indy has chosen his own symphony in B flat, Fauré's suite, "Pelléas et Mélisande"; his own "Saugefleurie," and Paul Dukas's "L'Apprenti sorcier." Of these the "Saugefleurie" is a novelty to New York. For the second concert he has chosen Chausson's symphony in B flat, a movement from Franck's "Psyché," two nocturnes by Debussy, the "Chant funèbre," by Alberic Magnard, and his own "Istar" variations. This symphony will be played in Philadelphia by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Monday evening, Dec. 4, for the first time in America. The Magnard work is also a novelty.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau of the World
NEW YORK SUN
DEC 3 - 1905

Willy Hess, the first violin and leader of the Boston Symphony Quartet, which will give its first concert of the season on January 2 in Mendelssohn Hall, January 2, announces the following programme: Beethoven, quartet in B flat, opus 18, No. 6; Sigismund Stojowski, Sonata for piano and violin in G major, opus 13, and Brahms, sextet for strings, in B flat major, opus 18. The Stojowski sonata will be the first time in America. In the Brahms sextet the assisting pianist, Mr. Stojowski will be the assisting pianist.

New York Times
DEC 3 - 1905

The Boston Symphony Quartet, for its first concert on Jan. 2, announces the following programme: Beethoven Quartet in B flat, op. 18, No. 6; Sigismund Stojowski, Sonata for piano and violin in G major, Opus 13; Brahms's Sextet for strings in B flat major, opus 18. The Stojowski Sonata will be played for the first time in America. Mr. Stojowski will be the assisting pianist.

NEW YORK TIMES
NOV 26 1905

As a tribute to Mr. Vincent d'Indy, who is at present in this country, the New York Symphony Orchestra is to play his "Symphonie sur un chant Montagnard francais" at its concerts on Dec. 10 and 12.

DEC 3 - 1905

THE coming of Mr. Vincent d'Indy to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra this month will bring to the front more prominently than ever the music of the modern French school. His programmes will be made up entirely of that music, including, naturally enough, several of his own compositions. Furthermore, the Kneisel Quartet will do him the honor of playing two of his works at their next concert, one of which has not before appeared on their programmes in this city, and the New York Symphony Orchestra next Sunday will play his symphony with piano upon a mountaineer's song. It is worthy of note, however, that, coming though he does fresh from the hotbed of the new French art, he brings very little that has not already been heard in this country. Herein is shown, as has often been shown before, the enterprise of our conductors in seeking out all that may have significance in contemporary music, and their hospitality toward every style and artistic movement that can make any claim to importance.

+ + +

The modern French movement is making a large claim to importance, and in the view of many music lovers has already done much to validate its claims. Whatever else may be said of its representatives they are working on lines of their own, and have established a style, a mode of expression, a musical idiom that is instantly recognizable as their own. Their individuality, as a body, is much more sharply defined than that of their brethren across the Rhine, who are rather developing, in one way or another, what has come down to them, than cultivating distinctively new ideas. It was a representative of this French school who observed to Richard Strauss not long ago—and he was an admirer and student of the German composer's work—that he did not understand how he, Strauss, could go on writing in such an old-fashioned way! The remark, considering Strauss's recognized position as the leader in what Germany is doing in orchestral music to-day, seems paradoxical at first. Yet it is evident that, at least from the point of view of the one who represented the French art, there is truth in it.

What Strauss and his followers have been devoting themselves to is the development of literary rather than purely musical ideas. Strauss has shown himself a musician of extraordinary resources and technical accomplishment in pushing to its extreme the assumption of the power of music to speak the definite, detailed language that will describe all sorts of material things. But while he has often shown much ingenuity in devising the means to do this, he has worked with a musical tissue, a thematic structure, a kind of harmony, that are obviously derived from what he found already existing. And there are those who find themselves continually confronted with commonplaces in Strauss.

The young Frenchmen are programme musicians in a different sense, when they are programme musicians, for they are by no means such exclusively. There is something else for them than programme music—they are still symphonists and absolute musicians. When they write programme music it is generally with a subtler conception than that of representing a definite series of objects, events, and material concepts. They seek for a delineation of moods, of atmosphere, of harmony of color, of embodying indefinable states of the soul, haunting memories of things not always exactly to be expressed. And in their music, both absolute and impressionistic, they have developed a new musical dialect. They have explored new paths in harmony, imagined new contours of melody, and have endeavored to set up a new basis of intervals and tonal relationships. It is a new and strange language which they speak in general, and the new and strange language in music is always imposed upon unwilling ears with difficulty and danger.

+ + +

Hugues Imbert suggests the application to the modern French music (of which, however, he was an ardent supporter) of the tirade put by the brothers de Goncourt into the mouth of the stranger who came to the supper, in the romance of "La Faustin":

"The French language impresses me as a kind of instrument in which the inventors, in their wholesome way, sought for clearness, logic, the rough approximation of the definitive. And now it seems that this instrument, at the present time, is being wielded by the most nervous, the most sensitive people, the most anxious searchers after the expression of indescribable sensations, the people least capable of finding satisfaction in the rough approximations of their good predecessors."

And he adds that whatever exaggerations may have come in through their "Franckist" training, added to those which still more urgently were imposed through "the dazzling invasion of the Wagnerian leit motive," there is no need to insist on the fact that the French school, if it has lost a little in clearness, has on the other hand gained both in poesy and knowledge.

+ + +

There is a subtlety of conception in this music of the young Frenchmen and a complexity of structure that of themselves oppose a barrier to the anxious or the indifferent listener. They have carried the art of thematic development and the derivation of one theme from another, of combination and opposition, and rhythmic elaboration, to the furthest extreme. Of these tendencies M. d'Indy is perhaps the most conspicuous representative. His music has an austerity that to a certain degree separates it from that of his compatriots. Some of his commentators have dwelt upon this phase of his nature:

"In painting he prefers the masters of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, and he confesses frankly that he experiences a greater and more artistic stimulus in the presence of the Assyrian art long before Christ than in the presence of the art known to Pericles. Imbert says that d'Indy will remain for hours in contemplation before pictures of certain primitive German or Flemish painters, while the marvelous compositions of the Italian painters of the Renaissance leave him cold. So that one may well trace in his preference for the colossal and rude works of earlier times, and in his disdain for the charming creations of the Renaissance the determination to keep from his music all that seems to him to have the least affectation, or that which is merely graceful or tender."

RICHARD ALDRICH.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau (1894) The World
THE MORNING TELEGRAPH
DEC 4 1905

om
dress
DEC 3 - 1905

The December pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be devoted entirely to modern French music of the "younger" school, and at both of them the conductor will be M. Vincent d'Indy, the distinguished representative of this school who has come to America by invitation from Mr. H. L. Higginson to conduct a series of concerts of this music. In the spring of 1898 Theodore Thomas and his orchestra, assisted by Guilmant, Pugno and Ysaye, gave a French concert in Carnegie Hall. That was the last important concert of this description New-York has had, although the names of the leading composers of the modern school have appeared of late very often on New-York orchestral programmes. And as a matter of fact, the number of actual novelties which M. d'Indy will present is not very large, so thoroughly have conductors in this country covered the field. At the first concert on Thursday evening the only novelty will be M. d'Indy's own "Saugefleurie," a "legende" after a story by Robert de Bonnières. M. d'Indy's second symphony (in B flat) was played here last season under Mr. Gericke, and the two other works, Faure's "Pelléas et Mélisande" suite and Dukas's "L'Apprenti Sorcier," have also been played here. From the point of view of novelties, the concert on next Saturday afternoon will be the more important, as it will bring a symphony which is quite new in New-York; in fact, which will have its first performance in America in Philadelphia tomorrow night. This is by Ernest Chausson, his symphony in B flat, opus 20. This work was written in 1891, and was performed for the first time in Paris by Arthur Nikisch, at the Cirque d'Hiver, on May 3, 1897. The full score has been printed, but the orchestral parts are still in manuscript, and were brought to this country by M. d'Indy. Ernest Chausson is thought by many to have been the most talented of that group of interesting men who surrounded César Franck and looked to him as to a prophet. Like his master, he found little appreciation during his life, and it has been only since his tragic death, in 1899, that his works have found the appreciation which their merit warrants. Born in Paris in 1855 of wealthy parents, and, like his friend d'Indy, destined for the law, it was not until he had been admitted to the bar that he was allowed to give serious study to music. He was twenty-five years old when he became a pupil of Massenet in the Conservatory, where he was associated with Vidal, Bruneau, Leroux and Pierne. Before the end of two years he went to Franck, and, joining the Societe Nationale, he was thrown constantly with d'Indy, Bordes, Faure, Dupard and de Breville. He was killed June 12, 1899, by being thrown from a bicycle while coasting down a hill at Limay. Another novelty at Saturday's concert will be a "Chant Funébre," by Alberic Magnard. Magnard is a rich man, a pupil of d'Indy, who has written considerable music, including three symphonies. His music is very highly spoken of by those who have heard it. The other three works on the programme have been played in New-York—a movement from Franck's "Psyche," two Nocturnes by Debussy and M. d'Indy's "Istar" symphonic variations. At neither concert will there be a solo performer. The programmes in full are as follows:

CARNEGIE HALL, THURSDAY EVENING.

Symphony No. 2, in B flat, Op. 57.....Vincent d'Indy
Suite, "Pelléas et Melisande".....Gabriel Fauré
"Saugefleurie," Légende, d'apres un conte de Robert de Bonnières.....Vincent d'Indy
"L'Apprenti sorcier, d'apres une ballade de Goethe.....Paul Dukas

CARNEGIE HALL, SATURDAY AFTERNOON.

Symphony in B flat, Op. 20.....Ernest Chausson
"Psyché et Eros," extrait de "Psyché," poëme symphonique.....César Franck
Nocturnes: (a) Nuages; (b) Fêtes.....Claude Debussy
Chant funèbre.....Albèric Magnard
"Istar," variations symphoniques.....Vincent d'Indy

NEW YORK PRESS
DEC 4 - 1905

Vincent D'Indy, the celebrated French composer who will appear as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon of this week, was born in Paris on March 27, 1852. Contrary to the usual arrangements of the Fates he was not forced to contend with poverty, for his father was a man of wealth. Soon after Vincent's debut in this world his mother died. The boy's father then entered matrimony for the second time and Vincent was put into the care of his grandmother, Therese D'Indy, who, being a good musician, gave to her ward his first instruction in music. Young D'Indy also had the benefit at that time of the advice and influence of his uncle, Saint Ange Wilfred D'Indy, an amateur composer of fair attainments. Like many another musician, Vincent D'Indy had law in mind as a profession and studied for that career. At the same time, however, he pursued the study of music diligently. Between 1862 and 1865 he took piano lessons from Diemer and harmony instruction from Lavignac. Two years later he became associated with Henri Duparc, who introduced him to the music of Richard Wagner, of which master D'Indy forthwith became an ardent champion. After serving in the Franco-Prussian War and taking part in the defense of Paris, D'Indy abandoned all thought of the law and devoted himself entirely to music. Duparc made him acquainted with Cesar Franck, who at that time had only a small coterie of admirers. D'Indy became a member of this fraternity of enthusiasts. He studied composition thoroughly with the master, and from 1873 to 1875 was a pupil in Franck's organ class in the Conservatory. After that he became a private pupil of the elder composer. It was in 1873 that D'Indy made a trip to Germany in search of Brahms, whose "Deutsches Requiem" had called forth his unbounded admiration. Staying for a time in Weimar, he met Liszt and thus won the title of Liszt pupil. When D'Indy arrived in Vienna Brahms had started for Bavaria. The young Frenchman found him in Tutzing, but the visit proved unsatisfactory, it seems.

In order that he might make himself at home in the orchestra, D'Indy enrolled as chorus master and second drummer of the Society of the Chatelet Concerts in Paris, a position he held until 1878, when he had a difference with Colonne, the conductor. D'Indy's first work to attract attention was his "Piccolomini" overture—now incorporated in the "Wallenstein" Symphony—which had its first performance in 1874 at a Pasdeloupe concert. That composition soon carried his name beyond the French boundary. In 1882 a one-act comic opera, "Attendez-moi sous L'Orme," was put on the boards of the Opera Comique, but proved too unconventional in character for the Paris public. D'Indy became chorus master of the Lamoureux concerts in 1887, and in that capacity shared in preparing the first Parisian performance of "Lohengrin," which took place in the Eden Theatre on May 3, 1887. He busied himself particularly in these years with original work; yet he found time to make several visits to Bayreuth, where, with many other Wagner enthusiasts, he assisted in preparing the first production of the "Ring" and the first performance of "Parsifal."

D'Indy was one of the founders of the National School of Music in Paris, of which institution he became president after Franck's death. In 1896 he founded with Alexander Guilmant and Charles Bordes the "Schola Cantorum," a music school of which he now is director. Since 1903 he also has been giving courses of lectures in the Ecole des Hautes Etudes Sociales. D'Indy's catalogue of compositions includes the "Jean Hunyady" symphony; two Symphonies without programme—G major, opus 25, with accompanying piano, and B flat major, opus 57; an overture, "Antony and Cleopatra"; a Legend, "Saugefleurie"; a Ballad, "La Foret Enchantee"; orchestral variations, "Istar"; many chamber music works, both for string instruments alone and for string and wind instruments combined; a choral work, "The Song of the Bell" (after Schiller); dramatic scenes—"The Ride of the Cid" and "Mary Magdalen"; the operas "Fervaal" (Brussels, 1897) and "L'Etranger" (Brussels, 1903), and music for Alexander's "Karadek" and Mendes's "Medea." D'Indy has written also a work on musical composition—"Cours de Composition Musicale."

MAX SMITH.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau (1894) The World
NEW YORK SUN
DEC 3 1905

Played by Mr. de Voto, pianist.

Prof. Willy Hess, the first violin and leader of the Boston Symphony Quartet, which will give its first concert in Mendelssohn Hall January 2 announces the following programme: Beethoven, quartet in B flat, opus 18, No. 6; Sigismund Stojowski, sonata for piano and violin in G major, opus 13; Brahms, sextet for strings in B flat major, opus 18. The Stojowski sonata will be played here for the first time in America. Mr. Stojowski, who will be the assisting pianist, is the head of the new piano department in the Institute of Musical Art. In the Brahms sextet the quartet will have the assistance of Max Zach and Josef Keller of the Boston Symphony Or-

n
ress
e

Willy Hess, leader of the Boston Symphony Quartet, which will give its first concert of the season on January 2 in Mendelssohn Hall, announces the following programme: Beethoven, quartet in B flat major, opus 18, No. 6; Sigismond Stojowski, sonata for piano and violin in G major, opus 13, and Brahms, sextet for strings in B flat major, opus 18. Stojowski will be the assistant pianist in his own composition. The work will have its first performance in America. In the Brahms sextet the quartet will have the assistance of Max Zach and Josef Keller of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

DEC 3 - 1905

The Boston Symphony Quartet, for its first concert on Jan. 2, announces the following programme: Beethoven Quartet in B flat, op. 18, No. 6; Sigismund Stojowski, Sonata for piano and violin in G major, Opus 13; Brahms's Sextet for strings in B flat major, opus 18. The Stojowski Sonata will be played for the first time in America. Mr. Stojowski will be the assisting pianist.

The First Established and Most ... Newspaper Cutting Bureau (1894) The World
ess
NEW YORK CITY

There will be two concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week. Both will be conducted by M. Vincent d'Indy, who comes to America as a representative of the younger school of French musicians.

The programme will be entirely French and will include a symphony by M. d'Indy himself.

On Saturday afternoon there will be performed a symphony by Ernest Chausson, another member of the hitherto none too illustrious Parisian clique of classic composers to which M. d'Indy's engagement has given such startling prominence.

ss
NOV 29 1905

As a tribute to Mr. Vincent d'Indy, who is at present in this country, the New York Symphony Orchestra is to play his "Symphonie sur un chant Montagnard francais" at its concerts on Dec. 10 and 12.

ishea: London, &c., New York

s
DEC 2 8 1905

Vincent d'Indy, the distinguished French composer and conductor, who reached America last Tuesday from Paris, has begun his rehearsals with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston, preparatory to conducting that organization in a series of concerts of modern French music. Two of these concerts will be given in New York on Thursday evening, Dec. 7, and Saturday afternoon, Dec. 9. There will be no soloists at these concerts. For the first concert Mr. d'Indy has chosen his own symphony in B flat, Fauré's suite, "Pelléas et Mélisande"; his own "Saugefleurie," and Paul Dukas's "L'Apprenti sorcier." Of these the "Saugefleurie" is a novelty to New York. For the second concert he has chosen Chausson's symphony in B flat, a movement from Franck's "Psyché," two nocturnes by Debussy, the "Chant funèbre," by Albéric Magnard, and his own "Istar" variations. This symphony will be played in Philadelphia by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Monday evening, Dec. 4, for the first time in America. The Magnard work is also a novelty.

rom DEC 6 - 1905
ddress NEW YORK COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER

VINCENT D'INDY, the eminent French composer, who will conduct the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall on Thursday night and Saturday afternoon of this week, has come to this country at the invitation of the Boston orchestra to conduct a series of concerts devoted to the works of the latest school of French composers—like Charpentier, Chausson, Debussy, Fauré, and Mr. d'Indy himself—who have found their guide and inspiration in César Franck rather than in men like Saint-Saëns, Godard, or Massenet.

Here in New York the new French school has received less attention than have the latest schools of some other countries. Russian music is presented by a society specially organized for that purpose. German music in its most potent recent development was thoroughly expounded two years ago in the concerts of Richard Strauss. The new French composers have been heard occasionally—of the nine numbers on Mr. d'Indy's two programmes only three are entirely new to New York—but even the most prominent of these composers, save perhaps Gabriel Fauré and César Franck himself, are little more than names to the music-going public.

In asking a conductor to come from Europe to present authoritatively at a limited number of concerts the latest French music, the Boston Orchestra has departed from its established customs, which never have included "guest" conductors, but in the case of Mr. d'Indy it has secured not a conspicuous "star" conductor with a new or striking reading of some great familiar work to exploit, but a distinguished composer, to-day the recognized leader of the newest school in his own country.

Vincent d'Indy was born at Paris, March 27, 1852. He was brought up by his grandmother, who like Saint-Saëns's grandmother, gave him his first instruction in music. Following the wishes of his family he studied law. His studies were interrupted, however, by the Franco-Prussian war, after serving through which he definitely renounced the law and took up music as a profession.

He early became the pupil of César Franck, and was associated with him until his death in 1890. Meantime Mr. d'Indy underwent various musical influences. In 1873 he visited Germany, and remained for some months at Weimar with Liszt. He was present at the original performance of the "Ring" at Bayreuth in 1876. He also conceived at one time a great admiration for the German Requiem of Brahms, though his visit to Brahms himself proved unsatisfactory. And constantly Mr. d'Indy has gone on studying, composing, and latterly teaching. He is one of the musicians, too, who are sensitive to the other arts. Literature and painting speak to him, and so even more than the arts does nature, especially in her wilder moods of mountain and forest.

Throughout his career Mr. d'Indy has been a prolific composer. Among his most important works, to mention only a few, are the "Istar" variations and the B flat symphony, both to be played here this week, the symphony for orchestra and piano on a mountain air, and the two lyric dramas, "Fervaal" and "The Stranger."

The complete programmes of the two concerts to be conducted by Mr. d'Indy are as follows: For to-morrow night, d'Indy, Symphony No. 2 in B-flat; Fauré, suite "Pélléas et Mélisande"; d'Indy, "Saugefleurie" (first time); Dukas, 'L'Apprenti sorcier." For Saturday afternoon, Chausson, symphony in B-flat (first time); Franck, "Psyché et Eros," from symphonic poem "Psyché"; Debussy, nocturnes ("Nuages" and "Fêtes"); Magnard, "Chant funèbre" (first time); d'Indy, smyphonic variations "Istar."

NEW YORK TIMES.
NOV 26 1905

The Longy Club of Boston will give a concert in New York on Dec. 19. The club will be remembered as an organization of wind instrument players, headed by the distinguished first oboist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. For their Boston concerts they have announced a number of pieces that will be played for the first time, some of which will be heard here. Among them are Beethoven's rondino, Faure's nocturne, Klughardt's reed songs for oboe, viola, and piano, Lacroix's symphonic variations, Lampe's serenade, Lefebvre's scherzo, Malherbe's nonetto, Mendelssohn's duet for clarinet and basset horn, Mozart's Divertimento No. 10, concerto in E flat for oboe; Novacek's sinfonietta, Rice's quintet, and Wolf-Ferrari's chamber symphony.

NEW YORK EV'G POST
ss
DEC 7 - 1905

MUSIC AND DRAMA.

A Guest from Paris.

At last even the staid, conservative Boston Symphony Orchestra has endorsed the up-to-date custom of importing a "guest" conductor, as the Germans say. Vincent D'Indy, the present leader of the César Franck school in Paris, presided over the concert given in Boston last week, and he will also conduct the same band in Carnegie Hall this evening and Saturday afternoon, and at the Baptist Temple, Brooklyn, to-morrow evening. The programmes for to-night in Manhattan and to-morrow night in Brooklyn are identical, the pieces selected being Deuxième Symphonie, B flat, Op. 57, Vincent d'Indy; Suite "Pelléas et Mélisande" de Maeterlinck, Gabriel Fauré; "Sangerfleurie" Legende, d'après un conte de Robert de Bonnieres, Vincent d'Indy; "L'Aprenti Sorcier" d'après une ballade de Goethe, Paul Dukas.

Vincent D'Indy is fifty-three years old. Paris was his birthplace; his father was a man of aristocratic descent, and rich enough to live on his income. He is also said to have played the violin "not too disagreeably," but did not think enough of music to wish his son to adopt it as a profession. Other influences, however, came into play. Mme. D'Indy having died shortly after her boy's birth, he was brought up by his grandmother, who was a good musician, and gave him his first lessons.

He began to play the piano at the age of nine, and at fourteen he was already quite an accomplished player, with a special liking for the works of the German masters, particularly Bach and Beethoven. Beside the grandmother there was another musical relative, his uncle Wilfred D'Indy, a composer of light and popular songs, who stimulated his interest in the art, particularly by placing in his hands the wonderful treatise of Berlioz on the art of writing for the orchestra. During the Franco-Prussian war Vincent served as a volunteer in helping to defend Paris. After the war was over it was expected by his family that he would resume his legal studies, for he was intended to be a lawyer; but by this time his musical instincts asserted themselves so strongly that he yielded to them completely.

In the development of D'Indy's genius German influences played a most important rôle. The composer Duparc introduced him, at the age of seventeen, to the splendors of Wagner's early operas, which aroused his unbounded enthusiasm. Duparc also introduced him to César Franck, whose chief pupil he became. In 1873 he came across the score of Brahms's German Requiem, and once more he was fired by enthusiasm; so much so that he actually made a trip to Germany and Austria, for the chief purpose of meeting Brahms. But although he was armed with letters of introduction from Franck and Saint-Saëns, the austere Brahms did not welcome his young French admirer. He always disliked visitors, perhaps because he suspected them of bringing manuscripts for him to read.

A very different sort of a man was Liszt, who was always ready to place his time at the service of young musicians. He had a cordial welcome for the young Frenchman, who remained with him at Weimar several months, benefiting by his invaluable lessons. This was in 1873. Two years later his first work for orchestra was performed several times at the Concerts Populaires in Paris, under Pasdeloup; it was the overture to Schiller's "Piccolomini," which afterward became the second part of his "Wallenstein Trilogy."

In 1887 D'Indy was chorus master for Lamoureux, when "Lohengrin" was produced for the first time. Seventy-seven rehearsals were held by him—all for that one performance; for the mob would not allow another. D'Indy had previously (1876) been one of the French pilgrims to Bayreuth when the Nibelung's Ring had its first performance there; he has since that time been a frequent spectator at the Wagner festivals, and it is no wonder that his works have become more and more Wagnerian in their harmonic and orchestral coloring; the climax of this spirit was reached in his opera "Fervaal," which was produced eight years ago at Brussels.

D'Indy is a man of wide culture. He has written the books for his own operas. Personally he is most modest. Once when asked by a friend regarding the future of his music, d'Indy replied, "If my work is good, it will live; if it is bad, no meticulous care in execution, no rich clothing will rescue it from the oblivion which is its destiny." To a friend in this city he wrote the other day regarding his second symphony, which opens to-night's programme: "This is the work which, it seems, made the New York critics cry out last season. But believe me, it is not for this that I have written the symphony. It is simply the reflection of thoughts dear to me, whether right or wrong. It is in four parts—that's long!"

N. Y. EV'G SUN
om
ddress
DEC 7 - 1905
ate

To-night's music event in town is a Boston Symphony concert, devoted to modern French music. M. Vincent d'Indy, the conductor, has come to America by invitation from Col. Henry L. Higginson as the first outsider in twenty-five years to lead his famous orchestra. It is recalled that in 1898 Theodore Thomas, assisted by Guilmant, Pugno and Ysaye, gave a French concert in Carnegie Hall. French composers have appeared often on New York programmes. And, as a matter of fact, the few actual novelties which M. d'Indy will present are not so interesting as the way he presents them.

The Boston Orchestra's novelty to-night will be D'Indy's own "Saugefleurie," a "legende" after a story by Robert de Bonnieres. D'Indy's second symphony, in B-flat, was played last season by Mr. Gericke, and the other two works, Faure's "Pelleas et Melisande" suite and Dukas's "L'Apprenti Sorcier," after a ballade by Goethe, have also been played here.

Established and Most Complete
Cutting Bureau in the World
NEW YORK PRESS
NOV 26 1905

Vincent D'Indy has begun rehearsals with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston preparatory to conducting that organization in a series of concerts of modern French music. Two of these will be given in this city on the evening of December 7 and the afternoon of December 9. Following the best usage in Paris there will be no soloists. For the first concert D'Indy has chosen his own symphony in B flat; Faure's suite, "Pelleas et Melisande"; his own "Saugefleurie" and Paul Dukas's "L'Apprenti Sorcier." The "Saugefleurie" is a novelty to New York. For the second concert he has chosen Chaussan's symphony in B flat, a movement from Franck's "Psyche"; two Nocturnes by Debussy, the "Chant Funebre," by Alberic Magnard and D'Indy's own "Istar" variations. The symphony will be played for the first time in America by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Philadelphia on the evening of December 4. The Magnard work also is a novelty.

NEW YORK HERALD

MR. D'INDY LEADS BOSTON ORCHESTRA

French Musician Makes His First Bow to American Audience in Carnegie Hall.

GETS AN EFFUSIVE WELCOME

Brilliant Audience Greets His Interpretation of Programme of Typical French Music with Applause.

Specially engaged as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's second concert, Mr. Vincent d'Indy, a distinguished French musician, made his first New York bow before a brilliant audience in Carnegie Hall last night.

He received an effusive welcome, which, as the evening wore on, was emphasized in warm and prolonged applause, a tribute alike to his rank among present day composers and to his effective interpretation of a programme of typical modern French music.

His fifty-four years seemed to sit but lightly on Mr. d'Indy's square shoulders as he stood erect at the conductor's desk. His use of the baton was easy and graceful; his other gestures were few. It was noticeable that he paid close attention to the scores before him, even in the case of his own works, and that he dealt in correspondingly fewer signs to the various departments of the orchestra than is the wont of conductors.

He demanded bigger climaxes and in general a more ponderous tone than it is Mr. Gericke's custom to evoke from the Boston players, but he somehow failed to obtain from them quite the refinement of detail which is usual in their work.

To some critical listeners there was sufficient compensation for this in the fact that for once the brass of the orchestra really had the opportunity to display its splendors of tone unrestrained.

There was no soloist. The programme opened with Mr. d'Indy's own B flat, major symphony, No. 2, opus 57, which had its first hearing here last winter. This very extraordinary piece of modern music showed in the composer's hands last night a more definite purpose than before, even if its playing had less polish, and its last three movements were warmly applauded.

Following it came a quaintly melancholy suite by Gabriel Fauré, from his stage music to Maeterlinck's "Pelleas and Melisande," and after this the novelty of the evening, Mr. d'Indy's "Saugefleurie," a charming "legend" for orchestra after a fairy tale by Robert de Bonnières. The concert closed with Paul Dukas' delightfully whimsical scherzo, "L'apprenti Sorcier."

and none of the eccentricities in musicians, quietly c... at Carnegie Hall last night and place at the conductor's desk b... Boston Symphony Orchestra there bled, one hardly realized that ... Mr. d'Indy, the distinguished French poser, who had come all the ... Paris to revolutionize our accept... of French music. Except for a ... diffidence in the dignity of his b... a stranger might have supposed ... habitual conductor of the orchestra.

This diffidence vanished as he signalled the men to begin. Throughout the ... cert he conducted with undemonstrative but insistent authority. His sincerity ... simplicity of bearing were irresistible. ... might have been unaware that his ... gramme was chosen from the latest ... of French music, of which the audience knew him to be the acknowledged ... Not by the slightest hint did he ... that he could be there for any purpose less impersonal than the interpretation of the music before him.

Mr. d'Indy's symphony in B flat was the "pièce de résistance" of the programme. When played here previously, at a Boston Symphony concert last year, it had seemed a work in a foreign musical idiom. One lost its beauties in the maze of strange progressions that seemed to lead nowhere. Yesterday the scales had begun to fall from one's ears. There were many passages, at least one entire movement (the second), that now seemed of surprising beauty. The change must have been with the listener rather than the performance, for the players last year were the same virtuoso orchestra they are to-day, and though Mr. d'Indy is obviously the authoritative interpreter of his own works, Mr. Gericke led it then with all his consummate skill as a conductor, and, as it seemed, a particular sympathy with this work.

Yesterday the listener was accustoming himself to a strange tone language. Those who regard this music as cacophanous would do well to remember how people once found Wagner ugly because they had not yet learned to understand the musical idiom he employed; how when "Faust" was first sung here many complained that Siebel's "Flower Song" was the only tune in the score, or how Edward Fitzgerald once wrote to Fanny Kemble regarding Bizet's "Carmen" that it was an opera of the Wagnerian pattern, "very beautiful accompaniment to no melody." The portion of Mr. d'Indy's symphony that still remains most difficult of comprehension is the first movement. Here the novelty of the progressions and the complexity of the rhythms require more than two hearings to make themselves plain.

Easier of comprehension, and after this austere and absolute music, almost sentimentally sweet in melody, is Mr. d'Indy's "Saugefleurie," playe dyesterday for the first time in New York. It is based on a legend in the "Contes de Fées," of Robert de Bonnières, and is frankly pictorial in intention. It is beautiful mu... and to be enjoyed without so great ap... cation in listening as the B-flat sympho... demands.

In comparison with Mr. d'Indy's music, Fauré's "Pelléas et Mélisande" suite might almost have been the work of Massenet. It misses somewhat the naïveté of Maeterlinck's play and also the fragmentariness in expression of Maeterlinck's characters. It rather expresses freely in music the moods that they feel, but in speech only hint gropingly.

"L'Apprenti sorcier," by Paul Kukas which ended the programme, had been played with great success last season at the initial concert of the Boston Orchestra. Yesterday it seemed no less brilliant, and set one thinking of what the composer may or may not have learned from Richard Strauss and Humperdinck.

For the second concert under Mr. d'Indy's direction, at Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon, the programme comprises Ernest Chausson's symphony in B-flat (first time); the "Psyché et Eros," from César Franck's symphonic poem "Psyché"; Debussy's nocturnes "Nuages" and "Fêtes"; a "Chant funèbre," by Alberic Magnard (first time), and Mr. d'Indy's "Istar" variations.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
AMERICAN.
om NEW YORK CITY.
ddress
DEC 8 - 1905
ate

Vincent d'Indy conducted at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening. He will again conduct at the concert which the orchestra is to give tomorrow, Saturday, afternoon. Mr. d'Indy is one of the leaders of the modern French school of musicians. The programme will be as follows: Symphonie (in B flat), op. 20, Ernest Chaussor; "Psythe et Eros," Cæsar Franck; Nocturne, "Nuages," "Fetes," Claude Debussy; "Chant funebre," Alberic Maynard; "Istar," variations symphoniques, Vincent d'Indy.

[120]

from DEC 6 - 1905
address NEW YORK COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER

VINCENT D'INDY, the eminent French composer, who will conduct the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall on Thursday night and Saturday afternoon of this week, has come to this country at the invitation of the Boston orchestra to conduct a series of concerts devoted to the works of the latest school of French composers—like Charpentier, Chausson, Debussy, Fauré, and Mr. d'Indy himself—who have found their guide and inspiration in César Franck rather than in men like Saint-Saëns, Godard, or Massenet.

Here in New York the new French school has received less attention than have the latest schools of some other countries. Russian music is presented by a society specially organized for that purpose. German music in its most potent recent development was thoroughly expounded two years ago in the concerts of Richard Strauss. The new French composers have been heard occasionally—of the nine numbers on Mr. d'Indy's two programmes only three are entirely new to New York—but even the most prominent of these composers, save perhaps Gabriel Fauré and César Franck himself, are little more than names to the music-going public.

In asking a conductor to come from Europe to present authoritatively at a limited number of concerts the latest French music, the Boston Orchestra has departed from its established customs, which never have included "guest" conductors, but in the case of Mr. d'Indy it has secured not a conspicuous "star" conductor with a new or striking reading of some great familiar work to exploit, but a distinguished composer, to-day the recognized leader of the newest school in his own country.

Vincent d'Indy was born at Paris, March 27, 1852. He was brought up by his grandmother, who like Saint-Saëns's grandmother, gave him his first instruction in music. Following the wishes of his family he studied law. His studies were interrupted, however, by the Franco-Prussian war, after serving through which he definitely renounced the law and took up music as a profession.

He early became the pupil of César Franck, and was associated with him until his death in 1890. Meantime Mr. d'Indy underwent various musical influences. In 1873 he visited Germany, and remained for some months at Weimar with Liszt. He was present at the original performance of the "Ring" at Bayreuth in 1876. He also conceived at one time a great admiration for the German Requiem of Brahms, though his visit to Brahms himself proved unsatisfactory. And constantly Mr. d'Indy has gone on studying, composing, and latterly teaching. He is one of the musicians, too, who are sensitive to the other arts. Literature and painting speak to him, and so even more than the arts does nature, especially in her wilder moods of mountain and forest.

Throughout his career Mr. d'Indy has been a prolific composer. Among his most important works, to mention only a few, are the "Istar" variations and the B flat symphony, both to be played here this week, the symphony for orchestra and piano on a mountain air, and the two lyric dramas, "Fervaal" and "The Stranger."

The complete programmes of the two concerts to be conducted by Mr. d'Indy are as follows: For to-morrow night, d'Indy, Symphony No. 2 in B-flat; Fauré, suite "Pélléas et Mélisande"; d'Indy, "Saugefleurie" (first time); Dukas, 'L'Apprenti sorcier." For Saturday afternoon, Chausson, symphony in B-flat (first time); Franck, "Psyché et Eros," from symphonic poem "Psyché"; Debussy, nocturnes ("Nuages" and "Fêtes"); Magnard, "Chant funèbre" (first time); d'Indy, smyphonic variations "Istar."

---

* * *

The Longy Club of Boston will give a concert in New York on Dec. 19. The club will be remembered as an organization of wind instrument players, headed by the distinguished first oboist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. For their Boston concerts they have announced a number of pieces that will be played for the first time, some of which will be heard here. Among them are Beethoven's rondino, Faure's nocturne, Klughardt's reed songs for oboe, viola, and piano, Lacroix's symphonic variations, Lampe's serenade, Lefebvre's scherzo, Malherbe's nonetto, Mendelssohn's duet for clarinet and basset horn, Mozart's Divertimento No. 10, concerto in E flat for oboe; Novacek's sinfonietta, Rice's quintet, and Wolf-Ferrari's chamber symphony.

NEW YORK EV'G POST
ss
DEC 7 - 1905

MUSIC AND DRAMA.

A Guest from Paris.

At last even the staid, conservative Boston Symphony Orchestra has endorsed the up-to-date custom of importing a "guest" conductor, as the Germans say. Vincent D'Indy, the present leader of the César Franck school in Paris, presided over the concert given in Boston last week, and he will also conduct the same band in Carnegie Hall this evening and Saturday afternoon, and at the Baptist Temple, Brooklyn, to-morrow evening. The programmes for to-night in Manhattan and to-morrow night in Brooklyn are identical, the pieces selected being Deuxième Symphonie, B flat, Op. 57, Vincent d'Indy; Suite "Pelléas et Mélisande" de Maeterlinck, Gabriel Fauré; "Sangerfleurie" Legende, d'après un conte de Robert de Bonnieres, Vincent d'Indy; "L'Aprenti Sorcier" d'après une ballade de Goethe, Paul Dukas.

Vincent D'Indy is fifty-three years old. Paris was his birthplace; his father was a man of aristocratic descent, and rich enough to live on his income. He is also said to have played the violin "not too disagreeably," but did not think enough of music to wish his son to adopt it as a profession. Other influences, however, came into play. Mme. D'Indy having died shortly after her boy's birth, he was brought up by his grandmother, who was a good musician, and gave him his first lessons.

He began to play the piano at the age of nine, and at fourteen he was already quite an accomplished player, with a special liking for the works of the German masters, particularly Bach and Beethoven. Beside the grandmother there was another musical relative, his uncle Wilfred D'Indy, a composer of light and popular songs, who stimulated his interest in the art, particularly by placing in his hands the wonderful treatise of Berlioz on the art of writing for the orchestra. During the Franco-Prussian war Vincent served as a volunteer in helping to defend Paris. After the war was over it was expected by his family that he would resume his legal studies, for he was intended to be a lawyer; but by this time his musical instincts asserted themselves so strongly that he yielded to them completely.

In the development of D'Indy's genius German influences played a most important rôle. The composer Duparc introduced him, at the age of seventeen, to the splendors of Wagner's early operas, which aroused his unbounded enthusiasm. Duparc also introduced him to César Franck, whose chief pupil he became. In 1873 he came across the score of Brahms's German Requiem, and once more he was fired by enthusiasm; so much so that he actually made a trip to Germany and Austria, for the chief purpose of meeting Brahms. But although he was armed with letters of introduction from Franck and Saint-Saëns, the austere Brahms did not welcome his young French admirer. He always disliked visitors, perhaps because he suspected them of bringing manuscripts for him to read.

A very different sort of a man was Liszt, who was always ready to place his time at the service of young musicians. He had a cordial welcome for the young Frenchman, who remained with him at Weimar several months, benefiting by his invaluable lessons. This was in 1873. Two years later his first work for orchestra was performed several times at the Concerts Populaires in Paris, under Pasdeloup; it was the overture to Schiller's "Piccolomini," which afterward became the second part of his "Wallenstein Trilogy."

In 1887 D'Indy was chorus master for Lamoureux, when "Lohengrin" was produced for the first time. Seventy-seven rehearsals were held by him—all for that one performance; for the mob would not allow another. D'Indy had previously (1876) been one of the French pilgrims to Bayreuth when the Nibelung's Ring had its first performance there; he has since that time been a frequent spectator at the Wagner festivals, and it is no wonder that his works have become more and more Wagnerian in their harmonic and orchestral coloring; the climax of this spirit was reached in his opera "Fervaal," which was produced eight years ago at Brussels.

D'Indy is a man of wide culture. He has written the books for his own operas. Personally he is most modest. Once when asked by a friend regarding the future of his music, d'Indy replied, "If my work is good, it will live; if it is bad, no meticulous care in execution, no rich clothing will rescue it from the oblivion which is its destiny." To a friend in this city he wrote the other day regarding his second symphony, which opens to-night's programme: "This is the work which, it seems, made the New York critics cry out last season. But believe me, it is not for this that I have written the symphony. It is simply the reflection of thoughts dear to me, whether right or wrong. It is in four parts—that's long!"

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
om N. Y. EV'G SUN
idress
ate DEC 7 - 1905

To-night's music event in town is a Boston Symphony concert, devoted to modern French music. M. Vincent d'Indy, the conductor, has come to America by invitation from Col. Henry L. Higginson as the first outsider in twenty-five years to lead his famous orchestra. It is recalled that in 1898 Theodore Thomas, assisted by Guilmant, Pugno and Ysaye, gave a French concert in Carnegie Hall. French composers have appeared often on New York programmes. And, as a matter of fact, the few actual novelties which M. d'Indy will present are not so interesting as the way he presents them.

The Boston Orchestra's novelty to-night will be D'Indy's own "Saugefleurie," a "legende" after a story by Robert de Bonnieres. D'Indy's second symphony, in B-flat, was played last season by Mr. Gericke, and the other two works, Faure's "Pelleas et Melisande" suite and Dukas's "L'Apprenti Sorcier," after a ballade by Goethe, have also been played here.

Established and Most Complete Cutting Bureau in the World
NEW YORK PRESS
NOV 26 1905

Vincent D'Indy has begun rehearsals with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston preparatory to conducting that organization in a series of concerts of modern French music. Two of these will be given in this city on the evening of December 7 and the afternoon of December 9. Following the best usage in Paris there will be no soloists. For the first concert D'Indy has chosen his own symphony in B flat; Faure's suite, "Pelleas et Melisande"; his own "Saugefleurie" and Paul Dukas's "L'Apprenti Sorcier." The "Saugefleurie" is a novelty to New York. For the second concert he has chosen Chaussan's symphony in B flat; a movement from Franck's "Psyche"; two Nocturnes by Debussy, the "Chant Funebre," by Alberic Magnard and D'Indy's own "Istar" variations. The symphony will be played for the first time in America by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Philadelphia on the evening of December 4. The Magnard work also is a novelty.

NEW YORK HERALD

MR. D'INDY LEADS BOSTON ORCHESTRA

French Musician Makes His First Bow to American Audience in Carnegie Hall.

GETS AN EFFUSIVE WELCOME

Brilliant Audience Greets His Interpretation of Programme of Typical French Music with Applause.

Specially engaged as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's second concert, Mr. Vincent d'Indy, a distinguished French musician, made his first New York bow before a brilliant audience in Carnegie Hall last night.

He received an effusive welcome, which, as the evening wore on, was emphasized in warm and prolonged applause, a tribute alike to his rank among present day composers and to his effective interpretation of a programme of typical modern French music.

His fifty-four years seemed to sit but lightly on Mr. d'Indy's square shoulders as he stood erect at the conductor's desk. His use of the baton was easy and graceful; his other gestures were few. It was noticeable that he paid close attention to the scores before him, even in the case of his own works, and that he dealt in correspondingly fewer signs to the various departments of the orchestra than is the wont of conductors.

He demanded bigger climaxes and in general a more ponderous tone than it is Mr. Gericke's custom to evoke from the Boston players, but he somehow failed to obtain from them quite the refinement of detail which is usual in their work.

To some critical listeners there was sufficient compensation for this in the fact that for once the brass of the orchestra really had the opportunity to display its splendors of tone unrestrained.

There was no soloist. The programme opened with Mr. d'Indy's own B flat, major symphony, No. 2, opus 57, which had its first hearing here last winter. This very extraordinary piece of modern music showed in the composer's hands last night a more definite purpose than before, even if its playing had less polish, and its last three movements were warmly applauded.

Following it came a quaintly melancholy suite by Gabriel Faure, from his stage music to Maeterlinck's "Pelleas and Melisande," and after this the novelty of the evening, Mr. d'Indy's "Saugefleurie," a charming "legend" for orchestra after a fairy tale by Robert de Bonnières. The concert closed with Paul Dukas' delightfully whimsical scherzo, "L'apprenti Sorcier."

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
AMERICAN.
om NEW YORK CITY.
ddress
DEC 8 - 1905
ate

Vincent d'Indy conducted at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening. He will again conduct at the concert which the orchestra is to give tomorrow, Saturday, afternoon. Mr. d'Indy is one of the leaders of the modern French school of musicians. The programme will be as follows: Symphonie (in B flat), op. 20, Ernest Chaussor; "Psythe et Eros," Cæsar Franck; Nocturne, "Nuages," "Fetes," Claude Debussy; "Chant funebre," Alberic Maynard; "Istar," variations symphoniques, Vincent d'Indy.

* * * *

When the tall, strongly built, middle-aged gentleman, with the cloistered look of the scholar and none of the eccentricities proverbial in musicians, quietly crossed the platform at Carnegie Hall last night and took his place at the conductor's desk before the Boston Symphony Orchestra there assembled, one hardly realized that here was Mr. d'Indy, the distinguished French composer, who had come all the way from Paris to revolutionize our accepted ideas of French music. Except for a trace of diffidence in the dignity of his bearing, a stranger might have supposed him an habitual conductor of the orchestra.

This diffidence vanished as he signalled the men to begin. Throughout the concert he conducted with undemonstrative but insistent authority. His sincerity and simplicity of bearing were irresistible. He might have been unaware that his programme was chosen from the latest school of French music, of which the audience knew him to be the acknowledged chief. Not by the slightest hint did he suggest that he could be there for any purpose less impersonal than the interpretation of the music before him.

Mr. d'Indy's symphony in B flat was the "pièce de résistance" of the programme. When played here previously, at a Boston Symphony concert last year, it had seemed a work in a foreign musical idiom. One lost its beauties in the maze of strange progressions that seemed to lead nowhere. Yesterday the scales had begun to fall from one's ears. There were many passages, at least one entire movement (the second), that now seemed of surprising beauty. The change must have been with the listener rather than the performance, for the players last year weer the same virtuoso orchestra they are to-day, and though Mr. d'Indy is obviously the authoritative interpreter of his own works, Mr. Gericke led it then with all his consummate skill as a conductor, and, as it seemed, a particular sympathy with this work.

Yesterday the listener was accustoming himself to a strange tone language. Those who regard this music as cacophanous would do well to remember how people once found Wagner ugly because they had not yet learned to understand the musical idiom he employed; how when "Faust" was first sung here many complained that Siebel's "Flower Song" was the only tune in the score, or how Edward Fitzgerald once wrote to Fanny Kemble regarding Bizet's "Carmen" that it was an opera of the Wagnerian pattern, "very beautiful accompaniment to no melody." The portion of Mr. d'Indy's symphony that still remains most difficult of comprehension is the first movement. Here the novelty of the progressions and the complexity of the rhythms require more than two hearings to make themselves plain.

Easier of comprehension, and after this austere and absolute music, almost sentimentally sweet in melody, is Mr. d'Indy's "Saugefleurie," playe dyesterday for the first time in New York. It is based on a legend in the "Contes de Fées," of Robert de Bonnières, and is frankly pictorial in intention. It is beautiful music and to be enjoyed without so great application in listening as the B-flat symphony demands.

In comparison with Mr. d'Indy's music, Fauré's "Pelléas et Mélisande" suite might almost have been the work of Massenet. It misses somewhat the naïveté of Maeterlinck's play and also the fragmentariness in expression of Maeterlinck's characters. It rather expresses freely in music the moods that they feel, but in speech only hint gropingly.

"L'Apprenti sorcier," by Paul Kukas, which ended the programme, had been played with great success last season at the initial concert of the Boston Orchestra. Yesterday it seemed no less brilliant, and set one thinking of what the composer may or may not have learned from Richard Strauss and Humperdinck.

For the second concert under Mr. d'Indy's direction, at Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon, the programme comprises Ernest Chausson's symphony in B-flat (first time); the "Psyché et Eros," from César Franck's symphonic poem "Psyché"; Debussy's nocturnes "Nuages" and "Fêtes"; a "Chant funèbre," by Alberic Magnard (first time), and Mr. d'Indy's "Istar" variations.

---

[120]

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
DEC 8 - 1905

D'INDY CONDUCTS THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Noted French Composer Gives Concert of French Music.

HIS SYMPHONY GIVEN

Also an Orchestral Legend, and Pieces by Faure and Dukas—The Visitor Warmly Received.

For the first time in its history the regular concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on its tour this week are conducted by another than its titular conductor. Mr. Vincent d'Indy, the distinguished French composer, was invited from Paris to conduct these concerts.

It was natural that he should regard the occasion as a fitting one to bring forward the music of the advanced French school of composers, of which he himself is often spoken of as the head and front. The programmes of his two concerts in New York are consequently made up entirely of this music.

That of last evening comprised Mr. d'Indy's second symphony, a suite made up of Gabriel Faure's incidental music to "Pelléas et Mélisande," Mr. d'Indy's legende, "Saugefleurie," and Paul Dukas's "L'Apprenti Sorcier." The first and last of these were heard here last season.

Mr. d'Indy is not distinguished as a conductor, and it was evident last evening that he has scarcely a pre-eminent talent for conducting. Both he and the men who played under him are too good musicians, however, to fail of a common understanding for the lack of that peculiar union of force and magnetism and skill that marks the virtuoso conductor—distinctive product of the present day in music.

Mr. d'Indy is a man of distinguished appearance, of perfect simplicity and modesty before the orchestra, entirely without preoccupation with himself. He is wholly familiar with his scores, and obtained results from the orchestra that plainly were a complete embodiment of his ideas.

No doubt, however, he was more concerned with the music that he was bringing for the edification of this public than his "readings" of it. These were, of course, authentic in spirit and form; yet it may be doubted whether he presented a more intelligible performance of his own symphony than Mr. Gericke gave last January.

And what of that symphony that raised so many doubts, so much bitter opposition at that time? There are those to whom the outgivings of the modern French musicians are as the preludings of a new birth of music, and to them Mr. d'Indy's symphony presents the quintessence of a new and unfamiliar beauty.

To most it is an unmeaning cacophony, a striving after something not realized or unrealizable, a deliberate seeking for effects that have never entered the ken of musicians of the elder days. He speaks a new and strange language, through which as yet few gleams of lucid and intelligent thought appear.

Did the thought appear more lucid, more intelligible last night on a second hearing, and after a year of reflection? It would be rash to venture the conjecture that it did. The work is the product of much taking thought.

It is d'Indy, the "cerebral" that speaks in it from beginning to end, not d'Indy in his singing robes, obsessed of musical ideas that must out. It is an elaborate piece of skillful construction built up on the community and development of a few themes that appear and reappear, combined and opposed and transformed, through all four movements.

But these themes are intangible, vague in outline and tonality, and the hearer is baffled all too often in his pursuit of them. There are occasional passages of singular beauty and seizing intensity, but they appear and are gone And lead nowhere.

There is much strong, glowing, and richly colored orchestral color; there are passages of strange and fantastic cackle, in which the instruments are forced to unnatural utterance and harsh combinations without the excuse that the programme musicians give, of representing something of terrible and unlovely aspect for which they must find fitting tones.

The modern Frenchmen greatly affect the augmented intervals in harmony and strange dislocations of the sequence of tone and semitone in the melodic line. There is the effect of new and uncomfortable tonalities in their music. They wish to reconstitute our ears, and force the acceptance of these sounds that now seem to most so grating.

They may succeed—the human ear has been forced to accept many things in the three centuries at which it once revolted—but until they do it is doubtful if d'Indy's second symphony will gain other than a painful and laborious access to its listeners.

His "Saugefleurie" is of a period when he was less a "cerebral" and made music less sophisticated. It is a charming piece of musical narration, not strikingly original in its material, and developed at somewhat too great length for the importance of that material.

It is picturesque and spirited; and a source of pleasure. Gabriel Fauré's suite, "Pelléas et Mélisande," is in three movements, of which the first two are rather monotonous in tone. They summon up a mood, a spirit of introspection; but there is not the strange, inexplicable undercurrent of drama that runs through Maeterlinck's drama.

Paul Dukas's "Sorcerer's Apprentice," which closed the concert, is a brilliant piece of tone picturing in which the comic spirit prevails.

Mr. d'Indy was most hospitably received, and after his symphony was made to rise again and again.

NEW YORK STAATS ZEITUNG
DEC 8 - 1905

Im Carnegie Hall fand gestern Abend das dritte Konzert des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters statt. Es waren keineswegs alle Stühle im Saale besetzt, und als die Leute nach Hause gingen, gaben sie privatissimo allerlei wunderliche Urtheile über das Gehörte ab. Kein Wunder, denn sie waren ausschließlich mit französischer Musik neuester Façon regalirt worden.

Natürlich haben die modernen Franzosen auch ein Recht darauf, von ihren Zeitgenossen gehört zu werden, und einige von ihnen, wie z. B. Claude Debussy, sind sogar sehr hörenswerth. Aber zum gestrigen Programm hatte Vincent d'Indy weitaus das Meiste beigesteuert, und er stand denn auch als erster Dirigir-Gast des Bostoner Orchesters am Dirigentenpult und leitete die Aufführung. Warum von den modernen Franzosen gerade d'Indy eingeladen war, wird wohl nur einem engsten Zirkel von Eingeweihten verständlich sein. Der ferner Stehende kann darüber nur mehr oder weniger vage Vermuthungen hegen. Im letzten Winter spielten uns die Bostoner unter Gericke die zweite Symphonie von d'Indy vor, und es kann ohne die geringste Uebertreibung gesagt werden, daß in diesen Konzerten noch niemals eine Symphonie „durchgefallen ist, als jene. War nun bei den maßgebenden Gewalten der Bostoner Orchesterorganisation der Glaube an d'Indy's Komponisten-Bedeutung so stark, daß er, wenn auch keine Berge, so doch den Komponisten zu versetzen wünschte, nämlich von Frankreich nach Amerika, damit er uns durch seine eigene Interpretation verborgene Schönheiten in seiner Symphonie enthüllen möge? Fast sieht es so aus; nur ist leider die Enthüllung ausgeblieben.

Ueber d'Indy's kompositorische Thätigkeit ist bereits kurz berichtet worden; es mag aber hinzugefügt werden, daß d'Indy in Paris einen bescheidenen Kreis von Anhängern besitzt, die ihm Bedeutung beimessen. Wenn unbefangene Musikfreunde in Amerika sich nicht leicht zu solcher Anerkennung aufschwingen sollten, darf man das nicht als Mangel an gutem Willen auslegen. Man war gestern Abend offenbar bemüht, aus Höflichkeit stärker zu applaudiren, als das Herz Einen antrieb; aber ein starkes Geräusch verursachte der Beifall dennoch nicht. d'Indy eröffnete das Konzert mit jener Symphonie, von der im vorigen Winter an dieser Stelle behauptet wurde, daß sie sich höchstens als Programmmusik erklären lasse, der man das Programm versagt habe. Man kann sich dieses Wühlen in unmotivirten und an sich nichtssagenden Dissonanzen höchstens als beschreibende Musik erklären, und man würde die Qual gewiß weniger empfinden, wenn der Phantasie nur ein kleiner Wink gegeben würde, was dieses Tonchaos bedeuten oder charakterisiren soll. Wenn d'Indy sich kein Programm vorgenommen hatte, hätte er doch nachher wenigstens einen Titel oder ein Motto beifügen können. Schumann hat solche Bezeichnungen ja auch erst nachträglich erfunden. Vielleicht ließen sich der erste Satz mit „Unter dem Hochbahngerüst", ein anderer als „Grober Unfug mit alterirten Akkorden" und wieder ein anderer als „Der Aufstieg zum Parnaß in Ganztonstufen" bezeichnen. Solche Bezeichnungen würden vorbereiten und daher auch ein wenig versöhnen.

In dieser Symphonie hat d'Indy versucht, die Maximen der modernsten Programmmusiker auf die absolute Musik anzuwenden. Es ist ihm gründlich mißlungen, und die Welt wird über diesen Versuch schnell zur Tagesordnung übergehen. Im Uebrigen ist d'Indy gewiß ein ernster Musiker, der viel gelernt hat und vorwärts strebt. Aber viel zu sagen hat er uns nicht, auch wenn er nicht als Bahnbrecher für eine neue Richtung auftritt. Seine Orchester-Legende „Saugefleurie" ist ehrliche Programmmusik und wirkt ungleich befriedigender als jene Symphonie. Diese „Saugefleurie" ließe sich sogar eher ohne Programm genießen, als die programmlose Symphonie. Es ist Stimmung und begreifliche Tonmalerei darin, und wenn auch die Thematik wie die Orchestration von Anklängen an Wagner voll ist, so macht das Ganze doch mehr den Eindruck des Empfundenen, als den des Gemachten.

Außer diesen eigenen Kompositionen dirigirte d'Indy noch einige Stücke aus der Faure'schen Musik zu „Pelléas und Mélisande". Exzerpte aus Debussy's gleichnamiger Oper wären allerdings wohl willkommener gewesen, aber Faure's Musik ist nicht ohne Charakteristik und muß sich der Maeterlinck'schen Mystik gut anschmiegen. Den Schluß des Konzertes machte jenes köstliche Tonbild „Der Zauberlehrling" von Dukas, der hier schon bei seiner ersten Aufführung entschiedenen Erfolg hatte.

Als Dirigent hat Herr d'Indy keine irgendwie hervorstechende Eigenschaften. Er wird auch das vierte Konzert des Bostoner Symphonieorchesters am Samstag Nachmittag dirigiren.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
THE MORNING TELEGRAPH
NEW YORK CITY
DEC 8 1905

D'INDY DIVIDES HIS AUDIENCE

Daring Innovations of His Methods Startle His Colleagues in Carnegie Hall.

MANY MUSICIANS HEAR HIM

He Leads the Boston Symphony Orchestra With the Baton of a Master With Ideas of His Own.

By ALGERNON ST. JOHN-BRENON.

Vincent d'Indy, the French composer, conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night at Carnegie Hall. The audience, an unusual one, consisted largely of musicians who had come to hear the last work in French music.

Engelbert Humperdinck was there to meditate upon the mixed reception with which d'Indy's extraordinary music was greeted.

Heinrich Zoellner, so many years associated with the German singing societies of New York, followed the exposition of d'Indy's musical views with the profoundest attention.

Victor Herbert, who, when it comes to serious music, is a modern of the moderns, laid aside all his multifarious labors to do honor to a brother conductor.

Kurt Schindler, assistant conductor of the Metropolitan Opera House, and Herman Klein, a leader in the musical life of a generation, were also present to manifest a strong and honorable sympathy with the distinguished Frenchman's revolutionary methods.

Audience in Two Factions.

The audience rapidly divided itself into two factions, one of which listened with frigid and well-bred hostility, while the other stormed out its applause with devoted and real enthusiasm.

The evening, perhaps destined to be historic in the annals of New York musical premieres, opened with d'Indy's own symphony. His music is vaguely based on Wagner, but at the same time he adheres rigidly to the old rules that govern the composition of symphonic music.

But he tortures those old rules until they yield him new opportunities. Never was heard such a congregation of farfetched sounds. Never did a man professing the old classical methods cut such wondrous and fantastic capers.

It was as if some unknown actor were to come before us and play a part which, like Mercutio, the ghost in Hamlet, or Moliere's Tartuffe, had always been rendered in a straight and traditional manner, and yet infuse into it a weirdly foreign and strangely original personality.

At Last a Man With Courage.

At first he seemed to insult the ear. Then one realized that he was fully aware that the ear, like any other human organ, can be developed and organized to new duties. We gasped, just as those who plunge suddenly into a cold bath would gasp, and catch at their breath.

The effects were the same as those which follow on a bracing dive, for they warmed and stimulated. At last something new! At last another man who had ideas, who had courage and who had, above all things, won a noble victory.

There is something pathetic, something noble, in an artist who will devote all his life to the creation of that which never can be popular.

For at the best d'Indy's innovations can only be suggestions for the music of the future—only a foreshadowing of what will be when this great Frenchman shall have been laid in his grave, and will only be remembered as one who sacrificed himself in the cause of an art whose boundaries he had striven to widen. He is deliberately eccentric, yet would there were more of such wanderings from the old beaten paths.

"Crazy," Hisses One.

"Absolutely crazy!" hissed an individual behind me, at the end of the second movement of the symphony. "Absolutely crazy!"

This profound critic unwittingly paid to d'Indy the highest compliment.

To be accused of musical insanity is to be arraigned in a noble company of fellow maniacs. We need more of such. Vincent d'Indy is the James McNeill Whistler of music. To-day he is laughed at and shouted down; to-morrow many of us will fall over ourselves in the attempt to prove that we were among the first to recognize his startling merits. His music is bald, and austere—so are the mountain tops.

An Exceptional Programme.

He played another of his own compositions, entitled "Saugefleurie," a less interesting composition, which, however, was redeemed by an ending of high poetic beauty.

Paul Dukas' "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," which is by no means a novelty, terminated a programme such as will not be heard again in Carnegie Hall for years to come.

Let me protest against the interminable discourses, biographies, genealogies and explanatory poems with which the authorities of the Boston Symphony delight to overload their programmes. For, as far as the bearing that much of these dissertations have upon the music actually played is concerned, Mr. Philip Hale might as well print a few pages of the Hoboken directory.

THE EVENING MAIL
FRIDAY, DECEMBER 8, 1905.

VINCENT D'INDY AND BOSTON ORCHESTRA

French Guest Conductor Makes His First New York Appearance—His Own Symphony Played.

In nearly every art movement there are men who, having but small creative gifts, yet take a prominent place in contemporary estimation because of their usefulness in executive ways. Such a place in the school of progressive French composers is probably the one in which Mr. Vincent d'Indy belongs.

Mr. d'Indy is one of the leaders of this interesting coterie, but his important work has been as conductor, as writer, as propagandist. His present visit to America, as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, proves him to be a well-equipped ambassador for the cause he has at heart. A Carnegie Hall audience last evening saw in him a man of strikingly handsome and aristocratic appearance, a conductor of evident skill and knowledge and a composer prolific of small and often picturesque detail but unable to fashion a large and coherent pattern.

It was Mr. d'Indy's B flat symphony that forced this conclusion most clearly. The work had been played here last winter by Mr. Gericke and the Boston men. A second hearing brought one no further on the path of admiration than before. The prodigious orchestration hides but few ideas of musical worth and moment.

There are themes, but they are not fruitful ones, or rather, their fruit is in minute particles, little fragments of melody that have little cohesive power. Dissonance is everywhere, but even that might be of small importance if one could discover a large design, a guiding pattern in the music as a whole. The second movement comes nearest to saying something, and the chorale-like ending is of splendid majesty and beauty.

Mr. d'Indy's "Saugefleurie," a legend after a well-known fairy tale, also played last night, suffered in less degree from the same want of real musical inspiration.

The suite of incidental music that Gabriel Faure wrote for Maeterlinck's "Pelleas and Melisande" proved of rare and touching beauty. It may well have heightened the ineffable melancholy of Maeterlinck's haunting play, but it makes its appeal quite apart from the stage. There are debts to "Parsifal" in it, perhaps, but they are not onerous; the music is melodic in the best sense, and it has a simplicity that strikes home.

Paul Dukas's gorgeously scored piece, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," after a ballad by Goethe, has been played here before. Last night it went with unexampled brilliance, and Mr. d'Indy and the Boston men brought out every caprice of its humor.

Modern French music will also make up to-morrow afternoon's programme, and Mr. d'Indy will again conduct. His beat is firm and elastic, and last night the orchestra followed instantly where he led. The visitor is said to have been astonished at the ease with which this band of virtuosi read the Chausson symphony at rehearsal. To-morrow will show what they and he have made of it.

[121]

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
DEC 3 - 1905

D'INDY CONDUCTS THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Noted French Composer Gives Concert of French Music.

HIS SYMPHONY GIVEN

Also an Orchestral Legend, and Pieces by Faure and Dukas—The Visitor Warmly Received.

For the first time in its history the regular concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on its tour this week are conducted by another than its titular conductor. Mr. Vincent d'Indy, the distinguished French composer, was invited from Paris to conduct these concerts.

It was natural that he should regard the occasion as a fitting one to bring forward the music of the advanced French school of composers, of which he himself is often spoken of as the head and front. The programmes of his two concerts in New York are consequently made up entirely of this music.

That of last evening comprised Mr. d'Indy's second symphony, a suite made up of Gabriel Faure's incidental music to "Pelléas et élisande," Mr. d'Indy's legende, "Saugefleurie," and Paul Dukas's "L'Apprenti Sorcier." The first and last of these were heard here last season.

Mr. d'Indy is not distinguished as a conductor, and it was evident last evening that he has scarcely a pre-eminent talent for conducting. Both he and the men who played under him are too good musicians, however, to fall of a common understanding for the lack of that peculiar union of force and magnetism and skill that marks the virtuoso conductor—distinctive product of the present day in music.

Mr. d'Indy is a man of distinguished appearance, of perfect simplicity and modesty before the orchestra, entirely without preoccupation with himself. He is wholly familiar with his scores, and obtained results from the orchestra that plainly were a complete embodiment of his ideas.

No doubt, however, he was more concerned with the music that he was bringing for the edification of this public than his "readings" of it. These were, of course, authentic in spirit and form; yet it may be doubted whether he presented a more intelligible performance of his own symphony than Mr. Gericke gave last January.

And what of that symphony that raised so many doubts, so much bitter opposition at that time? There are those to whom the outgivings of the modern French musicians are as the preludings of a new birth of music, and to them Mr. d'Indy's symphony presents the quintessence of a new and unfamiliar beauty.

To most it is an unmeaning cacophony, a striving after something not realized or unrealizable, a deliberate seeking for effects that have never entered the ken of musicians of the elder days. He speaks a new and strange language, through which as yet few gleams of lucid and intelligent thought appear.

Did the thought appear more lucid, more intelligible last night on a second hearing, and after a year of reflection? It would be rash to venture the conjecture that it did. The work is the product of much taking thought.

It is d'Indy, the "cerebral" that speaks in it from beginning to end, not d'Indy in his singing robes, obsessed of musical ideas that must out. It is an elaborate piece of skillful construction built up on the community and development of a few themes that appear and reappear, combined and opposed and transformed, through all four movements.

But these themes are intangible, vague in outline and tonality, and the hearer is baffled all too often in his pursuit of them. There are occasional passages of singular beauty and seizing intensity, but they appear and are gone and lead nowhere.

There is much strong, glowing, and richly colored orchestral color; there are passages of strange and fantastic cackle, in which the instruments are forced to unnatural utterance and harsh combinations without the excuse that the programme musicians give, of representing something of terrible and unlovely aspect for which they must find fitting tones.

The modern Frenchmen greatly affect the augmented intervals in harmony and strange dislocations of the sequence of tone and semitone in the melodic line. There is the effect of new and uncomfortable tonalities in their music. They wish to reconstitute our ears, and force the acceptance of these sounds that now seem to most so grating.

They may succeed—the human ear has been forced to accept many things in the last three centuries at which it once rebelled. But until they do it is doubtful if Mr. d'Indy's second symphony will gain other than a painful and laborious access to its listeners.

His "Saugefleurie" is of a period when he was less a "cerebral" and made music less sophisticated. It is a charming piece of musical narration, not strikingly original in its material, and developed at somewhat too great length for the importance of that material.

But it is picturesque and spirited; and it gave pleasure. Gabriel Fauré's suite, made up of the incidental music to "Pelléas et Mélisande," is in three movements, of which the first two are rather monotonous in tone. They summon up a mood, a mood of introspection; but there is not the strange, inexplicable undercurrent of dread in it that runs through Maeterlinck's drama.

Paul Dukas's "Sorcerer's Apprentice," which closed the concert, is a brilliant piece of tone picturing in which the scherzo spirit prevails.

Mr. d'Indy was most hospitably received, and after his symphony was made to bow again and again.

NEW YORK STAATS ZEITUNG
DEC 8 - 1905

Das Bostoner Symphonieorchester.

In Carnegie Hall fand gestern Abend das dritte Konzert des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters statt. Es waren keineswegs alle Stühle im Saale besetzt, und als die Leute nach Hause gingen, gaben sie privatissimo allerlei wunderliche Urtheile über das Gehörte ab. Kein Wunder, denn sie waren ausschließlich mit französischer Musik neuester Façon regalirt worden.

Natürlich haben die modernen Franzosen auch ein Recht darauf, von ihren Zeitgenossen gehört zu werden, und einige von ihnen, wie z. B. Claude, Debussy, sind sogar sehr hörenswerth. Aber zum gestrigen Programm hatte Vincent d'Indy weitaus das Meiste beigesteuert; und er stand denn auch als erster Dirigir-Gast des Bostoner Orchesters am Dirigentenpult und leitete die Aufführung. Warum von den modernen Franzosen gerade d'Indy eingeladen war, wird wohl nur einem engsten Zirkel von Eingeweihten verständlich sein. Der ferner Stehende kann darüber nur mehr oder weniger vage Vermuthungen hegen. Im letzten Winter spielten uns die Bostoner unter Gericke die zweite Symphonie von d'Indy vor, und es kann ohne die geringste Uebertreibung gesagt werden, daß in diesen Konzerten noch niemals eine Symphonie „durcher" gefallen ist, als jene. War nun bei den maßgebenden Gewalten der Bostoner Orchesterorganisation der Glaube an d'Indy's Komponisten-Bedeutung so stark, daß er, wenn auch keine Berge, so doch den Komponisten zu versetzen wünschte, nämlich von Frankreich nach Amerika, damit er uns durch seine eigene Interpretation verborgene Schönheiten in seiner Symphonie enthüllen möge? Fast sieht es so aus; nur ist leider die Enthüllung ausgeblieben.

Ueber d'Indy's kompositorische Thätigkeit ist bereits kurz berichtet worden; es mag aber hinzugefügt werden, daß d'Indy in Paris einen bescheidenen Kreis von Anhängern besitzt, die ihm Bedeutung beimessen. Wenn unbefangene Musikfreunde in Amerika sich nicht leicht zu solcher Anerkennung aufschwingen sollten, darf man das nicht als Mangel an gutem Willen auslegen. Man war gestern Abend offenbar bemüht, aus Höflichkeit stärker zu applaudiren, als das Herz Einen antrieb; aber ein starkes Geräusch verursachte der Beifall dennoch nicht. d'Indy eröffnete das Konzert mit jener Symphonie, von der im vorigen Winter an dieser Stelle behauptet wurde, daß sie sich höchstens als Programmmusik erklären lasse, der man das Programm versagt habe. Man kann sich dieses Wühlen in unmotivirten und an sich nichtssagenden Dissonanzen höchstens als beschreibende Musik erklären, und man würde die Qual gewiß weniger empfinden, wenn der Phantasie nur ein kleiner Wink gegeben würde, was dieses Tonchaos bedeuten oder charakterisiren soll. Wenn d'Indy sich kein Programm vorgenommen hatte, hätte er doch nachher wenigstens einen Titel oder ein Motto beifügen können. Schumann hat solche Bezeichnungen ja auch erst nachträglich erfunden. Vielleicht ließen sich der erste Satz mit „Unter dem Hochbahngerüst", ein anderer als „Grober Unfug mit alterirten Akkorden" und wieder ein anderer als „Der Aufstieg zum Parnaß in Ganztonstufen" bezeichnen. Solche Bezeichnungen würden vorbereiten und daher auch ein wenig versöhnen.

In dieser Symphonie hat d'Indy versucht, die Maximen der modernsten Programmmusiker auf die absolute Musik anzuwenden. Es ist ihm gründlich mißlungen, und die Welt wird über diesen Versuch schnell zur Tagesordnung übergehen. Im Uebrigen ist d'Indy gewiß ein ernster Musiker, der viel gelernt hat und vorwärts strebt. Aber viel zu sagen hat er uns nicht, auch wenn er nicht als Bahnbrecher für eine neue Richtung auftritt. Seine Orchester-Legende „Saugefleurie" ist ehrliche Programmmusik und wirkt ungleich befriedigender als jene Symphonie. Diese „Saugefleurie" ließe sich sogar eher ohne Programm genießen, als die programmlose Symphonie. Es ist Stimmung und begreifliche Tonmalerei darin, und wenn auch die Thematik wie die Orchestration von Anklängen an Wagner voll ist, so macht das Ganze doch mehr den Eindruck des Empfundenen, als den des Gemachten.

Außer diesen eigenen Kompositionen dirigirte d'Indy noch einige Stücke aus der Faure'schen Musik zu „Pelléas und Melisande". Exzerpte aus Debussy's gleichnamiger Oper wären allerdings wohl willkommener gewesen, aber Faure's Musik ist nicht ohne Charakteristik und muß sich der Maeterlinck'schen Mystik gut anschmiegen. Den Schluß des Konzertes machte jenes köstliche Tonbild „Der Zauberlehrling" von Dukas, der hier schon bei seiner ersten Aufführung entschiedenen Erfolg hatte.

Als Dirigent hat Herr d'Indy keine irgendwie hervorstechende Eigenschaften. Er wird auch das vierte Konzert des Bostoner Symphonieorchesters am Samstag Nachmittag dirigiren.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From THE MORNING TELEGRAPH
NEW YORK CITY
Address
Date DEC 8 1905

D'INDY DIVIDES HIS AUDIENCE

Daring Innovations of His Methods Startle His Colleagues in Carnegie Hall.

MANY MUSICIANS HEAR HIM

He Leads the Boston Symphony Orchestra With the Baton of a Master With Ideas of His Own.

By ALGERNON ST. JOHN-BRENON.

Vincent d'Indy, the French composer, conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night at Carnegie Hall. The audience, an unusual one, consisted largely of musicians who had come to hear the last work in French music.

Engelbert Humperdinck was there to meditate upon the mixed reception with which d'Indy's extraordinary music was greeted.

Heinrich Zoellner, so many years associated with the German singing societies of New York, followed the exposition of d'Indy's musical views with the profoundest attention.

Victor Herbert, who, when it comes to serious music, is a modern of the moderns, laid aside all his multifarious labors to do honor to a brother conductor.

Kurt Schindler, assistant conductor of the Metropolitan Opera House, and Herman Klein, a leader in the musical life of a generation, were also present to manifest a strong and honorable sympathy with the distinguished Frenchman's revolutionary methods.

Audience in Two Factions.

The audience rapidly divided itself into two factions, one of which listened with frigid and well-bred hostility, while the other stormed out its applause with devoted and real enthusiasm.

The evening, perhaps destined to be historic in the annals of New York musical premieres, opened with d'Indy's own symphony. His music is vaguely based on Wagner, but at the same time he adheres rigidly to the old rules that govern the composition of symphonic music.

But he tortures those old rules until they yield him new opportunities. Never was heard such a congregation of far-fetched sounds. Never did a man professing the old classical methods cut such wondrous and fantastic capers.

It was as if some unknown actor were to come before us and play a part which, like Mercutio, the ghost in Hamlet, or Moliere's Tartuffe, had always been rendered in a straight and traditional manner, and yet infuse into it a weirdly foreign and strangely original personality.

At Last a Man With Courage.

At first he seemed to insult the ear. Then one realized that he was fully aware that the ear, like any other human organ, can be developed and organized to new duties. We gasped, just as those who plunge suddenly into a cold bath would gasp, and catch at their breath.

The effects were the same as those which follow on a bracing dive, for they warmed and stimulated. At last something new! At last another man who had ideas, who had courage and who had, above all things, won a noble victory.

There is something pathetic, something noble, in an artist who will devote all his life to the creation of that which never can be popular.

For at the best d'Indy's innovations can only be suggestions for the music of the future—only a foreshadowing of what will be when this great Frenchman shall have been laid in his grave, and will only be remembered as one who sacrificed himself in the cause of an art whose boundaries he had striven to widen. He is deliberately eccentric, yet would there were more of such wanderings from the old beaten paths.

"Crazy," Hisses One.

"Absolutely crazy!" hissed an individual behind me, at the end of the second movement of the symphony. "Absolutely crazy!"

This profound critic unwittingly paid to d'Indy the highest compliment.

To be accused of musical insanity is to be arraigned in a noble company of fellow maniacs. We need more of such. Vincent d'Indy is the James McNeill Whistler of music. To-day he is laughed at and shouted down; to-morrow many of us will fall over ourselves in the attempt to prove that we were among the first to recognize his startling merits. His music is bald, and austere—so are the mountain tops.

An Exceptional Programme.

He played another of his own compositions, entitled "Saugefleurie," a less interesting composition, which, however, was redeemed by an ending of high poetic beauty.

Paul Dukas' "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," which is by no means a novelty, terminated a programme such as will not be heard again in Carnegie Hall for years to come.

Let me protest against the interminable discourses, biographies, genealogies and explanatory poems with which the authorities of the Boston Symphony delight to overload their programmes. For, as far as the bearing that much of these dissertations have upon the music actually played is concerned, Mr. Philip Hale might as well print a few pages of the Hoboken directory.

THE EVENING MAIL
Published every afternoon except Sunday by
FRIDAY, DECEMBER 8, 1905.

VINCENT D'INDY AND BOSTON ORCHESTRA

French Guest Conductor Makes His First New York Appearance—His Own Symphony Played.

In nearly every art movement there are men who, having but small creative gifts, yet take a prominent place in contemporary estimation because of their usefulness in executive ways. Such a place in the school of progressive French composers is probably the one in which Mr. Vincent d'Indy belongs.

Mr. d'Indy is one of the leaders of this interesting coterie, but his important work has been as conductor, as writer, as propagandist. His present visit to America, as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, proves him to be a well-equipped ambassador for the cause he has at heart. A Carnegie Hall audience last evening saw in him a man of strikingly handsome and aristocratic appearance, a conductor of evident skill and knowledge and a composer prolific of small and often picturesque detail but unable to fashion a large and coherent pattern.

It was Mr. d'Indy's B flat symphony that forced this conclusion most clearly. The work had been played here last winter by Mr. Gericke and the Boston men. A second hearing brought one no further on the path of admiration than before. The prodigious orchestration hides but few ideas of musical worth and moment.

There are themes, but they are not fruitful ones, or rather, their fruit is in minute particles, little fragments of melody that have little cohesive power. Dissonance is everywhere, but even that might be of small importance if one could discover a large design, a guiding pattern in the music as a whole. The second movement comes nearest to saying something, and the chorale-like ending is of splendid majesty and beauty.

Mr. d'Indy's "Saugefleurie," a legend after a well-known fairy tale, also played last night, suffered in less degree from the same want of real musical inspiration.

The suite of incidental music that Gabriel Faure wrote for Maeterlinck's "Pelleas and Melisande" proved of rare and touching beauty. It may well have heightened the ineffable melancholy of Maeterlinck's haunting play, but it makes its appeal quite apart from the stage. There are debts to "Parsifal" in it, perhaps, but they are not onerous; the music is melodic in the best sense, and it has a simplicity that strikes home.

Paul Dukas's gorgeously scored piece, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," after a ballad by Goethe, has been played here before. Last night it went with unexampled brilliance, and Mr. d'Indy and the Boston men brought out every caprice of its humor.

Modern French music will also make up to-morrow afternoon's programme, and Mr. d'Indy will again conduct. His beat is firm and elastic, and last night the orchestra followed instantly where he led. The visitor is said to have been astonished at the ease with which this band of virtuosi read the Chausson symphony at rehearsal. To-morrow will show what they and he have made of it.

N. Y. EV'G WORLD

DEC 8 - 1905

D'INDY ACCEPTABLY LEADS BOSTON SYMPHONY BAND

Perhaps it was the example set by the Pilgrim Fathers of our own Philharmonic that incited Col. Higginson to engage a foreign conductor for the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall last night. Anyhow, the experiment was tried with Vincent D'Indy, the French composer, leading the splendid band so long directed by Mr. Gericke.

There was no marked approval of the innovation. To tell the truth, Mr. D'Indy got only a perfunctory greeting as he walked upon the stage and a not much warmer good-night when he left it. Not that he failed to realize expectations; but the subscribers to these concerts are real lovers of music, full of knowledge and experience, little given to enthusiasm, somewhat sceptical of special programmes, and (criticise Mr. Gericke as they may among themselves) loyal to the old and tried leader.

A tall, lithe, unaffected man is Mr. D'Indy. Born in '53, he does not begin to look his years. He has no poses, but leads, unobtrusively, yet with the command of a master. He uses both hands effectively, and his whole body occasionally is brought into play, animated with magnetic force. Constantly he beats time with one foot; now with his right toes and again with his left heel. With the expert players who followed the movements of his baton, of course, he could not fail of success. They lived up to their high reputations as musicians.

First on the programme, which was entirely French, came Mr. D'Indy's own symphony in B flat, which Mr. Gericke played last season. It is full of disjointed bits that are pleasing, always is clever in orchestration and comes to a fine climax, but is confusing and uninspired. Later, the composer's "Sangefleurre" legend was played, and that came nearer to an expression of sentiment.

The other numbers were that dainty, fascinating suite of Gabriel Faure's "Pelleas et Melisande," after Macterlinck's play, and Paul Dukas's odd conceit, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," after a ballad by Goethe, both of which are familiar.

Mr. Gericke's "at 8.15 precisely" was not followed last night, and the large and brilliant audience usual at these concerts that finally gathered seemed to know intuitively that it would not be, for it came late.

E EVENING TELEGRAM, DECEMBER 8, 1905

Vincent D'Indy Conducts the Boston Orchestra.

AT the invitation of Mr. Higginson, M. Vincent D'Indy, the French composer, has come to this county and last night he made his appearance at Carnegie Hall as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The programme consisted of French compositions and included the second symphony of the conductor and his "Saugefleurie," a legend for orchestra after a tale of De Bonnierres.

First as a conductor, it must be said that M. D'Indy was most appealing to the major part of the audience. Quiet and almostj impersonal in his methods, there was a clear cut intellectual mastery of the orchestra that was always evident. From his own compositions it might be expected that there would be evident more the glint of mind than of passion, and yet there is forceful magnetism, an answer to every motion that guided the musicians before him, that, while it seemed to lack pliancy, stirred and even thrilled.

Of his symphony in B flat there is no doubt that to many it will seem a helpless jangle. This man, who proudly declares that he but carries on the tradition of Ceasar Franck, believes that the development of the music of the future is not along the lines of melody and harmony—they are exhausted, he says—but along the lines of discovering new eccentricities of rhythm. Even an audience that has been fed on an appreciable share of Strauss agreed after the second symphony that the new road is full of pitfalls and many may stumble before few arrive.

It would only be after many hearings that one would feel that there was an absolute right to criticise. The intellect of it one feels, not with any particular joyousness, it must be admitted, but the lack of sensuosity in it one also feels—and that very keenly.

The other of D'Indy's compositions, "Saugefleurie," was more evident and there were occasional strains of something like the discarded friends—melody and harmony. The song of the huntsman's horn brought one up from the regions of the unknown to the bright sunshine of earth.

The Evening Sun.

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 8, 1905.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

M. VINCENT D'INDY, NEWEST OF THE DESPOTS OF DIN.

He Is Music's Rodin, Though He Wears His Hair Short and Acts the Born Gentleman, but His Symphony of Discordant Human Will Is Yet a Musical Stranger in the Land—America's Premier Orchestra Does Not Sound Like the Boston Symphony When It Finds Its Second Wind in a Chorale of Brass.

Bowed with the weight of symphonies, M. Vincent d'Indy stood up in Carnegie Hall last night and showed not only that a Frenchman may be serious but also that a musician may appear a gentleman, even to his hair. This man, well groomed, well-fed, is the Rodin of modern music, but he does not look it. He came as envoy extraordinary in behalf of that gay "young France." Bringing, as he did, the fin de siècle songs of liberty, equality and fraternity, those three parts of all Gaul to-day, he yet stood on the pedestal of the conservative Gericke and conducted Col. Higginson's men through a French programme which made Italian Puccini sound like tin whistles, and German Richard Strauss like Haydn and Mozart rolled into one, without the aid of a megaphone. When the instrumentalists found their second wind and let loose the brazen instruments of war, you felt that America's premier orchestra, if not in eclipse, had yet assumed the complete disguise of a bal masque.

It was music, but as a Beacon street ghost once said of the hereafter, "It wasn't Boston." The "new French school" of composers had been heralded in America like some commercially endowed institute or frenzied orchestra foundation. It has not progressed so far. The tragedy of age, to quote Oscar Wilde, is not that we grow old, but that we remain young. Three composers figured in last night's programme. If the music sounded like sixty, that was precisely what it should. It was not written by children. "Still living in Paris," said the programme notes on D'Indy, Paul Dukas and Gabriel Fauré. Sven Dukas was born before the Franco-Prussian war. The others served in it, Fauré as a man of 25, and he is now past 60 years. D'Indy was born, not as the books say, in '51, but, according to himself,

M. d'Indy is physically a new French type, with bulging forehead and a vigorous jaw. He is gray of visage rather than of hair. He prefers, it is said, the inspired monoliths of Assyria to the forms half human, half divine, of the golden age of Pericles. He stands spellbound before primitive German or Flemish painters; while the marvellous Italians of the Renaissance leave him cold. He rules out of music all affectation of that which is merely graceful or tender.

Smart folks heard D'Indy in his own Second Symphony last evening, and frankly found it "slow." The first movement is indeed labelled "extremely slow," the second "moderately slow" and the third "moderate." But there is an invention of jarring seventhe in his most persistent theme which stands for "the ire of a dauntless human will." The monotony is psychologic and by design. When it has passed its ordeals of contrast with bewitching rhythms—these, at least, were French—and quaint legendary airs, it emerges in the fourth and final movement as a triumphant chorale, thrice proclaimed in outbursts of the whole orchestra. Though not brand-new, the discords of D'Indy are yet of too rare a flavor for plain people to say they like them. But the music has character of its own.

The Fauré suite, a prologue, spinning song and death scene to Masterlinck's "Pelleas and Melisande," sounded sickish sweet after this. D'Indy's one absolute novelty, his own "Saugefleurie," proved to be another legend of the sage bush, this time a fairy heroine who dies of love for a princely huntsman. Even the ghostly gallop of the Dukas "Sorcerer's Apprentice" after Goethe's ballad hardly brought contrast in such a riot of old tapestry "tone colors" as made up the programme's second half.

The concert was unlike others—except its own repetition in Brooklyn to-night and its counterpart with a Chausson symphony at to-morrow's matinée. The audience of subscribers was both brilliant and large. A few marginal seats which only star soloists fill were mutely eloquent of New York's astonishment that they take their music without soloists in Paris. The applause was intelligent, somewhat reserved, yet most friendly.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau of the World

m NEW YORK SUN

ress DEC 8 1905

VINCENT D'INDY'S MUSIC.

THE FRENCH COMPOSER AND BOSTON'S ORCHESTRA.

Mr. d'Indy Conducts Two Works of His Own and Two by Other Frenchmen—The Symphony in B Flat Heard Again—Compositions by Faure and Dukas.

The concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall last night was made unusually interesting by the appearance of the distinguished French composer Vincent d'Indy, who conducted the performance. There was no soloist, and the list of compositions on the programme comprised Mr. d'Indy's second symphony in B flat, Gabriel Faure's "Pélléas et Mélisande" suite, after Maeterlinck; "Sauge-Fleurie," a legend, by Mr. d'Indy, after a tale of Robert de Bonnières, and Paul Dukas's "L'Apprenti Sorcier," after a ballad of Goethe. It was manifest that this was expected to be recorded as an occasion of great artistic solemnity, for the public gathered in considerable mass and there was an air of portent about the orchestra.

In France they write very seriously of Vincent d'Indy, and some of the learned commentators seem to look upon him as the evangelist of a new gospel of beauty. "Fascinated by the new formulæ of musical art," says M. Hugues Imbert, "he had the courage from an early age to proclaim at the top of his voice the character of his preferences and to break with the past." It will be recalled that the past included such figures as Bach, Beethoven and Mozart. It also included Hector Berlioz, Bizet and a few others with whom Mr. d'Indy was perhaps less inclined to break. But this is anticipating.

If we were expected last night to observe Mr. d'Indy as a conductor we were certainly not called upon to view him with enthusiasm. Doubtless he does not esteem himself so great a man with a baton as with a three nibbed pen in his hand. Certainly other conductors will elect to nominate him a composer. It is equally probable that the great composers of the past with which he broke at such a lamentably early age would decide to call him a conductor.

The symphony heard last night was produced here by the Boston orchestra under Mr. Gericke on January 12, 1904. We were moved to say of it at that time that it was the work of the altogether utter modern school which eschews all harmonies not afflicted with strabismus. It appears to bring comfort to what M. Schuré has called the dreamy imagination of Mr. d'Indy to seize two or more inoffensive minor seconds in different keys and incite them to mortal combat with one another. At least such music keeps one awake.

But there is another aspect of this symphony which must not escape notice. We must consider the world-wide view of the composer over the field of thematic invention. He counts nothing lost which has had its day. For him the "Sakuntala" of Goldmark, the "Carmen" of Bizet, the "Fantastic Symphony" of Berlioz, and anything and everything of Wagner have their sweet uses. With these and a few less significant ingredients from the home laboratory, this composer has wrought a symphony which would puzzle a Philadelphia lawyer.

Mr. d'Indy has confessed that his purpose in writing this work was dramatic, and that the form is the development of "a veritable action." A learned commentator in France has further informed us that we would be quite mad to search for any programme, except a purely musical one, that developed by the working out of contrasting thematic ideas.

Mr. D'Indy's hint is more satisfying than his critic's explanation. There is an emotional scheme in this symphony, or the whole thing is inexplicable. As pure musical architecture it is a labyrinth. As a drama in tones it may have—nay, it must have—some meaning. But every confessed advocate of detailed programme music has admitted that such writing is Greek to the hearer without the programme, or at least some hint of the composer's design.

The tone poem which was Mr. d'Indy's other contribution to the programme had, at any rate, the merit of intelligibility. "Sauge-Fleurie," a legend for orchestra after Robert de Bonnières, was composed in October, 1884. It is a fairy tale of love. The young fairy, Sauge-Fleurie, wanders by a flower strewn lake. A Prince, hunting a stag, sees her and stops entranced by her beauty. For her to love mortal man is death, but for one moment's possession of so handsome and gallant a youth she surrenders her immortality.

This story the composer has told in plain thematic speech. One can saturate his imagination in the forest, hear the voice of the gentle fairy, catch the Tristan horns of the hunt coming through the leafy arches, listen to the love songs of the pair and find the unhappy dénouement.

If perchance one at the same time hears a deal of "Tristan und Isolde" and "Götterdämmerung," that is the fault of Wagner for having thought of the melodic subjects before Mr. D'Indy had opportunity to do so. Doubtless he would have thought of them in time—indeed, it seems as if he surely had. But this is a well knit composition and has some merits of its own to recommend it to music lovers.

in English with Mrs. Patrick Campbell as the star. The music is at least more active than Mrs. Campbell and it has an honorable attachment for the diatonic modes which gives it some advantage over the symphonic disturbance of last night's conductor.

Last, but not least, was the scherzo of Paul Dukas on Goethe's ballad, heard here for the first time at a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on November 5, 1904. Mr. Dukas is a music critic, but despite that, he is a musician. There is nothing at all subtle about the humor of this scherzo, but it is a good workmanlike piece of music and is thoroughly enjoyable.

The lumbering bassoon theme depicts clearly the awkwardness of the apprentice who has undertaken to practise sorcery in the absence of his master. The plunge of the experimenter into trouble is well worked out, and the return of the sorcerer, catching him at his tricks, is cleverly painted. The crash is built on old lines and the fun is generally made on established models.

The concert as a whole had not a little interest. To hear an entire evening of French music of our own time, music of the young school, which has joined d'Indy in breaking with the past, was instructive. Concerts of this nature will help us to understand the present state of music in France. The Frenchman is a born dramatist. He is equally a natural actor. Still more is he an incarnate litterateur.

Phrase making, stagecraft and the calcium light pose are three mighty factors in the Gallic music of our time. Over the whole hovers the huge shadow of Wagner. Your French Wagnerite is the maddest of them all, and these young would-be iconoclasts—Bruneau, Charpentier, Chausson, Debussy—Dukas and D'Indy in their search after a method have fallen neck and heels into the meshes of Wagner's mighty drag net. Their idiom is the idiom of Wagner Gallicized.

From the old time sugary sweetness of French melody they have swung the pendulum of their fancy to the far extreme of hot vinegar. They hate the tonic triad and they loathe relative tonalities. They would rather write in two keys at once or in no key at all than in a plain major mode.

And with it all they are trying to say something. They must tell tales in their music. Mr. d'Indy has even formulated a new theory of absolute music which includes dramatic action. It is all very learned, very subtle and very imposing; but it is usually also all very ugly and smothered in obfuscation.

We shall hear more of Mr. d'Indy's inventions to-morrow. We are thankful for one day's rest and for the promise that in the evening we may bring peace to our souls with the eternal simplicities of Wagner's "Die Walkuere" and Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis."

NEW YORK AMERICAN

D'INDY'S ART STIRS QUERY: "IS IT ART?"

Symphony Concert Audience Divided in Its Opinion of His Ability.

Vincent d'Indy conducted at Carnegie Hall, last evening, the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It played his Second Symphony, his "Saugefleurie" legend, the "Pelleas and Melisande" suite of Faure and the "Apprentice Sorcerer" of Dukas.

All this is new music of Paris, and the conductor, director of the Schola Cantorum there, and the composer of "L'Etranger," has great fame. The honor of standing in Mr. Gericke's place is extremely rare, and it made brilliant M. d'Indy's presentation to music lovers here.

They came to the concert in a great crowd. He is tall, slight, reserved, and has in his large eyes the clearness that impresses one acutely as characteristic of his work. It is complex, it is Wagnerian, as it has to be; it is even mystic, but it is always clear.

Other musicians—Faure, Dukas, Debussy—among the new men of France that Vincent d'Indy leads have piety without faith, but he has piety and faith. His inspiration is entirely religious and of the Gothic epoch.

His second symphony, which has no programme of any sort and has no other action than in the music, and his "Saugefleurie," composed after a naive fairy tale, proved that M. d'Indy's preference is for the archaic and the simple.

He was acclaimed. The applause was generous. But one felt that neither his works nor the poetic melancholy in [illegible] nor the mystic grace in Dukas's [illegible] entirely the audience here. It was divided a little.

One man, who is not prejudiced against the moderns of Germany, said that he doubted if Vincent d'Indy knew what music was. Of course that is [illegible] wild extremist, but he was at the head of graded adverse opinions.

Vincent d'Indy is a great musician, he proved it last evening. Unlike [illegible] disciples, he has a great general [illegible] thinks that criticism is of no use [illegible] is always the expression of one mind that is in its favor. It makes one think.

Then Vincent d'Indy is himself a passionate music critic. He is to [illegible] another concert here on Saturday afternoon. Surely, then, he is to [illegible] appreciation than was expressed [illegible] ing of his art.

It has a certain disdain, but [illegible] disdain is full of charm and learning.

N. Y. EV'G WORLD

D'INDY ACCEPTABLY LEADS BOSTON SYMPHONY BAND

Perhaps it was the example set by the Pilgrim Fathers of our own Philharmonic that incited Col. Higginson to engage a foreign conductor for the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall last night. Anyhow, the experiment was tried with Vincent D'Indy, the French composer, leading the splendid band so long directed by Mr. Gericke.

There was no marked approval of the innovation. To tell the truth, Mr. D'Indy got only a perfunctory greeting as he walked upon the stage and a not much warmer good-night when he left it. Not that he failed to realize expectations; but the subscribers to these concerts are real lovers of music, full of knowledge and experience, little given to enthusiasm, somewhat sceptical of special programmes, and criticise Mr. Gericke as they may among themselves) loyal to the old and tried leader.

A tall, lithe, unaffected man is Mr. D'Indy. Born in '53, he does not begin to look his years. He has no poses, but leads unobtrusively, yet with the command of a master. He uses both hands effectively, and his whole body occasionally is brought into play, animated with magnetic force. Constantly he beats time with one foot; now with his right toes and again with his left heel. With the expert players who followed the movements of his baton, of course, he could not fail of success. They lived up to their high reputations as musicians.

First on the programme, which was entirely French, came Mr. D'Indy's own symphony in B flat, which Mr. Gericke played last season. It is full of disjointed bits that are pleasing, always is clever in orchestration and comes to a fine climax, but is confusing and uninspired. Later, the composer's "Sangefleurre" legend was played, and that came nearer to an expression of sentiment.

The other numbers were that dainty, fascinating suite of Gabriel Faure's "Pelleas et Melisande," after Macterlinck's play, and Paul Dukas's odd conceit, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," after a ballad by Goethe, both of which are familiar.

Mr. Gericke's "at 8.15 precisely" was not followed last night, and the large and brilliant audience usual at these concerts that finally gathered seemed to know intuitively that it would not be, for it came late.

E EVENING TELEGRAM, DECEMBER 8, 1905

Vincent D'Indy Conducts the Boston Orchestra.

AT the invitation of Mr. Higginson, M. Vincent D'Indy, the French composer, has come to this county and last night he made his appearance at Carnegie Hall as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The programme consisted of French compositions and included the second symphony of the conductor and his "Saugefleurie," a legend for orchestra after a tale of De Bonnierres.

First as a conductor, it must be said that M. D'Indy was most appealing to the major part of the audience. Quiet and almost impersonal in his methods, there was a clear cut intellectual mastery of the orchestra that was always evident. From his own compositions it might be expected that there would be evident more the glint of mind than of passion, and yet there is forceful magnetism, an answer to every motion that guided the musicians before him, that, while it seemed to lack pliancy, spurred and even thrilled.

Of his symphony in B flat there is no doubt that to many it will seem a helpless jungle. This man, who proudly declares that he but carries on the tradition of Ceasar Franck, believes that the development of the music of the future is not along the lines of melody and harmony—they are exhausted, he says—but along the lines of discovering new eccentricities of rhythm. Even an audience that has been fed on an appreciable share of Strauss agreed after the second symphony that the new road is full of pitfalls and many may stumble before few arrive.

It would only be after many hearings that one would feel that there was an absolute right to criticise. The intellect of it one feels, not with any particular joyousness, it must be admitted, but the lack of sensuosity in it one also feels—and that very keenly.

The other of D'Indy's compositions, "Saugefleurie," was more evident and there were occasional strains of something like the discarded friends—melody and harmony. The song of the huntsman's horn brought one up from the regions of the unknown to the bright sunshine of earth.

M. d'Indy is physically a new French type, with bulging forehead and a vigorous jaw. He is gray of visage rather than of hair. He prefers, it is said, the inspired monoliths of Assyria to the forms half human, half divine, of the golden age of Pericles. He stands spellbound before primitive German or Flemish painters; while the marvellous Italians of the Renaissance leave him cold. He rules out of music all affectation of that which is merely graceful or tender.

Smart folks heard D'Indy in his own Second Symphony last evening, and frankly found it "slow." The first movement is indeed labelled "extremely slow," the second "moderately slow" and the third "moderate." But there is an invention of jarring sevenths in his most persistent theme which stands for "the ire of a dauntless human will." The monotony is psychologic and by design. When it has passed its ordeals of contrast with bewitching rhythms—these, at least, were French—and quaint legendary airs, it emerges in the fourth and final movement as a triumphant chorale, thrice proclaimed in outbursts of the whole orchestra. Though not brand-new, the discords of D'Indy are yet of too rare a flavor for plain people to say they like them. But the music has character of its own.

The Fauré suite, a prologue, spinning song and death scene to Maeterlinck's "Pelleas and Melisande," sounded sickish sweet after this. D'Indy's one absolute novelty, his own "Saugefleurie," proved to be another legend of the sage bush, this time a fairy heroine who dies of love for a princely huntsman. Even the ghostly gallop of the Dukas "Sorcerer's Apprentice" after Goethe's ballad hardly brought contrast in such a riot of old tapestry "tone colors" as made up the programme's second half.

The concert was unlike others—except its own repetition in Brooklyn to-night and its counterpart with a Chausson symphony at to-morrow's matinée. The audience of subscribers was both brilliant and large. A few marginal seats which only star soloists fill were mutely eloquent of New York's astonishment that they take their music without soloists in Paris. The applause was intelligent, somewhat reserved, yet most friendly.

The Evening Sun.

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 8, 1905.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

M. VINCENT D'INDY, NEWEST OF THE DESPOTS OF DIN.

He Is Music's Rodin, Though He Wears His Hair Short and Acts the Born Gentleman, but His Symphony of Discordant Human Will Is Yet a Musical Stranger in the Land—America's Premier Orchestra Does Not Sound Like the Boston Symphony When It Finds Its Second Wind in a Chorale of Brass.

Bowed with the weight of symphonies, M. Vincent d'Indy stood up in Carnegie Hall last night and showed not only that a Frenchman may be serious but also that a musician may appear a gentleman, even to his hair. This man, well groomed, well-fed, is the Rodin of modern music, but he does not look it. He came as envoy extraordinary in behalf of that gay "young France." Bringing, as he did, the fin de siècle songs of liberty, equality and fraternity, those three parts of all Gaul to-day, he yet stood on the pedestal of the conservative Gericke and conducted Col. Higginson's men through a French programme which made Italian Puccini sound like tin whistles, and German Richard Strauss like Haydn and Mozart rolled into one, without the aid of a megaphone. When the instrumentalists found their second wind and let loose the brazen instruments of war, you felt that America's premier orchestra, if not in eclipse, had yet assumed the complete disguise of a bal masque.

It was music, but as a Beacon street ghost once said of the hereafter, "It wasn't Boston." The "new French school" of composers had been heralded in America like some commercially endowed institute or frenzied orchestra foundation. It has not progressed so far. The tragedy of age, to quote Oscar Wilde, is not that we grow old, but that we remain young. Three composers figured in last night's programme. If the music sounded like sixty, that was precisely what it should. It was not written by children. "Still living in Paris," said the programme note on D'Indy, Paul Dukas and Gabriel Fauré. Even Dukas was born before the Franco-Prussian war. The others served in it, Fauré as a man of 25, and he is now past 60 years. D'Indy was born, not as the books say, in '51, but, according to himself, in the following year, 1852.

M. d'Indy is physically a new French type, with bulging forehead and a vigorous jaw. He is gray of visage rather than of hair. He prefers, it is said, the inspired monoliths of Assyria to the forms half human, half divine, of the golden age of Pericles. He stands spellbound before primitive German or Flemish painters; while the marvellous Italians of the Renaissance leave him cold. He rules out of music all affectation of that which is merely graceful or tender.

Smart folks heard D'Indy in his own Second Symphony last evening, and frankly found it "slow." The first movement is indeed labelled "extremely slow," the second "moderately slow" and the third "moderate." But there is an invention of jarring sevenths in his most persistent theme which stands for "the ire of a dauntless human will." The monotony is psychologic and by design. When it has passed its ordeals of contrast with bewitching rhythms—these, at least, were French—and quaint legendary airs, it emerges in the fourth and final movement as a triumphant chorale, thrice proclaimed in outbursts of the whole orchestra. Though not brand-new, the discords of D'Indy are yet of too rare a flavor for plain people to say they like them. But the music has character of its own.

The Fauré suite, a prologue, spinning song and death scene to Maeterlinck's "Pelleas and Melisande," sounded sickish sweet after this. D'Indy's one absolute novelty, his own "Saugefleurie," proved to be another legend of the sage bush, this time a fairy heroine who dies of love for a princely huntsman. Even the ghostly gallop of the Dukas "Sorcerer's Apprentice" after Goethe's ballad hardly brought contrast in such a riot of old tapestry "tone colors" as made up the programme's second half.

The concert was unlike others—except its own repetition in Brooklyn to-night and its counterpart with a Chausson symphony at to-morrow's matinée. The audience of subscribers was both brilliant and large. A few marginal seats which only star soloists fill were mutely eloquent of New York's astonishment that they take their music without soloists in Paris. The applause was intelligent, somewhat reserved, yet most friendly.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

N.Y. SUN

m

ress

DEC 8 1905

VINCENT D'INDY'S MUSIC.

THE FRENCH COMPOSER AND BOSTON'S ORCHESTRA.

Mr. d'Indy Conducts Two Works of His Own and Two by Other Frenchmen—The Symphony in B Flat Heard Again—Compositions by Faure and Dukas.

The concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall last night was made unusually interesting by the appearance of the distinguished French composer Vincent d'Indy, who conducted the performance. There was no soloist, and the list of compositions on the programme comprised Mr. d'Indy's second symphony in B flat, Gabriel Faure's "Pélléas et Mélisande" suite, after Maeterlinck; "Sauge-Fleurie," a legend, by Mr. d'Indy, after a tale of Robert de Bonnières, and Paul Dukas's "L'Apprenti Sorcier," after a ballad of Goethe. It was manifest that this was expected to be recorded as an occasion of great artistic solemnity, for the public gathered in considerable mass and there was an air of portent about the orchestra.

In France they write very seriously of Vincent d'Indy, and some of the learned commentators seem to look upon him as the evangelist of a new gospel of beauty. "Fascinated by the new formulæ of musical art," says M. Hugues Imbert, "he had the courage from an early age to proclaim at the top of his voice the character of his preferences and to break with the past." It will be recalled that the past included such figures as Bach, Beethoven and Mozart. It also included Hector Berlioz, Bizet and a few others with whom Mr. d'Indy was perhaps less inclined to break. But this is anticipating.

If we were expected last night to observe Mr. d'Indy as a conductor we were certainly not called upon to view him with enthusiasm. Doubtless he does not esteem himself so great a man with a baton as with a three nibbed pen in his hand. Certainly other conductors will elect to nominate him a composer. It is equally probable that the great composers of the past with which he broke at such a lamentably early age would decide to call him a conductor.

The symphony heard last night was produced here by the Boston orchestra under Mr. Gericke on January 12, 1904. We were moved to say of it at that time that it was the work of the altogether utter modern school which eschews all harmonies not afflicted with strabismus. It appears to bring comfort to what M. Schuré has called the dreamy imagination of Mr. d'Indy to seize two or more inoffensive minor seconds in different keys and incite them to mortal combat with one another. At least such music keeps one awake.

But there is another aspect of this symphony which must not escape notice. We must consider the world-wide view of the composer over the field of thematic invention. He counts nothing lost which has had its day. For him the "Sakuntala" of Goldmark, the "Carmen" of Bizet, the "Fantastic Symphony" of Berlioz, and anything and everything of Wagner have their sweet uses. With these and a few less significant ingredients from the home laboratory, this composer has wrought a symphony which would puzzle a Philadelphia lawyer.

Mr. d'Indy has confessed that his purpose in writing this work was dramatic, and that the form is the development of "a veritable action." A learned commentator in France has further informed us that we would be quite mad to search for any programme, except a purely musical one, that developed by the working out of contrasting thematic ideas.

Mr. D'Indy's hint is more satisfying than his critic's explanation. There is an emotional scheme in this symphony, or the whole thing is inexplicable. As pure musical architecture it is a labyrinth. As a drama in tones it may have—nay, it must have—some meaning. But every confessed advocate of detailed programme music has admitted that such writing is Greek to the hearer without the programme, or at least some hint of the composer's design.

The tone poem which was Mr. d'Indy's other contribution to the programme had, at any rate, the merit of intelligibility. "Sauge-Fleurie," a legend for orchestra after Robert de Bonnières, was composed in October, 1884. It is a fairy tale of love. The young fairy, Sauge-Fleurie, wanders by a flower strewn lake. A Prince, hunting a stag, sees her and stops entranced by her beauty. For her to love mortal man is death, but for one moment's possession of so handsome and gallant a youth she surrenders her immortality.

This story the composer has told in plain thematic speech. One can saturate his imagination in the forest, hear the voice of the gentle fairy, catch the Tristan horns of the hunt coming through the leafy arches, listen to the love songs of the pair and find the unhappy dénouement.

If perchance one at the same time hears a deal of "Tristan und Isolde" and "Götterdämmerung," that is the fault of Wagner for having thought of the melodic subjects before Mr. D'Indy had opportunity to do so. Doubtless he would have thought of them in time—indeed, it seems as if he surely had. But this is a well knit composition and has some merits of its own to recommend it to music lovers.

symphony last night [illegible] bit of music. Like the [illegible] the All Right, to understand [illegible] sary to think of nothing [illegible] while listening to the music it was impossible to think of anything, unless you thought of something else. This suite is arranged from incidental music composed for a performance of Maeterlinck's play in English with Mrs. Patrick Campbell as the star. The music is at least more artistic than Mrs. Campbell and it has an honorable attachment for the diatonic modes which gives it some advantage over the symphonic disturbance of last night's conductor.

Last, but not least, was the scherzo of Paul Dukas on Goethe's ballad, heard here for the first time at a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on November 3, 1904. Mr. Dukas is a music critic, but despite that, he is a musician. There is nothing at all subtle about the humor of this scherzo, but it is a good workmanlike piece of music and is thoroughly enjoyable.

The lumbering bassoon theme depicts clearly the awkwardness of the apprentice who has undertaken to practise sorcery in the absence of his master. The plunge of the experimenter into trouble is well worked out, and the return of the sorcerer, catching him at his tricks, is cleverly painted. The crash is built on old lines and the fun is generally made on established models.

The concert as a whole had not a little interest. To hear an entire evening of French music of our own time, music of the young school, which has joined d'Indy in breaking with the past, was instructive. Concerts of this nature will help us to understand the present state of music in France. The Frenchman is a born dramatist. He is equally a natural actor. Still more is he an incarnate litterateur.

Phrase making, stagecraft and the calcium light pose are three mighty factors in the Gallic music of our time. Over the whole hovers the huge shadow of Wagner. Your French Wagnerite is the maddest of them all, and these young would-be iconoclasts—Bruneau, Charpentier, Chausson, Debussy—Dukas and D'Indy in their search after a method have fallen neck and heels into the meshes of Wagner's mighty drag net. Their idiom is the idiom of Wagner Gallicized.

From the old time sugary sweetness of French melody they have swung the pendulum of their fancy to the far extreme of hot vinegar. They hate the tonic triad and they loathe relative tonalities. They would rather write in two keys at once or in no key at all than in a plain major mode.

And with it all they are trying to say something. They must tell tales in their music. Mr. d'Indy has even formulated a new theory of absolute music which includes dramatic action. It is all very learned, very subtle and very imposing, but it is usually also all very ugly and smothered in obfuscation.

We shall hear more of Mr. d'Indy's inventions to-morrow. We are thankful for one day's rest and for the promise that in the evening we may bring peace to our souls with the eternal simplicities of Wagner's "Die Walkuere" and Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis."

NEW YORK AMERICAN

D'INDY'S ART STIRS QUERY: "IS IT ART?"

Symphony Concert Audience Divided in Its Opinion of His Ability.

Vincent d'Indy conducted at Carnegie Hall, last evening, the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It played his Second Symphony, his "Saugefleurie" legend, the "Pelleas and Melisande" suite of Faure and the "Apprentice Sorcerer" of Dukas.

All this is new music of Paris, and the conductor, director of the Schola Cantorum there, and the composer of "L'Etranger," has great fame. The honor of standing in Mr. Gericke's place is extremely rare, and it made brilliant M. d'Indy's presentation to music lovers here.

They came to the concert in a great crowd. He is tall, slight, reserved, and has in his large eyes the clearness that impresses one acutely as characteristic of his work. It is complex, it is Wagnerian, as it has to be; it is even mystic, but it is always clear.

Other musicians—Faure, Dukas, Debussy—among the new men of France that Vincent d'Indy leads have piety without faith, but he has piety and faith. His inspiration is entirely religious and of the Gothic epoch.

His second symphony, which has no programme of any sort and has no other action than in the music, and his "Saugefleurie," composed after a naive fairy tale, proved that M. d'Indy's preference is for the archaic and the simple.

He was acclaimed. The applause was generous. But one felt that neither his works nor the poetic melancholy in Faure's, nor the mystic grace in Dukas's captivated entirely the audience here. It was disconcerted a little.

One man, who is not prejudiced against the moderns of Germany, said that he doubted if Vincent d'Indy knew what music was. Of course that man was a wild extremist, but he was at the climax of graded adverse opinions.

Vincent d'Indy is a great musician. He proved it last evening. Unlike other musicians, he has a great general culture. He thinks that criticism is of no use; that it is always the expression of one man. But that is in its favor. It makes one think.

Then Vincent d'Indy is himself a passionate music critic. He is to conduct another concert here on Saturday afternoon. Surely, then, he is to find graver appreciation than was expressed last evening of his art.

It has a certain disdain, but this disdain is full of charm and learning.

NEW YORK EV'G POST

DEC 8- 1905

MUSIC AND DRAMA.

Vincent D'Indy Conducts.

M. Vincent D'Indy is the eighth prominent European composer who has crossed the Atlantic and given concerts in this country. His predecessors were Johann Strauss, Dvorák, Tchaikovsky, Paderewski, D'Albert, Richard Strauss, and Humperdinck. The eminent Frenchman has come at the invitation of Col. Higginson to preside over the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for two weeks; he will also be heard in chamber music next Tuesday, at the Kneisel Quartet; and Walter Damrosch has put his first symphony in the programme of his Sunday concert on December 17. Thus there will be abundant opportunity to judge the latest phase of French music as represented by Vincent D'Indy.

It was his second symphony that opened the Boston orchestra's concert at Carnegie Hall last night. Mr. Gericke had produced the same work a year ago, but that made it the more interesting to hear it under the composer's own bâton. The general impression, however, was the same; one could not but wish constantly that there were more melody—the melody of Auber, Gounod, Bizet—and less up-to-date cleverness in the use of orchestral colors and the reckless predilection for unmeaning dissonances. Perhaps it isn't quite like "flinging a pot of paint in the public's face," but there certainly is a regrettable disproportion between the lavish use of color and the scant drawing. Invention—particularly melodic invention—is the weak point of all the composers of the César Franck school; and it is in vain they try to atone for it with orchestral decoration and dissonance. Here is the common ground on which the modern Frenchmen (Saint-Saëns excepted) join hands with the latest German school of R. Strauss, Weingartner, Mahler, and Max Reger. There is an ocean of sound, but none of the vital melody—water, water everywhere, yet not a drop to drink. Wagner and Liszt also used briny, bitter discords, but only where they were in place and meant something—the expression of dramatic emotion; and they do not taboo melody.

The suspicion that M. D'Indy's second symphony was written by one who has studied the latest developments of German music is confirmed by the date of its composition. It is barely two years old. Another of D'Indy's works on last night's programme—"Saugefleurie"—is older in method as well as date of composition (1884); but here, too, there is a lack of melodic invention; the one thing, alas, that no amount of study can give. Saugefleurie (Wild Sage) is a young and beautiful fairy living by the edge of a lake in the trunk of a willow. She falls in love with a king's son, who passes by a-hunting. It is death for her to love a mortal man, but death with love she chooses in preference to life without it. The composition has interesting details of hunting horns and impassioned love music.

M. Gabriel Fauré and M. Paul Dukas were the other composers heard last night, Fauré being represented by his "Pelléas et Mélisande" suite, Dukas by his droll "L'Apprenti Sorcier." A French critic, Imbert, says regarding Fauré: "If there be a French musician who by temperament and taste has left the French school in order to approach the German symphonic school; if there be a composer who has the profoundest respect for his art, who loves it with his whole soul; if there be a man who despises self-advertisement, and is averse to all concessions in favor of the doubtful taste of the public, it is Gabriel Fauré." Another French critic, Camille Benoit, says regarding Fauré: "From all points of view, if I had to liken him to a contemporary foreign composer, it is to the Norwegian, Edward Grieg, that I should compare him. That is to say," he adds, "that in France, G. Fauré is the first in the special line he has chosen."

However this may be, Fauré certainly shares with Grieg the arts of refined orchestral coloring and appealing to the feelings. The second of the three numbers, "The Spinner," was particularly liked by last night's audience. The whole suite is decidedly worth repeating. So is Dukas's "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," which may be regarded as a lurid illustration of the servant question. A sorcerer, according to a ballad of Goethe, had been in the habit of using his hocus pocus to transform a broom into a servant and making it do his work for him. One day, when the sorcerer is away, his apprentice applies his formula and makes the broom man go to the river and fetch a pail of water. He goes again and again; the house is being inundated, for the apprentice has forgotten the formula for changing the man back into a broom. He cuts him in two, but both pieces start out to fetch more water. Luckily the sorcerer returns at this moment, and with a few words averts further mischief.

One might view this legend seriously as teaching the lesson that only a master should presume to meddle with certain things. The French composer, however, has made it the basis of an orchestral scherzo; that is, he treats the ballad from the humorous point of view; and he has made of it a decidedly clever and amusing piece. Dukas, fortunately, seems to follow in the footsteps of Saint-Saëns rather than of César Franck and R. Strauss. The scherzo was played with much spirit under the direction of M. D'Indy, who, it need not be added, was cordially applauded and treated as so eminent a "guest" deserves to be treated. The same programme will be repeated in Brooklyn this evening. On Saturday afternoon, at Carnegie Hall, M. D'Indy will conduct a symphony by Chausson (op. 20). César Franck's "Psyché et Eros," Debussy's "Nuages" and "Fêtes," a "Chant funèbre" by Maknard, and his own "Istar."

The New York Press

DAILY EDITION.

New York, Friday, December 8, 1905.

D'Indy Directs Boston Orchestra.

Vincent D'Indy's first appearance in New York last night in Carnegie Hall, as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, proved somewhat disappointing; and so did the programme of modern French music he offered. This is a disagreeable thing to say, for D'Indy is a man of great distinction and of fine artistic accomplishments, and we should prefer to give a right royal welcome to him. But truth compels the statement that last night's auditors found little to move or elate them either in D'Indy's directorial powers or in his compositions. Indeed, Gabriel Faure's suite, "Pelleas et Melisande," a work of small significance, evoked more enthusiasm than any other contribution of the evening.

It is not surprising, perhaps, that the eminent stranger caused little excitement at the conductor's desk. He is an exceedingly serious man; modest and retiring, too. Moreover, he does not pose as a "star" of the baton. In fact, he refused last night to acknowledge even with a slight inclination of the head any applause save that which he believed was offered to him in the capacity of a composer. Yet D'Indy is no mean conductor, if he does seem somewhat stilted in his movements, for he kept his men well in hand, and his interpretations were conceived admirably and executed finely.

As a composer he is not unknown in New York. His Symphony in B flat, opus 57, which opened the concert, was played here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Gericke on January 12 last, the work having had its first performance in America by the Philadelphia orchestra shortly before that date, and the list of his other works which have come to a hearing is not small.

The second hearing of D'Indy's symphony, though it gave better insight into its various intricacies, confirmed one's first impressions. It is a symphony without programme only in name. As a fact it would bear literary elucidation fully as well as any of Strauss's tone-poems, and, to our way of thinking, stands more in need of it.

D'Indy is a brilliant composer. He has at his finger's ends all the resources of orchestration, harmonic coloring and contrapuntal broidery known to the modern musical world. At the same time he avoids the cacophony of a Strauss, even the exaggerations of a Debussy. But we can discover in his work no suggestion of real originality and individuality of expression. In his opus 57 the musical idiom is largely taken from Wagner and Liszt, with a tincture of the modern French and Belgian schools, showing many of those little tricks that to the unaccustomed ear seem strangely haunting and effective, but on closer inspection appear hollow, grotesque and superficially ornamental. D'Indy is a poet and a thinker; but nature did not make him a genius. He is a sort of French Weingartner.

His "Saugefleurie" was heard for the first time last night, but made no deep impression. It shows the influence of Wagner clearly. The opening bars are closely akin to the "Good Friday" music from "Parsifal." Faure's Suite, "Pelleas et Melisande," is nothing more than a chain of pretty salon pieces. Compared with this composition D'Indy's music is of gigantic power.

Paul Dukas's clever and effective Scherzo, "L'Apprenti Sorcier," brought the concert to an end. It was performed admirably, as indeed was every number on the programme. The programme of to-morrow afternoon's concert, which D'Indy also will conduct, comprises Ernest Chausson's Symphony in B flat, opus 20; "Psyche et Eros," from Cesar Franck's symphonic poem, "Psyche"; two Nocturnes by Debussy—"Nuages" and "Fetes"; Alberic Magnard's "Chant Funebre," and D'Indy's symphonic variations, "Istar."

The Evening Post.

New York, Friday, December 8, 1905.

Vincent D'Indy Conducts.

M. Vincent D'Indy is the eighth prominent European composer who has crossed the Atlantic and given concerts in this country. His predecessors were Johann Strauss, Dvorák, Tchaikovsky, Paderewski, D'Albert, Richard Strauss, and Humperdinck. The eminent Frenchman has come at the invitation of Col. Higginson to preside over the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for two weeks; he will also be heard in chamber music next Tuesday, at the Kneisel Quartet; and Walter Damrosch has put his first symphony in the programme of his Sunday concert on December 17. Thus there will be abundant opportunity to judge the latest phase of French music as represented by Vincent the Boston orchestra's concert at Carnegie Hall last night. Mr. Gericke had produced the same work a year ago, but that made it the more interesting to hear it under the composer's own bâton. The general impression, however, was the same; one could not but wish constantly that there were more melody—the melody of Auber, Gounod, Bizet—and less up-to-date cleverness in the use of orchestral colors and the reckless predilection for unmeaning dissonances. Perhaps it isn't quite like "flinging a pot of paint in the public's face," but there certainly is a regrettable disproportion between the lavish use of color and the scant drawing. Invention—particularly melodic invention—is the weak point of all the composers of the César Franck school; and it is in vain they try to atone for it with orchestral decoration and dissonance. Here is the common ground on which the modern Frenchmen (Saint-Saëns excepted) join hands with the latest German school of R. Strauss, Weingartner, Mahler, and Max Reger. There is an ocean of sound, but none of the vital melody—water, water everywhere, yet not a drop to drink. Wagner and Liszt also used briny, bitter discords, but only where they were in place and meant something—the expression of dramatic emotion; and they do not taboo melody.

[123]

The suspicion that M. D'Indy's second symphony was written by one who has studied the latest developments of German music is confirmed by the date of its composition. It is barely two years old. Another of D'Indy's works on last night's programme—"Saugefleurie"—is older in method as well as date of composition (1884); but here, too, there is a lack of melodic invention; the one thing, alas, that no amount of study can give. Saugefleurie (Wild Sage) is a young and beautiful fairy living by the edge of a lake in the trunk of a willow. She falls in love with a king's son, who passes by a-hunting. It is death for her to love a mortal man, but death with love she chooses in preference to life without it. The composition has interesting details of hunting horns and impassioned love music.

M. Gabriel Fauré and M. Paul Dukas were the other composers heard last night, Fauré being represented by his "Pelléas et Mélisande" suite, Dukas by his droll "L'Apprenti Sorcier." A French critic, Imbert, says regarding Fauré: "If there be a French musician who by temperament and taste has left the French school in order to approach the German symphonic school; if there be a composer who has the profoundest respect for his art, who loves it with his whole soul; if there be a man who despises self-advertisement, and is averse to all concessions in favor of the doubtful taste of the public, it is Gabriel Fauré." Another French critic, Camille Benoit, says regarding Fauré: "From all points of view, if I had to liken him to a contemporary foreign composer, it is to the Norwegian, Edward Grieg, that I should compare him. That is to say," he adds, "that in France, G. Fauré is the first in the special line he has chosen."

However this may be, Fauré certainly shares with Grieg the arts of refined orchestral coloring and appealing to the feelings. The second of the three numbers, "The Spinner," was particularly liked by last night's audience. The whole suite is decidedly worth repeating. So is Dukas's "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," which may be regarded as a lurid illustration of the servant question. A sorcerer, according to a ballad of Goethe, had been in the habit of using his hocus pocus to transform a broom into a servant and making it do his work for him. One day, when the sorcerer is away, his apprentice applies his formula and makes the broom man go to the river and fetch a pail of water. He goes again and again; the house is being inundated, for the apprentice has forgotten the formula for changing the man back into a broom. He cuts him in two, but both pieces start out to fetch more water. Luckily the sorcerer returns at this moment, and with a few words averts further mischief.

One might view this legend seriously as teaching the lesson that only a master should presume to meddle with certain things. The French composer, however, has made it the basis of an orchestral scherzo; that is, he treats the ballad from the humorous point of view; and he has made of it a decidedly clever and amusing piece. Dukas, fortunately, seems to follow in the footsteps of Saint-Saëns rather than of César Franck and R. Strauss. The scherzo was played with much spirit under the direction of M. D'Indy, who, it need not be added, was cordially applauded and treated as so eminent a "guest" deserves to be treated. The same programme will be repeated in Brooklyn this evening. On Saturday afternoon, at Carnegie Hall, M. D'Indy will conduct a symphony by Chausson (op. 20). César Franck's "Psyché et Eros," Debussy's "Nuages" and "Fêtes," a "Chant funèbre" by Maknard, and his own "Istar."

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 8, 1905.

A CONCERT OF FRENCH MUSIC.

After voluminous announcement; the Boston S phony Orchestra gave its second evening concert Carnegie Hall last night, under the direction Vincent d'Indy. It was an evening devoted to effort at making propaganda for French mus M. d'Indy is a forward man in his school; there scarcely anything good in it which he does represent—its elegance of expression first of He produced some of his own music; also some that of his friends and contemporaries, Gabri Fauré and Paul Dukas. His own pieces were symphony in B flat, to which Mr. Gericke had ready given a hearing, and a symphonic poem, "legend," as he prefers to call it, entitled "Sau fleurie," a piece of delineative music which, it m be confessed, is so ingenuous in purpose that, in but its voice, it belongs to an age so long ago that it scarcely seems worth while to d cuss it. Here is the formula: Slow mus of an idyllic character—a nymph, a fair embowered in the wood; rippling and gurglin figures—there is water in her environment. Fanfar from the horns, muted at first, then frank an open voiced—a prince comes a-hunting; muted the close—the hunters have gone, the fairy has lov a mortal, and the little tragedy is over. Kuhn would have known how to do it two hundred ye ago, though he would not have known how to pense the magical orchestral tones which are at disposal of M. d'Indy. These tones were, ind the most admirable things about last night's cert. The French composers of the decadent sc (there were no others represented last night) all the daring of the German Strausses, Ha gers, Schillings and Rigers, but they remain ful to their old sense of beauty of tone. The indulge in platitudes of musical thought, but will clothe their commonplaces tastefully an gantly. In nothing was M. d'Indy so interestin night as in making this demonstration. not only a musical scholar, but his whole s on scholarship. He is an ingenious manipul formularies. Were he half as ingenious in vention of beautiful themes as he is in the h of such material as he selects (especially matter of instrumentation) he would su one of the choice and master spirits of But he is not. His symphony was quite gestible and incomprehensible last night a last season, though it had the advantag second hearing and an indubitably authorit terpretation. M. d'Indy conducted intel soundly, lucidly, and the orchestra follo every direction with obvious sympathy. B there must have been many in the room w their powers of analysis and description pletely bewildered as they were w they heard the work. There is no to change the opinion expressed in thi before: . . . That it irritated interest deniable; that, with all its incomprehensi larities, it published sincerity on the pa composer was equally unquestionable; bu all meant, either as absolute or illustrati we are still as unable to fathom as w year ago. We must still want for its ess cessories, possibly a preliminary deba hasheesh, moving pictures by the imp who paint red houses with blue pigme dissemination machines such as Apuleius in his "Golden Ass," flitting scenes Meistersinger," "Tristan und Isolde" an graph of a page from Goldmark's "G overture. Mr. d'Indy was most politely most politely; that he persuaded his hea mire the music of the young Frenchm cause he is representing on this visit we dare assert.

NEW YORK WORL

ess

DEC 8- 19

D'INDY BATON LESS EFFECTIVE THAN PEN

French Composer Conducts Boston Symphony Orchestra in His Own Pieces.

Concerts, devoted to German music and to that of Russian composers, are comparatively frequent in New York, but a whole programme given over to the production of French compositions is a novelty. Last night's programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was not only given to French music alone, but it had a further attraction in that a Frenchman held the baton.

The fever of importing foreign conductors as "guests" has hitherto been confined principally to the Philharmonic Society, but now the desire for new faces and for new batonic angles seems to have spread to Boston, for Vincent d'Indy was invited to come to this country and conduct that famous orchestra for a series of performances.

D'Indy is known to music lovers in this country by several of his compositions, and it is most likely that the impression of these will outlive those made by d'Indy as a conductor. He seemed last night to exert little of his personality upon the men of the orchestra. The men played superbly well—but they do that nine times out of ten. D'Indy consulted his score persistently, even in his own compositions, and then beat time without any especial mannerisms or without any remarkable results.

The programme last night contained two of this Frenchman's works, the B-flat symphony and his "Sangfleurie" Legend. The symphony has been heard here before, when it created the impression of highly artificial music, lacking in inspiration and being fragmentary to a point of boredom. It was hoped that the work under the composer's baton might arouse new interest, but in this it failed. It is cleverly orchestrated, with frequent resources to dissonant effects whose ugliness seems meaningless because of the lack of a mighty sweep to knit it into a logical whole. The "Sangfleurie" is more modest music and much more enjoyable.

Beside these two numbers d'Indy conducted a suite from Faure's incidents music to Maeterlinck's "Pelleas et Mellisande." This music is full of deliberate color effects, but its place is rightly that of the theatre, when it should be heard in connection with the play.

The programme's final number was Dukas's Scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," which delightful work was [illegible] played, and thus renewed

NEW YORK EV'G POST

DEC

MUSIC AND DRAMA.

Vincent D'Indy Conducts.

M. Vincent D'Indy is the eighth prominent European composer who has crossed the Atlantic and given concerts in this country. His predecessors were Johann Strauss, Dvorák, Tchaikovsky, Paderewski, D'Albert, Richard Strauss, and Humperdinck. The eminent Frenchman has come at the invitation of Col. Higginson to preside over the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for two weeks; he will also be heard in chamber music next Tuesday, at the Kneisel Quartet; and Walter Damrosch has put his first symphony in the programme of his Sunday concert on December 17. Thus there will be abundant opportunity to judge the latest phase of French music as represented by Vincent D'Indy.

It was his second symphony that opened the Boston orchestra's concert at Carnegie Hall last night. Mr. Gericke had produced the same work a year ago, but that made it the more interesting to hear it under the composer's own bâton. The general impression, however, was the same; one could not but wish constantly that there were more melody—the melody of Auber, Gounod, Bizet—and less up-to-date cleverness in the use of orchestral colors and the reckless predilection for unmeaning dissonances. Perhaps it isn't quite like "flinging a pot of paint in the public's face," but there certainly is a regrettable disproportion between the lavish use of color and the scant drawing. Invention—particularly melodic invention—is the weak point of all the composers of the César Franck school; and it is in vain they try to atone for it with orchestral decoration and dissonance. Here is the common ground on which the modern Frenchmen (Saint-Saëns excepted) join hands with the latest German school of R. Strauss, Weingartner, Mahler, and Max Reger. There is an ocean of sound, but none of the vital melody—water, water everywhere, yet not a drop to drink. Wagner and Liszt also used briny, bitter discords, but only where they were in place and meant something—the expression of dramatic emotion; and they do not taboo melody.

The suspicion that M. D'Indy's second symphony was written by one who has studied the latest developments of German music is confirmed by the date of its composition. It is barely two years old. Another of D'Indy's works on last night's programme—"Saugefleurie"—is older in method as well as date of composition (1884); but here, too, there is a lack of melodic invention; the one thing, alas, that no amount of study can give. Saugefleurie (Wild Sage) is a young and beautiful fairy living by the edge of a lake in the trunk of a willow. She falls in love with a king's son, who passes by a-hunting. It is death for her to love a mortal man, but death with love she chooses in preference to life without it. The composition has interesting details of hunting horns and impassioned love music.

M. Gabriel Fauré and M. Paul Dukas were the other composers heard last night, Fauré being represented by his "Pelléas et Mélisande" suite, Dukas by his droll "L'Apprenti Sorcier." A French critic, Imbert, says regarding Fauré: "If there be a French musician who by temperament and taste has left the French school in order to approach the German symphonic school; if there be a composer who has the profoundest respect for his art, who loves it with his whole soul; if there be a man who despises self-advertisement, and is averse to all concessions in favor of the doubtful taste of the public, it is Gabriel Fauré." Another French critic, Camille Benoit, says regarding Fauré: "From all points of view, if I had to liken him to a contemporary foreign composer, it is to the Norwegian, Edward Grieg, that I should compare him. That is to say," he adds, "that in France, G. Fauré is the first in the special line he has chosen."

However this may be, Fauré certainly shares with Grieg the arts of refined orchestral coloring and appealing to the feelings. The second of the three numbers, "The Spinner," was particularly liked by last night's audience. The whole suite is decidedly worth repeating. So is Dukas's "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," which may be regarded as a lurid illustration of the servant question. A sorcerer, according to a ballad of Goethe, had been in the habit of using his hocus pocus to transform a broom into a servant and making it do his work for him. One day, when the sorcerer is away, his apprentice applies his formula and makes the broom man go to the river and fetch a pail of water. He goes again and again; the house is being inundated, for the apprentice has forgotten the formula for changing the man back into a broom. He cuts him in two, but both pieces start out to fetch more water. Luckily the sorcerer returns at this moment, and with a few words averts further mischief.

One might view this legend seriously as teaching the lesson that only a master should presume to meddle with certain things. The French composer, however, has made it the basis of an orchestral scherzo; that is, he treats the ballad from the humorous point of view; and he has made of it a decidedly clever and amusing piece. Dukas, fortunately, seems to follow in the footsteps of Saint-Saëns rather than of César Franck and R. Strauss. The scherzo was played with much spirit under the direction of M. D'Indy, who, it need not be added, was cordially applauded and treated as so eminent a "guest" deserves to be treated. The same programme will be repeated in Brooklyn this evening. On Saturday afternoon, at Carnegie Hall, M. D'Indy will conduct a symphony by Chausson (op. 20). César Franck's "Psyché et Eros," Debussy's "Nuages" and "Fêtes," a "Chant funèbre" by Maknard, and his own "Istar."

One might view this legend seriously as teaching the lesson that only a master should presume—to meddle with certain things. The French composer, however, has made it the basis of an orchestral scherzo; that is, he treats the ballad from the humorous point of view; and he has made of it a decidedly clever and amusing piece. Dukas, fortunately, seems to follow in the footsteps of Saint-Saëns rather than of César Franck and R. Strauss. The scherzo was played with much spirit under the direction of M. D'Indy, who, it need not be added, was cordially applauded and treated as so eminent a "guest" deserves to be treated. The same programme will be repeated in Brooklyn this evening. On Saturday afternoon, at Carnegie Hall, M. D'Indy will conduct a symphony by Chausson (op. 20). César Franck's "Psyché et Eros," Debussy's "Nuages" and "Fêtes," a "Chant funèbre" by Maknard, and his own "Istar."

The New York Press

DAILY EDITION.

New York, Friday, December 8, 1905.

D'Indy Directs Boston Orchestra.

Vincent D'Indy's first appearance in New York last night in Carnegie Hall, as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, proved somewhat disappointing; and so did the programme of modern French music he offered. This is a disagreeable thing to say, for D'Indy is a man of great distinction and of fine artistic accomplishments, and we should prefer to give a right royal welcome to him. But truth compels the statement that last night's auditors found little to move or elate them either in D'Indy's directorial powers or in his compositions. Indeed, Gabriel Faure's suite, "Pelleas et Melisande," a work of small significance, evoked more enthusiasm than any other contribution of the evening.

It is not surprising, perhaps, that the eminent stranger caused little excitement at the conductor's desk. He is an exceedingly serious man; modest and retiring, too. Moreover, he does not pose as a "star" of the baton. In fact, he refused last night to acknowledge even with a slight inclination of the head any applause save that which he believed was offered to him in the capacity of a composer. Yet D'Indy is no mean conductor, if he does seem somewhat stilted in his movements, for he kept his men well in hand, and his interpretations were conceived admirably and executed finely.

As a composer he is not unknown in New York. His Symphony in B flat, opus 57, which opened the concert, was played here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Gericke on January 12 last, the work having had its first performance in America by the Philadelphia orchestra shortly before that date; and the list of his other works which have come to a hearing is not small.

The second hearing of D'Indy's symphony, though it gave better insight into its various intricacies, confirmed one's first impressions. It is a symphony without programme only in name. As a fact it would bear literary elucidation fully as well as any of Strauss's tone-poems, and, to our way of thinking, stands more in need of it.

D'Indy is a brilliant composer. He has at his finger's ends all the resources of orchestration, harmonic coloring and contrapuntal broidery known to the modern musical world. At the same time he avoids the cacophony of a Strauss, even the exaggerations of a Debussy. But we can discover in his work no suggestion of real originality and individuality of expression. In his opus 57 the musical idiom is largely taken from Wagner and Liszt, with a tincture of the modern French and Belgian schools, showing many of those little tricks that to the unaccustomed ear seem strangely haunting and effective, but on closer inspection appear hollow, grotesque and superficially ornamental. D'Indy is a poet and a thinker; but nature did not make him a genius. He is a sort of French Weingartner.

His "Saugefleurie" was heard for the first time last night, but made no deep impression. It shows the influence of Wagner clearly. The opening bars are closely akin to the "Good Friday" music from "Parsifal." Faure's Suite, "Pelleas et Melisande," is nothing more than a chain of pretty salon pieces. Compared with this composition D'Indy's music is of gigantic power.

Paul Dukas's clever and effective Scherzo, "L'Apprenti Sorcier," brought the concert to an end. It was performed admirably, as indeed was every number on the programme. The programme of to-morrow afternoon's concert, which D'Indy also will conduct, comprises Ernest Chausson's Symphony in E flat, opus 20; "Psyche et Eros," from Cesar Franck's symphonic poem, "Psyche"; two Nocturnes by Debussy—"Nuages" and 'Fetes"; Alberic Magnard's "Chant Funebre," and D'Indy's symphonic variations, "Istar."

The Evening Post.

New York, Friday, December 8, 1905.

Vincent D'Indy Conducts.

M. Vincent D'Indy is the eighth prominent European composer who has crossed the Atlantic and given concerts in this country. His predecessors were Johann Strauss, Dvorák, Tchaikovsky, Paderewski, D'Albert, Richard Strauss, and Humperdinck. The eminent Frenchman has come at the invitation of Col. Higginson to preside over the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for two weeks; he will also be heard in chamber music next Tuesday, at the Kneisel Quartet; and Walter Damrosch has put his first symphony in the programme of his Sunday concert on December 17. Thus there will be abundant opportunity to judge the latest phase of French music as represented by Vincent D'Indy.

It was his second symphony that opened the Boston orchestra's concert at Carnegie Hall last night. Mr. Gericke had produced the same work a year ago, but that made it the more interesting to hear it under the composer's own bâton. The general impression, however, was the same; one could not but wish constantly that there were more melody—the melody of Auber, Gounod, Bizet—and less up-to-date cleverness in the use of orchestral colors and the reckless predilection for unmeaning dissonances. Perhaps it isn't quite like "flinging a pot of paint in the public's face," but there certainly is a regrettable disproportion between the lavish use of color and the scant drawing. Invention—particularly melodic invention—is the weak point of all the composers of the César Franck school; and it is in vain they try to atone for it with orchestral decoration and dissonance. Here is the common ground on which the modern Frenchmen (Saint-Saëns excepted) join hands with the latest German school of R. Strauss, Weingartner, Mahler, and Max Reger. There is an ocean of sound, but none of the vital melody—water, water everywhere, yet not a drop to drink. Wagner and Liszt also used briny, bitter discords, but only where they were in place and meant something—the expression of dramatic emotion; and they do not taboo melody.

The suspicion that M. D'Indy's second symphony was written by one who has studied the latest developments of German music is confirmed by the date of its composition. It is barely two years old. Another of D'Indy's works on last night's programme—"Saugefleurie"—is older in method as well as date of composition (1884); but here, too, there is a lack of melodic invention; the one thing, alas, that no amount of study can give. Saugefleurie (Wild Sage) is a young and beautiful fairy living by the edge of a lake in the trunk of a willow. She falls in love with a king's son, who passes by a-hunting. It is death for her to love a mortal man, but death with love she chooses in preference to life without it. The composition has interesting details of hunting horns and impassioned love music.

M. Gabriel Fauré and M. Paul Dukas were the other composers heard last night, Fauré being represented by his "Pelléas et Mélisande" suite, Dukas by his droll "L'Apprenti Sorcier." A French critic, Imbert, says regarding Fauré: "If there be a French musician who by temperament and taste has left the French school in order to approach the German symphonic school; if there be a composer who has the profoundest respect for his art, who loves it with his whole soul; if there be a man who despises self-advertisement, and is averse to all concessions in favor of the doubtful taste of the public, it is Gabriel Fauré." Another French critic, Camille Benoit, says regarding Fauré: "From all points of view, if I had to liken him to a contemporary foreign composer, it is to the Norwegian, Edward Grieg, that I should compare him. That is to say," he adds, "that in France, G. Fauré is the first in the special line he has chosen."

However this may be, Fauré certainly shares with Grieg the arts of refined orchestral coloring and appealing to the feelings. The second of the three numbers, "The Spinner," was particularly liked by last night's audience. The whole suite is decidedly worth repeating. So is Dukas's "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," which may be regarded as a lurid illustration of the servant question. A sorcerer, according to a ballad of Goethe, had been in the habit of using his hocus pocus to transform a broom into a servant and making it do his work for him. One day, when the sorcerer is away, his apprentice applies his formula and makes the broom man go to the river and fetch a pail of water. He goes again and again; the house is being inundated, for the apprentice has forgotten the formula for changing the man back into a broom. He cuts him in two, but both pieces start out to fetch more water. Luckily the sorcerer returns at this moment, and with a few words averts further mischief.

One might view this legend seriously as teaching the lesson that only a master should presume to meddle with certain things. The French composer, however, has made it the basis of an orchestral scherzo; that is, he treats the ballad from the humorous point of view; and he has made of it a decidedly clever and amusing piece. Dukas, fortunately, seems to follow in the footsteps of Saint-Saëns rather than of César Franck and R. Strauss. The scherzo was played with much spirit under the direction of M. D'Indy, who, it need not be added, was cordially applauded and treated as so eminent a "guest" deserves to be treated. The same programme will be repeated in Brooklyn this evening. On Saturday afternoon, at Carnegie Hall, M. D'Indy will conduct a symphony by Chausson (op. 20). César Franck's "Psyché et Eros," Debussy's "Nuages" and "Fêtes," a "Chant funèbre" by Maknard, and his own "Istar."

New-York Daily Tribune

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 8, 1905.

A CONCERT OF FRENCH MUSIC.

After voluminous announcement, the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its second evening concert in Carnegie Hall last night, under the direction of Vincent d'Indy. It was an evening devoted to a effort at making propaganda for French mus M. d'Indy is a forward man in his school; there scarcely anything good in it which he does represent—its elegance of expression first of a He produced some of his own music; also some that of his friends and contemporaries, Gabri Fauré and Paul Dukas. His own pieces were symphony in B flat, to which Mr. Gericke had ready given a hearing, and a symphonic poem, "legend," as he prefers to call it, entitled "Sau fleurie," a piece of delineative music which, it mu be confessed, is so ingenuous in purpose that, in but its voice, it belongs to an age so long ago that it scarcely seems worth while to di cuss it. Here is the formula: Slow mus of an idyllic character—a nymph, a fair embowered in the wood; rippling and gurglin figures—there is water in her environment. Fanfare from the horns, muted at first, then frank an open voiced—a prince comes a-hunting; muted the close—the hunters have gone, the fairy has lov a mortal, and the little tragedy is over. Kuhn would have known how to do it two hundred yea ago, though he would not have known how to d pense the magical orchestral tones which are at disposal of M. d'Indy. These tones were, inde the most admirable things about last night's c cert. The French composers of the decadent sc (there were no others represented last night) all the daring of the German Strausses, Ha gers, Schillings and Rigers, but they remain ful to their old sense of beauty of tone. The indulge in platitudes of musical thought, but will clothe their commonplaces tastefully an gantly. In nothing was M. d'Indy so interestin night as in making this demonstration. not only a musical scholar, but his whole ar on scholarship. He is an ingenious manipula formularies. Were he half as ingenious in vention of beautiful themes as he is in the h of such material as he selects (especially matter of instrumentation) he would su one of the choice and master spirits of t But he is not. His symphony was quite gestible and incomprehensible last night as last season, though it had the advantage second hearing and an indubitably authorit terpretation. M. d'Indy conducted intel soundly, lucidly, and the orchestra follo every direction with obvious sympathy. B there must have been many in the room wh their powers of analysis and description pletely bewildered as they were wh they heard the work. There is no to change the opinion expressed in this before: . . . That it irritated interest deniable; that, with all its incomprehensib larities, it published sincerity on the par composer was equally unquestionable; bu all meant, either as absolute or illustrati we are still as unable to fathom as w year ago. We must still want for its ess cessories, possibly a preliminary deba hasheesh, moving pictures by the impr who paint red houses with blue pigme dissemination machines such as Apuleius in his "Golden Ass," flitting scenes Meistersinger," "Tristan und Isolde" an graph of a page from Goldmark's "S overture. Mr. d'Indy was most politely most politely; that he persuaded his hea loire the music of the young Frenchm cause he is representing on this visit we dare assert.

---

ess

D'INDY BATON LESS EFFECTIVE THAN PEN

French Composer Conducts Boston Symphony Orchestra in His Own Pieces.

Concerts, devoted to German music and to that of Russian composers, are comparatively frequent in New York, but a whole programme given over to the production of French compositions is a novelty. Last night's programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was not only given to French music alone, but it had a further attraction in that a Frenchman held the baton.

The fever of importing foreign conductors as "guests" has hitherto been confined principally to the Philharmonic Society, but now the desire for new faces and for new batonic angles seems to have spread to Boston, for Vincent d'Indy was invited to come to this country and conduct that famous orchestra for a series of performances.

D'Indy is known to music lovers in this country by several of his compositions, and it is most likely that the impression of these will outlive those made by d'Indy as a conductor. He seemed last night to exert little of his personality upon the men of the orchestra. The men played superbly well—but they do that nine times out of ten. D'Indy consulted his score persistently, even in his own compositions, and then beat time without any especial mannerisms or without any remarkable results.

The programme last night contained two of this Frenchman's works, the B-flat symphony and his "Sangfleurie" Legend. The symphony has been heard here before, when it created the impression of highly artificial music, lacking in inspiration and being fragmentary to a point of boredom. It was hoped that the work under the composer's baton might arouse new interest, but in this it failed. It is cleverly orchestrated, with frequent resources to dissonant effects whose ugliness seems meaningless because of the lack of a mighty sweep to knit it into a logical whole. The "Sangfleurie" is more modest music and much more enjoyable.

Beside these two numbers d'Indy conducted a suite from Faure's incidental music to Maeterlinck's "Pelleas et Mellissande." This music is full of deliberate color effects, but its place is rightly that of the theatre, when it should be heard in connection with the play.

The programme's final number was Dukas's Scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," which delightful work was stunningly played, and thus renewed the impressions made by an earlier hearing. The work of the orchestra was well nigh flawless.

At this concert there was no soloist, which fact was another departure from the conventional scheme of the Boston Symphony concerts. The audience was moderately large, and not excessively enthusiastic.

[123]

LIFE
NEW YORK CITY
DEC 9

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra began this present New York season with a concert of exceptional interest. For lovers of the best music, these events have become an important and almost indispensable resource. The quality of the audiences is in itself the finest recognition, the highest tribute. Nowhere in the city does one find himself in a more cultured society, musically and intellectually, than at these silent, appreciative assemblies.

PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
DEC 10 1903
DEC 10 1903

IN THE REALM OF MUSIC

D'Indy Conducts Again.

Vincent d'Indy appeared for the second time at the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall and again offered a programme devoted entirely to Gallic music. As a leader D'Indy proved more impressive than on Thursday evening. He was evidently in a better mood. But he did not succeed in holding the interest of his audience throughout the afternoon. Indeed, it must be said the performance, considered as a whole, was monotonous. True, it had some fascinating moments, but there was little to move the heart and kindle one's emotions. The fact is, the music of modern French composers is absolutely lacking in blood and marrow. It is now sweetly sentimental, now equisitely refined and delicate in workmanship, now strangely suggestive and haunting in its effects. But it is empty of real life and energy; empty of true human feeling. This appears to be the result of abnormally developed imagination which sees more significance in the reflection of reality than in reality itself. The music of France is, to our way of thinking, the music of decadence.

There were two numbers on the programme new to New York—a symphony in B flat major, opus 20, by Ernest Chausson, and a "Chante Funebre" by Alberic Magnard, a pupil of D'Indy. In spite of their novelty these compositions must be set down as the least interesting of the programme. The "Psyche et Eros" excerpt from Cesar Frank's symphonic poem, "Psyche," two nocturnes by Claude Debussy, "Nuages" and "Fetes," and D'Indy's own symphonic variations, "Istar," which made up the rest of the programme, are far more important contributions to orchestral literature.

In a manner Chausson's symphony is an effective composition. It is melodious, readily appealing and comparatively simple. At the same time it is without originality and is overburdened with tearful sentimentality. One of the most important themes—decidedly the best—is taken almost bodily from Liszt's "Faust" symphony. The second movement, the title of which we are told should be "Grief," obviously is inspired by the beginning of the third act of "Tristan und Isolde." Withal, Chausson's Wagnerian idiom is diluted with Slavic suggestions. There are frequent reminders of Tschaikowsky and even of Dvorak.

That Magnard is "congested with talent," as a Paris critic said of him, is probably true. But his "Funeral Dirge" revealed little more. Debussy's Nocturnes, played here last season by the New York Symphony Orchestra, stood far above the level of the other numbers on the programme, for the reason they are truly original in character and effect. Whether these exquisite tone-pictures are to hold a high position in music remains to be seen. They are, perhaps, too vaguely suggestive, too subtly imaginative to survive the ravages of time. But, taking them for what they are—impressionistic paintings in sounds of atmospheric effects—they are nothing short of wonderful. There is no way of describing the peculiar harmonic and orchestral colors with which the composer translates into sound what has impressed itself upon his imagination through the eye.

D'Indy's interpretations were wholly admirable. They showed poetic insight and fervor, as well as directorial skill. There was a moment, however, in the "Istar" variations when the orchestra came near getting into a tangle. This work is a finely conceived tonal interpretation of an ancient poem, which represents the descent of one Istar, daughter of Sin, into the Land of No-Return, some of her garments and adornments being stripped off at each gate through which she passes, until finally she arrives nude at her destination.

Dec 9 1903

The two concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra next week in Carnegie Hall acquire special interest from the presence of Vincent d'Indy, the distinguished French composer and acknowledged leader of the newest school of music in France, as conductor. Mr. d'Indy has come to this country as the guest of the Boston Orchestra to conduct a few concerts of modern French music. The programme of the first New York concert, Thursday evening, Dec. 7, includes d'Indy's symphony No. 2 in B flat, Ysaye's "Poeme Elegiaque," Faure's "Pelleas et Melisande" suite, and Paul Dukas's "L'Apprenti Sorcier." The programme of the second concert, Saturday afternoon, Dec. 9, includes a symphony in B flat by Ernest Chausson (first time), excerpt from César Franck's symphonic poem "Psyche," two nocturnes by Debussy, "Nuages" and "Fetes," and d'Indy's symphonic variations, "Istar."

NEW YORK DAILY TRIBUNE
DEC 10 1903

MORE FRENCH MUSIC

The Second Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

CHAUSSON'S SYMPHONY GIVEN

The Conductor's Own "Istar" Variations and Pieces by Franck, Debussy, and Magnard.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's second trip to New York, like the first, was conducted by Mr. Vincent d'Indy; and, also like the first, was devoted to the music of the extreme left wing of the contemporaneous French composers. The programme comprised Ernest Chausson's symphony, an extract from César Frank's symphonic poem, "Psyche"; two nocturnes by Claude Debussy, a funeral dirge by Alveric Magnard, and Mr. d'Indy's own symphonic variations, entitled "Istar." Of these the symphony and Magnard's piece were new to this city.

The afternoon, it must be confessed, was a strenuous one for a large audience, by whom Mr. d'Indy was again most warmly received and enthusiastically applauded after the concert. The young Frenchmen are apt to be "young and intolerably severe," whatever may be their respective ages; their ultra-modernty exacts a new point of view and a receptivity for new utterances in music. They have yet definitely to establish the value of what they have to say and their methods of saying it. Much of it seems at present of little value, and their way of saying it forced and unnatural. Some of it, on the other hand, has a haunting charm, a seizing intensity of expression, that makes their way through the barrier that unfamiliarity sets up. The chief object of Mr. d'Indy's visit is to forward the appreciation of these things.

The programme on the whole was easier than that of Thursday evening. Chausson's symphony is in no respect cryptic. He writes in a modern vein, but his ideas are not obscure, nor is he engrossed with abstruse problems of construction. He has devised vigorous and plastic themes not always without reminiscence of others' property—and he has elaborated them with ingenuity and skill that at certain points have produced interesting results; as especially in the slow introduction, where the chief motives of the symphony are outlined, and in the first movement, which, while it is developed at great length, is the most spontaneous and effective of the three. They are bound together in that kind of relationship which latter-day composers have sought through the device of "community of theme." The slow movement is sombre to the verge of gloom. The impression left by the work is, indeed, rather episodical than that of a sustained working out into a clearly defined whole. The instrumentation is not altogether so fine as many of Chausson's compeers have achieved; it has in places an experimental quality, and the experiment is not always successful. The symphony, it should be remembered, was the work of a very young man; and if he has not quite "arrived" in it, it is, nevertheless, a significant showing of talent.

Other movements from Cesar Franck's symphonic poem "Psyche" were played here three seasons ago by the Philharmonic Society. That entitled "Psyche and Cupid," which M. d'Indy gave yesterday, is the last of the four sections; it represents the happiness of the lovers, and may be supposed to be the climax of the tone poem, into which the commentators have read a higher symbolism, a spirit of Christian mysticism. It is sonorous, richly colored; and, as the commentators again inform us, is compacted of themes which are representative of the characters and emotions in the story of Psyche which Franck is musically illustrating. But the movement rises to no very great height of mystical exaltation. The passion and bliss of love find expression here that is scarcely of extraordinary eloquence, though, like all of Franck's music, it is the work of a master of all the technical things, and of a sincere and earnest musician.

The two deliciously impressionistic sketches by Debussy were played last year by the New York Symphony orchestra and were then, as they are now, found of remarkable charm and originality. Dubussy in the "Nuages" has found new and subtle expression for a mood that is as intangible as the gray aspect of nature with which he has connected it, vague in outline but unmistakable in spirit; scarcely more than a vaporous exhalation of tone. The "Fêtes" conveys a more definite picture, but here, too, the suggestion is one of mood, of fantasy, of vague, confused impressions of fantastic and thickly crowding glimpses. Slight as these pieces are, they help to strengthen the belief that Debussy is head and shoulders above his fellows in this movement as regards sheer imagination, spontaneity and originality, and as well in the ingenuity that has given him command of new resources of musical technique.

The funeral dirge of Magnard might well have been spared; it is extremely long and without special significance to the audience that heard it, however heartfelt may be the expression in it of personal loss, and it was as a weight upon a none too enlivening programme.

Mr. d'Indy's "Istal" variations, which closed the concert, are a work of considerably less forbidding mien than his symphony. They are based on an original idea most skillfully carried out, and though they are programme music they are of the higher and more poetic purpose that permits enjoyment of them as music without a laborious following of their poetical basis. The musical idea is a most striking embodiment of the suggestion of the poem, a world-old story from Babylonian mythology; the theme at the basis of the variations is not proclaimed till the end, after the series of variations that represent the successive despoilings of Istal's ornaments and raiments on her journey to the nether world. And as Istal stands [illegible]

NEW YORK WORLD
DEC 10 1903

MUSIC

NATIONAL MUSIC S A FEATURE OF

By Edward Ziegler.

VINCENT D'INDY is the sixth of the list of celebrated composers who have been persuaded to visit this country during the past decade and a half. His visit is one of decided importance, and differs in nature from that of any of the other famous men who have been incited to come actively to these alleged unmusical shores.

Peter Iljitsch Tschaikowsky was probably the first composer of very great importance to visit America—although students of music history recall that Wagner had tempting offers made him to settle in this wide country when Germany was turning the musical and political cold shoulder toward the sensitive Richard. Wagner at that time considered the offers, but it must have been with shudders at the idea of going into a barbaric wilderness where he would have to forego his personal comforts, of which he was something of a slave, and where he would find music appreciation in a primitive state. So Wagner declined the offer.

Tschaikowsky came to New York to grace and dignify the opening of Carnegie Hall. During his stay in this land he visited some points other than New York and conducted. Some interesting allusions to this visit are contained in the biography of this famous Russan composer, which has so lately been compiled by his brother, Modest Tschaikowsky.

Antonin Dvorak, now also numbered among the departed ones, was the second of the list, and he came to New York to lend his artistic services to a native Conservatory of Music. Beyond this he also recorded the impressions of his stay in this country by the beloved symphony, "From the New World," and by some numbers in the form of quartets, known to music lovers as "negro" quartets by Dvorak, for here the composer has succeeded in including some of the melodic and rhythmic peculiarities of the musical American negroes.

Richard Strauss was the third composer induced to visit this country. He came to conduct his own compositions and was accompanied by his wife, who came to sing her husband's songs in concert and recital. The details of this visit are still too vivid in the minds of those who mourned at the departure from artistic lines this musician chose during his sojourn in New York.

Felix Weingartner was invited to this country by the New York Philharmonic Society to conduct this orchestra, just as were other foreign conductors of fame, such as the Frenchman Colonne, the Russian Safonoff, the Dutchman Mengelberg and several Germans, principal among which was Weingartner. But Felix Weingartner is also to be reckoned with the prominent composers among living men, as he with scant justice hardly can be classed solely among the list of conductors.

Engelbert Humperdinck was the next in order to come to New York, and his visit had no obvious purpose as far as any one could see. He attended the rehearsals of his opera "Haensel und Gretel," gladly shook the hand of various persons concerned in the production, even conducted a few of his own compositions at a Sunday night concert, was the guest of honor at a banquet, and incidentally visited Niagara Falls. Mr. Humperdinck's modesty of performance may possibly be attributed to the fact that he has grown quite hard of hearing. He expressed great satisfaction at the performance of "Haensel und Gretel" at the Metropolitan Opera-House, which is probably what every composer says about any production of any of his works at any place.

And the sixth musician of note to visit us in Vincent d'Indy, who has been invited by the controlling spirit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to conduct this orchestra during a series of concerts. It is the first time that the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra has departed radically from its scheme of artistic conservatism.

* * *

Vincent d'Indy's compositions are not unknown in this country. They represent the modern French school with its love for color and its mystic hints at tragedy and action rather than a brutal expression of the incident itself. But it is not alone to put his own best composing foot forward that d'Indy has come to this country since he has conducted but a few works that have come from his own pen, devoting himself rather to compositions by his fellow countrymen, such as Faure, Chausson and Magnard. Thus New York music-lovers have been allowed to hear notable modern French works conducted by one who ought to be a bearer of tradition—just as it has heard Russian music under Russians and German music under the batons from eminent German conductors. It is rapidly becoming an age of specialty—even in music.

* * *

[124]

NEW YORK
DEC 10 1903

M. D'INDY LEADS BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Again Interprets a Programme Consisting Wholly of Music by Modern French Composers.

PROVES HARD TO FOLLOW

Large Audience on Hand in Carnegie Hall to Greet the Visitor, but Applause is Lukewarm.

Mr. Vincent d'Indy was again the conductor by special arrangement at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's second matinée concert in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon, the programme, like that of Thursday night, consisting wholly of music by modern French composers.

The occasion thus provided another exceptional opportunity to study present day French music under an authoritative interpreter, and there was a large audience on hand to take advantage of it.

It must be confessed, however, that the afternoon's entertainment, save to students and to some impressionists in "cranks' ally," proved dull. Even so cultivated a body of listeners as the Boston Orchestra's clientèle found it difficult to maintain the mental attitude of strained attention demanded by the programme, and the applause was, as a consequence, lukewarm.

The works presented were a symphony by Ernest Chausson in B flat, opus 20, new here; 'Cesar Frank's "Psyché et Eros"; Claude Debussy's two nocturnes, "Nuages" and "Fêtes"; a "Dirge" by Alberic Magnard, and Mr. D'Indy's "Istar" variations, also a local novelty. There was again no soloist.

Judged by these compositions the modern French school would seem to have forsaken all beaten paths and to be bent on a long voyage of discovery into the musical unknown. One mere man in the audience put the case in pithy phrase when he remarked that "there wasn't a tune you could hang your hat on." There wasn't. The Chausson symphony was a typical case. It had pleasing details now and then, but these were put together, so to speak, into a sort of musical mosaic, vaguely colored and without design.

Of all the programme's numbers the most striking were the two little Debussy nocturnes, particularly the first "Nuages," with its weird instrumentation and weirder harmonies.

Mr. D'Indy obtained somewhat more finish for his readings than on Thursday night, but there was lacking much of the orchestra's usual polish.

ILLUSTRATED EXPRESS
DEC 10 1903

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Convention Hall, on Monday evening, February 19th. For the orchestra to come to Buffalo for a single concert is an undertaking of greatest difficulty. When it gave a concert here in October it made Buffalo one of several cities visited on its fall tour, but in February it will make a special trip here. To carry such a large organization so far—for the Boston Symphony Orchestra takes with it on its trips as many men as the other orchestras use in their home cities—is a most expensive operation and has been made possible only by the liberality of the music-loving men and women of Buffalo, who are primarily responsible for the concerts. If Mr. Gericke and the management believed that justice could be done to the orchestra and to the works performed by less than 75 players, the Boston Orchestra could give many more concerts in cities distant from Boston; but it is believed by them that 75 is the smallest number that can be used in a symphony concert. It is likely that the programmes which Mr. Gericke will arrange for this city will call for 80 or 85 men.

This week the orchestra is on the second of its regular monthly trips to New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington, and has as its guest, Conductor Vincent d'Indy, the great French composer. M. d'Indy spoke thus, after his first hearing of the orchestra:

"I did not believe it possible that there could be a more beautiful orchestra than the Philharmonic of Vienna, but this is greater. Such equisite [illegible] winds, wonderful and brilliant strings. The searching beauty of the [illegible] choirs quite surpasses anything I have ever heard. There is nothing in Europe to equal it."

Another tribute to the Boston Symphony Orchestra was paid by Willem Mengelberg of the Amsterdam Concertgebouw Orchestra, who said that there was absolutely no orchestra in Europe which was its equal. Its superb beauty and its astonishing virtuosity had been a revelation to him.

Applications for seats for the concert on February 19th may be made now to Mrs. Mai Davis Smith, No. [illegible] place. The programme and [illegible] the concert will be announced in the very near future.

om

ddress

THE Boston Symphony O... began this present New Yor... son with a concert of exception... terest. For lovers of the best music, these events have become an important and almost indispensable resource. The quality of the audiences is in itself the finest recognition, the h... t tribute. Nowhere in the city does one find himself in a more cultured s... musically and intellectually, t... these silent, appreciative asse...

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

DEC 10 1905

ess

IN THE REALM OF MUSIC

D'Indy Conducts Again.

Vincent d'Indy appeared for the second time at the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall and again offered a programme devoted entirely to Gallic music. As a leader D'Indy proved more impressive than on Thursday evening. He was evidently in a better mood. But he did not succeed in holding the interest of his audience throughout the afternoon. Indeed, it must be said the performance, considered as a whole, was monotonous. True, it had some fascinating moments, but there was little to move the heart and kindle one's emotions. The fact is, the music of modern French composers is absolutely lacking in blood and marrow. It is now sweetly sentimental, now equisitely refined and delicate in workmanship, now strangely suggestive and haunting in its effects. But it is empty of real life and energy; empty of true human feeling. This appears to be the result of abnormally developed imagination which sees more significance in the reflection of reality than in reality itself. The music of France is, to our way of thinking, the music of decadence.

There were two numbers on the programme new to New York—a symphony in B flat major, opus 20, by Ernest Chausson, and a "Chante Funebre" by Alberic Magnard, a pupil of D'Indy. In spite of their novelty these compositions must be set down as the least interesting of the programme. The "Psyche et Eros" excerpt from Cesar Frank's symphonic poem, "Psyche," two nocturnes by Claude Debussy, "Nuages" and "Fetes," and D'Indy's own symphonic variations, "Istar," which made up the rest of the programme, are far more important contributions to orchestral literature.

In a manner Chausson's symphony is an effective composition. It is melodious, readily appealing and comparatively simple. At the same time it is without originality and is overburdened with tearful sentimentality. One of the most important themes—decidedly the best—is taken almost bodily from Liszt's "Faust" symphony. The second movement, the title of which we are told should be "Grief," obviously is inspired by the beginning of the third act of "Tristan und Isolde." Withal, Chausson's Wagnerian idiom is diluted with Slavic suggestions. There are frequent reminders of Tschaikowsky and even of Dvorak.

That Magnard is "congested with talent," as a Paris critic said of him, is probably true. But his "Funeral Dirge" revealed little more. Debussy's Nocturnes, played here last season by the New York Symphony Orchestra, stood far above the level of the other numbers on the programme, for the reason they are truly original in character and effect. Whether these exquisite tone-pictures are to hold a high position in music remains to be seen. They are, perhaps, too vaguely suggestive, too subtly imaginative to survive the ravages of time. But, taking them for what they are—impressionistic paintings in sounds of atmospheric effects—they are nothing short of wonderful. There is no way of describing the peculiar harmonic and orchestral colors with which the composer translates into sound what has impressed itself upon his imagination through the eye.

D'Indy's interpretations were wholly admirable. They showed poetic insight and fervor, as well as directorial skill. There was a moment, however, in the "Istar" variations when the orchestra came near getting into a tangle. This work is a finely conceived tonal interpretation of an ancient poem, which represents the descent of one Istar, daughter of Sin, into the Land of No-Return, some of her garments and adornments being stripped off at each gate through which she passes, until finally she arrives nude at her destination.

The two concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra next week in Carnegie Hall acquire special interest from the presence of Vincent d'Indy, the distinguished French composer and acknowledged leader of the newest school of music in France, as conductor. Mr. d'Indy has come to this country as the guest of the Boston Orchestra to conduct a few concerts of modern French music. The programme of the first New York concert, Thursday evening, Dec. 7, includes d'Indy's symphony No. 2 in B flat, Fauré's "Pelléas et Mélisande" suite, Paul Dukas's "L'Apprenti Sorcier." The programme of the second concert, Saturday afternoon, Dec. 9, includes a symphony in B flat by Ernest Chausson (first time), a movement from César Franck's "Psyche," two nocturnes by Debussy, a "Chant funèbre" by Alberic Magnard (first time), and d'Indy's own "Istar" symphonic variations. At neither concert will there b...

NEW ... DECEMBER 10, 1905

D'INDY CONDUCTS MORE FRENCH MUSIC.

The Second Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

CHAUSSON'S SYMPHONY GIVEN

The Conductor's Own "Istar" Variations and Pieces by Franck, Debussy, and Magnard.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's second trip to New York, like the first, was conducted by Mr. Vincent d'Indy; and, also like the first, was devoted to the music of the extreme left wing of the contemporaneous French composers. The programme comprised Ernest Chausson's symphony, an extract from César Frank's symphonic poem, "Psyche"; two nocturnes by Claude Debussy, a funeral dirge by Alveric Magnard, and Mr. d'Indy's own symphonic variations, entitled "Istar." Of these the symphony and Magnard's piece were new to this city.

The afternoon, it must be confessed, was a strenuous one for a large audience, by whom Mr. d'Indy was again most warmly received and enthusiastically applauded after the concert. The young Frenchmen are apt to be "young and intolerably severe," whatever may be their respective ages; their ultra-modernity exacts a new point of view and a receptivity for new utterances in music. They have yet definitely to establish the value of what they have to say and their methods of saying it. Much of it seems at present of little value, and their way of saying it forced and unnatural. Some of it, on the other hand, has a haunting charm, a seizing intensity of expression, that makes their way through the barrier that unfamiliarity sets up. The chief object of Mr. d'Indy's visit is to forward the appreciation of these things.

The programme on the whole was easier than that of Thursday evening. Chausson's symphony is in no respect cryptic. He writes in a modern vein, but his ideas are not obscure, nor is he engrossed with abstruse problems of construction. He has devised vigorous and plastic themes not always without reminiscence of others' property—and he has elaborated them with ingenuity and skill that at certain points have produced interesting results; as especially in the slow introduction, where the chief motives of the symphony are outlined, and in the first movement, which, while it is developed at great length, is the most spontaneous and effective of the three. They are bound together in that kind of relationship which latter-day composers have sought through the device of "community of theme." The slow movement is sombre to the verge of gloom. The impression left by the work is, indeed, rather episodical than that of a sustained working out into a clearly defined whole. The instrumentation is not altogether so fine as many of Chausson's compeers have achieved; it has in places an experimental quality, and the experiment is not always successful. The symphony, it should be remembered, was the work of a very young man; and if he has not quite "arrived" in it, it is, nevertheless, a significant showing of talent.

Other movements from Cesar Franck's symphonic poem "Psyche" were played here three seasons ago by the Philharmonic Society. That entitled "Psyche and Cupid," which M. d'Indy gave yesterday, is the last of the four sections; it represents the happiness of the lovers, and may be supposed to be the climax of the tone poem, into which the commentators have read a higher symbolism, a spirit of Christian mysticism. It is sonorous, richly colored; and, as the commentators again inform us, is compacted of themes which are representative of the characters and emotions in the story of Psyche which Franck is musically illustrating. But the movement rises to no very great height of mystical exaltation. The passion and bliss of love find expression here that is scarcely of extraordinary eloquence, though, like all of Franck's music, it is the work of a master of all the technical things, and of a sincere and earnest musician.

The two deliciously impressionistic sketches by Debussy were played last year by the New York Symphony orchestra and were then, as they are now, found of remarkable charm and originality. Dubussy in the "Nuages" has found new and subtle expression for a mood that is as intangible as the gray aspect of nature with which he has connected it, vague in outline but unmistakable in spirit; scarcely more than a vaporous exhalation of tone. The "Fêtes" conveys a more definite picture, but here, too, the suggestion is one of mood, of fantasy, of vague, confused impressions of fantastic and thickly crowding glimpses. Slight as these pieces are, they help to strengthen the belief that Debussy is head and shoulders above his fellows in this movement as regards sheer imagination, spontaneity and originality, and as well in the ingenuity that has given him command of new resources of musical technique.

The funeral dirge of Magnard might well have been spared; it is extremely long and without special significance to the audience that heard it, however heartfelt may be the expression in it of personal loss, and it was as a weight upon a none too enlivening programme.

Mr. d'Indy's "Istai" variations, which closed the concert, are a work of considerably less forbidding mien than his symphony. They are based on an original idea most skillfully carried out, and though they are programme music they are of the higher and more poetic purpose that permits enjoyment of them as music without a laborious following of their poetical basis. The musical idea is a most striking embodiment of the suggestion of the poem, a world-old story from Babylonian mythology; the theme at the basis of the variations is not proclaimed till the end, after the series of variations that represent the successive despoilings of Istai's ornaments and raiments on her journey to the nether world. And as Istai stands forth in her nudity, at last the theme is given out unadorned. We do not suppose that many were able accurately to distinguish the tiara from the pendants or the girdle, as their removal was successively set forth in the music. Nor was it necessary. The main thing was that the music was of imagination, expressiveness, and beauty.

om

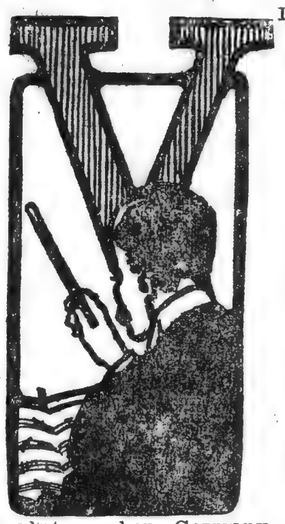
ldress

te

MUSIC

NATIONAL MUSIC S... A FEATURE OF ...

By Edward Ziegler.



VINCENT D'INDY is the sixth of the list of celebrated composers who have been persuaded to visit this country during the past decade and a half. His visit is one of decided importance, and differs in nature from that of any of the other famous men who have been incited to come actively to these alleged unmusical shores.

Peter Iljitsch Tschaikowsky was probably the first composer of very great importance to visit America—although students of music history recall that Wagner had tempting offers made him to settle in this wide country when Germany was turning the musical and political cold shoulder toward the sensitive Richard. Wagner at that time considered the offers, but it must have been with shudders at the idea of going into a barbaric wilderness where he would have to forego his personal comforts, of which he was something of a slave, and where he would find music appreciation in a primitive state. So Wagner declined the offer.

Tschaikowsky came to New York to grace and dignify the opening of Carnegie Hall. During his stay in this land he visited some points other than New York and conducted. Some interesting allusions to this visit are contained in the biography of this famous Russan composer, which has so lately been compiled by his brother, Modest Tschaikowsky.

Antonin Dvorak, now also numbered among the departed ones, was the second of the list, and he came to New York to lend his artistic services to a native Conservatory of Music. Beyond this he also recorded the impressions of his stay in this country by the beloved symphony, "From the New World," and by some numbers in the form of quartets, known to music lovers as "negro" quartets by Dvorak, for here the composer has succeeded in including some of the melodic and rhythmic peculiarities of the musical American negroes.

Richard Strauss was the third composer induced to visit this country. He came to conduct his own compositions and was accompanied by his wife, who came to sing her husband's songs in concert and recital. The details of this visit are still too vivid in the minds of those who mourned at the departure from artistic lines this musician chose during his sojourn in New York.

Felix Weingartner was invited to this country by the New York Philharmonic Society to conduct this orchestra, just as were other foreign conductors of fame, such as the Frenchman Colonne, the Russian Safonoff, the Dutchman Mengelberg and several Germans, principal among which was Weingartner. But Felix Weingartner is also to be reckoned with the prominent composers among living men, as he with scant justice hardly can be classed solely among the list of conductors.

Engelbert Humperdinck was the next in order to come to New York, and his visit had no obvious purpose as far as any one could see. He attended the rehearsals of his opera "Haensel und Gretel," gladly shook the hand of various persons concerned in the production, even conducted a few of his own compositions at a Sunday night concert, was the guest of honor at a banquet, and incidentally visited Niagara Falls. Mr. Humperdinck's modesty of performance may possibly be attributed to the fact that he has grown quite hard of hearing. He expressed great satisfaction at the performance of "Haensel und Gretel" at the Metropolitan Opera-House, which is probably what every composer says about any production of any of his works at any place.

And the sixth musician of note to visit us in Vincent d'Indy, who has been invited by the controlling spirit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to conduct this orchestra during a series of concerts. It is the first time that the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra has departed radically from its scheme of artistic conservatism.

* * *

Vincent d'Indy's compositions are not unknown in this country. They represent the modern French school with its love for color and its mystic hints at tragedy and action rather than a brutal expression of the incident itself. But it is not alone to put his own best composing foot forward that d'Indy has come to this country since he has conducted but a few works that have come from his own pen, devoting himself rather to compositions by his fellow countrymen, such as Faure, Chausson and Magnard. Thus New York music-lovers have been allowed to hear notable modern French works conducted by one who ought to be a bearer of tradition—just as it has heard Russian music under Russians and German music under the batons from eminent German conductors. It is rapidly becoming an age of specialty—even in music.

* * *

[124]

ldress

MR. D'INDY LEADS BOSTON ORCHESTRA

...rk, 1884

Again Interprets a Programme Consisting Wholly of Music by Modern French Composers.

PROVES HARD TO FOLLOW

Large Audience on Hand in Carnegie Hall to Greet the Visitor, but Applause is Lukewarm.

Mr. Vincent d'Indy was again the conductor by special arrangement at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's second matinée concert in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon, the programme, like that of Thursday night, consisting wholly of music by modern French composers.

The occasion thus provided another exceptional opportunity to study present day French music under an authoritative interpreter, and there was a large audience on hand to take advantage of it.

It must be confessed, however, that the afternoon's entertainment, save to students and to some impressionists in "cranks' ally," proved dull. Even so cultivated a body of listeners as the Boston Orchestra's clientèle found it difficult to maintain the mental attitude of strained attention demanded by the programme, and the applause was, as a consequence, lukewarm.

The works presented were a symphony by Ernest Chausson in B flat, opus 20, new here; Cesar Frank's "Psyché et Eros"; Claude Debussy's two nocturnes, "Nuages" and "Fêtes"; a "Dirge" by Alberic Magnard, and Mr. D'Indy's "Istar" variations, also a local novelty. There was again no soloist.

Judged by these compositions the modern French school would seem to have forsaken all beaten paths and to be bent on a long voyage of discovery into the musical unknown. One mere man in the audience put the case in pithy phrase when he remarked that "there wasn't a tune you could hang your hat on." There wasn't. The Chausson symphony was a typical case. It had pleasing details now and then, but these were put together, so to speak, into a sort of musical mosaic, vaguely colored and without design.

Of all the programme's numbers the most striking were the two little Debussy nocturnes, particularly the first "Nuages," with its weird instrumentation and weirder harmonies.

Mr. D'Indy obtained somewhat more finish for his readings than on Thursday night, but there was lacking much of the orchestra's usual polish.

...ILLUSTRATED ... AXPRESS

om

ldress

te DEC 10 1905

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Convention Hall, on Monday evening, February 19th. For the orchestra to come to Buffalo for a single concert is an undertaking of greatest difficulty. When it gave a concert here in October, it made Buffalo one of several cities visited on its fall tour, but in February it will make a special trip here. To carry such a large organization so far—for the Boston Symphony Orchestra takes with it on its trips as many men as the other orchestras use in their home cities—is a most expensive operation and has been made possible only by the liberality of the music-loving men and women of Buffalo, who are primarily responsible for the concerts. If Mr. Gericke and the management believed that justice could be done to the orchestra and to the works performed by less than 75 players, the Boston Orchestra could give many more concerts in cities distant from Boston; but it is believed by them that 75 is the smallest number that can be used in a symphony concert. It is likely that the programme which Mr. Gericke will arrange for this city will call for 80 or 85 men.

This week the orchestra is on the second of its regular monthly trips to New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington, and has as its guest, Conductor Vincent d'Indy, the great French composer. M. d'Indy spoke thus, after his first hearing of the orchestra:

"I did not believe it possible that there could be a more beautiful orchestra than the Philharmonic of Vienna, but this is greater. Such equisite woodwinds, wonderful and brilliant strings! The searching beauty of the string choirs quite surpasses anything I have ever heard. There is nothing in Europe to equal it."

Another tribute to the Boston Symphony Orchestra was paid by Willem Mengelberg of the Amsterdam Concertgebouw Orchestra, who said that there was absolutely no orchestra in Europe which was its equal. Its superb tonal beauty and its astonishing virtuosity had been a revelation to him.

Applications for seats for the concert on February 19th may be made now to Mrs. Mai Davis Smith, No. 26 Irving place. The programme and soloists of the concert will be announced in the very near future.

MUSIC NOTES.

The two forthcoming concerts of the Boston Orchestra will give in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon of this week can be considered in some respects as the most interesting which this organization has ever given locally. At both of them the conductor will be Mr. Vincent d'Indy, a distinguished French composer, who has come to America at the invitation of Colonel Higginson to conduct a series of concerts of modern French music.

At Thursday evening's concert the only novelty will be Mr. d'Indy's own "Sauge Fleurie," a "Legende," after a story by Robert de Bonnieres.

In pursuance of plans formulated last winter, the Musurgia Society, for many years one of the two leading male singing societies of New York, has doubled its membership by adding over sixty women's voices. It will make its formal début as a mixed chorus in Carnegie Hall on Wednesday evening.

Mr. Walter Henry Hall, the society's conductor, presents an admirable programme, the most important feature of which is Liszt's "St. Elizabeth." Mme. Isabel Bouton, soprano, and Mr. Claude Cunningham and Mr. Eric V. Goodwin, bassos, are the soloists. A large orchestra, with Mr. Gustav Dannreuther as concert master, will provide the accompaniments.

NEW YORK STAATS-ZEITUNG

DEC 10 1905

Abermals d'Indy.

Auch das vierte Konzert des Bostoner Symphonieorchesters, das gestern Nachmittag in Carnegie Hall stattfand, wurde von Vincent d'Indy dirigirt. Es muß wohl verstanden werden, daß d'Indy die Einladung, Amerika's bestes Orchester zu dirigiren, nicht seinen Kapellmeistereigenschaften, sondern seiner Reputation als Komponist verdankt. Als Dirigent ist von ihm zu sagen, daß er das Orchester wie ein ernster, tüchtiger Musiker anführt, der aus dem Kapellmeistern keinen Sonderberuf gemacht hat. Was d'Indy als Interpret anderer Kompositionen leisten würde, läßt sich natürlich nicht feststellen, aber daß er seine eigenen Werke und diejenigen seiner engeren französischen Kollegen mit Autorität vorzuführen vermag, braucht wohl kaum noch erörtert zu werden.

Auf dem gestrigen Programm trat übrigens d'Indy als Komponist bescheiden in den Hintergrund: nur die Schlußnummer gehörte ihm, nämlich die symphonischen Variationen „Istar". Unser Publikum hatte sie schon vor sechs Jahren vom Bostoner Orchester gehört, und gestern wird es wohl in der Ansicht bestärkt worden sein, daß „Istar" das zugänglichste und erfreulichste von d'Indy's Werken ist. Die Komposition ist nicht in eigentlicher strenger Variationenform gehalten und hat zudem die Besonderheit, daß das Hauptthema erst zum Schluß in voller Breite erscheint. Nimmt man „Istar" als Programmmusik, so wird man der Detailmalerei unzweifelhaft sehr verschiedene Bedeutung geben können. Aber es ist ganz wohl möglich, sich dabei etwas Orientalisch-Fabelhaftes zu denken, auch wenn's nicht gerade die Höllenfahrt der Istar sein mag. Das Ganze hat viel mehr inneren Zusammenhang und überzeugendere Motivirung, als d'Indy's zweite Symphonie, und dem krankhaften Drang, selbst ein ganz kurzes Verweilen in derselben Tonalität ängstlich zu vermeiden, wird darin nicht so fanatisch gefröhnt. Es ist also ein Werk, dem man Interesse abgewinnen kann. Würde d'Indy auf dieser programmmusikalischen Bahn weiter wandeln, ohne sich die Mission zuzuertheilen, als Bahnbrecher zu wirken, dann würde sein kompositorisches Schaffen nicht auch diejenigen zum Widerspruch reizen, die selbst voran wollen und allemal bereit sind, gegen konservative Stagnation zu protestiren.

Das Hauptstück des gestrigen Programms war eine Symphonie des verstorbenen Ernest Chausson, von dem man hier außer seiner „Viviane" kaum irgendwelche Orchestermusik kennt. Chausson ist nicht so hartnäckig auf Dissonanzen erpicht gewesen, wie der gegenwärtige Vincent d'Indy. Ob er, hätte ihn ein allzu früher Tod nicht vor sechs Jahren hinweggerafft, mittlerweile auch zu d'Indy'schen Extremen gegangen wäre, wer kann das sagen? Er hatte viel Talent, sein Streben aber ging offenbar noch über sein Können hinaus. Seine Erfindungs- und Gestaltungskraft war seinem Wollen nicht ebenbürtig, und daher befriedigt er da am wenigsten, wo er sich am größten geben will. Von den drei Sätzen der Symphonie ist der zweite, langsame, vielleicht der erfreulichste, denn er hält eine besondere Stimmung mit interessanten Mitteln fest. Die Symphonie könnte übrigens ganz gut eine gelegentliche Wiederholung im New Yorker Konzertsaal vertragen.

Darnach kam der Lehrer d'Indy's und Chausson's, César Franck, mit einem Abschnitt aus seiner symphonischen Dichtung „Psyche und Amor" zu Gehör, und wenn das nun auch keineswegs das beste war, was er geschrieben, so stellte es doch die Arbeiten seiner beiden Schüler ganz gewaltig in den Schatten.

Ein geradezu unmögliches Stück ist aber der Todtengesang von Alberic Magnard; er ist von einer solch' absurden Langweiligkeit, daß er ohne Frage Scheintodte ganz todt machen würde. Lebendige Leute aber schläfert er ein, weshalb er als eine endlose Berceuse in Moll bezeichnet werden sollte.

Die beiden Orchesternocturnes von Debussy, die Walter Damrosch uns im vorigen Winter zum ersten Male vorführte, vervollständigten das Programm und waren ein Lichtpunkt darin.

Beethoven's "Missa solemnis".

Die Oratorien-Gesellschaft hatte sich gestern Abend zu löblichem Thun aufgerafft und vermehrte die wenigen Aufführungen, die Beethoven's große Messe in diesem Lande erfahren, um eine. Ob dadurch dem Werke viele neue Bewunderer gewonnen worden sind, ist aber eine Frage, die man nicht mit einem hoffnungsvollen Ja beantworten kann. Zunächst war Carnegie Hall nur ziemlich schlecht besucht, mithin konnten keine Tausende von Herzen gewonnen werden. Es muß Einem also klar werden, daß unser Publikum eine Abneigung nicht nur gegen neue, sondern überhaupt gegen alle Oratorien hat; ausgenommen natürlich gegen jenes eine, den Händel'schen „Messias", dessen Aufführung abzusitzen es zur Weihnachtszeit für seine religiöse Pflicht hält. Wie man es anfangen soll, diese Apathie zu bannen, ist geradezu unerfindlich. Frank Damrosch und seine Oratoriengesellschaft geben sich unzweifelhaft große Mühe, in den Oratorien-Aufführungen Gutes darzubieten, und in den weitaus meisten Fällen gelingt ihnen das auch, aber seit Jahren finden sie nicht das geringste Entgegenkommen. Es ist nur zu verwundern, daß sie nicht den Muth verlieren. Beethoven's Messe war in dreiundzwanzig Jahren hier nicht gehört worden, also eine ganze Generation muß herangewachsen sein, die kein Verlangen darnach hat, ein Werk kennen zu lernen, das Beethoven selbst für sein größtes hielt.

Allerdings steht der Komponist mit dieser Annahme wohl vereinzelt da, denn trotz alle dem eigenartig-Schönen, dem man in der Messe begegnet, wird es wohl kaum einen Beethoven-Kenner geben, der das Ganze als die Krone des Beethoven'schen Schaffens betrachtet. Diese Messe war Beethoven's Schmerzenskind, daraus erklärt sich seine Liebe zu dem Werke. Daß ihm der Gedanke an die Komposition einer Messe immerhin erst auf Umwegen kommen mußte, wird jedem einleuchten, der seinen Charakter und seinen Lebensgang studirt hat. Wohl besaß er viel fromme Einfalt, aber Kirchlichkeit lag ihm sehr fern. Natürlich wollte und mußte er eine Messe schreiben, die ganz anders war, als irgend ein anderer sie hätte schreiben können. Alle seine theoretische Bewunderung für Cherubini und dessen Requiem gingen bei der Komposition der D-dur Messe praktisch in die Brüche.

Und die Absonderlichkeiten der Messe sind so groß, daß selbst eine ideale Aufführung sie dem Durchschnitts-Zuhörer nicht mundgerecht machen kann. Woher sollen also die neuen Bewunderer kommen? Es verdient erwähnt zu werden, daß auch in Deutschland die Aufführungen der D-dur Messe recht selten sind.

Die gestrige Aufführung aber hatte neben manchen Licht- auch erhebliche Schattenseiten. So lassen sich kaum alle Tempi, die Herr Damrosch nahm, rechtfertigen. Zum Schluß der „Gloria" muthete er seinen Sängern, dem Chor wie den Solisten, eine beinahe unmögliche Geschwindigkeit zu. Aus jenem „Pocopiu Allegro" wurde ein Presto, und aus dem späteren Presto ein Prestissimo. Und dazu kommt nun noch, daß Beethoven, wie männiglich bekannt, nicht gerade „sanglich" zu schreiben pflegte, daß er in dieser Messe den Sopranen eine förmlich unmenschliche Höhe zumuthet.

Indessen, der Chor hielt sich überraschend tapfer, und selbst die ausgehaltenen, höchsten Töne bekamen nur selten den Beiklang des Gequälten. Auch setzte der Chor unverkennbare Begeisterung für seine Aufgabe ein. Nicht so gut war es mit dem Soloquartett bestellt; die Sopranistin, Fräulein Ada Chambers, muß leider als gänzlich ungenügend bezeichnet werden. Besseres leisteten die Altistin Janet Spencer und der Tenorist van Hoose. Frank Croxton war der Bassist.

French Composer Conducts Boston Symphony Orchestra In His Own Pieces.

Concerts devoted to German music and to that of Russian composers, are comparatively frequent in New York, but a whole programme given over to the production of French compositions is a novelty. Last night's programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was not only given to French music alone, but it had a further attraction in that a Frenchman held the baton.

The fever of importing foreign conductors as "guests" has hitherto been confined principally to the Philharmonic Society, but now the desire for new faces and for new batonic angles seems to have spread to Boston, for Vincent d'Indy was invited to come to this country and conduct that famous orchestra in a series of performances.

That d'Indy is known to music lovers in this country by several of his compositions and it is most likely that the impression of those will outlive those made by him as a conductor, He seemed to be at pains not to exert little of his personality upon the men of the orchestra. The men played superbly well—but they did it nine times out of ten. D'Indy conducted his score persistently, even in his own compositions, and then beat time without any especial mannerisms and without any remarkable results.

The programme last night contained two works of this Frenchman's works, the Symphony and his "Sangfleurie" and a novelty.

The symphony has been heard here before, when it created the impression of highly artificial music, lacking in inspiration and being fragmentary to the point of boredom. It was hoped that the work under the composer's baton might arouse new interest, but in this it failed. It is cleverly orchestrated with frequent resources to display instruments whose ugliness seems to be used because of the lack of a musical scheme to knit it into a logical whole. The "Sangfleurie" is more melodious and much more enjoyable.

Of these two numbers d'Indy conducted from Faure's incidental music to Maeterlinck's "Pelleas et Melisande." This music is full of delightful moments, but its place is rightly in the theatre, when it should be in connection with the play.

The programme's final number was Dukas's "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," a delightful work was well played, and thus renewed the impression made by an earlier hearing. The playing of the orchestra was superb.

As there was no soloist, the only other departure from the routine of the Boston Symphony was the audience was not at all demonstratively

---

[125]

Press-Dec 8

D'Indy Directs Boston Orchestra.

Vincent D'Indy's first appearance in New York last night in Carnegie Hall, as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, proved somewhat disappointing; and so did the programme of modern French music he offered. This is a disagreeable thing to say, for D'Indy is a man of great distinction and of fine artistic accomplishments, and we should prefer to give a right royal welcome to him. But truth compels the statement that last night's auditors found little to move or elate them either in D'Indy's directorial powers or in his compositions. Indeed, Gabriel Faure's suite, "Pelleas et Melisande," a work of small significance, evoked more enthusiasm than any other contribution of the evening.

It is not surprising, perhaps, that the eminent stranger caused little excitement at the conductor's desk. He is an exceedingly serious man; modest and retiring, too. Moreover, he does not pose as a "star" of the baton. In fact, he refused last night to acknowledge even with a slight inclination of the head any applause save that which he believed was offered to him in the capacity of a composer. Yet D'Indy is no mean conductor, if he does seem somewhat stilted in his movements, for he kept his men well in hand, and his interpretations were conceived admirably and executed finely.

As a composer he is not unknown in New York. His Symphony in B flat, opus 57, which opened the concert, was played here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Gericke on January 12 last, the work having had its first performance in America by the Philadelphia orchestra shortly before that date; and the list of his other works which have come to a hearing is not small.

The second hearing of D'Indy's symphony, though it gave better insight into its various intricacies, confirmed one's first impressions. It is a symphony without programme only in name. As a fact it would bear literary elucidation fully as well as any of Strauss's tone-poems, and, to our way of thinking, stands more in need of it.

D'Indy is a brilliant composer. He has at his finger's ends all the resources of orchestration, harmonic coloring and contrapuntal broidery known to the modern musical world. At the same time he avoids the cacophony of a Strauss, even the exaggerations of a Debussy. But we can discover in his work no suggestion of real originality and individuality of expression. In his opus 57 the musical idiom is largely taken from Wagner and Liszt, with a tincture of the modern French and Belgian schools, showing many of those little tricks that to the unaccustomed ear seem strangely haunting and effective, but on closer inspection appear hollow, grotesque and superficially ornamental. D'Indy is a poet and a thinker; but nature did not make him a genius. He is a sort of French Weingartner.

His "Saugefleurie" was heard for the first time last night, but made no deep impression. It shows the influence of Wagner clearly. The opening bars are closely akin to the "Good Friday" music from "Parsifal." Faure's Suite, "Pelleas et Melisande," is nothing more than a chain of pretty salon pieces. Compared with this composition D'Indy's music is of gigantic power.

Paul Lukas's clever and effective Scherzo, "L'Apprenti Sorcier," brought the concert to an end. It was performed admirably, as indeed was every number on the programme. The programme of to-morrow afternoon's concert, which D'Indy also will conduct, comprises Ernest Chausson's Symphony in B flat, opus 20; "Psyche et Eros," from Cesar Franck's symphonic poem, "Psyche"; two Nocturnes by Debussy—"Nuages" and "Fetes"; Alberic Magnard's "Chant Funebre," and D'Indy's symphonic variations, "Istar."

Herald Dec 3

MUSIC NOTES.

THE two forthcoming concerts which the Boston Orchestra will give in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon of this week can be considered in some respects as the most interesting which this organization has ever given locally. At both of them the conductor will be Mr. Vincent d'Indy, a distinguished French composer, who has come to America at the invitation of Colonel Higginson to conduct a series of concerts of modern French music.

At Thursday evening's concert the only novelty will be Mr. d'Indy's own "Sauge Fleurie," a "Legende," after a story by Robert de Bonnieres.

In pursuance of plans formulated last winter, the Musurgia Society, for many years one of the two leading male singing societies of New York, has doubled its membership by adding over sixty women's voices. It will make its formal début as a mixed chorus in Carnegie Hall on Wednesday evening.

Mr. Walter Henry Hall, the society's conductor, presents an admirable programme, the most important feature of which is Liszt's "St. Elizabeth." Mme. Isabel Bouton, soprano, and Mr. Claude Cunningham and Mr. Eric V. Goodwin, bassos, are the soloists. A large orchestra, with Mr. Gustav Dannreuther as concert master, will provide the accompaniments.

NEW YORK STAATS-ZEITUNG

Dec 8

Abermals d'Indy.

Auch das vierte Konzert des Bostoner Symphonieorchesters, das gestern Nachmittag in Carnegie Hall stattfand, wurde von Vincent d'Indy dirigirt. Es muß wohl verstanden werden, daß d'Indy die Einladung, Amerika's bestes Orchester zu dirigiren, nicht seinen Kapellmeistereigenschaften, sondern seiner Reputation als Komponist verdankt. Als Dirigent ist von ihm zu sagen, daß er das Orchester wie ein ernster, tüchtiger Musiker anführt, der aus dem Kapellmeistern keinen Sonderberuf gemacht hat. Was d'Indy als Interpret anderer Kompositionen leisten würde, läßt sich natürlich nicht feststellen, aber daß er seine eigenen Werke und diejenigen seiner engeren französischen Kollegen mit Autorität vorzuführen vermag, braucht wohl kaum noch erörtert zu werden.

Auf dem gestrigen Programm trat übrigens d'Indy als Komponist bescheiden in den Hintergrund: nur die Schlußnummer gehörte ihm, nämlich die symphonischen Variationen „Istar". Unser Publikum hatte sie schon vor sechs Jahren vom Bostoner Orchester gehört, und gestern wird es wohl in der Ansicht bestärkt worden sein, daß „Istar" das zugänglichste und erfreulichste von d'Indy's Werken ist. Die Komposition ist nicht in eigentlicher strenger Variationenform gehalten und hat zudem die Besonderheit, daß das Hauptthema erst zum Schluß in voller Breite erscheint. Nimmt man „Istar" als Programmmusik, so wird man der Detailmalerei unzweifelhaft sehr verschiedene Bedeutung geben können. Aber es ist ganz wohl möglich, sich dabei etwas Orientalisch-Fabelhaftes zu denken, auch wenn's nicht gerade die Höllenfahrt der Istar sein mag. Das Ganze hat viel mehr inneren Zusammenhang und überzeugendere Motivirung, als d'Indy's zweite Symphonie, und dem krankhaften Drang, selbst ein ganz kurzes Verweilen in derselben Tonalität ängstlich zu vermeiden, wird darin nicht so fanatisch gefröhnt. Es ist also ein Werk, dem man Interesse abgewinnen kann. Würde d'Indy auf dieser programmmusikalischen Bahn weiter wandeln, ohne sich die Mission zuzuertheilen, als Bahnbrecher zu wirken, dann würde sein kompositorisches Schaffen nicht auch diejenigen zum Widerspruch reizen, die selbst voran wollen und allemal bereit sind, gegen konservative Stagnation zu protestiren.

Das Hauptstück des gestrigen Programms war eine Symphonie des verstorbenen Ernest Chausson, von dem man hier außer seiner „Viviane" kaum irgendwelche Orchestermusik kennt. Chausson ist nicht so hartnäckig auf Dissonanzen erpicht gewesen, wie der gegenwärtige Vincent d'Indy. Ob er, hätte ihn ein allzu früher Tod nicht vor sechs Jahren hinweggerafft, mittlerweile auch zu d'Indy'schen Extremen gegangen wäre, wer kann das sagen? Er hatte viel Talent, sein Streben aber ging offenbar noch über sein Können hinaus. Seine Erfindungs- und Gestaltungskraft war seinem Wollen nicht ebenbürtig, und daher befriedigt er da am wenigsten, wo er sich am größten geben will. Von den drei Sätzen der Symphonie ist der zweite, langsame, vielleicht der erfreulichste, denn er hält eine besondere Stimmung mit interessanten Mitteln fest. Die Symphonie könnte übrigens ganz gut eine gelegentliche Wiederholung im New Yorker Konzertsaal vertragen.

Darnach kam der Lehrer d'Indy's und Chausson's, César Franck, mit einem Abschnitt aus seiner symphonischen Dichtung „Psyche und Amor" zu Gehör, und wenn das nun auch keineswegs das beste war, was er geschrieben, so stellte es doch die Arbeiten seiner beiden Schüler ganz gewaltig in den Schatten.

Ein geradezu unmögliches Stück ist aber der Todtengesang von Alberic Magnard; er ist von einer solch' absurden Langweiligkeit, daß er ohne Frage Scheintodte ganz todt machen würde. Lebendige Leute aber schläfert er ein, weshalb er als eine endlose Berceuse in Moll bezeichnet werden sollte.

Die beiden Orchesternocturnes von Debussy, die Walter Damrosch uns im vorigen Winter zum ersten Male vorführte, vervollständigten das Programm und waren ein Lichtpunkt darin.

Beethoven's "Missa solemnis".

Die Oratorien-Gesellschaft hatte sich gestern Abend zu löblichem Thun aufgerafft und vermehrte die wenigen Aufführungen, die Beethoven's große Messe in diesem Lande erfahren, um eine. Ob dadurch dem Werke viele neue Bewunderer gewonnen worden sind, ist aber eine Frage, die man nicht mit einem hoffnungsvollen Ja beantworten kann. Zunächst war Carnegie Hall nur ziemlich schlecht besucht, mithin konnten keine Tausende von Herzen gewonnen werden. Es muß Einem also klar werden, daß unser Publikum eine Abneigung nicht nur gegen neue, sondern überhaupt gegen alle Oratorien hat; ausgenommen natürlich gegen jenes eine, den Händel'schen „Messias", dessen Aufführung abzusitzen es zur Weihnachtszeit für seine religiöse Pflicht hält. Wie man es anfangen soll, diese Apathie zu bannen, ist geradezu unerfindlich. Frank Damrosch und seine Oratoriengesellschaft geben sich unzweifelhaft große Mühe, in den Oratorien-Aufführungen Gutes darzubieten, und in den weitaus meisten Fällen gelingt ihnen das auch, aber seit Jahren finden sie nicht das geringste Entgegenkommen. Es ist nur zu verwundern, daß sie nicht den Muth verlieren. Beethoven's Messe war in dreiundzwanzig Jahren hier nicht gehört worden, also eine ganze Generation muß herangewachsen sein, die kein Verlangen darnach hat, ein Werk kennen zu lernen, das Beethoven selbst für sein größtes hielt.

Allerdings steht der Komponist mit dieser Annahme wohl vereinzelt da, denn trotz alle dem eigenartig-Schönen, dem man in der Messe begegnet, wird es wohl kaum einen Beethoven-Kenner geben, der das Ganze als die Krone des Beethoven'schen Schaffens betrachtet. Diese Messe war Beethoven's Schmerzenskind, daraus erklärt sich seine Liebe zu dem Werke. Daß ihm der Gedanke an die Komposition einer Messe immerhin erst auf Umwegen kommen mußte, wird jedem einleuchten, der seinen Charakter und seinen Lebensgang studirt hat. Wohl besaß er viel fromme Einfalt, aber Kirchlichkeit lag ihm sehr fern. Natürlich wollte und mußte er eine Messe schreiben, die ganz anders war, als irgend ein anderer sie hätte schreiben können. Alle seine theoretische Bewunderung für Cherubini und dessen Requiem gingen bei der Komposition der D-dur Messe praktisch in die Brüche.

Und die Absonderlichkeiten der Messe sind so groß, daß selbst eine ideale Aufführung sie dem Durchschnitts-Zuhörer nicht mundgerecht machen kann. Woher sollen also die neuen Bewunderer kommen? Es verdient erwähnt zu werden, daß auch in Deutschland die Aufführungen der D-dur Messe recht selten sind.

Die gestrige Aufführung aber hatte neben manchen Licht- auch erhebliche Schattenseiten. So lassen sich kaum alle Tempi, die Herr Damrosch nahm, rechtfertigen. Zum Schluß der „Gloria" muthete er seinen Sängern, dem Chor wie den Solisten, eine beinahe unmögliche Geschwindigkeit zu. Aus jenem „Pocopiu Allegro" wurde ein Presto, und aus dem späteren Presto ein Prestissimo. Und dazu kommt nun noch, daß Beethoven, wie männiglich bekannt, nicht gerade „sanglich" zu schreiben pflegte, daß er in dieser Messe den Sopranen eine förmlich unmenschliche Höhe zumuthet.

Indessen, der Chor hielt sich überraschend tapfer, und selbst die ausgehaltenen höchsten Töne bekamen nur selten den Beiklang des Gequälten. Auch setzte der Chor unverkennbare Begeisterung für seine Aufgabe ein. Nicht so gut war es mit dem Soloquartett bestellt; die Sopranistin, Fräulein Ada Chambers, muß leider als gänzlich ungenügend bezeichnet werden. Besseres leisteten die Altistin Janet Spencer und der Tenorist van Hoose. Frank Croxton war der Bassist.

Abermals d'Indy.

Auch das vierte Konzert des Bostoner Symphonieorchesters, das gestern Nachmittag in Carnegie Hall stattfand, wurde von Vincent d'Indy dirigirt. Es muß wohl verstanden werden, daß d'Indy die Einladung, Amerika's bestes Orchester zu dirigiren, nicht seinen Kapellmeistereigenschaften, sondern seiner Reputation als Komponist verdankt. Als Dirigent ist von ihm zu sagen, daß er das Orchester wie ein ernster, tüchtiger Musiker anführt, der aus dem Kapellmeistern keinen Sonderberuf gemacht hat. Was d'Indy als Interpret anderer Kompositionen leisten würde, läßt sich natürlich nicht feststellen, aber daß er seine eigenen Werke und diejenigen seiner engeren französischen Kollegen mit Autorität vorzuführen vermag, braucht wohl kaum noch erörtert zu werden.

Auf dem gestrigen Programm trat übrigens d'Indy als Komponist bescheiden in den Hintergrund: nur die Schlußnummer gehörte ihm, nämlich die symphonischen Variationen „Istar". Unser Publikum hatte sie schon vor sechs Jahren vom Bostoner Orchester gehört, und gestern wird es wohl in der Ansicht bestärkt worden sein, daß „Istar" das zugänglichste und erfreulichste von d'Indy's Werken ist. Die Komposition ist nicht in eigentlicher strenger Variationenform gehalten und hat zudem die Besonderheit, daß das Hauptthema erst zum Schluß in voller Breite erscheint. Nimmt man „Istar" als Programmmusik, so wird man der Detailmalerei unzweifelhaft sehr verschiedene Bedeutung geben können. Aber es ist ganz wohl möglich, sich dabei etwas Orientalisch-Fabelhaftes zu denken, auch wenn's nicht gerade die Höllenfahrt der Istar sein mag. Das Ganze hat viel mehr inneren Zusammenhang und überzeugendere Motivirung, als d'Indy's zweite Symphonie, und dem krankhaften Drang, selbst ein ganz kurzes Verweilen in derselben Tonalität ängstlich zu vermeiden, wird darin nicht so fanatisch gefröhnt. Es ist also ein Werk, dem man Interesse abgewinnen kann. Würde d'Indy auf dieser programmmusikalischen Bahn weiter wandeln, ohne sich die Mission zuzuertheilen, als Bahnbrecher zu wirken, dann würde sein kompositorisches Schaffen nicht auch diejenigen zum Widerspruch reizen, die selbst voran wollen und allemal bereit sind, gegen konservative Stagnation zu protestiren.

Das Hauptstück des gestrigen Programms war eine Symphonie des verstorbenen Ernest Chausson, von dem man hier außer seiner „Viviane" kaum irgendwelche Orchestermusik kennt. Chausson ist nicht so hartnäckig auf Dissonanzen erpicht gewesen, wie der gegenwärtige Vincent d'Indy. Ob er, hätte ihn ein allzu früher Tod nicht vor sechs Jahren hinweggerafft, mittlerweile auch zu d'Indy'schen Extremen gegangen wäre, wer kann das sagen? Er hatte viel Talent, sein Streben aber ging offenbar noch über sein Können hinaus. Seine Erfindungs- und Gestaltungskraft war seinem Wollen nicht ebenbürtig, und daher befriedigt er da am wenigsten, wo er sich am größten geben will. Von den drei Sätzen der Symphonie ist der zweite, langsame, vielleicht der erfreulichste, denn er hält eine besondere Stimmung mit interessanten Mitteln fest. Die Symphonie könnte übrigens ganz gut eine gelegentliche Wiederholung im New Yorker Konzertsaal vertragen.

Darnach kam der Lehrer d'Indy's und Chausson's, César Franck, mit einem Abschnitt aus seiner symphonischen Dichtung „Psyche und Amor" zu Gehör, und wenn das nun auch keineswegs das beste war, was er geschrieben, so stellte es doch die Arbeiten seiner beiden Schüler ganz gewaltig in den Schatten.

Ein geradezu unmögliches Stück ist aber der Todtengesang von Alberic Magnard; er ist von einer solch' absurden Langweiligkeit, daß er ohne Frage Scheintodte ganz todt machen würde. Lebendige Leute aber schläfert er ein, weshalb er als eine endlose Berceuse in Moll bezeichnet werden sollte.

Die beiden Orchesternocturnes von Debussy, die Walter Damrosch uns im vorigen Winter zum ersten Male vorführte, vervollständigten das Programm und waren ein Lichtpunkt darin.

Worald 8

French Composer Conducts Boston Symphony Orchestra in His Own Pieces.

Concerts devoted to German music and to that of Russian composers, are comparatively frequent in New York, but a whole programme given over to the production of French compositions is a novelty. Last night's programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was not only given to French music alone, but it had a further attraction in that a Frenchman held the baton.

The fever of importing foreign conductors as "guests" has hitherto been confined principally to the Philharmonic Society, but now the desire for new faces and for new batonic angles seems to have spread to Boston, for Vincent d'Indy was invited to come to this country and conduct that famous orchestra for a series of performances.

D'Indy is known to music lovers in this country by several of his compositions, and it is most likely that the impression of these will outlive those made by d'Indy as a conductor. He seemed last night to exert little of his personality upon the men of the orchestra. The men played superbly well—but they do that nine times out of ten. D'Indy consulted his score persistently, even in his own compositions, and then beat time without any especial mannerisms or without any remarkable results.

The programme last night contained two of this Frenchman's works, the B-flat symphony and his "Sangfleurie" Legend. The symphony has been heard here before, when it created the impression of highly artificial music, lacking in inspiration and being fragmentary to a point of boredom. It was hoped that the work under the composer's baton might arouse new interest, but in this it failed. It is cleverly orchestrated, with frequent resources to dissonant effects whose ugliness seems meaningless because of the lack of a mighty sweep to knit it into a logical whole. The "Sangfleurie" is more modest music and much more enjoyable.

Beside these two numbers d'Indy conducted a suite from Faure's incidental music to Maeterlinck's "Pelleas et Mellissande." This music is full of delibérate color effects, but its place is rightly that of the theatre, when it should be heard in connection with the play.

The programme's final number was Dukas's Scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," which delightful work was stunningly played, and thus renewed the impressions made by an earlier hearing. The work of the orchestra was well nigh flawless.

At this concert there was no soloist, which fact was another departure from the conventional scheme of the Boston Symphony concerts. The audience was moderately large, and not excessively

[125]

Musikalische Angelegenheiten.

Man würde zu viel behaupten, wenn man sagen wollte, daß die verflossene musikalische Woche im Zeichen d'Indy's gestanden, denn es haben sich zwar viele New Yorker während der letzten sieben Tage an Musik, aber an d'Indy ganz und gar nicht erbaut. Wohl aber wird man einzuräumen haben, daß d'Indy's Anwesenheit und die Vorführung einiger seiner Kompositionen das musikalische Ereignis der Woche waren. Wer an übermäßigem Widerspruchsgeist leidet, wird das vielleicht bestreiten und meinen, es sei vielmehr das unmusikalischste Ereignis gewesen, das New York seit langem betroffen habe. Das Unglück aber ist, daß man einem solchen Widersprecher nicht einmal ganz unrecht geben könnte. Während es Niemandem einfallen kann, einem d'Indy Ernst, Vornehmheit der künstlerischen Gesinnung und musikalische Beschlagenheit in allen technischen Dingen abzusprechen, wird es unbefangenen Musikfreunden doch bis zur Unmöglichkeit schwer, seinem Streben ihren Segen zu ertheilen.

Es ist eine große und schöne Sache, wenn die französischen Komponisten daran gehen, sich von ihrer süßlichen Salon-Sentimentalität zu befreien. Aber es scheint, daß sie sich unwillkürlich auch der Spontaneität des Ausdrucks begeben, wenn sie sich von jenem Erbübel losreißen. Möglicherweise wäre Bizet der Regenerator der französischen Musik geworden, hätte er länger zu leben gehabt. Bei aller seiner Kraft und Originalität kam er eben doch nicht so weit, sich völlig von jenem Salonton zu emanzipiren. Berlioz hatte das vor ihm zwar schon gründlicher fertiggebracht, aber er ist, trotz all' der starken Wirkungen, die er erzielt, für die große musikalische Gemeinde in und außerhalb Frankreichs doch immer ein mit allzu starker Intellektualität behafteter Musiker geblieben. Von den Neueren ist César Franck die einzige große und ziemlich allgemein anerkannte. Erscheinung, der man Musik nachrühmen kann, die nicht auf Eleganz und Pikanterie fußt, sondern Eigenes, Bedeutendes und unmittelbar Empfundenes darbietet. Unter den Allerneuesten sticht Claude Debussy hervor, der eine Art von Hexenmeister zu sein scheint. Aber die paar Klavierstücke, Lieder, Orchestersätze und das Streichquartett von ihm, das den New Yorkern zu hören beschieden war, lassen noch kein abschließendes Urtheil über diesen interessantesten der heute komponirenden Franzosen aufkommen. Ob die Wunderdinge, die uns einige Enthusiasten über Debussy's Oper "Pelléas et Mélisande" erzählen, gerechte Urtheile oder leichtfertige Fabeleien sind: wer mag das entscheiden, bevor er mit eigenen Ohren gehört hat?

Vincent d'Indy aber ist wohl einer der geachtetsten der modernen Pariser Schule, aber er ist durchaus nicht ihr führender Geist. Als Schüler César Francks glaubt er in dessen Sinne an einer großen Mission weiter zu arbeiten und ein Pfadfinder zu sein, aber zum Ersatz dafür, daß ihm nichts Eignes aus dem Busen fließen will, versucht er in schwerer Arbeit Eignes zu konstruiren. Er möchte die Tonkunst vor den Irrungen bewahren, in die sie möglicher Weise — wenn nämlich die professionellen Kassandras männlichen Geschlechts, die konservativen Wehe-Rufer recht behalten sollten, — gerathen könnte, wenn nämlich das Princip der beschreibenden Musik mit Rücksichtslosigkeit zu Tode geritten wird. Den Formalisten aber möchte er gleichfalls die Erlösung von der tödlichen Langweiligkeit bringen, der die endlosen Wiederholungen desselben Formengebildes verfallen sind, eines Formengebildes, das neue Ideen eben so wenig zu halten vermag, wie alte Schläuche neuen Most. Wie thöricht ein solches Bestreben ist, muß jedem Unbefangenen, einerlei wie wohlwollend er ist, beim Anhören von d'Indy's zweiter Symphonie klar werden. Wenn es jemals dargethan wurde, daß Dissonanzen nur relativ und nicht absolut schmerzlich wirken, dann ist das in d'Indy's zweiter Symphonie geschehen. Man kann ungestraft die Tonalität derart durcheinander mengen, daß überhaupt von keiner Tonalität mehr zu sprechen ist, aber man muß dieses Gemengte dem Zuhörer unter einem Gesichtspunkt beibringen, der es als zweckentsprechend, das heißt als illusionsbefördernd erscheinen läßt. Ueberläßt man aber diese Dissonanzen sich selbst, sollen sie sich selbst rechtfertigen, dann wendet sich das Ohr enttäuscht und ermüdet ab.

D'Indy hat in manchen seiner früheren Arbeiten, in seinen Orchesterlegenden, wie zum Beispiel in derjenigen vom „verwunschenen Walde" (oder „verzauberten Forst") ebenfalls in kühnen Kombinationen geschwelgt, aber er ist da verständlich, und zum größeren Theile erfreulich geblieben. Er hatte zwar auch in seiner Programmusik niemals viel zu sagen, er ließ stets [illegible] und much[illegible] möchte doch wenigstens aller harmonischen [illegible]

---

Musik durch [illegible] rechtfertigen läßt, dann begeht er einen gefährlichen Irrthum. Wer ihn aus Höflichkeit, aus sogenanntem Wohlwollen, in dieser Bestrebung bestärkt, wird mit verantwortlich sein für alle die schweren Irrthümer, die d'Indy im Verfolg seines Princips noch begehen mag.

Man steht dem distinguirten Gast aus Paris, der bei dieser Gelegenheit zum ersten Male amerikanischen Boden betrat, (der aber nicht zu Barbaren kam, denn seine Kompositionen waren uns schon zum erklecklichen Theile bekannt,) mit gemischten Gefühlen gegenüber. Ohne Frage ist d'Indy ein vornehmer Musiker, der nicht nach dem großen Haufen fragt, der sich zum Höchsten durchringen möchte; aber die Sympathie, die man ihm darob zollt, darf nicht zu einer Verblendung über sein irriges Princip, und nicht zu einer freundlichen Täuschung über sein sehr bescheidenes Schaffenstalent führen. Gestern Nachmittag dirigirte übrigens Vincent d'Indy ein zweites Konzert des Bostoner Symphonieorchesters. Man findet darüber einen ausführlichen Bericht unter „Theater und Musik".

[illegible] Cutting Bureau in the World

[illegible] YORK WORLD

[illegible]

[illegible]

FRENCH MUSIC TIRESOME AT SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Conductor Vincent d'Indy Warmly Applauded, but His Work Seems Conventional.

Vincent d'Indy, the French composer, who is now in this country at the invitation of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, received a cablegram on Friday night that Mme. D'Indy, his wife, had suffered a stroke of paralysis. M. D'Indy was preparing to sail yesterday, but a later cablegram reassured him that his wife's condition was not necessarily serious, so he remained and conducted yesterday's matinee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall.

This concert was a mate to the one of Thursday night, the whole programme being again devoted to French music. It began with Ernest Chausson's Symphony, Op. 20, Cæsar Frank's "Psyche et Eros," Debussy's Two Nocturnes, "Nuages" and "Fetes," Magnard's "Chant Funebre" and D'Indy's "Istur." Again was there no soloist.

The concert was as a whole tiresome. It sat through an afternoon of music devoted to this French feast of dissonances is trying and exasperating. The Chausson Symphony was largely ineffective, and the Magnard composition was included on the programme possibly because Magnard is a pupil of D'Indy. The music sounded devoid of interest and notable merit. The two Debussy Nocturnes are gems of mood and color depicted in music.

The orchestra played exquisitely again and D'Indy's conducting was conventional. Evidently he was laboring under a stress of worriment over the news of his wife's illness. D'Indy was warmly applauded by a large audience.

THE SUN, SUNDAY,

DECEMBER 10, 1905.

FRANCO-BAVARIAN MUSIC.

SECOND APPEARANCE OF VINCENT D'INDY AS CONDUCTOR.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's Matinee Devoted to the Performance of Music of the Present French School—The Audience Extremely Polite, Indeed.

Vincent d'Indy, the eminent French composer, led the Boston Symphony Orchestra again yesterday afternoon through a programme of French music at Carnegie Hall. The public was most kind and assembled in goodly numbers in the auditorium, where it observed the proceedings with circumspect manifestations of joy and bestowed its chief blessing upon the conductor at the end of the concert. The compositions heard yesterday were the B flat symphony of Ernest Chausson, the "Psyche et Eros" episode from César Franck's symphonic poem, "Psyche," two nocturnes—"Nuages" and "Fetes"—by Debussy, a dirge by Alberic Magnard, and Mr. d'Indy's own symphonic variations, entitled "Istar."

The first two numbers on the list carried the audience into an atmosphere somewhat less charged with damp winds and threatening snow than that of the Thursday night's concert. Chausson, who was cut off by a bicycle accident at the age of 44, was a pupil of César Franck, and he showed the influence of his master, who was, perhaps, when all things are considered, the strongest of the later French composers.

But Chausson showed individuality in this symphony. The firmness of the instrumental texture and the sanity of the tonal scheme resemble the work of Franck, who was not afflicted with abnormal appetites for [illegible] harmonies and shattered phrases. Franck, too, was an in[illegible] and much of his inten-not the spirit of the Paris of to-day, but, in spite of all talk about breaking with the past, the spirit of old Paris, of the Faubourgs and of the historic avenues, perhaps of the city of François Villon. In their effort to embody this spirit the composers have wisely striven to tear themselves away from the popular dominance of such facile dabblers as Saint-Saëns and Gounod.

---

Time was when Saint-Saëns was deemed a great master in France, and the whole world of grown up children loves Gounod's perversion of Goethe. But these sad, glad, mad brethren of Villon will have none of this. If they had only some new and marvellous musical speech of their own to give us in its place we should hail them as pathfinders in the wilderness of a degenerate age.

Jean Marnold in an analysis of Debussy's nocturnes points out the fact that their tonal plan is wholly revolutionary. Heaven grant that this be true, for the world has labored too long under a delusion that before the days of 1900, when these etchings were made known, Richard Strauss produced "Also sprach Zarathustra," "Don Quixote" and "Ein Heldenleben," with the world, the flesh and the devil united for his tonic triad and a giant jewsharp for an orchestra.

Debussy has talent and his music is of the kind that makes men think, but he is of the Gallic school, for all that. He rises above its general level, but most of its product we must sadly confess is Wagner and claret, and a good deal of the claret is [illegible] at that.

[illegible] 5, DECEMBER

MR. D'INDY LEADS BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Again Interprets a Programme Consisting Wholly of Music by Modern French Composers.

PROVES HARD TO FOLLOW

Large Audience on Hand in Carnegie Hall to Greet the Visitor, but Applause Is Lukewarm.

Mr. Vincent d'Indy was again the conductor by special arrangement at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's second matinée concert in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon, the programme, like that of Thursday night, consisting wholly of music by modern French composers.

The occasion thus provided another exceptional opportunity to study present day French music under an authoritative interpreter, and there was a large audience on hand to take advantage of it.

It must be confessed, however, that the afternoon's entertainment, save to students and to some impressionists in "cranks' alley" proved dull. Even so cultivated a body of listeners as the Boston Orchestra's clientele found it difficult to maintain the mental attitude of strained attention demanded by the programme, and the applause was, as a consequence, lukewarm.

The works presented were a symphony by Ernest Chausson in B flat, opus 20, new here; Cesar Frank's "Psyché et Eros"; Claude Debussy's two nocturnes, "Nuages" and "Fêtes"; a "Dirge" by Alberic Magnard, and Mr. D'Indy's "Istar" variations, also a local novelty. There was again no soloist.

Judged by these compositions the modern French school would seem to have forsaken all beaten paths and to be bent on a long voyage of discovery into the musical unknown. One mere man in the audience put the case in pithy phrase when he remarked that "there wasn't a tune you could hang your hat on." There wasn't. The Chausson symphony was a typical case. It had pleasing details now and then, but these were put together, so to speak, into a sort of musical mosaic, vaguely colored and without design.

Of all the programme's numbers the most striking were the two little Debussy nocturnes, particularly the first "Nuages," with its weird instrumentation and weirder harmonies.

Mr. D'Indy obtained somewhat more finish for his readings than on Thursday night, but there was lacking much of the orchestra's usual polish.

TRANSCRIPT, TUESDAY,

DECEMBER 12, 1905

Potter Hall: D'Indy and the Longy Club

Mr. d'Indy took leave of us here in Boston yesterday, in the concert room, in a way that it will be good in future to remember. In compliment to him our Longy Club of French virtuosi were eager to play a programme of his chamber music for wind instruments. Out of compliment to them and to their brethren of our orchestra, he was as eager to join them at the piano. The little concert of yesterday afternoon brought the occasion, and a company of the musically and socially elect of the town filled the hall to listen in pleasant intimacy. The club played Mr. d'Indy's plaintive song and gayly tinted dances for wind choir. He himself accompanied Mr. Longy in a fantasia for oboe, in which the composer showed as delicate a feeling for the instrument as the virtuoso. Then for ending came the trio for piano, clarinet, and 'cello. Rich and fertile were the melodies of it. Rich and warm was the development. Feeling played through the music, now delicate, now deep, now light and gay—tempered feeling always, but feeling that was singularly pure. Design and delineation, imagination and execution were nearly perfectly fused. It was more human music than any of d'Indy's that we have heard in the last fortnight. For once we that listened forgot the mind that we have honored for the man that was like ourselves. There was sheer zest of life in him and in his music after all. H. T. P.

D'Indy at Harvard

In the lecture room of the Fogg Museum last evening at Harvard Mr. d'[illegible] gave the discourse upon his master C[illegible] Franck, that he has been so eager to deliver at least once during his visit to America. He has done the Transcript the honor to intrust his manuscript to it for translation and publication, and tomorrow the lecture will appear in full and for the first time in print in our columns. [illegible] while, as a part of the news of the [illegible] suffice it that Mr. d'Indy began with a brief summary of the main events of Franck's life, and of the musical influences that surrounded him, and that he passed, with intimate anecdote here and there, to Franck's traits as a teacher and as a man. He proceeded with [illegible] crimination and sympathetic understanding to speak of Franck's music and of the transforming qualities in it that made him the creator of the new French school and the inspiration of them that would continue it. Then Mr. d'Indy digressed to some larger aspects of modern music, and always illuminatingly. There was [illegible] lucidity in the lecture, and that [illegible] was the vehicle for the [illegible] brings [illegible] intellect to [illegible] d'Indy.

[126]

Fr. U.

Musikalische Angelegenheiten.

Man würde zu viel behaupten, wenn man sagen wollte, daß die verflossene musikalische Woche im Zeichen d'Indy's gestanden, denn es haben sich zwar viele New Yorker während der letzten sieben Tage an Musik, aber an d'Indy ganz und gar nicht erbaut. Wohl aber wird man einzuräumen haben, daß d'Indy's Anwesenheit und die Vorführung einiger seiner Kompositionen das musikalische Ereignis der Woche waren. Wer an übermäßigem Widerspruchsgeist leidet, wird das vielleicht bestreiten und meinen, es sei vielmehr das unmusikalischste Ereignis gewesen, das New York seit langem betroffen habe. Das Unglück aber ist, daß man einem solchen Widersprecher nicht einmal ganz unrecht geben könnte. Während es Niemandem einfallen kann, einem d'Indy Ernst, Vornehmheit der künstlerischen Gesinnung und musikalische Beschlagenheit in allen technischen Dingen abzusprechen, wird es unbefangenen Musikfreunden doch bis zur Unmöglichkeit schwer, seinem Streben ihren Segen zu ertheilen.

Es ist eine große und schöne Sache, wenn die französischen Komponisten daran gehen, sich von ihrer süßlichen Salon-Sentimentalität zu befreien. Aber es scheint, daß sie sich unwillkürlich auch der Spontaneität des Ausdrucks begeben, wenn sie sich von jenem Erbübel losreißen. Möglicherweise wäre Bizet der Regenerator der französischen Musik geworden, hätte er länger zu leben gehabt. Bei aller seiner Kraft und Originalität kam er eben doch nicht so weit, sich völlig von jenem Salonton zu emanzipiren. Berlioz hatte das vor ihm zwar schon gründlicher fertiggebracht, aber er ist, trotz all' der starken Wirkungen, die er erzielt, für die große musikalische Gemeinde in und außerhalb Frankreichs doch immer ein mit allzu starker Intellektualität behafteter Musiker geblieben. Von den Neueren ist César Franck die einzige große und ziemlich allgemein anerkannte Erscheinung, der man Musik nachrühmen kann, die nicht auf Eleganz und Pikanterie fußt, sondern Eigenes, Bedeutendes und unmittelbar Empfundenes darbietet. Unter den Allerneuesten sticht Claude Debussy hervor, der eine Art von Hexenmeister zu sein scheint. Aber die paar Klavierstücke, Lieder, Orchestersätze und das Streichquartett von ihm, das den New Yorkern zu hören beschieden war, lassen noch kein abschließendes Urtheil über diesen interessantesten der heute komponirenden Franzosen aufkommen. Ob die Wunderdinge, die uns einige Enthusiasten über Debussy's Oper "Pelléas et Mélisande" erzählen, gerechte Urtheile oder leichtfertige Fabeleien sind: wer mag das entscheiden, bevor er mit eigenen Ohren gehört hat?

Vincent d'Indy aber ist wohl einer der geachtetsten der modernen Pariser Schule, aber er ist durchaus nicht ihr führender Geist. Als Schüler César Francks glaubt er in dessen Sinne an einer großen Mission weiter zu arbeiten und ein Pfadfinder zu sein, aber zum Ersatz dafür, daß ihm nichts Eignes aus dem Busen fließen will, versucht er in schwerer Arbeit Eignes zu konstruiren. Er möchte die Tonkunst vor den Irrungen bewahren, in die sie möglicher Weise — wenn nämlich die professionellen Kassandras männlichen Geschlechts, die konservativen Wehe-Rufer recht behalten sollten, — gerathen könnte, wenn nämlich as Princip der beschreibenden Musik mit Rücksichtslosigkeit zu Tode geritten wird. Den Formalisten aber möchte er gleichfalls die Erlösung von der tödtlichen Langweiligkeit bringen, der die endlosen Wiederholungen desselben Formengebildes verfallen sind, eines Formengebildes, das neue Ideen eben so wenig zu halten vermag, wie alte Schläuche neuen Most. Wie thöricht ein solches Bestreben ist, muß jedem Unbefangenen, einerlei wie wohlwollend er ist, beim Anhören von d'Indy's zweiter Symphonie klar werden. Wenn es jemals dargethan wurde, daß Dissonanzen nur relativ und nicht absolut schmerzlich wirken, dann ist das in d'Indy's zweiter Symphonie geschehen. Man kann ungestraft die Tonalität derart durcheinander mengen, daß überhaupt von keiner Tonalität mehr zu sprechen ist, aber man muß dieses Gemenge dem Zuhörer unter einem Gesichtspunkt beibringen, der es als zweckentsprechend, das heißt als illusionsbefördernd erscheinen läßt. Ueberläßt man aber diese Dissonanzen sich selbst, sollen sie sich selbst rechtfertigen, dann wendet sich das Ohr enttäuscht und ermüdet ab.

D'Indy hat in manchen seiner früheren Arbeiten, in seinen Orchesterlegenden, wie zum Beispiel in derjenigen vom „verwunschenen Walde" (oder „verzauberten Forst") ebenfalls in kühnen Kombinationen geschwelgt, aber er ist da verständlich, und zum größeren Theile erfreulich geblieben. Er hatte zwar auch in seiner Programmmusik niemals viel zu sagen, er ließ stets zu viele unverdaute Reminiszenzen hören, aber er vermochte doch wenigstens den Zuhörer in seinen programmatischen er aber annimmt, daß auf die Verletzung aller harmonischen Logik in der absoluten Musik durch „dramatischen Ausdruck" rechtfertigen läßt, dann begeht er einen gefährlichen Irrthum. Wer ihn aus Höflichkeit, aus sogenanntem Wohlwollen, in dieser Bestrebung bestärkt, wird mit verantwortlich sein für alle die schweren Irrthümer, die d'Indy im Verfolg seines Princips noch begehen mag.

Man steht dem distinguirten Gast aus Paris, der bei dieser Gelegenheit zum ersten Male amerikanischen Boden betrat, (der aber nicht zu Barbaren kam, denn seine Kompositionen waren uns schon zum erklecklichen Theile bekannt,) mit gemischten Gefühlen gegenüber. Ohne Frage ist d'Indy ein vornehmer Musiker, der nicht nach dem großen Haufen fragt, der sich zum Höchsten durchringen möchte; aber die Sympathie, die man ihm darob zollt, darf nicht zu einer Verblendung über sein irriges Princip, und nicht zu einer freundlichen Täuschung über sein sehr bescheidenes Schaffenstalent führen. Gestern Nachmittag dirigirte übrigens Vincent d'Indy ein zweites Konzert des Bostoner Symphonieorchesters. Man findet darüber einen ausführlichen Bericht unter „Theater und Musik".

* *

Paper Cutting Bureau in the World

FRENCH MUSIC TIRESOME AT SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Conductor Vincent d'Indy Warmly Applauded, but His Work Seems Conventional.

84

Vincent d'Indy, the French composer, who is now in this country at the invitation of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, received a cablegram on Friday night that Mme. D'Indy, his wife, had suffered a stroke of paralysis. M. D'Indy was preparing to sail yesterday, but a later cablegram reassured him that his wife's condition was not necessarily serious, so he remained and conducted yesterday's matinee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall.

This concert was a mate to the one of Thursday night, the whole programme being again devoted to French music. It began with Ernest Chausson's Symphony, Op. 20, Caesar Frank's "Psyche et Eros," Debussy's Two Nocturnes, "Nuages" and "Fetes," Magnard's "Chant Funebre" and D'Indy's "Istur." Again was there no soloist.

The concert was as a whole tiresome. It began with an afternoon of music devoted to this French feast of dissonances is trying and exasperating. The Chausson Symphony was largely ineffective, and the Magnard composition was included on the programme possibly because Magnard is a pupil of D'Indy. The music sounded devoid of interest and notable merit. The two Debussy Nocturnes are gems of mood and color depicted in music.

The orchestra played exquisitely again and D'Indy's conducting was conventional. Evidently he was laboring under a stress of worriment over the news of his wife's illness. D'Indy was warmly applauded by a large audience.

THE SUN, SUNDAY, DECEMBER 10, 1905.

FRANCO-BAVARIAN MUSIC.

SECOND APPEARANCE OF VINCENT D'INDY AS CONDUCTOR.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's Matinee Devoted to the Performance of Music of the Present French School—The Audience Extremely Polite, Indeed.

Vincent d'Indy, the eminent French composer, led the Boston Symphony Orchestra again yesterday afternoon through a programme of French music at Carnegie Hall. The public was most kind and assembled in goodly numbers in the auditorium, where it observed the proceedings with circumspect manifestations of joy and bestowed its chief blessing upon the conductor at the end of the concert. The compositions heard yesterday were the B flat symphony of Ernest Chausson, the "Psyche et Eros" episode from César Franck's symphonic poem, "Psyche," two nocturnes—"Nuages" and "Fêtes"—by Debussy, a dirge by Alberic Magnard, and Mr. d'Indy's own symphonic variations, entitled "Istar."

The first two numbers on the list carried the audience into an atmosphere somewhat less charged with damp winds and threatening snow than that of the Thursday night's concert. Chausson, who was cut off by a bicycle accident at the age of 44, was a pupil of César Franck, and he showed the influence of his master, who was, perhaps, when all things are considered, the strongest of the later French composers.

But Chausson shows individuality in this symphony. The firmness of the instrumental texture and the sanity of the tonal scheme resemble the work of Franck, who was not afflicted with abnormal appetites or diseased harmonies and shattered phraseology. Franck, too, was an introspective writer, and much of his intention is [illegible] to deny [illegible]

Herein he was a most congenial master for Chausson, who was a retiring and self-contained man, shut up within himself, nursing his dreams, and utterly unfit to bring them to general consideration. In fact, it was not till he was dead that France found him out. Nikisch lifted the veil from the meanings of this B flat symphony for the Parisians, and they fell upon his neck and forgot 1870.

Neither Chausson nor Franck clove utterly the bonds which held them to the musical past. In this symphony, for example, one can find in the first movement a deference to the old fashioned laws of form. There is a slow introduction, built on a theme afterward used in the body of the movement. There are clearly defined contrasting subjects and there is systematic development.

Again, in the second movement there is a large mood picture, and the third and last movement of the composition is also firm in its architecture. It is a good symphony written in chords and not in discords, in melodic phrases and not in mere chortlings of tortured instruments; but we gravely doubt whether it is really as great a work as ardent French commentators have told us it is. The themes are uncertain in shape, indefinite in character, and in the workings out, which are lucid enough, they are like Tennyson's long tailed birds, which float through heaven but do not alight.

Two movements from Franck's "Psyche" suite were heard at a Philharmonic concert in January, 1903, and at the time we were moved to remark that the heroine certainly dwelt somewhere in the neighborhood of the Opéra Comique and that Eros was surely a tenor with a voix blanche and falsetto high notes. A hearing of yesterday's excerpt served to demonstrate that when it came to the love scene the tenor had some fairly good chest tones. At any rate there was firmness in Franck's treatment of the episode and the climax published the passion of the pair in good round orchestration.

Debussy's two nocturnes have been performed here under Mr. Damrosch's direction, and we make bold to say that they will be played here again. They are not large canvases, but are instrumental etchings from the hand of a man of unquestionable talent. They are dainty, fanciful tone pictures of airy nothings of the composer's brain.

A procession of slow moving clouds across a changeless sky and a festival of light and shadow, interrupted by a procession of gleaming visions—these are his subjects; and his musical treatment of them is poetic in the most elegant and literary of musical styles. The dirge of Alberic Magnard may be passed without further comment than that it was a very sad dirge indeed.

So come we at the end to the variations of Mr. d'Indy. It is unnecessary at this time to tell the story of "Istar's Descent Into Hades," upon which this music is founded. Suffice it to say that when the devoted woman reached the place she had to pass through seven gates, at each of which a warder removed one of her garments. As she wore only seven she entered bades as she had entered the world.

To a Parisian composer such a theme was as ripe fruit upon the bough. But who other than Vincent d'Indy would have missed the opportunity to publish the disrobing of the heroine in music glowing with orchestral flesh tints and throbbing with ill disguised passion? To Mr. d'Indy this poem suggested nothing better than a set of variations turned backward, variations first, theme last. Is it not ingenious?

Clothe the naked theme in sevenfold garments of variations. Take them off one at a time and let the naked tune stand forth in all its glory at the end, like Istar in hades. To do Mr. d'Indy justice, he has made his variations very well; but the mathematical calculation of the thing is a thousand miles away from the mystic and beautiful spirit of the poem. It is scholarly music and it is admirably instrumented. But as Kipling would say, "Is it art?"

And so ends this determined invasion of a peaceful nation by tonal problems from the sunny land of France. Reviewing the total results of the two days battle we cannot perceive that any brilliant victory has perched upon the banners of the art's propagandist. He has come, he has seen and we have heard; but we have not been conquered.

We are just where we were before his advent. We find in the French music of the later school a genuinely Parisian spirit, not the spirit of the Paris of to-day, but, in spite of all talk about breaking with the past, the spirit of old Paris, of the Faubourgs and of the historic avenues, perhaps of the city of François Villon. In their effort to embody this spirit the composers have wisely striven to tear themselves away from the popular dominance of such facile dabblers as Saint-Saëns and Gounod.

Time was when Saint-Saëns was deemed a great master in France, and the whole world of grown up children loves Gounod's perversion of Goethe. But these sad, glad, mad brethren of Villon will have none of this. If they had only some new and marvellous musical speech of their own to give us in its place we should hail them as pathfinders in the wilderness of a degenerate age.

Jean Marnold in an analysis of Debussy's nocturnes points out the fact that their tonal plan is wholly revolutionary. Heaven grant that this be true, for the world has labored too long under a delusion that before the days of 1900, when these etchings were made known, Richard Strauss produced "Also sprach Zarathustra," "Don Quixote" and "Ein Heldenleben," with the world, the flesh and the devil united for his tonic triad and a giant jewsharp for an orchestra.

Debussy has talent and his music is of the kind that makes men think, but he is of the Gallic school, for all that. He rises above its general level, but most of its product we must sadly confess is Wagner and claret, and a good deal of the claret is vin ordinaire, at that.

[126]

NEW YORK [illegible]
Y, DECEMBER 10, 1905.

MR. D'INDY LEADS BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Again Interprets a Programme Consisting Wholly of Music by Modern French Composers.

PROVES HARD TO FOLLOW

Large Audience on Hand in Carnegie Hall to Greet the Visitor, but Applause Is Lukewarm

Mr. Vincent d'Indy was again the conductor by special arrangement at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's second matinée concert in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon, the programme, like that of Thursday night, consisting wholly of music by modern French composers.

The occasion thus provided another exceptional opportunity to study present day French music under an authoritative interpreter, and there was a large audience on hand to take advantage of it.

It must be confessed, however, that the afternoon's entertainment, save to students and to some impressionists in "cranks' alley" proved dull. Even so cultivated a body of listeners as the Boston Orchestra's clientele found it difficult to maintain the mental attitude of strained attention demanded by the programme, and the applause was, as a consequence, lukewarm.

The works presented were a symphony by Ernest Chausson in B flat, opus 20, new here; Cesar Frank's "Psyché et Eros"; Claude Debussy's two nocturnes, "Nuages" and "Fêtes"; a "Dirge" by Alberic Magnard, and Mr. D'Indy's "Istar" variations, also a local novelty. There was again no soloist.

Judged by these compositions the modern French school would seem to have forsaken all beaten paths and to be bent on a long voyage of discovery into the musical unknown. One mere man in the audience put the case in pithy phrase when he remarked that "there wasn't a tune you could hang your hat on." There wasn't. The Chausson symphony was a typical case. It had pleasing details now and then, but these were put together, so to speak, into a sort of musical mosaic, vaguely colored and without design.

Of all the programme's numbers the most striking were the two little Debussy nocturnes, particularly the first "Nuages," with its weird instrumentation and weirder harmonies.

Mr. D'Indy obtained somewhat more finish for his readings than on Thursday night, but there was lacking much of the orchestra's usual polish.

TRANSCRIPT, TUESDAY, DECEMBER 12, 1905

Potter Hall: D'Indy and the Longy Club

Mr. d'Indy took leave of us here in Boston yesterday, in the concert room, in a way that it will be good in future to remember. In compliment to him our Longy Club of French virtuosi were eager to play a programme of his chamber music for wind instruments. Out of compliment to them and to their brethren of our orchestra, he was as eager to join them at the piano. The little concert of yesterday afternoon brought the occasion, and a company of the musically and socially elect of the town filled the hall to listen in pleasant intimacy. The club played Mr. d'Indy's plaintive song and gayly tinted dances for wind choir. He himself accompanied Mr. Longy in a fantasia for oboe, in which the composer showed as delicate a feeling for the instrument as the virtuoso. Then for ending came the trio for piano, clarinet, and 'cello. Rich and fertile were the melodies of it. Rich and warm was the development. Feeling played through the music, now delicate, now deep, now light and gay—tempered feeling always, but feeling that was singularly pure. Design and delineation, imagination and execution were nearly perfectly fused. It was more human music than any of d'Indy's that we have heard in the last forntnight. For once we that listened forgot the mind that we have honored for the man that was like ourselves. There was sheer zest of life in him and in his music after all. H. T. P.

D'Indy at Harvard

In the lecture room of the Fogg Museum last evening at Harvard Mr. d'Indy gave the discourse upon his master César Franck, that he has been so eager to deliver at least once during his visit to America. He has done the Transcript the honor to intrust his manuscript to it for translation and publication, and tomorow the lecture will appear in full and for the first time in print in our columns. Meanwhile, as a part of the news of the day, suffice it that Mr. d'Indy began with a brief summary of the main events in Franck's life; and of the musical influences that surrounded him, and that he then passed, with intimate anecdote here and there, to Franck's traits as a teacher and as a man. He proceeded with keen discrimination and sympathetic understanding to speak of Franck's music and of the transforming qualities in it that made him the creator of the new French school and the inspiration of them that would continue it. Then Mr. d'Indy digressed to the larger aspects of modern music, and always illuminatingly. There was admirable lucidity in the lecture, and that lucidity was the vehicle for the ideas of man who brings unusual clearness and force of intellect to the art of music. Tomorrow Mr. d'Indy shall speak for himself.

From N. Y. TRIBUNE
Address
Date DEC 11 1905

MUSIC.

The Concerts of French Music.

The effort to popularize specifically French music of the ultra-modern type which marked the second [illegible] of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was brought to a conclusion at Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon last. M. Vincent d'Indy, who had been brought over from Paris for the sake of propaganda, again directed the performance of the admirable band, and again the programme was devoted wholly to the music of the revolutionaries. Unlike that of Thursday, however, the post of honor was not this time reserved for the conductor; it was given to Ernest Chausson, but little less modern than some music by Cesar Franck was admitted to the list. Franck is the spiritual father of the young school, their saint; and it was plain as a pikestaff after an excerpt or two that his "Psyche" had been brought into comparison with a symphony by Chausson, a dirge by Magnard, two bits of scenic delineation by Debussy ("Nuages" and "Fete," both of which had been introduced by Walter Damrosch earlier in the season) and M. d'Indy's own "Istar" variations, which the Boston orchestra played here some six years ago under Mr. Gericke, that the austere old master leads all his impetuous young disciples in every element that enters into good writing. Only in vagueness and cacophony of utterance do they surpass him. Nor is his music as reminiscent as that of his followers. The book of quotations was opened again at Saturday's concert by Chausson, whose second symphony was a complete novelty in New-York. It reeks with daring dissonance and mere reiteration of phrase. Why have these young men no melodies plastic enough to be developed interestingly and logically? What is the matter with the good old scale? Are there new thoughts and feelings in the world now to which the diatonic series cannot give expression? Or is it imagined that a new essence of beauty lies hidden in whole tone progressions? Can cerebralism, of which we hear much in connection with this latter day music, find utterance only in the uniovely, the unwonted, the unexpected? Must natural sequence be forever after taboo? Grant the ingenuity of the instrumentation in Debussy's nocturnes; might not the same ingenuity have exercise in a composition which did not contemn form and rationality of harmonic procedure? Suppose we accept Cesar Franck as a great musician, worthy of a place by the side of Bach, as one of his admirers has said; are we to assume that his genius is shared by all of the young men who failed to carry off prizes at the Conservatoire, and therefore will have nothing to do with the old manner of teaching or the manner which satisfied Berlioz, Bizet, Delibes, Massenet, Saint-Saëns and Gounod? There is too much literature in the young French school, too much in the alleged poetical conceits which are said to lie at the bottom of the compositions, too much in the laudation of one another. These concerts have too plainly disclosed a narrow purpose. Even so excellent a man as M. d'Indy will suffer from the too obvious propagandism; he would stand higher in critical opinion had he not wearied all of his hearers on Saturday with the dreadful dirge of M. Magnard and vexed not a few.

The concert closed with the "Istar" variations of M. d'Indy. Much is asked nowadays from those who would follow the progress of the new music of France and Germany. In this case it is nothing less than a chapter of Assyrian mythology. When the work was first given here, in February, 1899, the programme book was silent as to the significance of the title, and only those in the audience who had read Delitzsch's "Höllenfahrt der Istar" or the chapter in George Smith's "Chaldean Genesis" were able to see the ingenious purpose of the composer in turning the familiar form of theme and variations end for end. Istar was an Oriental love goddess of unspeakable antiquity who descended into the underworld in search of her husband-lover, Tammuz. On her visit she was compelled by each of the guardians of its seven portals to divest herself of an article of ornament or dress, until she passed through the last portal entirely nude. To illustrate this series of adventures M. d'Indy conceived the ingenious scheme of writing seven variations on a theme and playing the variations first and the theme last. Only a fragment of the theme is heard at first, and this is tricked out with a great deal of scintillant ornament. As the music goes on the melodic foundation is augmented, until at last the theme stalks forth in its whole stature and in complete nudity—a pompous unisono of the strings and brass. A pity that M. d'Indy could not find an Assyrian scale.

H. E. K.

From MAIL
Address
Date DEC 11 1905

[illegible] Chausson's symphony in B flat, [illegible] was the chief novelty of the [illegible] orchestra's programme Saturday.

[illegible] proved a well-written and original [illegible] language that of contemporary [illegible] romantic, precise and elegant, and [illegible] structural and of genuine in[illegible] power.

[illegible] et Eros," by Cesar Franck, [illegible] repetition; the idiom of the [illegible] school, of which he was [illegible] leader, is better understood [illegible] a few years ago, when [illegible] played here. Debussy's [illegible] poems," entitled "Nu[illegible]" are masterpieces of [illegible] good to hear

---

Page 11

Music And Drama.

Concerts and Operas.

When the same day brings two important operatic performances and two equally important concerts, a critic is perforce bound to become like a tea-taster, unless he has an alter ego to rely on. The fact that operas last an hour or two longer than concerts, facilitates the sampling process. Last Saturday Mr. Conried's company sang, for the first time this season Donizetti's "L'Elisir D'Amore" and Wagner's "Valkyrie," while at Carnegie Hall the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave, in the afternoon, a second concert of contemporary French music, and in the evening the Oratorio Society attempted to revive Beethoven's Mass in D.

M. Vincent D'Indy again conducted the Boston Orchestra having chosen for his programme the B flat symphony of Ernest Chausson; César Franck's symphonic poem "Psyché et Eros"; two "Nocturnes" by Claude Debussy; a "Chant funèbre," by Alberic Magnard, and "Istar," by D'Indy himself. Most of these pieces had been heard here before, but that made it none the less desirable to hear them again under the authoritative and sympathetic bâton of M. D'Indy, who made the most of them, with the aid of the excellent Boston band. The Chausson symphony is in three movements only, the fourth being omitted. No great harm would have accrued to the musical world had the other three been omitted, too. There is little evidence of inventive power. The slow movement is the best of the three; it suggests a careful study of "Parsifal." The César Franck sample is written in a refined style, but quite banal from a melodic point of view. Of the two Debussey nocturnes the second, "Fêtes," has an interesting semi-barbaric splendor. The "Chant funebre" by Magnard proved to be dull, empty, maundering, amateurish, interminable. After that, it was a relief to hear the familiar and ingenious set of variations by M. d'Indy, entitled "Istar," which made an effective close for the concert. After hearing these two French concerts the thought uppermost in one's mind is: "Why did not these young Frenchmen follow Saint-Saëns as a model instead of the absurdly overrated César Franck?" Saint-Saëns, though influenced by Bach and Wagner, is much more French in his thought and style than the composers of the Franck school. He has, above all things, that which they all seem to lack—the divine gift of melody. His is the music of the future in France.

N. Y. EVG. TELEGRAM
DEC 11 1905

D'Indy Again Conducts

FOR the second time before a New York audience Vincent d'Indy, the eminent French conductor, led the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its regular concert in Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon, and, with a programme made up of French music, gave an effect by no means usual to concert goers in this city. It was so different in scope, phrasing and handling of themes not altogether unknown that the programme was heard with more than usual interest; but as to whether it was enjoyed in an unqualified manner is a matter that each person would be obliged to answer for himself. Taken as a whole, however, M. d'Indy undoubtedly gave pleasure, his leading of a large orchestra and his interpretation of music, particularly his own in character (though only one was his own composition) being a musical treat.

The compositions given Saturday were Chausson's B flat symphony, "Psyche et Eros," from Cesar Frank's symphonic poems "Psyche," two nocturnes, a dirge and M. d'Indy's own symphonic variations, called "Istar."

It was in the latter that the interest of the afternoon was centred. The poem is the story of "Istar's Descent Into Hades," and the opportunity for fair varied emotional and musical expression ran almost the gamut.

His handling of it was certainly amusing and interesting, but the French theory that he represents lacks the mystery, beauty and sensuousness, the sorrow, fear and emotion that might well be put into it. He has demonstrated again his idea that music may be music, beautiful, harmonious and even exquisite, and that it may yet lack the one thing that would make it touch the heart as well as the mind. It is artistic, but to many it does not seem altogether to be art.

Nevertheless one is grateful to him for the "variations" and his conducting. The latter is most interesting, and the composer's individuality shines in both his music and his conducting to a marked degree. He has given one new musical thoughts, if not emotions, and that is something these days.

From THE MORNING TELEGRAPH
Address NEW YORK CITY
Date DEC 11 1905

More Revivals at the Opera.

Among the revivals shortly to be seen at the opera are Wagner's "Die Meistersinger," at the end of December, and "Parsifal" on or about New Year's Day. The mention of "Die Meistersinger" makes one think of M. Vincent d'Indy's reception in New York last Thursday.

In "Die Meistersinger" Wagner represents a close corporation of old men tied by tradition and swearing by set and antique rule and animated by a spirit of hostility toward every new or original thing not emanating from themselves.

While for the purposes of dramatic effect Wagner has overintensified the stick-in-the-muddiness of these old fellows who arrogated to themselves the functions of judge and jury and attempted to do the thinking of the people for them, his satire is even to this day justified by existing musical conditions.

D'Indy was new and original and supremely audacious; therefore all the meistersingers in the audience listened to him with icy stillness while even high musical authority attempted to frown and shout him down.

Yet this d'Indy has a great deal in him, and the freshness and freedom of his art will force even the general public, sooner or later, to realize that neither Wagner nor Strauss has said the last word in music.

I write it with reluctance, but had d'Indy been German and an exponent of that Deutscher kunst of which we hear so much at German banquets, he would have been treated a little differently.

D'Indy and his French music said "Au revoir" but not goodby at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Saturday matinée. The visitor plays piano with the Kneisels tomorrow and his piano symphony, with Pugno, is next Sunday's New York Symphony attraction.

GLOBE
NEW YORK COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER
DEC 11 1905

Musical Notes.

THE second concert of modern French music given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Vincent d'Indy as conductor, at Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon was decidedly more persuasive than the previous concert of Thursday night. The B flat symphony of the late Ernest Chausson, which headed the programme, is a work in a more accustomed musical idiom, of a more definitely emotional character, and of a simpler and less abstruse beauty than Mr. d'Indy's own symphony in B flat, played at the previous concert.

The "Psyché et Eros" movement from César Franck's "Psyché," which came next in order, is the only work by the father of all this neo-Gallic school to appear on either programme. It showed anew the extraordinary technical skill with which Franck handled his materials and the exalted beauty of the themes themselves. The third number was Debussy's nocturnes, "Nuages" and "Fêtes," first produced here by Walter Damrosch last year. These orchestral "impressions" again seemed imbued with the singular imaginative fineness of this strangely gifted man. After these nocturnes and before the "Istar" variations Mr. d'Indy probably felt the need of music in a strongly contrasting mood, and accordingly introduced a "Chant funèbre" by Alberic Magnard.

This dirge supplied the change of mood, but disclosed no other excuse for its presence in the programme. It is the one piece played at either concert that did not seem, whatever its permanent value, for the once at least, distinctly worth doing. Mr. d'Indy's own clever and brilliant "Istar" variations, with their tremendous orchestral climax, closed the programme. Just how many converts Mr. d'Indy has won to his modern French propaganda cannot at present be known, but whether one discovers great beauty in the second movement of Mr. d'Indy's symphony and the first and second movements of Chausson's or not, one must admit that this new school has a sincerity and loftiness of aim that have seldom been apparent in the work of the more widely known French composers.

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT
MONDAY, DECEMBER 11, 19[illegible]

D'INDY IN NEW YORK

CHAUSSON'S SYMPHONY FOR THE FIRST TIMES IN AMERICA

Unique and Notable Music That Reveals a Peculiar Individual Talent and an Unknown Side of the New French School—Debussy's Nocturnes—D'Indy's Reception in New York

Chausson's symphony, as the new French music goes, is clear. In comparison with some of Mr. d'Indy's own, for example, it is easy to grasp the contour and contents of its melodies, to follow their development, to note their relation and interplay. Chausson can wander far in the derivation of material from them and pick his way through intricate and remote modulations. But he is less abstruse than d'Indy, and there is less suggestion in the symphony of music by intellectual process, striving to express in tones the things of the intellect. Chausson's moods are not cold and abstract passions of the brain. They are more concrete and human. They seem larger, perhaps because they are more readily comprehensible. For Chausson, like Franck and unlike Debussy and sometimes d'Indy, is content with a highly individual treatment of established musical forms. His symphony begins, for example, with a slow introduction, foreshadowing the melodic material to come. The first movement is the customary allegro, built upon its themes and, so far as outline goes, worked out in the usual fashion. The second is the prescribed adagio in form, but in depth and poignancy it is all Chausson's own. The final movement—there is no scherzo—is freer in formal handling than either of the other two and Liszt's notion and practice of "community of themes" shape and color it.

Throughout, however, there is the same individuality of treatment that makes the adagio unique. It lies less in the melody ideas than in Chausson's handling of them. They do not seem remarkable in themselves, nor after d'Indy, Debussy and Richard Strauss, are his strange harmonies, remote modulations, and occasional dissonaces, particularly impressive. Our ears almost expect them. Chausson, moreover, does not pursue the final, the most sensitive phrase for the expression of his thought or feeling with the passionate eagerness of his brethren. He is less ardent and laboring than they in the similar quest of subtleties of rhythm, and of new uses and novel combinations of instruments. Perhaps his besetting self-distrust restrains him. For he is capable of all these things, and when he does achieve them they have the inevitableness that is in Debussy's music and that is not always in d'Indy's. Chausson, like Franck, still keeps his hold in the communicative power of the emotional contents of melody. More probably still, he was seeking, consciously or unconsciously, less the poignant and peculiar phrase than the largest and deepest expression.

It is this largeness and loftiness of mood and expression that make Chausson's symphony, as it seems to us, unique among the symphonies of our own time, and that justify the faith of his brethren that he might have surpassed them all. They like to call his symphony "noble" and they are as sincere and sensitive in their choice of the word as they are in the making of their instrumental phrases. Our modern symphony and tone-poems—Franck's as much as anything and everything but—miss the elevation, the austere passion that is none the less in it because it is controlled, and the [illegible] and communicating [illegible] implies. They are [illegible] is comparatively [illegible] all is with them [illegible]

[1.27]

From N. Y. TRIBUNE,
Address
Date

Post Ire II

MUSIC.

The Concerts of French Music.

The effort to popularize specifically French music of the ultra-modern type which marked the second coming of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was brought to a conclusion at Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon last. M. Vincent d'Indy, who had been brought over from Paris for the sake of the propaganda, again directed the performance of the admirable band, and again the programme was devoted wholly to the music of the revolutionaries. Unlike that of Thursday, however, the place of honor was not this time reserved for the conductor; it was given to Ernest Chausson, but nothing less modern than some music by Cesar Franck was admitted to the list. Franck is the spiritual father of the young school, their saint; yet it was plain as a pikestaff after an excerpt from his "Psyche" had been brought into comparison with a symphony by Chausson, a dirge by Magnard, two bits of scenic delineation by Debussy ("Nuages" and "Fete," both of which had been introduced by Walter Damrosch earlier in the season) and M. d'Indy's own "Istar" variations, which the Boston orchestra played here some six years ago under Mr. Gericke, that the austere old master leads all his impetuous young disciples in every element that enters into good writing. Only in vagueness and cacophony of utterance do they surpass him. Nor is his music as reminiscent as that of his followers. The book of quotations was opened again at Saturday's concert by Chausson, whose second symphony was a complete novelty in New-York. It reeks with daring dissonance and mere reiteration of phrase. Why have these young men no melodies plastic enough to be developed interestingly and logically? What is the matter with the good old scale? Are there new thoughts and feelings in the world now to which the diatonic series cannot give expression? Or is it imagined that a new essence of beauty lies hidden in whole tone progressions? Can cerebralism, of which we hear much in connection with this latter day music, find utterance only in the unlovely, the unwonted, the unexpected? Must natural sequence be forever after taboo? Grant the ingenuity of the instrumentation in Debussy's nocturnes; might not the same ingenuity have exercise in a composition which did not contemn form and rationality of harmonic procedure? Suppose we accept Cesar Franck as a great musician, worthy of a place by the side of Bach, as one of his admirers has said; are we to assume that his genius is shared by all of the young men who failed to carry off prizes at the Conservatoire, and therefore will have nothing to do with the old manner of teaching or the manner which satisfied Berlioz, Bizet, Delibes, Massenet, Saint-Saëns and Gounod? There is too much literature in the young French school, too much in the alleged poetical conceits which are said to lie at the bottom of the compositions, too much in the laudation of one another. These concerts have too plainly disclosed a narrow purpose. Even so excellent a man as M. d'Indy will suffer from the too obvious propagandism; he would stand higher in critical opinion had he not wearied all of his hearers on Saturday with the dreadful dirge of M. Magnard and vexed not a few.

The concert closed with the "Istar" variations of M. d'Indy. Much is asked nowadays from those who would follow the progress of the new music of France and Germany. In this case it is nothing less than a chapter of Assyrian mythology. When the work was first given here, in February, 1899, the programme book was silent as to the significance of the title, and only those in the audience who had read Delitzsch's "Höllenfahrt der Istar" or the chapter in George Smith's "Chaldean Genesis" were able to see the ingenious purpose of the composer in turning the familiar form of theme and variations end for end. Istar was an Oriental love goddess of unspeakable antiquity who descended into the underworld in search of her husband-lover, Tammuz. On her visit she was compelled by each of the guardians of its seven portals to divest herself of an article of ornament or dress, until she passed through the last portal entirely nude. To illustrate this series of adventures M. d'Indy conceived the ingenious scheme of writing seven variations on a theme and playing the variations first and the theme last. Only a fragment of the theme is heard at first, and this is tricked out with a great deal of scintillant ornament. As the music goes on the melodic foundation is augmented, until at last the theme stalks forth in its whole stature and in complete nudity—a pompous unisono of the strings and brass. A pity that M. d'Indy did not find an Assyrian scale.

H. E. K.

---

m
DEC 11 1905
ress
NEW YORK
e

Ernest Chausson's symphony in B flat, opus 20, was the chief novelty of the Boston orchestra's programme Saturday.

and it proved a well-written and original work, its language that of contemporary Paris, idiomatic, precise and elegant, and its thought structural and of genuine interest and power.

"Psyche et Eros," by Cesar Franck, gains by repetition; the idiom of the modern French school, of which he was the real founder, is better understood here now than a few years ago, when this was first played here. Debussy's two short "Nocturnes," entitled "Nuages" and "Fetes," are masterpieces of coloring, and it was good to hear

---

MUSIC AND DRAMA.

Concerts and Operas.

When the same day brings two important operatic performances and two equally important concerts, a critic is perforce bound to become like a tea-taster, unless he has an alter ego to rely on. The fact that operas last an hour or two longer than concerts, facilitates the sampling process. Last Saturday Mr. Conried's company sang, for the first time this season Donizetti's "L'Elisir D'Amore" and Wagner's "Valkyrie," while at Carnegie Hall the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave, in the afternoon, a second concert of contemporary French music, and in the evening the Oratorio Society attempted to revive Beethoven's Mass in D.

M. Vincent D'Indy again conducted the Boston Orchestra having chosen for his programme the B flat symphony of Ernest Chausson; César Franck's symphonic poem "Psyché et Eros"; two "Nocturnes" by Claude Debussy; a "Chant funèbre," by Albéric Magnard, and "Istar," by D'Indy himself. Most of these pieces had been heard here before, but that made it none the less desirable to hear them again under the authoritative and sympathetic bâton of M. D'Indy, who made the most of them, with the aid of the excellent Boston band. The Chausson symphony is in three movements only, the fourth being omitted. No great harm would have accrued to the musical world had the other three been omitted, too. There is little evidence of inventive power. The slow movement is the best of the three; it suggests a careful study of "Parsifal." The César Franck sample is written in a refined style, but quite banal from a melodic point of view. Of the two Debussey nocturnes the second, "Fêtes," has an interesting semi-barbaric splendor. The "Chant funebre" by Magnard proved to be dull, empty, maundering, amateurish, interminable. After that, it was a relief to hear the familiar and ingenious set of variations by M. d'Indy, entitled "Istar," which made an effective close for the concert. After hearing these two French concerts the thought uppermost in one's mind is: "Why did not these young Frenchmen follow Saint-Saëns as a model instead of the absurdly overrated César Franck?" Saint-Saëns, though influenced by Bach and Wagner, is much more French in his thought and style than the composers of the Franck school. He has, above all things, that which they all seem to lack—the divine gift of melody. His is the music of the future in France.

GLOBE
DEC 11 1905

Musical Notes.

THE second concert of modern French music given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Vincent d'Indy as conductor, at Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon was decidedly more persuasive than the previous concert of Thursday night. The B flat symphony of the late Ernest Chausson, which headed the programme, is a work in a more accustomed musical idiom, of a more definitely emotional character, and of a simpler and less abstruse beauty than Mr. d'Indy's own symphony in B flat, played at the previous concert.

The "Psyché et Eros" movement from César Franck's "Psyché," which came next in order, is the only work by the father of all this neo-Gallic school to appear on either programme. It showed anew the extraordinary technical skill with which Franck handled his materials and the exalted beauty of the themes themselves. The third number was Debussy's nocturnes "Nuages" and "Fêtes," first produced here by Walter Damrosch last year. These orchestral "impressions" again seemed imbued with the singular imaginative fineness of this strangely gifted man. After these nocturnes and before the "Istar" variations Mr. d'Indy probably felt the need of music in a strongly contrasting mood, and accordingly introduced a "Chant funèbre" by Albéric Magnard.

This dirge supplied the change of mood, but disclosed no other excuse for its presence in the programme. It is the one piece played at either concert that did not seem, whatever its permanent value, for the once at least, distinctly worth doing. Mr. d'Indy's own clever and brilliant "Istar" variations, with their tremendous orchestral climax, closed the programme. Just how many converts Mr. d'Indy has won to his modern French propaganda cannot at present be known, but whether one discovers great beauty in the second movement of Mr. d'Indy's symphony and the first and second movements of Chausson's or not, one must admit that this new school has a sincerity and loftiness of aim that have seldom been apparent in the work of the more widely known French composers.

N. Y. EVG. TELEGRAM
1905

D'Indy Again Conducts

FOR the second time before a New York audience Vincent d'Indy, the eminent French conductor, led the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its regular concert in Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon, and, with a programme made up of French music, gave an effect by no means usual to concert goers in this city. It was so different in scope, phrasing and handling of themes not altogether unknown that the programme was heard with more than usual interest; but as to whether it was enjoyed in an unqualified manner is a matter that each person would be obliged to answer for himself. Taken as a whole, however, M. d'Indy undoubtedly gave pleasure; his leading of a large orchestra and his interpretation of music, particularly his own in character (though only one was his own composition) being a musical treat.

The compositions given Saturday were Chausson's B flat symphony, "Psyche et Eros," from Cesar Frank's symphonic poems "Psyche," two nocturnes, a dirge and M. d'Indy's own symphonic variations, called "Istar."

It was in the latter that the interest of the afternoon was centred. The poem is the story of "Istar's Descent Into Hades," and the opportunity for fair varied emotional and musical expression ran almost the gamut.

His handling of it was certainly amusing and interesting, but the French theory that he represents lacks the mystery, beauty and sensuousness, the sorrow, fear and emotion that might well be put into it. He has demonstrated again his idea that music may be music, beautiful, harmonious and even exquisite, and that it may yet lack the one thing that would make it touch the heart as well as the mind. It is artistic, but to many it does not seem altogether to be art.

Nevertheless one is grateful to him for the "variations" and his conducting. The latter is most interesting, and the composer's individuality shines in both his music and his conducting to a marked degree. He has given one new musical thoughts, if not emotions, and that is something these days.

---

m
THE MORNING TELEGRAPH
ress
NEW YORK CITY
e

More Revivals at the Opera.

Among the revivals shortly to be seen at the opera are Wagner's "Die Meistersinger," at the end of December, and "Parsifal" on or about New Year's Day. The mention of "Die Meistersinger" makes one think of M. Vincent d'Indy's reception in New York last Thursday.

In "Die Meistersinger" Wagner represents a close corporation of old men tied by tradition and swearing by set and antique rule and animated by a spirit of hostility toward every new or original thing not emanating from themselves.

While for the purposes of dramatic effect Wagner has overintensified the stick-in-the-muddiness of these old fellows who arrogated to themselves the functions of judge and jury and attempted to do the thinking of the people for them, his satire is even to this day justified by existing musical conditions.

D'Indy was new and original and supremely audacious; therefore all the meistersingers in the audience listened to him with icy stillness while even high musical authority attempted to frown and shout him down.

Yet this d'Indy has a great deal in him, and the freshness and freedom of his art will force even the general public, sooner or later, to realize that neither Wagner nor Strauss has said the last word in music.

I write it with reluctance, but had d'Indy been German and an exponent of that Deutscher kunst of which we hear so much at German banquets, he would have been treated a little differently.

D'Indy and his French music said "Au revoir" but not goodby at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Saturday matinée. The visitor plays piano with the Kneisels tomorrow and his piano symphony, with Pugno, is next Sunday's New York Symphony attraction.

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCR
MONDAY, DECEMBER 11, 19

D'INDY IN NEW YORK

CHAUSSON'S SYMPHONY FOR THE FIRST TIMES IN AMERICA

Unique and Notable Music That Reveals a Peculiar Individual Talent and an Unknown Side of the New French School—Debussy's Nocturnes—D'Indy's Reception in New York

Mr. d'Indy prepared two programmes for the little tour that he made last week with our orchestra. On one stood his second symphony, Fauré's incidental music to "Pelléas and Mélisande," and Dukas's scherzo that we in Boston heard him conduct. To them he added his own early "Saugefleurie," the tale in tones of the fairy of the wild sage bush who found love and death both waiting when she saw the king's son a-hunting in the forest and gave him her heart. On the other, which he made for his second concert in New York on Saturday, were his "Istar" and the fragment of Franck's "Psyche," that he chose also for Boston, with Debussy's two nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festivals," a "Dirge" by his own pupil, Albéric Magnard ,and Ernest Chausson's unpublished symphony in B-flat, the manuscript parts for which Mr. d'Indy brought from Paris. Debussy's nocturnes have been played in Boston, though not yet by the Symphony Orchestra. Magnard's "Dirge"—a son's lament of a dead father rising and falling against a sombre background in long wailing curves sharpened by poignant progressions and strange bitter harmonies—seemed hardly so interesting as the other music Mr. d'Indy has been playing for us. The chief reason, indeed, for the second programme was Chausson's symphony. It has been rarely played outside Paris. Even there it is little known, and it was a German conductor, Nikisch, who really "discovered" it to Parisian audiences. Besides, Chausson's untimely and accidental death on the threshold, as it seemed, of riper and more individual achievement has measurably hallowed it.

He matured slowly. Modesty hid him, indecision pursued him, self-distrust hampered him; to speak out, even in the music that to him was a work of love, was hard. Freer and fuller utterance was coming to him when a fall from a bicycle killed him six years ago. He left behind him songs of a searching and haunting simplicity, chamber music that gropes, struggling for clear intense speech, among deep things; two operas not without moments of dramatic power, a "poem" for violin and orchestra, melancholy with subdued passion, wan and clear like an autumn twilight, that Ysaye has played now and then in America; one or two other orchestral pieces, and the symphony that Mr. d'Indy played on Saturday. More fully than any other of Franck's disciples he seems his master's heir. Something of Franck's detachment and loftiness of spirit and feeling, of his large and serene utterance were in Chausson's temperament and passed into his music. It has qualities that are in none other of the new French school, that sometimes are in singular contrast to its dominant traits, and that are of wider appeal. The fulness of them had yet to come, and it is good to believe that it would have come. At forty-five, when he died, he had hardly spoken out. Perhaps in the symphony, though it was written eight years before, he spoke more freely than in all the rest of his music.

Chausson's symphony, as the new French music goes, is clear. In comparison with some of Mr. d'Indy's own, for example, it is easy to grasp the contour and contents of its melodies, to follow their development, to note their relation and interplay. Chausson can wander far in the derivation of material from them and pick his way through intricate and remote modulations. But he is less abstruse than d'Indy, and there is less suggestion in the symphony of music by intellectual process, striving to express in tones the things of the intellect. Chausson's moods are not cold and abstract passions of the brain. They are more concrete and human. They seem larger, perhaps because they are more readily comprehensible. For Chausson, like Franck and unlike Debussy and sometimes d'Indy, is content with a highly individual treatment of established musical forms. His symphony begins, for example, with a slow introduction, foreshadowing the melodic material to come. The first movement is the customary allegro, built upon two themes and, so far as outline goes, worked out in the usual fashion. The second is the prescribed adagio in form, but in depth and poignancy it is all Chausson's own. The final movement—there is no scherzo—is freer in formal handling than either of the other two and Liszt's notion and practice of "community of themes" shape and color it.

Throughout, however, there is the same individuality of treatment that makes the adagio unique. It lies less in the melodic ideas than in Chausson's handling of them. They do not seem remarkable in themselves, nor after d'Indy, Debussy and Richard Strauss, are his strange harmonies, remote modulations, and occasional dissonances, particularly impressive. Our ears almost expect them. Chausson, moreover, does not pursue the final, the most sensitive phrase for the expression of his thought or feeling with the passionate eagerness of his brethren. He is less ardent and laborious than they in the similar quest of subtleties of rhythm, and of new uses and novel combinations of instruments. Perhaps his besetting self-distrust restrains him. For he is capable of all these things, and when he does achieve them they have the inevitableness that is in Debussy's music and that is not always in d'Indy's. Chausson, like Franck, still keeps his faith in the communicative power of the curve and contents of melody. More probably still, he was seeking, consciously or unconsciously, less the poignant and peculiar phrase than the largest and deepest expression.

It is this largeness and loftiness of mood and expression that make Chausson's symphony, as it seems to us, unique among the symphonies of our own time, and that justify the faith of his brethren that he might have surpassed them all. They like to call his symphony "noble" and they are as quick and sensitive in their choice of the word as they are in the making of their fundamental phrases. Our modern symphonies and tone-poems—Franck's aside—are full of thing and everything but noble. They miss the elevation, the austerity of mood, the passion that is none the less deep because it is controlled, and the breadth of style and communicating appeal that the word implies. They are restless where Chausson is comparatively serene. For all is with them even when

[12]

And as it seems to us, this world of thought and feeling is in some respects singularly remote from all things modern. The form and the expression are of today, but the mood is the mood almost of some of Sophocles's noblest tragedies. Set your composer whose mind and emotions are of our time to the writing of a joyous allegro like the first movement of Chausson's symphony. The chances are that he will make it all nervous exuberance, or all nervous strivings, excitement and reaction. Contrast with it the comparatively serene, the deep and sane joy of Chausson's allegro. Hear the touch of austerity in it, high but never cold. One must go back to Beethoven and the classic masters to find music of such qualities. One must go back even to the Greeks for the fulness of such mood. The joy is shadowed now and then with the sorrow and the strife of life, but do not the verses of the Greek plays sometimes darken so?

Chausson's second movement is grief incarnate in tones. Our modern composers, pessimists for the most part, have often written of personal sorrow or wider woe. We may hear in their music the physical pangs, so to say, of grief, the torture and the despair of it. They are repeating Jeremiah's "Is it nothing to you, all ye that pass by? behold and see if there be any sorrow like unto my sorrow?" There is little hint of these things in Chausson's adagio. His is a larger, loftier, more impersonal woe. It is the bitter distillation, the disembodied essence of grief, the endless burden of it to the sons and the daughters of men, falling now to smothered sadness, rising again to desolate lamentation, grief that may be endured and must be, but that may not be consoled. There is such grief in more than one speech of Greek tragedy, though not one as we recall them at the moment that has the wan desolation of Chausson's. That is of himself and perhaps of his time and environment—to put desolation so into tones.

For a while, at the beginning of the final movement, Chausson seems to be struggling in the modern fashion to withstand or dispel that consuming sorrow. Clear, sharp melody, crisp and alert phrases, are his weapons. There is the solace of activity. There is the solace also of meditation. Then suddenly the mood changes, as by a revelation. The music rises like a full-throated choral. The instruments leap and swell. There is resignation in it, perhaps, but there is more of faith and exaltation. The mood runs higher and deeper; often it touches majesty; at moments it is almost sublime. "Say not the struggle naught availeth." Outside the beginning of "Zarathustra" there is nothing in ultra-modern music with which to compare it. The end is a great and enfolding calm. And then, perhaps, Chausson is least modern and most Sophoclean of all.

Beside the symphony, Debussy's nocturnes seemed almost familiar. Boston and New York have both heard them, but never before with such a sensitive and understanding conductor as Mr. d'Indy and such a band as ours to play them. It was easy to wonder, on Saturday afternoon, if even in Paris they had ever sounded as they sounded then. The virtuosi with imagination that make our orchestra gilded or silvered Debussy's clouds, flecked his sky with tonal tints and half tints, or spangled it with evanescent instrumental points. The clouds swam or marched, rose, fell, vanished in the rhythm of their tones. They missed no vivid flicker in Debussy's broken phrases, no fitful suggestion in his harmonies. The nocturne faded in the wan grays of Debussy's very imagining. Then conductor and band flashed into the "Festivals." They filled the air with the quivering, shimmering, dazzling tonal dust of Debussy's keenest fancy. Dim wantons of chimera ran and danced behind and through it, in strange broken rhythms. At moments there was only the shiver and shatter of the falling, crumbling sounds of some remote uncanny festival. Then as suddenly the music reformed itself. The wantons marched again. The air gleamed and snapped with radiant echoes. Conductor and band had for the moment all Debussy's sensitiveness of impression, imagination and expression. Music of the poignant phrase seemingly could be no more vivid. There was no thought of form. It made itself before your ears, because it expressed to the utmost what the composer willed.

New York has been less interested than Boston in Mr. d' Indy's visit and in the newer French music that he has been revealing to us in America. Audiences have crowded Carnegie Hall to the doors for the concerts of our orchestra there. Last Thursday and last Saturday they only filled it well. Similar audiences have listened with more interest and responded with more applause, though at the end of the second concert they were unexpectedly warm and generous in their recalls for Mr. d'Indy himself. His own "Istar" had just been stimulating them. Reviewers and public have seemingly regarded his visit as an incident of the musical winter and not as a conspicuous and significant event. Music in New York was Teutonized at the start, when without the German impulse there would have been no music there. Now when the city is a flourishing musical capital, it remains rather needlessly Teutonized. It is hard to persuade it to take French music, especially a highly novel and abstruse sort of French music, quite seriously. That is not the sort of thing that it expects from Paris. Boston in particular, and even Chicago, have been more hospitable and appreciative to it. New York was the scene of the battle that established Wagner in America. There are those that fought manfully in it, but that now present the composers like Strauss and the young Frenchmen, who would turn the river of music into new and strange channels of their own bold contriving, and who will not make Wagner seem their starting point. New York is not very curious about [illegible] music. It is curious about [illegible] novelties, and Mr. d' Indy happened to be the gentleman who

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
CITIZEN.
Brooklyn, N. Y.
DEC - 2 1905

NUMEROUS MUSIC EVENTS COMING IN TWO BOROUGHS

D'Indy to Conduct Next Symphony Concert Here.

SAMUEL BALDWIN'S CONCERT.

Trinity Organist's Orchestral Works to Be Played—Other Programmes for the Week.

The second series of five concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Baptist Temple on Friday evening, Dec. 8, at 8:15 o'clock. In many respects this will be the most interesting concert that Brooklyn has had in many years. Like the last concert which had the Wagner programme, there will be also this time a special programme but very different, for it will be devoted entirely to the works of modern French composers and the conductor will be Monsieur Vincent d'Indy, who has come to this country by special invitation to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a series of concerts.

One of the most interesting features in the development of modern music in France has been the revival of music for orchestra and for the chamber. After the death of Berlioz up to practically twenty years ago nearly all the music written in France was for the theater. This was due not only to the fact that French genius tends naturally to the stage, but also to the encouragement given by the two subsidized opera houses which made it generally worth the while of French composers to work only in opera. The man who signalled the revolt against this state of affairs was Cesar Franck, a musician of highest worth, a composer of genius, yet one of those unfortunate men who had to wait until the last years of a long life to get even partial recognition from the public and did not receive his full meed of glory until after his death. In the later 60's and early 70's he had gathered about himself a group of young, ardent, enthusiastic musicians, who drew their inspiration from his genius and from his courageous efforts to restore absolute music to its proper place in France. These younger men continued the work begun by him with the result that some of the most brilliant compositions for the orchester and for the smaller combinations of instruments that have been written in modern times are cast up to the credit of France and no orchestras think that the work of the season is complete without having some of this new music on its programme.

Among the young men who were in the Franck group was Vincent d'Indy. The son of wealthy and noble parents, intended originally for the law, he had finally responded to the imperative call of music and was brought under the influence of Franck, shortly after the Franco-Prussian war. His career has been one long courageous struggle against hostile influence for the sake of pure art. While he has written two operas that met with considerable success his chief fame rests upon his works for the orchestra. Only less than this is his reputation as a teacher and conductor. By his talent, his energy and his persistence he has won for himself the position of undisputed leader in the French musical world and therefore he brings to America an authority which no other Frenchman could. The pupil of Franck, the colleague of such men as Faure, Chausson, Bruneau and the patron of such younger men as Debussy, Magnard and Roparts, for whom he performed for the first time many of their works, Monsieur d'Indy is a most interesting personality.

For the Brooklyn concert he has chosen a most interesting programme. The first number will be his own symphony in B-flat, which had its first performance in America last year by both the Boston Symphony and the Philadelphia Orchestras, meeting with very great success. Then will come the beautiful incidental music to Maeterlinck's "Pelleas et Melisande," by Faure. Following this is his own Legende "Saugefleurie" and finally the particularly fascinating work called "L'Apprenti sorcier," by Paul Dukas. After the best custom of Paris there will be no soloist, for this music gives no place for one.

Standard Union
Brooklyn, N. Y.
DEC - 2 1905

M. VINCENT D'INDY, the distinguished French composer and conductor, who reached America a week ago Tuesday from Paris, has been holding rehearsals with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Boston, previous to conducting that organization in a series of concerts. He will lead them here at the concert next Friday evening at the Baptist Temple (Brooklyn Institute and Brooklyn Philharmonic Society) and following the usage in Paris, there will be no soloist. The first work played will be his own second symphony in B flat, which has been played by the Boston Symphony and Philadelphia orchestras with great success. By him also will be the third number: Saugefleurie; Legende, d'apres un conte de Robert de Bonnieres. In full the programme is: Deuxieme Symphonie, in B flat, Op. 57, D'Indy; Extrement lent, Tres vif; Moderement lent; Modere, Tres anime, Modere; Tres lent, Assez vif, Largement; Suite Pelleas et Melisande, de Maeterlinck, Gabriel Faure; Saugefleurie, Legende, d'apres un conte de Robert de Bonnieres, D'Indy; L'Apprenti sorcier, d'apres une ballade de Goethe, Paul Dukas.

Eagle
Brooklyn, N. Y.
DEC - 3 1905

A LECTURE RECITAL.

Boston Symphony Programme Explained by Henry T. Finck.

The explanatory lecture recital on the programme of the Boston Symphony concert at the Baptist Temple to-morrow evening was given at Association Hall yesterday afternoon (Brooklyn Institute) by Henry T. Finck, with W. H. Humiston at the piano. The programme includes the "Duexieme Symphonie," in B flat, Op. 57, and "Saugefleurie," both by Vincent D'Indy; the "Suite Pelleas et Melisande," by Gabriel Faure, and "L'Apprenti Sorcier," by Paul Dukas. It will be remebrered that M. D'Indy is to lead the concert; therefore, his selections were first considered. Mr. Finck first gave a bit of his family history. His music was said to be so idiomatically orchestral that it is most difficult to arrange for the piano. As no such arrangement exists, Mr. Humiston had been obliged to make one. Mr. Finck assured his hearers it would sound much less discordant when played by the orchestra, not because of any lack in the player, but because it is essentially orchestral music. Mr. Finck further thought that D'Indy is much such a writer as is Strauss, though not so much so as Hofregger, who will probably be heard from much more in the future, as "he out-Strausses Strauss."

Faure, as a song writer, was said to be of exquisite taste in music, and it is thought that his suite is the most pleasing portion of the programme. He, like D'Indy and Dukas, is a Frenchman. The music to the suite was delightfully played, and then Paul Dukas and his music were taken up and carefully considered.

TIMES.
Brooklyn, N. Y.
DEC - 3 1905

MUSICAL.

M. Vincent d'Indy Conducts Boston Symphony Orchestra in Concert of French Music.

For the first time in many years, a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Brooklyn, at the Baptist Temple, was conducted by another leader than Wilhelm Gericke, who gave place to Vincent d'Indy, a composer-conductor of the modern French school, who has come over here for a season to plead the cause, as it were, of the ultra-modern French composer of pure concert music. The programme was given over entirely to music of this class, the opening number being Mr. d'Indy's Second Symphony in B flat. He also conducted his "Saugefleurie" legend for orchestra, after a tale by Robert de Bonnieres; Gabriel Faure's "Pelleas and Melisande" suite, taken from the stage music to Maeterlinck's play, and Paul Dukas' "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," after a ballad by Goethe.

There was a natural curiosity to note a distinguished composer's interpretation of his own words and others in sympathy with his musical ideas, and in this respect the concert was gratifying, even though it was somewhat disturbing in the character of its music to established notions of propriety in music-making for orchestra. Mr. d'Indy's symphony, especially, is peculiarly iconoclastic in its departure from conventional methods. Apparently he has tried to avoid all channels of rational procedure, and the result is a puzzling sequence of musical ideas, such as few if any in the audience last night ever heard before. It is one of those works which so attack the convictions and conceptions as to create uncertainty of mind as to how it should be regarded. It sounds as if the com-day or the future shall be ex[illegible] anything but what it is. The mark [illegible] arly insight is apparent enough, and a [illegible] ough knowledge of evisting criterions is [illegible] plied in the very defiance of them.

The other pieces are picturesque expressions of orchestral thought, scintillating, vacious; yet withal poignant with warmth of feeling and subtlety of touch. Mr. d'Indy does not impress the observer as being primarily a great or inspiring conductor, but as one who commands the attention and best efforts of his players through respect for his knowledge, rather than through any executive magnetism of manner.

CITIZEN.
ress
Brooklyn, N. Y.
e
DEC 10 1905

D'INDY DISAPPOINTS.

French Composer's Music at Symphony Concert Bewilders Hearers.

Patrons of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Brooklyn were aroused from the even tenor of their way of listening to the music of that renowned band Friday night when D'Indy, the French composer and two of his works, were introduced at the Baptist Temple. Here was a new and uncommon impetus for discussion of things musical; and when the audience dispersed, comments were on the lips of almost everybody—unfavorable, however, for the most part. Is it yet time to say the last word as to the value of the music of Vincent D'Indy? This composer stands in his home country at the head of a new school. What its future may evolve can, as yet, only be a matter of conjecture. This much is certain, that the symphony—the second, in B flat, op. 57—left the hearers bewildered. There was a time when Wagner was altogether mystifying; but the Frenchman's music mystifies in an entirely different way. There is ryhthm in it, but no apparent rhyme or reason. The four movements of the symphony mingle theme upon theme with most elaborate and extraordinary working out. The task of the composer is here appreciated; but the themes are left unfinished in the maze of sounds which every instrument of the full orchestra is called upon to make. There is a great striving after something without arriving anywhere. The conclusion of the last movement without clearing up the atmosphere after the misty movements and the storm, gives something pleasing and slightly tangible. There is withal, the touch of French brilliancy, and many a delicate rhythmatic episode appears here and there without being accounted for.

D'Indy is a tall, fine looking Frenchman, void of mannerisms, and an energetic conductor. He is not magnetic in the sense of making or holding either the orchestra or the audience, but the Boston musicians are calculated to play well-nigh perfectly without a leader.

The French composer's other work on the programme, "Sange-fleurie," was beautiful, and comprehensible.

The gem of the French evening was Gabriel Faure's suite, "Pelleas and Melisande," based on a story by Maeterlinck. The last number was "L'Apprenti Sorcier," by Paul Dukas, after a ballad of Goethe.

[128] mountains or Debussy gazes clouds or sea. Chausson lived within himself, sufficient to himself. Living too, he escaped the neurotic contagion of his time that so often afflicts and also afflicts them. He has more of the detachment of Franck, more of his absorption in a world that was in himself.

And as it seems to us, this world of thought and feeling is in some respects singularly remote from all things modern. The form and the expression are of today, but the mood is the mood almost of some of Sophocles's noblest tragedies. Set your composer whose mind and emotions are of our time to the writing of a joyous allegro like the first movement of Chausson's symphony. The chances are that he will make it all nervous exuberance, or all nervous strivings, excitement and reaction. Contrast with it the comparatively serene, the deep and sane joy of Chausson's allegro. Hear the touch of austerity in it, high but never cold. One must go back to Beethoven and the classic masters to find music of such qualities. One must go back even to the Greeks for the fulness of such mood. The joy is shadowed now and then with the sorrow and the strife of life, but do not the verses of the Greek plays sometimes darken so?

Chausson's second movement is grief incarnate in tones. Our modern composers, pessimists for the most part, have often written of personal sorrow or wider woe. We may hear in their music the physical pangs, so to say, of grief, the torture and the despair of it. They are repeating Jeremiah's "Is it nothing to you, all ye that pass by? behold and see if there be any sorrow like unto my sorrow?" There is little hint of these things in Chausson's adagio. His is a larger, loftier, more impersonal woe. It is the bitter distillation, the disembodied essence of grief, the endless burden of it to the sons and the daughters of men, falling now to smothered sadness, rising again to desolate lamentation, grief that may be endured and must be, but that may not be consoled. There is such grief in more than one speech of Greek tragedy, though not one as we recall them at the moment that has the wan desolation of Chausson's. That is of himself and perhaps of his time and environment—to put desolation so into tones.

For a while, at the beginning of the final movement, Chausson seems to be struggling in the modern fashion to withstand or dispel that consuming sorrow. Clear, sharp melody, crisp and alert phrases, are his weapons. There is the solace of activity. There is the solace also of meditation. Then suddenly the mood changes, as by a revelation. The music rises like a full-throated choral. The instruments leap and swell. There is resignation in it, perhaps, but there is more of faith and exaltation. The mood runs higher and deeper; often it touches majesty; at moments it is almost sublime. "Say not the struggle naught availeth." Outside the beginning of "Zarathustra" there is nothing in ultra-modern music with which to compare it. The end is a great and enfolding calm. And then, perhaps, Chausson is least modern and most Sophoclean of all.

Beside the symphony, Debussy's nocturnes seemed almost familiar. Boston and New York have both heard them, but never before with such a sensitive and understanding conductor as Mr. d'Indy and such a band as ours to play them. It was easy to wonder, on Saturday afternoon, if even in Paris they had ever sounded as they sounded then. The virtuosi with imagination that make our orchestra gilded or silvered Debussy's clouds, flecked his sky with tonal tints and half tints, or spangled it with evanescent instrumental points. The clouds swam or marched, rose, fell, vanished in the rhythm of their tones. They missed no vivid flicker in Debussy's broken phrases, no fitful suggestion in his harmonies. The nocturne faded in the wan grays of Debussy's very imagining. Then conductor and band flashed into the "Festivals." They filled the air with the quivering, shimmering, dazzling tonal dust of Debussy's keenest fancy. Dim wantons of chimera ran and danced behind and through it, in strange broken rhythms. At moments there was only the shiver and shatter of the falling, crumbling sounds of some remote uncanny festival. Then as suddenly the music reformed itself. The wantons marched again. The air gleamed and snapped with radiant echoes. Conductor and band had for the moment all Debussy's sensitiveness of impression, imagination and expression. Music of the poignant phrase seemingly could be no more vivid. There was no thought of form. It made itself before your ears, because it expressed to the utmost what the composer willed.

New York has been less interested than Boston in Mr. d' Indy's visit and in the newer French music that he has been revealing to us in America. Audiences have crowded Carnegie Hall to the doors for the concerts of our orchestra there. Last Thursday and last Saturday they only filled it well. Similar audiences have listened with more interest and responded with more applause, though at the end of the second concert they were unexpectedly warm and generous in their recalls for Mr. d'Indy himself. His own "Istar" had just been stimulating them. Reviewers and public have seemingly regarded his visit as an incident of the musical winter and not as a conspicuous and significant event. Music in New York was Teutonized at the start, when without the German impulse there would have been no music there. Now when the city is a flourishing musical capital, it remains rather needlessly Teutonized. It is hard to persuade it to take French music, especially a highly novel and abstruse sort of French music, quite seriously. That is not the sort of thing that it expects from Paris. Boston in particular, and even Chicago, have been more hospitable and appreciative to it. New York was the scene of the battle that established Wagner in America. There are those that fought manfully in it, but that now present the composers like Strauss and the young Frenchmen, who would turn the river of music into new and strange channels of their own bold contriving, and who will not make Wagner even their starting point. New York is not very curious about innovating music. It is curious about vivid musical personalities, and Mr. d' Indy happened to be only a quiet gentleman who is a composer and a conductor.

New York, Dec. 10. H. T. F.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

NUMEROUS MUSIC EVENTS COMING IN TWO BOROUGHS

D'Indy to Conduct Next Symphony Concert Here.

SAMUEL BALDWIN'S CONCERT.

Trinity Organist's Orchestral Works to Be Played—Other Programmes for the Week.

The second series of five concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Baptist Temple on Friday evening, Dec. 8, at 8:15 o'clock. In many respects this will be the most interesting concert that Brooklyn has had in many years. Like the last concert which had the Wagner programme, there will be also this time a special programme but very different, for it will be devoted entirely to the works of modern French composers and the conductor will be Monsieur Vincent d'Indy, who has come to this country by special invitation to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a series of concerts.

One of the most interesting features in the development of modern music in France has been the revival of music for orchestra and for the chamber. After the death of Berlioz up to practically twenty years ago nearly all the music written in France was for the theater. This was due not only to the fact that French genius tends naturally to the stage, but also to the encouragement given by the two subsidized opera houses which made it generally worth the while of French composers to work only in opera. The man who signalled the revolt against this state of affairs was Cesar Franck, a musician of highest worth, a composer of genius, yet one of those unfortunate men who had to wait until the last years of a long life to get even partial recognition from the public and did not receive his full meed of glory until after his death. In the later 60's and early 70's he had gathered about himself a group of young, ardent, enthusiastic musicians, who drew their inspiration from his genius and from his courageous efforts to restore absolute music to its proper place in France. These younger men continued the work begun by him with the result that some of the most brilliant compositions for the orchester and for the smaller combinations of instruments that have been written in modern times are cast up to the credit of France and no orchestras think that the work of the season is complete without having some of this new music on its programme.

Among the young men who were in the Franck group was Vincent d'Indy. The son of wealthy and noble parents, intended originally for the law, he had finally responded to the imperative call of music and was brought under the influence of Franck, shortly after the Franco-Prussian war. His career has been one long courageous struggle against hostile influence for the sake of pure art. While he has written two operas that met with considerable success his chief fame rests upon his works for the orchestra. Only less than this is his reputation as a teacher and conductor. By his talent, his energy and his persistence he has won for himself the position of undisputed leader in the French musical world and therefore he brings to America an authority which no other Frenchman could. The pupil of Franck, the colleague of such men as Faure, Chausson, Bruneau and the patron of such younger men as Debussy, Magnard and Ropartz, for whom he performed for the first time many of their works, Monsieur d'Indy is a most interesting personality.

For the Brooklyn concert he has chosen a most interesting programme. The first number will be his own symphony in B-flat, which had its first performance in America last year by both the Boston Symphony and the Philadelphia Orchestras, meeting with very great success. Then will come the beautiful incidental music to Maeterlinck's "Pelleas et Melisande," by Faure. Following this is his own Legende "Saugefleurie" and finally the particularly fascinating work called "L'Apprenti sorcier," by Paul Dukas. After the best custom of Paris there will be no soloist, for this music gives no place for one.

M. VINCENT D'INDY, the distinguished French composer and conductor, who reached America a week ago Tuesday from Paris, has been holding rehearsals with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Boston, previous to conducting that organization in a series of concerts. He will lead them here at the concert next Friday evening at the Baptist Temple (Brooklyn Institute and Brooklyn Philharmonic Society) and following the usage in Paris, there will be no soloist. The first work played will be his own second symphony in B flat, which has been played by the Boston Symphony and Philadelphia orchestras with great success. By him also will be the third number: Saugefleurie; Legende, d'apres un conte de Robert de Bonnieres. In full the programme is: Deuxieme Symphonie, in B flat, Op. 57, D'Indy; Extrement lent, Tres vif; Moderement lent; Modere, Tres anime, Modere; Tres lent, Assez vif, Largement; Suite Pelleas et Melisande, de Maeterlinck, Gabriel Faure; Saugefleurie, Legende, d'apres un conte de Robert de Bonnieres, D'Indy; L'Apprenti sorcier, d'apres une ballade de Goethe, Paul Dukas.

A LECTURE RECITAL.

Boston Symphony Programme Explained by Henry T. Finck.

The explanatory lecture recital on the programme of the Boston Symphony concert at the Baptist Temple to-morrow evening was given at Association Hall yesterday afternoon (Brooklyn Institute) by Henry T. Finck, with W. H. Humiston at the piano. The programme includes the "Duexieme Symphonie," in B flat, Op. 57, and "Saugefleurie," both by Vincent D'Indy; the "Suite Pelleas et Melisande," by Gabriel Faure, and "L'Apprenti Sorcier," by Paul Dukas. It will be remebered that M. D'Indy is to lead the concert; therefore, his selections were first considered. Mr. Finck first gave a bit of his family history. His music was said to be so idiomatically orchestral that it is most difficult to arrange for the piano. As no such arrangement exists, Mr. Humiston had been obliged to make one. Mr. Finck assured his hearers it would sound much less discordant when played by the orchestra, not because of any lack in the player, but because it is essentially orchestral music. Mr. Finck further thought that D'Indy is much such a writer as is Strauss, though not so much so as Hofregger, who will probably be heard from much more in the future, as "he out-Strausses Strauss."

Faure, as a song writer, was said to be of exquisite taste in music, and it is thought that his suite is the most pleasing portion of the programme. He, like D'Indy and Dukas, is a Frenchman. The music to the suite was delightfully played, and then Paul Dukas and his music were taken up and carefully considered.

MUSICAL.

M. Vincent d'Indy Conducts Boston Symphony Orchestra in Concert of French Music.

For the first time in many years, a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Brooklyn, at the Baptist Temple, was conducted by another leader than Wilhelm Gericke, who gave place to Vincent d'Indy, a composer-conductor of the modern French school, who has come over here for a season to plead the cause, as it were, of the ultra-modern French composer of pure concert music. The programme was given over entirely to music of this class, the opening number being Mr. d'Indy's Second Symphony in B flat. He also conducted his "Saugefleurie" legend for orchestra, after a tale by Robert de Bonnieres; Gabriel Faure's "Pelleas and Melisande" suite, taken from the stage music to Maeterlinck's play, and Paul Dukas' "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," after a ballad by Geothe.

There was a natural curiosity to note a distinguished composer's interpretation of his own words and others in sympathy with his musical ideas, and in this respect the concert was grfatifying, even though it was somewhat disturbing in the character of its music to established notions of propriety in music-making for orchestra. Mr. d'Indy's symphony, especially, is peculiarly iconoclastic in its departure from conventional methods. Apparently he has tried to avoid all channels of rational procedure, and the result is a puzzling sequence of musical ideas, such as few if any in the audience last night ever heard before. It is one of those works which so attack the convictions and conceptions as to create uncertainty of mind as to how it should be regarded. It sounds as if the composer, with a strange insistence that music for to-day or the future shall be everything or anything but what it is. The mark of scholarly insight is apparent enough, and a thorough knowledge of evisting criterions is implied in the very defiance of them.

The other pieces are picturesque expressions of orchestral thought, scintillating, vivacious, yet withal poignant with warmth of feeling and subtlety of touch. Mr. d'Indy does not impress the observer as being primarily a great or inspiring conductor, but as one who commands the attention and best efforts of his players through respect for his knowledge, rather than through any executive magnetism of manner.

D'INDY DISAPPOINTS.

French Composer's Music at Symphony Concert Bewilders Hearers.

Patrons of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Brooklyn were aroused from the even tenor of their way of listening to the music of that renowned band Friday night when D'Indy, the French composer and two of his works, were introduced at the Baptist Temple. Here was a new and uncommon impetus for discussion of things musical; and when the audience dispersed, comments were on the lips of almost everybody—unfavorable, however, for the most part. Is it yet time to say the last word as to the value of the music of Vincent D'Indy? This composer stands in his home country at the head of a new school. What its future may evolve can, as yet, only be a matter of conjecture. This much is certain, that the symphony—the second, in B flat, op. 57—left the hearers bewildered. There was a time when Wagner was altogether mystifying; but the Frenchman's music mystifies in an entirely different way. There is ryhthm in it, but no apparent rhyme or reason. The four movements of the symphony mingle theme upon theme with most elaborate and extraordinary working out. The task of the composer is here appreciated; but the themes are left unfinished in the maze of sounds which every instrument of the full orchestra is called upon to make. There is a great striving after something without arriving anywhere. The conclusion of the last movement without clearing up the atmosphere after the misty movements and the storm, gives something pleasing and slightly tangible. There is withal, the touch of French brilliancy, and many a delicate rhythmatic episode appears here and there without being accounted for.

D'Indy is a tall, fine looking Frenchman, void of mannerisms, and an energetic conductor. He is not magnetic in the sense of making or holding either the orchestra or the audience, but the Boston musicians are calculated to play well-nigh perfectly without a leader.

The French composer's other work on the programme, "Sange-fleurie," was beautiful, and comprehensible.

The gem of the French evening was Gabriel Faure's suite, "Pelleas and Melisande," based on a story by Maeterlinck. The last number was "L'Apprenti Sorcier," by Paul Dukas, after a ballad of Goethe.

TOWN TOPICS Dec 14

CROTCHETS AND QUAVERS

TWO CARGOES OF MODERN FRENCH MUSIC

VINCENT D'INDY, stepfather of dissonances, appeared for the first time in the living at the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last week. He conducted his own compositions and he was composed in his own conducting. To be more explicit, he conducted like a composer and he composed like a conductor; and between the two the dear public nearly yawned its ears off. There was, to begin with, that dread B-flat Symphony, which was heard here last year, and proved a bore almost without end. I hoped to have been mistaken in the work, and hailed with delight the fact that d'Indy was to give us the author's interpretation of it. I am frank enough to admit that Mr. Gericke's reading was good enough to prove what a bad work it is. Bad is so elastic an adjective that I am eager to add that the work boasts of the most unpardonable of sins in music—that of being tiresome. This is not a mere matter of mood, for the work sounds hopeless after two patient hearings of it. In it d'Indy has nothing to tell us. He traffics in dissonances in abundance—which is not a sin if it is to a purpose; he fears a theme as something pernicious and vulgar, and he distorts his flow of utterance in a way that brings about irritating dissonances which seem to have been born of the desire to avoid melody rather than of the craving for effectiveness. And the lengths; the stretches of barren, mincing tonal speech; the tantalizing hints at themes better known as the creations of other composers, but so distorted that they would sound original if the ear could invent a logic for them instead of trying to match them with the sensible messages of the other composers! It was a very bad symphonic quarter of an hour.

The Chausson B-flat Symphony was a much happier work, for, to catalogue its greatest virtue first, it has but three movements to the other work's four divisions. It also comes nearer having real themes, but its absence from any program will scarcely ever be missed save by the curious ones. D'Indy's "Sangefleurie" rounded an interesting number in this welter of dissonant stuttering, and the Suite "Pelléas et Mélisandre," of Gabriele Fauré was not so nearly effective as it is with the drama—it relies so tremendously upon the background of the Maeterlinck play to which it was originally composed as incidental music. Then there was a Chant Funèbre by one Albéric Magnard, who is a pupil of d'Indy, and who is wealthy enough to have his own music published. Well, it is not every man's lot to be able to pay for his own Funeral March, and the work was, in all truth, a sad affair. It reminded me of a remark that is credited to Rousseau: "The French will never have music of their own, and if they have, so much the worse for them."

But there is another side to the medal, and that is filled with the titles of such estimable compositions as the Debussy "Nocturnes," with the Scherzo "L'Apprenti Sorcier," by Dukas, and even d'Indy's interesting "Istar" variations. These were all known to us, and while d'Indy the conductor gave these works a conventional reading the colors of the Debussy compositions glowed with ravishing tints when voiced by this exquisite orchestra. They are heavenly bits of writing—the "Nuages" being of a marvelous intangibility and pregnant with suggestions, and the "Fêtes" is unusual and original, keeping the ear alert through its entire length. Of the Dukas "L'Apprenti Sorcier" there is but to repeat that it is full of droll humor—actual humor and not the kind that is dependent upon the suggestions of the remarkable, valuable program notes by Philip Hale for these concerts.

This about completes the list of French compositions that were heard at these two Boston Symphony visits last week, and I hope everyone has had enough of French music to last them through at least one Winter. The greatest disappointment about this whole scheme, however, was that Monsieur d'Indy told us nothing new about the music of his native land. He did not seem to impress his own personality upon the men of the orchestra at all, but busied himself for the most part with beating time with his hands while reading the score with his eyes. We may have been spoiled in the matter of conductors by the wholesale importations of famous men that have been flung upon the shores of this unmusical island—at all events d'Indy impressed me very little as a master of men and of the baton. I would like to call the attention of Frederic Comee, the orchestra's fairy godfather-in-law, to the fact that the set of scenery that helps to Bostonize the platform of Carnegie Hall when this orchestra visits us is a shock. It has been bruised by scene bruisers, it has been leaked upon by nature and Carnegie Hall plumbing until it looks like the setting of a dance hall in a mining town.

There is nothing startling to report about the Metropolitan Opera House save that for the Saturday matinee there was a performance of "L'Elisir d'Amore," in which the curtain was so swiftly and impatiently allowed to descend that it struck Caruso on the cranium and almost shattered his head tones. Mme. Sembrich escaped with only a scare and an entanglement with the folds of the outer drop. There is wonderful stage management down at that opera house, more evidences of which were offered at the evening's performance of "Die Walküre," when the illumination of the duel scene between Siegmund and Hunding almost sent the good folk into convulsions of laughter. The management has had several years in which not to find a stage manager. It is about time it succeeded in finding one. The balance of this performance was good in spots. Fremstad made a stunning Sieglinde, towering head and shoulder above the Brünnhilde of Nordica, who is singing homeopathically of late. Dippel was the Siegmund whose memory lapsed for once, Van Rooy sang Wotan, but strayed from pitch oftener than was necessary in his effort to produce volume of sound. The crew of Valkyries sang not nearly so well as they would sing if there were more rehearsals, but Alfred Hertz conducted very well, and the orchestra was in fine fettle.

The Emotionalist.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in London
POST
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
DEC 2 - 1905

In Musical Circles

The coming of a new composer, conductor, performer is always followed by a looking up of his history, the critical review of his past and speculations as to his future. In the course of this process the guileless foreigner generally learns more interesting news about himself than he dreamed he could ever provoke. He also gets placed for futurity in as many different niches of the hall of fame as there are people who write about him. This is diverting and gives the intelligent foreigner a sense of the breeziness and unconventionality of American life. In Europe they generally say that a man would have done better if he had happened to be someone else, or if he had been more careful in the choice of his parents. If he had been born in America, on the other hand, he would have been made to feel that, if luck had made him a wild-haired Muscovite, of a German with a transcendental gleam in the off eye, or a fire-eating Frenchman, or an Italian with a redundancy of wives, genius would have seen to lurk in his ambrosial locks and temperament to gush from his personality in refreshing showers. No musician need hope for recognition, if he has a mere Anglo-Saxon name, if he bear the marks of Western tailor-made civilization, or if he talks English in such a way that people can understand him. Poor Edward MacDowell is a case in point; his songs and piano pieces are exquisite; but, because he is just an American citizen, because people can point out the post-office where he gets his mail and because they are sure he pays his butcher, they are only mildly interested in him. Addison said of the Londoners of his day that they would rather see a dead Indian than a live genius. Some Americans like looking at dead Indians too; but they share the Cockney indifference to genius unless it is of the wild-hatred, fiery-eyed description. But apropos of what is this railing at the dear general public which, like a good humored big boy never hits back though the frenzied critic strike ever so viciously? It is a prelude to some picturesque ramblings by Lawrence Gilman in the "Reviews of Reviews," in which that gentleman talks about Vincent D'Indy. Why, we are tempted to ask, does nobody write in the magazines in similar strain about American composers. Arthur Farwell goes about the country, like a musical John the Baptist, preaching the gospel of the new music which he sees somewhere on "the margin of the un-German;" Horatio Parker meditates the muse in ascetic polyphony in quiet New England; Edward Stillman Kelley finds that American art is better recognized in Germany than at home. But these things interest neither scribes nor public. Is it a relic of the old colonial habit of mind that makes people so slow to recognize home talent? Must American worth have the cachet of European approval before it is esteemed at par value in its own country? A note in the Rochester Symphony Orchestra programme concerning the two orchestral sketches of Henry F. Gilbert, may have a healthy effect on minds which are clouded with the miasma of inherited or acquired prejudice. Says the annotator:

"Henry F. Gilbert was born in Somerville, Mass., in 1868. As a boy he played the violin a little, and at twelve years of age ran a small amateur orchestra. It was after a sojourn abroad that he began his serious musical work. The "Two Episodes" which are to be produced at this concert are among his earlier orchestral works, but show the genius of this American composed. As he somewhat proudly declares, his tendencies in music are somewhat revolutionary. The unquestioning acknowledgment of the sacredness of European Art-Tradition by the mass of cultured Americans is exceedingly distasteful to him, and he uses these words on that subject: "I do not think we shall develop a significant and valuable musical art here in America until we have cast this aside, to an extent, and make a good, earnest endeavor to stand on our musical feet."

This, of course, is going a little too far on Mr. Gilbert's part. But doubtless he feels that, in order to get recognition for his position, he has to overstate it.

Now the reader will be ready for Mr. Gilman's words about Vincent d'Indy, having been forwarned that all the salt of the earth does not come from Europe and quietly re-informed that there is Attic savor in he work of Americans too. Mr. Gilman's article appears in the "Review of Reviews," for December.

"M. d'Indy, who comes to America to direct a number of the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will infuse into the winter's activities a vivid influence and personality. In the musical life of Paris no one occupies a more conspicuous and authoritative place. He is generally conceded to be the leader of the ultra-modern group of French composers, as distinguished from the school which includes such men as Saint-Saens, Massenet, and their artistic kinsmen. D'Indy, a pupil and devoted adherent of the luminous and gentle Cæsar Franck, is as far removed, in principle and practice, from this elder school as was Richard Wagner from the operatic idols of his day. Together with such other representatives of his class as Claude Debussy, Pierre de Breville, and Paul Dukas, he is an experimentalist in the matter of musical form and expres-

[129]

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in London
ILLUSTRATED TIMES
BUFFALO, N. Y.
DEC 10 1905

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Convention Hall, on Monday evening, February 19th. For the orchestra to come to Buffalo for a single concert is an undertaking of greatest difficulty. When it gave a concert here in October, it made Buffalo one of several cities visited on its fall tour, but in February it will make a special trip to this city. To carry such a large organization so far—for the Boston Symphony Orchestra takes with it on its trips as many men as the other orchestras use in their home cities—is a most expensive operation, and has been made possible only by the liberality of the music-loving men and women of Buffalo who are primarily responsible for the concerts.

If Mr. Gericke and the management believed that justice could be done to the orchestra and to the works performed by less than a minimum of seventy-five men, the Boston Orchestra could give many more concerts in cities distant from Boston; but it is believed by Mr. Gericke and the management that seventy-five men is absolutely the smallest number that can be used in a symphony concert. It is more than likely that the programme which Mr. Gericke will arrange for this city will call for eighty or eighty-five performers.

This week the orchestra is on the second of its regular monthly trips to New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Washington, and has as its guest Conductor Vincent d'Indy, the great French composer. The concerts under his direction in Boston on the first and second created a veritable sensation in Boston, and this week the extraordinary success of the orchestra in the programmes of modern French music is being repeated in the other great Eastern cities where it plays.

Two remarkable tributes have recently been paid to the orchestra. Last month the visiting conductor of the New York Philharmonic Society was Willem Mengelberg, the conductor of the famous Concertgebouw Orchestra of Amsterdam, the man to whom Richard Strauss dedicated his tremendous "Heldenleben." In an interview published in the New York papers, Mr. Mengelberg, who heard the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York, said that there was absolutely no orchestra in Europe which was its equal. Its superb tonal beauty and its astonishing virtuosity had been a revelation to him.

The other came from Mr. d'Indy. He first heard the orchestra he was to conduct the morning of his arrival in Boston when Mr. Gericke was rehearsing Charles Martin Loeffler's tremendously difficult "Villanelle du Diable." After he had listened about an hour, he turned to Mr. Loeffler, who was with him, and said:

"I did not believe it possible that there could be a more beautiful orchestra than the Philharmonics of Vienna, but this is greater. Such exquisite wood-winds, wonderful brass, and brilliant strings! The searching beauty of the string choirs quite surpasses anything I have ever heard. There is nothing in Europe to equal it."

Applications for seats may be made now to Mrs. Mal Davis Smith, 26 Irving Place. The programme and soloists of the concert will be announced in the very near future.

NEWS
CLEVELAND, O.
DEC 4 - 1905

ONE of the most distinguished of living composers has just arrived in America to conduct a few performances of his own works by the Boston Symphony orchestra. He is Vincent d'Indy, an acknowledged leader of the modern French school of music. Two of his most notable compositions are "The Song of The Bell" and "The Enchanted Forest," neither of which, I believe, has been heard in Cleveland. The reputation of d'Indy rests largely on his rare technical mastery. His polyphonic artistry, his use of rhythm and color, his skill and taste in orchestration—these cannot be too highly praised. His musical thought is seldom, if ever, sensuous. It is often, especially of late years, austere, and at times almost, if not wholly forbidding. A modern of the moderns, he reveres the memory of the great masters, whatever their country or century. He is today a strong influence in French musical life. His channel is a large one, and it

TOWN TOPICS Dec 14

CROTCHETS AND QUAVERS

TWO CARGOES OF MODERN FRENCH MUSIC

VINCENT D'INDY, stepfather of dissonances, appeared for the first time in the living at the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last week. He conducted his own compositions and he was composed in his own conducting. To be more explicit, he conducted like a composer and he composed like a conductor; and between the two the dear public nearly yawned its ears off. There was, to begin with, that dread B-flat Symphony, which was heard here last year, and proved a bore almost without end. I hoped to have been mistaken in the work, and hailed with delight the fact that d'Indy was to give us the author's interpretation of it. I am frank enough to admit that Mr. Gericke's reading was good enough to prove what a bad work it is. Bad is so elastic an adjective that I am eager to add that the work boasts of the most unpardonable of sins in music—that of being tiresome. This is not a mere matter of mood, for the work sounds hopeless after two patient hearings of it. In it d'Indy has nothing to tell us. He traffics in dissonances in abundance—which is not a sin if it is to a purpose; he fears a theme as something pernicious and vulgar, and he distorts his flow of utterance in a way that brings about irritating dissonances which seem to have been born of the desire to avoid melody rather than of the craving for effectiveness. And the lengths; the stretches of barren, mincing tonal speech; the tantalizing hints at themes better known as the creations of other composers, but so distorted that they would sound original if the ear could invent a logic for them instead of trying to match them with the sensible messages of the other composers! It was a very bad symphonic quarter of an hour.

The Chausson B-flat Symphony was a much happier work, for, to catalogue its greatest virtue first, it has but three movements to the other work's four divisions. It also comes nearer having real themes, but its absence from any program will scarcely ever be missed save by the curious ones. D'Indy's "Sangefleurie" sounded an interesting number in this welter of dissonant stuttering, and the Suite "Pelléas et Mélisandre," of Gabriele Fauré was not so nearly effective as it is with the drama—it relies so tremendously upon the background of the Maeterlinck play to which it was originally composed as incidental music. Then there was a Chant Funèbre by one Albéric Magnard, who is a pupil of d'Indy, and who is wealthy enough to have his own music published.

Well, it is not every man's lot to be able to pay for his own Funeral March, and the work was, in all truth, a sad affair. It reminded me of a remark that is credited to Rousseau: "The French will never have music of their own, and if they have, so much the worse for them."

But there is another side to the medal, and that is filled with the titles of such estimable compositions as the Debussy "Nocturnes," with the Scherzo "L'Apprenti Sorcier," by Dukas, and even d'Indy's interesting "Istar" variations. These were all known to us, and while d'Indy the conductor gave these works a conventional reading the colors of the Debussy compositions glowed with ravishing tints when voiced by this exquisite orchestra. They are heavenly bits of writing—the "Nuages" being of a marvelous intangibility and pregnant with suggestions, and the "Fêtes" is unusual and original, keeping the ear alert through its entire length. Of the Dukas "L'Apprenti Sorcier" there is but to repeat that it is full of droll humor—actual humor and not the kind that is dependent upon the suggestions of the remarkable, valuable program notes by Philip Hale for these concerts.

This about completes the list of French compositions that were heard at these two Boston Symphony visits last week, and I hope everyone has had enough of French music to last them through at least one Winter. The greatest disappointment about this whole scheme, however, was that Monsieur d'Indy told us nothing new about the music of his native land. He did not seem to impress his own personality upon the men of the orchestra at all, but busied himself for the most part with beating time with his hands while reading the score with his eyes. We may have been spoiled in the matter of conductors by the wholesale importations of famous men that have been flung upon the shores of this unmusical island—at all events d'Indy impressed me very little as a master of men and of the baton. I would like to call the attention of Frederic Comee, the orchestra's fairy godfather-in-law, to the fact that the set of scenery that helps to Bostonize the platform of Carnegie Hall when this orchestra visits us is a shock. It has been bruised by scene bruisers, it has been leaked upon by nature and Carnegie Hall plumbing until it looks like the setting of a dance hall in a mining town.

There is nothing startling to report about the Metropolitan Opera House save that for the Saturday matinee there was a performance of "L'Elisir d'Amore," in which the curtain was so swiftly and impatiently allowed to descend that it struck Caruso on the cranium and almost shattered his head tones. Mme. Sembrich escaped with only a scare and an entanglement with the folds of the outer drop. There is wonderful stage management down at that opera house, more evidences of which were offered at the evening's performance of "Die Walküre," when the illumination of the duel scene between Siegmund and Hunding almost sent the good folk into convulsions of laughter. The management has had several years in which not to find a stage manager. It is about time it succeeded in finding one. The balance of this performance was good in spots. Fremstad made a stunning Sieglinde, towering head and shoulder above the Brünnhilde of Nordica, who is singing homeopathically of late. Dippel was the Siegmund whose memory lapsed for once, Van Rooy sang Wotan, but strayed from pitch oftener than was necessary in his effort to produce volume of sound. The crew of Valkyries sang not nearly so well as they would sing if there were more rehearsals, but Alfred Hertz conducted very well, and the orchestra was in fine fettle.

The Emotionalist.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
POST
om
dress ROCHESTER, N. Y. te DEC 2 - 1911

In Musical Circles

The coming of a new composer, conductor, performer is always followed by a looking up of his history, the critical review of his past and speculations as to his future. In the course of this process the guileless foreigner generally learns more interesting news about himself than he dreamed he could ever provoke. He also gets placed for futurity in as many different niches of the hall of fame as there are people who write about him. This is diverting and gives the intelligent foreigner a sense of the breeziness and unconventionality of American life. In Europe they generally say that a man would have done better if he had happened to be someone else, or if he had been more careful in the choice of his parents. If he had been born in America, on the other hand, he would have been made to feel that, if luck had made him a wild-haired Muscovite, or a German with a transcendental gleam in the off eye, or a fire-eating Frenchman, or an Italian with a redundancy of wives, genius would have seen to lurk in his ambrosial locks and temperament to gush from his personality in refreshing showers. No musician need hope for recognition, if he has a mere Anglo-Saxon name, if he bear the marks of Western tailor—made civilization, or if he talks English in such a way that people can understand him. Poor Edward MacDowell is a case in point; his songs and piano pieces are exquisite; but, because he is just an American citizen, because people can point out the post-office where he gets his mail and because they are sure he pays his butcher, they are only mildly interested in him. Addison said of the Londoners of his day that they would rather see a dead Indian than a live genius. Some Americans like looking at dead Indians too; but they share the Cockney indifference to genius unless it is of the wild-haired, fiery-eyed description. But apropos of what is this railing at the dear general public which, like a good humored big boy never hits back though the frenzied critic strike ever so viciously? It is a prelude to some picturesque ramblings by Lawrence Gilman in the "Reviews of Reviews," in which that gentleman talks about Vincent D'Indy. Why, we are tempted to ask, does nobody write in the magazines in similar strain about American composers. Arthur Farwell goes about the country, like a musical John the Baptist, preaching the gospel of the new music which he sees somewhere on "the margin of the un-German;" Horatio Parker meditates the muse in ascetic polyphony in quiet New England; Edward Stillman Kelley finds that American art is better recognized in Germany than at home. But these things interest neither scribes nor public. Is it a relic of the old colonial habit of mind that makes people so slow to recognize home talent? Must American worth have the cachet of European approval before it is esteemed at par value in its own country? A note in the Rochester Symphony Orchestra programme concerning the two orchestral sketches of Henry F. Gilbert, may have a healthy effect on minds which are clouded with the miasma of inherited or acquired prejudice. Says the annotator:

"Henry F. Gilbert was born in Somerville, Mass., in 1868. As a boy he played the violin a little, and at twelve years of age ran a small amateur orchestra. It was after a sojourn abroad that he began his serious musical work. The "Two Episodes" which are to be produced at this concert are among his earlier orchestral works, but show the genius of this American composed. As he somewhat proudly declares, his tendencies in music are somewhat revolutionary. The unquestioning acknowledgment of the sacredness of European Art-Tradition by the mass of cultured Americans is exceedingly distasteful to him, and he uses these words on that subject: "I do not think we shall develop a significant and valuable musical art here in America until we have cast this aside, to an extent, and make a good, earnest endeavor to stand on our musical feet."

This, of course, is going a little too far on Mr. Gilbert's part. But doubtless he feels that, in order to get recognition for his position, he has to overstate it.

Now the reader will be ready for Mr. Gilman's words about Vincent d'Indy, having been forwarned that all the salt of the earth does not come from Europe and quietly re-informed that there is Attic savor in he work of Americans too. Mr. Gilman's article appears in the "Review of Reviews," for December.

"M. d'Indy, who comes to America to direct a number of the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will infuse into the winter's activities a vivid influence and personality. In the musical life of Paris no one occupies a more conspicuous and authoritative place. He is generally conceded to be the leader of the ultra-modern group of French composers, as distinguished from the school which includes such men as Saint-Saens, Massenet, and their artistic kinsmen. D'Indy, a pupil and devoted adherent of the luminous and gentle Casar Franck, is as far removed, in principle and practice, from this elder school as was Richard Wagner from the operatic idols of his day. Together with such other representatives of his class as Claude Debussy, Pierre de Breville, and Paul Dukas, he is an experimentalist in the matter of musical form and expression. A musician of profound learning and the broadest sympathy with the brilliant but formalities of Saint-Saens, or the equally vacuous sentimentalities of Massenet and his followers. He is an ardent lover of the natural world, a man of wide reading, of keen discrimination and catholic sympathies; yet his predisposition is toward the austere rather than toward that which is merely gracious and immediately appealing. He is essentially an aristocrat, in his tastes and in his art,—yet an aristocrat who is also a radical, even a revolutionist, in his methods and tendencies. For him, all that Wagner had achieved in the matter of harmonic novelty and flexibility of form is as a point of departure. He goes even further beyond Wagner in such matters than Wagner went beyond Gluck, Weber, and his immediate forerunners. Compared with such a work as d'Indy's B-flat symphony, for example, Wagner's "Tristan," which, a quarter of a century ago, seemed to touch the furthest limits of musical radicalism, sounds as simple and comprehensible as a score by Mozart or Haydn would have sounded beside what was then Wagner's most adventurous achievement."

1
ess

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Convention Hall on Monday evening, February 19th. For the orchestra to come to Buffalo for a single concert is an undertaking of greatest difficulty. When it gave a concert here in October, it made Buffalo one of several cities visited on its fall tour, but in February it will make a special trip to this city. To carry such a large organization so far—for the Boston Symphony Orchestra takes with it on its trips as many men as the other orchestras use in their home cities—is a most expensive operation, and has been made possible only by the liberality of the music-loving men and women of Buffalo who are primarily responsible for the concerts.

If Mr. Gericke and the management believed that justice could be done to the orchestra and to the works performed by less than a minimum of seventy-five men, the Boston Orchestra could give many more concerts in cities distant from Boston; but it is believed by Mr. Gericke and the management that seventy-five men is absolutely the smallest number that can be used in a symphony concert. It is more than likely that the programme which Mr. Gericke will arrange for this city will call for eighty or eighty-five performers.

This week the orchestra is on the second of its regular monthly trips to New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Washington, and has as its guest Conductor Vincent d'Indy, the great French composer. The concerts under his direction in Boston on the first and second created a veritable sensation in Boston, and this week the extraordinary success of the orchestra in the programmes of modern French music is being repeated in the other great Eastern cities where it plays.

Two remarkable tributes have recently been paid to the orchestra. Last month the visiting conductor of the New York Philharmonic Society was Willem Mengelberg, the conductor of the famous Concertgebouw Orchestra of Amsterdam, the man to whom Richard Strauss dedicated his tremendous "Heldenleben." In an interview published in the New York papers, Mr. Mengelberg, who heard the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York, said that there was absolutely no orchestra in Europe which was its equal. Its superb tonal beauty and its astonishing virtuosity had been a revelation to him.

The other came from Mr. d'Indy. He first heard the orchestra he was to conduct the morning of his arrival in Boston when Mr. Gericke was rehearsing Charles Martin Loeffler's tremendously difficult "Villanelle du Diable." After he had listened about an hour, he turned to Mr. Loeffler, who was with him, and said:

"I did not believe it possible that there could be a more beautiful orchestra than the Philharmonics of Vienna, but this is greater. Such exquisite wood-winds, wonderful brass, and brilliant strings! The searching beauty of the string choirs quite surpasses anything I have ever heard. There is nothing in Europe to equal it."

Applications for seats may be made now to Mrs. Mai Davis Smith, 26 Irving Place. The programme and soloists of the concert will be announced in the very near future.

s

ONE of the most distinguished of living composers has just arrived in America to conduct a few performances of his own works by the Boston Symphony orchestra. He is Vincent d'Indy, an acknowledged leader of the modern French school of music. Two of his most notable compositions are "The Song of The Bell" and "The Enchanted Forest," neither of which, I believe, has been heard in Cleveland. The reputation of d'Indy rests largely on his rare technical mastery. His polyphonic artistry, his use of rhythm and color, his skill and taste in orchestration—these cannot be too highly praised. His musical thought is seldom, if ever, sensuous; it is often, especially of late years, austere, and at times almost, if not wholly forbidding. A modern of the moderns, he reveres the memory of the great masters, whatever their country or century. He is today a strong influence in French musical life. His chapel is a large one, and it is filled with the faithful.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
ILLUSTRATED TIMES

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Convention Hall, on Monday evening, February 19th. For the orchestra to come to Buffalo for a single concert is an undertaking of greatest difficulty. When it gave a concert here in October, it made Buffalo one of several cities visited on its fall tour, but in February it will make a special trip to this city. To carry such a large organization so far—for the Boston Symphony Orchestra with it on its trips as many men as the other orchestras use in their home cities—is a most expensive operation, and has been made possible only by the liberality of the music loving men and women of Buffalo who are primarily responsible for the concerts.

believed that justice could be done to the orchestra and to the works performed by less than a minimum of seventy-five men, the Boston Orchestra could give many more concerts in cities distant from Boston; but it is believed by Mr. Gericke and the management that seventy-five men is absolutely the smallest number that can be used in a symphony concert. It is more than likely that the program which Mr. Gericke will arrange for this city will call for eighty or eighty-five performers. This week the Orchestra is on the second of its regular monthly trips to New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington and has as its guest conductor, Vincent d'Indy, the great French composer.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

...Paper Cutting Bureau in the World
From REVIEW OF REVIEWS.
Address NEW YORK CITY.
Date DEC - - 1905

FOREIGN CONDUCTORS OF THIS SEASON'S MUSIC.

BY LAWRENCE GILMAN.

(Mr. Gilman is a well-known music critic for several metropolitan journals.)

THE "star" conductor, who has long been a conspicuous and essential feature of the foreign concert stage, is in prospect of becoming indispensable to musical America. Within the last two years we have been permitted, — in considerable part through the enterprise of the Philharmonic Society of New York, — to observe the activities of most of the "bâton prima donnas" of the old world. We have heard—and seen—the Germans, Weingartner, Strauss, and Kogel, the Frenchman Colonne, the Englishman Wood, and the Russian Safonov at the Philharmonic; and at the opera, the eminent and admirable Mottl. During the coming season the Philharmonic Society, persisting in its munificent and energetic policy, has arranged to import for the direction of its concerts four more European conductors of distinction, hitherto strangers to America, —Willem Mengelberg, of Amsterdam; Max Fiedler, of Hamburg; Ernst Kunwald, of Frankfort; and Fritz Steinbach, of Cologne. Aside from the Philharmonic's plans, the season will be made exceptionably notable by the visit of M. Vincent d'Indy, who stands at the head of the younger French school of composers, and of Serge Vasilyevich Rachmaninov, director of the Imperial Opera at Moscow, and one of the most forceful and imaginative of living Russian music-makers.

M. VINCENT D'INDY, THE EMINENT FRENCH COMPOSER.

(M. d'Indy will visit the United States this season and conduct a series of concerts with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.)

M. d'Indy, who comes to America to direct a number of the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will infuse into the winter's activities a vivid influence and personality. In the musical life of Paris no one occupies a more conspicuous and authoritative place. He is generally conceded to be the leader of the ultra-modern group of French composers, as distinguished from the school which includes such men as Saint-Saëns, Massenet, and their artistic kinsmen. D'Indy, a pupil and devoted adherent of the luminous and gentle César Franck, is as far removed, in principle and practice, from this elder school as was Richard Wagner from the operatic idols of his day. Together with such other representatives of his class as Claude Debussy, Pierre de Bréville, and Paul Dukas, he is an experimentalist in the matter of musical form and expression. A musician of profound learning and the broadest culture, he has little sympathy with the brilliant but vacuous formalities of Saint-Saëns, or the equally vacuous sentimentalities of Massenet and his followers. He is an ardent lover of the natural world, a man of wide reading, of keen discrimination and catholic sympathies; yet his predisposition is toward the austere, rather than toward that which is merely gracious and immediately appealing. He is essentially an aristocrat, in his tastes and in his art, —yet an aristocrat who is also a radical, even a revolutionist, in his methods and tendencies.

...MERCIAL
...FFALO.
...ddress
...ate DEC 9 1905

Monday evening, February 19th, at Convention Hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its second concert in Buffalo this season, the program for which, with the names of the soloists, will soon be announced. Conductor Gericke will bring with him at least 75 men, and it is quite likely that the program he arranges for Buffalo may require 80 or 85 performers, in which event he will come here with practically the full strength of his great orchestra. To bring such an organization to Buffalo would be possible only at tremendous expense and it could not have been done except by the co-operation and support of music-loving men and women of the city, who have guaranteed a certain amount of the cost, and are therefore primarily responsible for these concerts. Buffalo is the only city of the middle west which gets the Boston orchestra for more than a single concert this season. This week the orchestra is on the second of its monthly trips to New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington, and has as its guest conductor the great French composer, Vincent d'Indy, under whose direction it is presenting with tremendous success programs made up entirely of French music. The concerts given under M. d'Indy's conductorship in Boston last week created a sensation. Seats for the second concert will not be put on sale until shortly before the appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Buffalo, but reservations for this event may be made now upon application to Mrs. Mai Davis Smith, 26 Irving place.

...Paper Cutting Bureau in the World
...
...DEC 10 1905

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Convention Hall, on Monday evening, Feb. 19. For the Orchestra to come to Buffalo for a single concert is an undertaking of great difficulty. For the concerts given in October, Buffalo was one of several cities visited, but in February a special trip must be made to this city. To carry such a large organization so far—for the Boston Symphony Orchestra takes with it on its trips as many men as the other orchestras use in their home cities—is a most expensive operation and has been made possible only by the liberality of the music loving men and women of Buffalo, who are principally responsible for the concerts. If Mr. Gericke and the management believed that justice could be done to the orchestra and to the works performed by less than a minimum of 75 men, the Boston Orchestra could give many more concerts in cities distant from Boston; but it is believed by Mr. Gericke and the management that 75 men is absolutely the smallest number that can be used in a symphony concert. It is more than likely that the programme which Mr. Gericke will arrange for this city will call for 80 or 85 performers.

This week the orchestra is on the second of its regular monthly trips to New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington, and has as its guest conductor, Vincent d'Indy, the great French composer. The concerts under his direction in Boston on the 1st and 2d, created a veritable sensation and this week the extraordinary success of the orchestra in the programmes of modern French music is being repeated in the other great eastern cities.

Two remarkable tributes have recently been paid to the orchestra. Last month, the visiting conductor of the New York Philharmonic Society was Willem Mengelberg, the conductor of the famous Concertgebour Orchestra of Amsterdam, the man to whom Richard Strauss dedicated his tremendous "Heldenleben." In an interview published in the New York papers, Mr. Mengelberg, who heard the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York, said that there was absolutely no orchestra in Europe which was its equal. Its superb tonal beauty and its astonishing virtuosity had been a revelation to him.

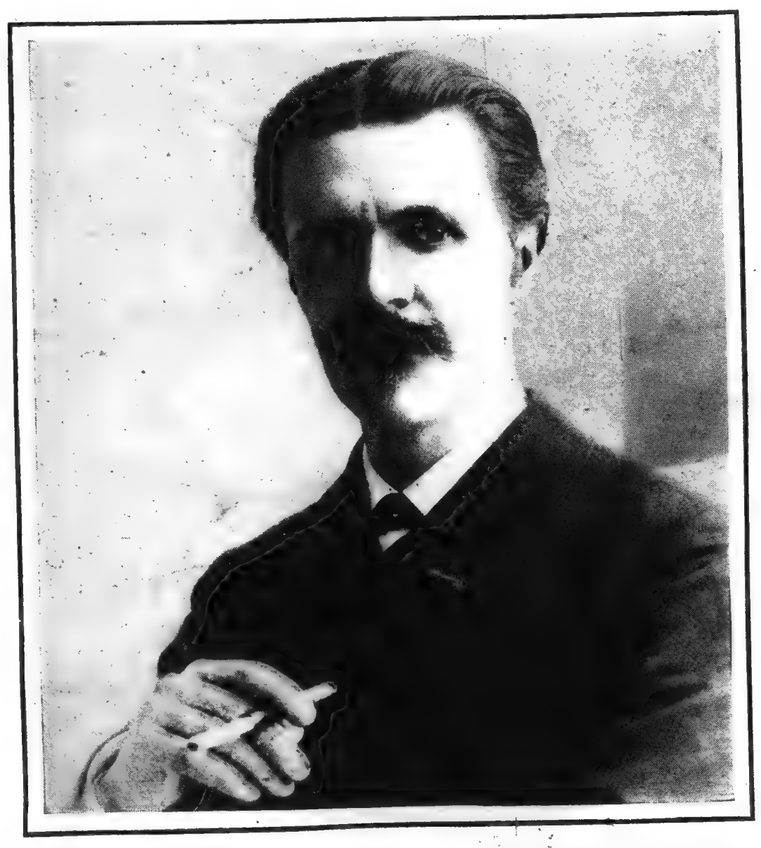
The other came from Mr. d'Indy. He first heard the orchestra he was to conduct the morning of his arrival in Boston when Mr. Gericke was rehearsing Charles Martin Loeffler's tremendously difficult "Villanelle du Diable." After he had listened about an hour, he turned to Mr. Loeffler who was with him and said:

"I did not believe it poesible that there could be a more beautiful orchestra than the Philharmonic of Vienna, but this is greater. Such exquisite wood-winds, wonderful brass and brilliant strings! The searching beauty of the string choirs quite surpass anything I have ever heard. There is nothing in Europe to equal it."

Applications for seats may be made now to Mrs. Mai Davis Smith, 26 Irving Place. The programme and soloists of the concert will be announced in the near future.

Harper's Weekly, Dec 9, 1905

M. Vincent D'Indy, the eminent French composer, who is now visiting America upon the invitation of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, comes in the interest of an excellent cause—that of contemporary French music. In extending this invitation, the Boston Orchestra has desired to honor the younger French school of composers of whom M. D'Indy is probably the most conspicuous member—the school which comprises such men as Debussy, De Bréville, Fauré, Dukas, Bruneau, and Charpentier, and which seems gradually to be superseding, in the estimation of thoughtful and independent musicians, the German school of which Richard Strauss is the chief exponent. An overinsistence upon the relative value of various "schools," as such, is apt to result in too confident generalizations; but it may justly be said of the younger Frenchmen whom M. D'Indy represents that they stand essentially for those elements in their art that make for subtlety of mood and color and refinement of workmanship, as opposed to the more rhetorical methods of their German contemporaries. Although M. D'Indy embodies, in a marked degree, certain of the dominant traits of his school, he yet occupies a unique position among his fellows. A singularly modest man, he is an aristocrat in his art. Those for whom modern French music is typified in the effusiveness of Massenet and the arid brilliancy of Saint-Saëns will find in the music of D'Indy much that may seem, at first, strange and uninviting. Without pose or affectation of attitude, he is genuinely indifferent to whatever immediate impression his work may make. Effects that are easily achieved, the facile eloquence of those who write frankly for applause, have no share in his purpose. His musical temperament is austere rather than winning, powerful rather than persuasive. He has little of the serene aloofness that so often characterizes the music of his master, César Franck, nor has he anything of the color and sensibility of Debussy, or Fauré's Verlaine-like melancholy. With a technical mastery that is not surpassed by any living composer, M. D'Indy commands an idiom entirely his own. Whatever judgment one may form of his work, the dignity and completeness of his art are indisputable.



Vincent D'Indy, the eminent French Composer

M. D'Indy, who is now visiting America, will conduct several concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra

[130]

...MERCIAL
...from
...ddress
...ate

Monday evening, February 19th, at Convention Hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its second concert in Buffalo this season, the program for which, with the names of the soloists, will soon be announced. Conductor Gericke will bring with him at least 75 men, and it is quite likely that the program he arranges for Buffalo may require 80 or 85 performers, in which event he will come here with practically the full strength of his great orchestra. To bring such an organization to Buffalo would be possible only at tremendous expense and it could not have been done except by the co-operation and support of music-loving men and women of the city, who have guaranteed a certain amount of the cost, and are therefore primarily responsible for these concerts. Buffalo is the only city of the middle west which gets the Boston orchestra for more than a single concert this season. This week the orchestra is on the second of its monthly trips to New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington, and has as its guest conductor the great French composer, Vincent d'Indy, under whose direction it is presenting with tremendous success programs made up entirely of French music. The concerts given under M. d'Indy's conductorship in Boston last week created a sensation. Seats for the second concert will not be put on sale until shortly before the appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Buffalo, but reservations for this event may be made now upon application to Mrs. Mai Davis Smith, 26 Irving place.

...Paper Cutting Bureau in the World
From REVIEW OF REVIEWS
Address NEW YORK CITY.
Date DEC - - 1905

FOREIGN CONDUCTORS OF THIS SEASON'S MUSIC.

BY LAWRENCE GILMAN.

(Mr. Gilman is a well-known music critic for several metropolitan journals.)

THE "star" conductor, who has long been a conspicuous and essential feature of the foreign concert stage, is in prospect of becoming indispensable to musical America. Within the last two years we have been permitted, — in considerable part through the enterprise of the Philharmonic Society of New York, — to observe the activities of most of the "bâton prima donnas" of the old world. We have heard—and seen—the Germans, Weingartner, Strauss, and Kogel, the Frenchman Colonne, the Englishman Wood, and the Russian Safonov at the Philharmonic; and at the opera, the eminent and admirable Mottl. During the coming season the Philharmonic Society, persisting in its munificent and energetic policy, has arranged to import for the direction of its concerts four more European conductors of distinction, hitherto strangers to America, —Willem Mengelberg, of Amsterdam; Max Fiedler, of Hamburg; Ernst Kunwald, of Frankfort; and Fritz Steinbach, of Cologne. Aside from the Philharmonic's plans, the season will be made exceptionably notable by the visit of M. Vincent d'Indy, who stands at the head of the younger French school of composers, and of Serge Vasilyevich Rachmaninov, director of the Imperial Opera at Moscow, and one of the most forceful and imaginative of living Russian music-makers.

M. d'Indy, who comes to America to direct a number of the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will infuse into the winter's activities a vivid influence and personality. In the musical life of Paris no one occupies a more conspicuous and authoritative place. He is generally conceded to be the leader of the ultra-modern group of French composers, as distinguished from the school which includes such men as Saint-Saëns, Massenet, and their artistic kinsmen. D'Indy, a pupil and devoted adherent of the luminous and gentle César Franck, is as far removed, in principle and practice, from this elder school as was Richard Wagner from the operatic idols of his day. Together with such other representatives of his class as Claude Debussy, Pierre de Bréville, and Paul Dukas, he is an experimentalist in the matter of musical form and expression. A musician of profound learning and the broadest culture, he has little sympathy with the brilliant but vacuous formalities of Saint-Saëns, or the equally vacuous sentimentalities of Massenet and his followers. He is an ardent lover of the natural world, a man of wide reading, of keen discrimination and catholic sympathies; yet his predisposition is toward the austere, rather than toward that which is merely gracious and immediately appealing. He is essentially an aristocrat, in his tastes and in his art, —yet an aristocrat who is also a radical, even a revolutionist, in his methods and tendencies.

M. VINCENT D'INDY, THE EMINENT FRENCH COMPOSER.

(M. d'Indy will visit the United States this season and conduct a series of concerts with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.)

...Paper Cutting Bureau in the World
...ss

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Convention Hall, on Monday evening, Feb. 19. For the Orchestra to come to Buffalo for a single concert is an undertaking of great difficulty. For the concerts given in October, Buffalo was one of several cities visited, but in February a special trip must be made to this city. To carry such a large organization so far—for the Boston Symphony Orchestra takes with it on its trips as many men as the other orchestras use in their home cities—is a most expensive operation and has been made possible only by the liberality of the music loving men and women of Buffalo, who are principally responsible for the concerts. If Mr. Gericke and the management believed that justice could be done to the orchestra and to the works performed by less than a minimum of 75 men, the Boston Orchestra could give many more concerts in cities distant from Boston; but it is believed by Mr. Gericke and the management that 75 men is absolutely the smallest number that can be used in a symphony concert. It is more than likely that the programme which Mr. Gericke will arrange for this city will call for 80 or 85 performers.

This week the orchestra is on the second of its regular monthly trips to New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington, and has as its guest conductor, Vincent d'Indy, the great French composer. The concerts under his direction in Boston on the 1st and 2d, created a veritable sensation and this week the extraordinary success of the orchestra in the programmes of modern French music is being repeated in the other great eastern cities.

Two remarkable tributes have recently been paid to the orchestra. Last month, the visiting conductor of the New York Philharmonic Society was Willem Mengelberg, the conductor of the famous Concertgebour Orchestra of Amsterdam, the man to whom Richard Strauss dedicated his tremendous "Heldenleben." In an interview published in the New York papers, Mr. Mengelberg, who heard the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York, said that there was absolutely no orchestra in Europe which was its equal. Its superb tonal beauty and its astonishing virtuosity had been a revelation to him.

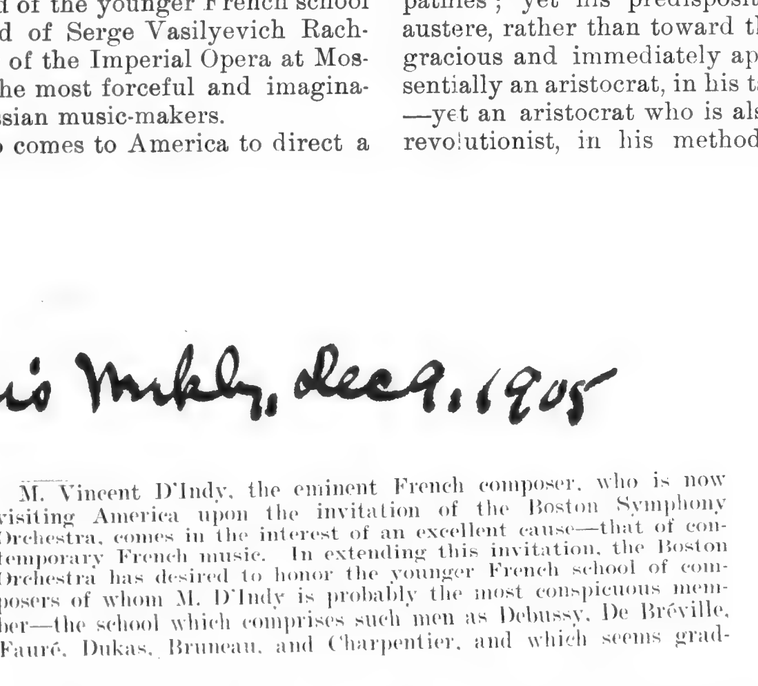
The other came from Mr. d'Indy. He first heard the orchestra he was to conduct the morning of his arrival in Boston when Mr. Gericke was rehearsing Charles Martin Loeffler's tremendously difficult "Villanelle du Diable." After he had listened about an hour, he turned to Mr. Loeffler who was with him and said:

"I did not believe it possible that there could be a more beautiful orchestra than the Philharmonic of Vienna, but this is greater. Such exquisite wood-winds, wonderful brass and brilliant strings! The searching beauty of the string choirs quite surpass anything I have ever heard. There is nothing in Europe to equal it."

Applications for seats may be made now to Mrs. Mai Davis Smith, 26 Irving Place. The programme and soloists of the concert will be announced in the near future.

Harper's Weekly, Dec 9, 1905

M. Vincent D'Indy, the eminent French composer, who is now visiting America upon the invitation of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, comes in the interest of an excellent cause—that of contemporary French music. In extending this invitation, the Boston Orchestra has desired to honor the younger French school of composers of whom M. D'Indy is probably the most conspicuous member—the school which comprises such men as Debussy, De Bréville, Fauré, Dukas, Bruneau, and Charpentier, and which seems gradually to be superseding, in the estimation of thoughtful and independent musicians, the German school of which Richard Strauss is the chief exponent. An overinsistence upon the relative value of various "schools," as such, is apt to result in too confident generalizations; but it may justly be said of the younger Frenchmen whom M. D'Indy represents that they stand essentially for those elements in their art that make for subtlety of mood and color and refinement of workmanship, as opposed to the more rhetorical methods of their German contemporaries. Although M. D'Indy embodies, in a marked degree, certain of the dominant traits of his school, he yet occupies a unique position among his fellows. A singularly modest man, he is an aristocrat in his art. Those for whom modern French music is typified in the effusiveness of Massenet and the arid brilliancy of Saint-Saëns will find in the music of D'Indy much that may seem, at first, strange and uninviting. Without pose or affectation of attitude, he is genuinely indifferent to whatever immediate impression his work may make. Effects that are easily achieved, the facile eloquence of those who write frankly for applause, have no share in his purpose. His musical temperament is austere rather than winning, powerful rather than persuasive. He has little of the serene aloofness that so often characterizes the music of his master, César Franck, nor has he anything of the color and sensibility of Debussy, or Fauré's Verlaine-like melancholy. With a technical mastery that is not surpassed by any living composer, M. D'Indy commands an idiom entirely his own. Whatever judgment one may form of his work, the dignity and completeness of his art are indisputable.



Vincent D'Indy, the eminent French Composer

M. D'Indy, who is now visiting America, will conduct several concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra

[130]

Herr Fritz Steinbach, of Cologne, one of the new Philharmonic conductors. Steinbach is known as a specialist in the music of Brahms.

Myneer Willem Mengelberg, of Amsterdam, the distinguished Dutch conductor, and the first of the Philharmonics Society's newleaders to appear this season.

Herr Max Fiedler, of Hamburg, one of the Philharmonic Society's new conductors. Fiedler is Director of the Conservatory of Music at Hamburg.

THREE OF THE SEASON'S NEW MUSICAL CONDUCTORS FROM ABROAD.

For him, all that Wagner had achieved in the matter of harmonic novelty and flexibility of form is as a point of departure. He goes even further beyond Wagner in such matters than Wagner went beyond Gluck, Weber, and his immediate forerunners. Compared with such a work as d'Indy's B-flat symphony, for example, Wagner's "Tristan," which, a quarter of a century ago, seemed to touch the furthest limits of musical radicalism, sounds as simple and comprehensible as a score by Mozart or Haydn would have sounded beside what was then Wagner's most adventurous achievement.

Since the appearance, thirty years ago, of his "Piccolomine" overture (now the second part of his "Wallenstein" trilogy), d'Indy has composed industriously in nearly all the established musical forms. There are orchestral tone-poems of frankly impressionistic intent, as "La Forêt Enchantée," "Saugefleurie," the "Istar" variations, an "Antony and Cleopatra" overture (since discarded from the authorized list of his works), and "The Song of the Bell," after Schiller,—a "symphony" for solo voices, double chorus, and orchestra. He has written, besides, two operas, "Fervaal" and "L'Etranger;" "The Ride of the Cid," for baritone, chorus, and orchestra; incidental music to Catulle Mendés' "Medée;" a cantata, "Mary Magdalene;" "Sur la Mer," a chorus for female voices; "Clair de Lune," for voice and orchestra, after Hugo; a symphony for piano and orchestra "on a French mountain air;" and the extraordinarily complex, forbidding, yet impressive B-flat symphony performed in New York last season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. There are, besides, other works of somewhat less moment,—orchestral pieces, chamber music, and some songs. Since 1896, d'Indy has been at the head of the celebrated Schola Cantorum of Paris, an excellent and influential institution which he founded with Charles Bordes and Alexandre Guilmant.

D'INDY, ONE OF THE MOST ORIGINAL TEMPERAMENTS IN MODERN MUSIC.

In his quality as a musician d'Indy is not so subtle nor so poetic as Debussy; he has not De Bréville's refinement, nor Dukas' wit and delicacy, nor Charpentier's direct and obvious appeal, and he is less dramatic than Bruneau. But in his mastery of musical structure he is without a superior. Not even Richard Strauss surpasses him in this respect, for all his breadth of imagination and progressiveness of method. His command of the entire technique of expression,—harmonic, melodic, and orchestral,—is unexcelled in modern music: his executive power is on a par with his originality of thought. His independence of all traditions and restrictions not infrequently results, beyond question, in music

Herr Ernst Kunwald, of Frankfort, who will conduct one of the Philharmonic Society's concerts this winter. Kunwald introduced the Wagner music-dramas in Spain.

Prof. S. V. Rachmaninov, the celebrated Russian composer and conductor, who will appear this season with the Russian Symphony Orchestra.

Prof. Vassily Safonov, of Moscow, head of the Moscow Imperial Conservatory, who will conduct for the Philharmonic and Russian Symphony Societies this winter.

THREE VISITING COMPOSERS AND CONDUCTORS FROM EUROPE.

which it is difficult to call beautiful, and which does not seem, at first hearing, particularly eloquent. But there are other times when his method is undeniably successful,—when he achieves a beauty and significance which completely justify whatever extremes he may have resorted to to compass them. There are arid places in his later music, passages of singular ugliness, others of doubtful effectiveness; but, throughout, one feels the workings of a vigorous and purposeful intelligence,—the informing influence of one of the most distinguished and original temperaments in modern music.

A FAMOUS RUSSIAN COMPOSER.

An occasion scarcely less interesting than the visit of d'Indy will be the appearance, in conjunction with the Russian Symphony Orchestra, of Serge Vasilyevich Rachmaninov, conductor of the Imperial Opera at Moscow, and one of the most ardent and influential forces in contemporary music. Comparatively little of Rachmaninov's work is known in America, although he has written quite abundantly in both the larger and smaller forms. He was born at Novgorod in 1873, entered the St. Petersburg conservatory when he was nine years old, and later studied in Moscow with the pianist Siloti and with his brother composer Anton Stepanovitch Arensky. A man whose temperament is both rich and impulsive, he is dramatic rather than contemplative, forthright and masterful rather than sensitive,—the temperament of Richard Strauss rather than of César Franck. He is young, and his youth is reflected in his art,—not in any immaturity, for that is not readily discoverable, but in exuberance, freshness of sentiment, and largeness of endeavor. Rachmaninov has composed three operas,—"The Bohemians," "The Avaricious Knight" (based upon poems by Pushkin), and "Francesca da Rimini;" a symphony; a tone-poem for orchestra, "The Cliff;" a cantata, "Spring," for chorus and baritone; a "Bohemian Caprice," for orchestra; two piano concertos, two four-hand suites (one of which, re-scored for orchestra, will be conducted by Rachmaninov on the occasion of his appearance with the Russian Symphony Orchestra), a piano trio, a 'cello sonata, a number of smaller works for piano, and numerous songs. He is best known to thoughtful music lovers in this country by his superb orchestral fantasy, "The Cliff," produced by the Russian Symphony Orchestra, for the first time in America, in January, 1904,—one of the most impressive pieces of orchestral scene-painting since Wagner, and a work which went far toward justifying those who have claimed for modern Russian music a unique and characteristic excellence. It is thought that Rachmaninov may possibly bring

COMMERCIAL
from BUFFALO
address
DEC 9
date

Monday evening, February 19th, at Convention Hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its second concert in Buffalo this season, the program for which, with the names of the soloists, will soon be announced. Conductor Gericke will bring with him at least 75 men, and it is quite likely that the program he arranges for Buffalo may require 80 or 85 performers, in which event he will come here with practically the full strength of his great orchestra. To bring such an organization to Buffalo would be possible only at tremendous expense and it could not have been done except by the co-operation and support of music-loving men and women of the city, who have guaranteed a certain amount of the cost, and are therefore primarily responsible for these concerts. Buffalo is the only city of the middle west which gets the Boston orchestra for more than a single concert this season. This week the orchestra is on the second of its monthly trips to New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington, and has as its guest conductor the great French composer, Vincent d'Indy, under whose direction it is presenting with tremendous success programs made up entirely of French music. The concerts given under M. d'Indy's conductorship in Boston last week created a sensation. Seats for the second concert will not be put on sale until shortly before the appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Buffalo, but reservations for this event may be made now upon application to Mrs. Mai Davis Smith, 28 Irving place.

Press-Clipping Bureau in the World
BUFFALO, N. Y.
DEC 10 1905

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Convention Hall, on Monday evening, Feb. 19. For the Orchestra to come to Buffalo for a single concert is an undertaking of great difficulty. For the concerts given in October, Buffalo was one of several cities visited, but in February a special trip must be made to this city. To carry such a large organization so far—for the Boston Symphony Orchestra takes with it on its trips as many men as the other orchestras use in their home cities—is a most expensive operation and has been made possible only by the liberality of the music loving men and women of Buffalo, who are principally responsible for the concerts. If Mr. Gericke and the management believed that justice could be done to the orchestra and to the works performed by less than a minimum of 75 men, the Boston Orchestra could give many more concerts in cities distant from Boston; but it is believed by Mr. Gericke and the management that 75 men is absolutely the smallest number that can be used in a symphony concert. It is more than likely that the programme which Mr. Gericke will arrange for this city will call for 80 or 85 performers.

This week the orchestra is on the second of its regular monthly trips to New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington, and has as its guest conductor, Vincent d'Indy, the great French composer. The concerts under his direction in Boston on the 1st and 2d, created a veritable sensation and this week the extraordinary success of the orchestra in the programmes of modern French music is being repeated in the other great eastern cities.

Two remarkable tributes have recently been paid to the orchestra. Last month, the visiting conductor of the New York Philharmonic Society was Willem Mengelberg, the conductor of the famous Concertgebour Orchestra of Amsterdam, the man to whom Richard Strauss dedicated his tremendous "Heldenleben." In an interview published in the New York papers, Mr. Mengelberg, who heard the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York, said that there was absolutely no orchestra in Europe which was its equal. Its superb tonal beauty and its astonishing virtuosity had been a revelation to him.

The other came from Mr. d'Indy. He first heard the orchestra he was to conduct the morning of his arrival in Boston when Mr. Gericke was rehearsing Charles Martin Loeffler's tremendously difficult "Villanelle du Diable." After he had listened about an hour, he turned to Mr. Loeffler who was with him and said:

"I did not believe it possible that there could be a more beautiful orchestra than the Philharmonic of Vienna, but this is greater. Such exquisite wood-winds, wonderful brass and brilliant strings! The searching beauty of the string choirs quite surpass anything I have ever heard. There is nothing in Europe to equal it."

Applications for seats may be made now to Mrs. Mai Davis Smith, 28 Irving place. The programme and soloists of the concert will be announced in the near future.

Harper's Weekly, Dec 9, 1905

A Submarine Cruiser

THE French navy is still maintaining an active interest in submarine vessels, and an entirely new type of craft is soon to be constructed at Cherbourg, which, on account of its large size, will be known as a "submarine cruiser." It is 182 feet in length and 15 feet beam, being driven by electric motors when under the water and by gasoline engines at the surface. There are two electric motors, which operate two propellers and eight horizontal rudders, while current is to be supplied by double sets of accumulators. Water-tight compartments will be out from under the old boat; indeed, he remarked to me only this morning when he brought Grizzle and me our breakfasts:

M. Vincent D'Indy, the eminent French composer, who is now visiting America upon the invitation of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, comes in the interest of an excellent cause—that of con-

"I let dem wolves de poor folks talk about how, Trusty; dey ain't about our door any more."

when Wagner's torchco tioned.
"At St. James's H poser. "I trust your to come."
"I may, I may," r
eonage.
The concert took pl
a week or more later gave a soirée in honor
Pitkin was prominent he seized the first opp to Wagner and congrat
"I was at your cnt
"and I don't know wh thing more. I laughed very funny, Herr Wag
The company stopl amazed look spread ov
"But, you know,"
lord, "it was almost
I recognized you, with erinkly hair."
When Lord Pitkin
saw that he was alone
"Why, what—I ous mem-

e Bréville,
ems grad-

sold in town and village and matchless for the complexion.

with him to America new work celebrating the spirit of awakened asp tion in his native country.

MENGELBERG, A PE ONALITY OF COMMANDING POWER.

Of the new Philharmonic conductors, Willem Mengelberg, of Amsterdam, has aroused perhaps the keenest interest. Mengelberg is director of the celebrated Concertgebouw Orchestra, and one of the most successful and efficient of the younger European conductors. He was born at Utrecht in 1871, achieved distinction while a pupil at the Cologne Conservatory, and won the post of music director at Lucerne from seventy-nine other competitors,—a post which he abandoned for his present position at Amsterdam. He is said to be called upon not infrequently to appear before Queen Wilhelmina as a pianist. A conductor of uncommon vigor and breadth of view, Mengelberg is a personality of commanding power,—intellectually robust as well as subtly penetrating, and appropriately known as an authoritative interpreter of the music of Richard Strauss, in the dedication of whose extraordinary score, "Ein Heldenleben," he may read his name.

THREE NEW CONDUCTORS FROM GERMANY.

Fritz Steinbach, who will also be new to Philharmonic audiences, is conductor of the Gürzenich concerts at Cologne and director of the Conservatory of Music there. Steinbach was born in Grünsfeld, Baden, in 1855. He studied at the Leipsic Conservatory, and was a pupil of von Lachner in Karlsrühe and of Nottebohm in Vienna. He taught counterpoint and composition in the Raff Conservatory at Frankfort (where our most eminent American composer, Edward MacDowell, learned the technique of his art), and in 1886 followed Hans von Bülow as conductor of the famous Meiningen Orchestra, a post which he held until 1902. He has the impressive title of Generalmusik-direktor to the Duke of Saxe-Meiningen, is known as a specialist in the music of Brahms, and has composed and published a septet, a 'cello sonata, and songs. Steinbach is a conductor of finesse and judgment, of ripe feeling and balanced intelligence. He has made numerous successful concert tours in Germany, and is especially popular in Berlin.

Max Fiedler, another of the Philharmonic Society's new importations, is conducto the Philharmonic Society and director of the Conservatory of Music at Hamburg. He is a graduate of the Leipsic Conservatory, and was known as a pianist before he became a conductor. He has been prominent as an orchestral leader since a success in ... and Madrid, impressing audiences with his alertness, intensity, and control. He has published a piano quintet, and has composed a symphony and a quartet for strings.

Dr. Ernst Kunwald, the fourth of the new Philharmonic conductors, who in personal appearance suggests the popular tenor of tradition rather than the master of orchestral forces, made himself known by his missionary efforts in behalf of the Wagner music dramas in Spain. Kunwald is the least conspicuous of the foreign conductors who will court the favor of American audiences this winter. He was for a time director of the opera in Frankfort and Berlin, but since 1903 has given his entire attention to concert work.

VASSILY SAFONOV'S THIRD VISIT TO NEW YORK.

In addition to its four new conductors, the Philharmonic Society has reëngaged Vassily Safonov, of Moscow, who will make his appearance at three of the concerts of the Society,—two of the regular series and an extra one,—and who will also take some part in the activities of the Russian Symphony Society. Safonov will be remembered as one of the dominant figures of the past two musical seasons in New York. No conductor who has appeared before a concert orchestra in America since the death of the unforgettable Seidl has made a more immediate and profound impression. A man of uncommon personal force, he is one of the most eloquent, dramatic, and authoritative of living conductors, and his return is an event of the first importance.

Felix Weingartner, of Munich, who plays Liszt, Wagner, and the moderns magnificently, and Beethoven like a prophet, is also to make his third American visit this season. Weingartner will be recalled as having made, on the occasion of his first American appearance two years ago, hardly less of a sensation than the masterful Safonov. Gaunt, grave, military in his personality and bearing, his artistic constitution is curiously divided, curiously illusive. He is reserved, yet intensely dramatic; continent and reposeful, yet irresistibly compelling. His beat is severe, precise, angular, yet electrically communicative,—he is, in brief, a conductor of unique individuality, character, and insight. He will appear in January and February in a special series of concerts with the New York Symphony Orchestra, when we shall again have an opportunity of observing his singularly reticent yet moving art.

FOREIGN CONDUCTORS

...Transcript

...DAY, DECEMBER 16, 1905.

IN THE WORLD OF MUSIC

SUGAR-PLUMS AT THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

A Light Programme and Pleasant Entertainment—The Choral Art Society Recalls the Pleasures of Pure Tone—Next Week's Concert—The Recitals of the New Year—Musical Miscellany

After all, we Bostonians are not so serious as our neighbors like to believe us, and now and then we prove it. Audiences at symphony concerts in New York never smile a general smile. It might not be good form. Audiences at symphony concerts in London are grave as images. In Germany they are heavily attentive, and so on, perhaps, the world over. At least we in Boston dare to smile in the full tide of a symphony concert, generally, spontaneously, genuinely. It happened yesterday, in the midst of Weber's "Concert-Piece" for piano and orchestra that we were hearing for the first time in ten years. Mr. Reisenauer, the pianist, was playing his part as sympathetically as though it was the newest concerto of the hour. The orchestra, under Mr. Hess, was playing the accompaniment as sympathetically. Weber had an innocent little programme for the piece, as programmes go nowadays. He saw in fancy the lady of the castle mourning her absent lord, gone to fight the infidels in Palestine. They had slain him perchance. And lo! as she looked out upon the forest, she saw spears flashing through the leaves and heard the tramp of men-at-arms. Then she knew that her lord had returned safe and sound, and there was much rejoicing in rondo form. The orchestra begins the march that pictures the return of the Crusaders. The piano embroiders it and heightens the rhythm. The march rises and falls. There is a sudden sharp glissando on the piano for no apparent reason, except that Weber was excited and wished to "cut loose." Then off goes the march again fuller and higher than before. It was dramatic effect, no doubt, in Weber's days. Perhaps even the glissando mirrors the glance in which the lady recognizes her spouse. Yesterday it mirrored a little in anticipation the smile that went around the hall. A few youngsters almost smiled audibly. It was hardly at the music. It was not archaic enough for that. It was hardly at the naive "programmatic" effect, if there was any. It was the humor of the hour and of the concert. Mr. Gericke was content that we should amuse ourselves. And we Bostonians have smiled unitedly and gladly in the midst of a symphony concert.

It was not an important programme, as Mr. Gericke's programmes go, but it was very agreeable and interesting entertainment. Maybe it was our sugar-plum for our listening so intently and sympathetically to Mr. d'Indy and his young Frenchmen. Certainly it was the orchestra's, after all its labor, with their exacting scores. Haydn led us pleasantly through the four smooth movements—all tonal pattern weaving just touched by feeling—of his symphony in B-flat, played for the first time at a Symphony concert. Two brightly figured allegros, really gay at heart; a slow movement that melted its sugary way along; a piquant little minuet and trio; and through all the light play of such an orchestra as Haydn knew. With a little more distinction of melody and workmanship, it would have been all that such music should be. As it was, it gave a pleasure that is in no modern symphony to give, the simple pleasure of pure curves and arabesques of sound lined in as pure tone by our orchestra. It is a pleasure as well worth receiving as any that flows from the newest tone-poem of Berlin or of Paris. It is nearer completeness, too, in its kind.

It happened yesterday also to set the mood for the afternoon. Therefore, perhaps, we smiled at the glissando of the "Concert-Piece" and yielded ourselves readily and delightedly to the thin, clear brilliance of the rondo of the rejoicing pair. Gay, too, was the little "Humoreske" of Humperdinck's. Perhaps Mr. Gericke feared he was giving us too many sugar-plums. Or he wished to remind us that Humperdinck has also been visiting America, though he wandered no farther than New York and Washington. So, it may be, he played the introduction to the third act of "King's Children," the fairy play for which Humperdinck wrote incidental music. But with all its Wagnerian pomp and intricacy that, too, was a sugar-plum. There is no deep lamenting these little creatures of elf-land, though they were very hungry and cold and died in each other's arms. It is all wistful, and the wonder is that Humperdinck could keep it wistful through all that Wagnerian scoring. He is the paradox of his school. He writes intricately as a full-grown son of Wagner, yet he feels as simply as a child. There the box of musical sugar-plums closed with a gentle snap, and for ending came the tonal stress and tonal fervors of Liszt's "Tasso." From the forest and fairy folk to the court of Ferrara and a poet's "triumph" at Rome. From the wistful little princes to the self-torturing Tasso and the heaven-storming Liszt. Exciting music it is, and there were stirring moments as our band and conductor played it. But somehow it did not efface the wistfulness of the royal children as Humperdinck played them, and Haydn seemed only the gayer to recall. Perhaps Liszt was really as sincere as they, but they persuade of their sincerity, and he does not.

H. T. P.

Mr. Strube's new concerto for violin, with Mr. Adamowski to take the solo part, is to be played at the ninth pair of Symphony Concerts on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening of next week. One of the first violins of the orchestra has written it, and another of them is to play it. Already we know by several tests the worth and the interest of Mr. Strube as a composer, and Mr. Adamowski is, perhaps, the figure of longest and most familiar standing in the whole band. For the rest of the programme, Mr. Gericke has made what he was calling the other day a "nature" programme. It comprises Dvorak's overture, "In der Natur," the pastoral from Bach's Christmas Oratorio, and Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony.

The Boston Post

The Representative Democratic Paper of New England

Issued Sunday by Post Publishing Co.

DECEMBER 17, 1905. NO. 12; VOL. 38

Office 259 Washington st., Boston, Mass

EIGHTH SYMPHONY CONCERT

Alfred Reisenauer, pianist, was the soloist at the eighth Symphony concert last evening, the programme of which was as follows:

Symphony in B flat (B. and H., No. 8)...Haydn
Concert piece for piano and orchestra....Weber
Prelude to third act of "King's Children" and Humoresque .....Humperdinck
Symphonic Poem, "Tasso".....Liszt

This was not an especially interesting programme, yet it was one that gave evident pleasure to many. Haydn's symphonies are nowadays out of place at these concerts, for such works are heard to the best advantage in a small hall, played by an orchestra of medium proportions. However, the symphony, one of the many written for the London Salomon concerts in 1791, was finely played, and it was stated also to be "first time at these concerts." It has been played previously on several occasions, the first being about 40 years ago.

Humperdinck's prelude to the third act of his opera, "King's Children," is delightfully pleasing music, the composer evidently having been under Wagnerian influence when he wrote the score. The Humoresque, an earlier work for orchestra, played here a number of years ago, is less of interest. The performance of both was admirable and the same may be said as to Liszt's "Tasso." Mr. Reisenauer played last evening for the first time here, with orchestra. He gave two recitals in Jordan Hall about a year ago, at which time he made a highly favorable impression. Last evening he played Weber's antiquated concert piece with superb technic and authoritative interpretation that made his efforts exceedingly enjoyable. He was loudly applauded and several times recalled.

At the ninth rehearsal and concert this coming week, T. Adamowski will be the soloist in a new violin concerto by Gustav Strube; the symphony will be Beethoven's "Pastoral," with other numbers by Dvorak and Bach.

SUNDAY HERALD

Published Every Day in the Year.

VOL. CXVIII., NO. 170.

SUNDAY, DEC. 17, 1905.

SYMPHONY GIVES EIGHTH CONCERT

An Old-New Work by Papa Haydn Played for First Time at These Concerts—Mr. Reisenauer in Weber Piece.

A DIGRESSION ON MR. HUMPERDINCK

Mr. Jan Kubelik Makes His First Appearance of Season at Jordan Hall Before an Applausive Audience.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Gericke conductor, gave its eighth concert last evening in Symphony Hall. The programme was as follows:

Symphony in B-flat (B. & H. No. 8.....Haydn
Concert piece for piano.....Weber
Introduction to Act III. of "Kings' Children" and Humoreske.....Humperdinck
Symphonic poem "Tasso".....Liszt

Haydn, like Hannibal, was a very pretty fellow in those days, and it is a pleasure to hear occasionally his amiable chatter, and cheery laugh. This symphony in B flat was played for the first time at these concerts, and it was a novelty to the younger generation, although in the palmy years of the Harvard Musical Association it was a favorite.

But is this honest music now heard to its best advantage? Written for a Salomon concert in London, it was played by an orchestra of about 40 men and in a hall 95 feet by 35. The gay spirit was then contagious; the sentiment—as a rule inherently perfunctory, or graceful rather than deep or tender—did not probably seem so thin and superficial. Let this music be played by a full modern orchestra, with 30 or more violins against a flute, two oboes, two bassoons, two horns and two trumpets, in a huge hall, and what, pray, becomes of its charm, its simple mirth?

Certain famous conductors in recent years try to solve the problem by reducing the string band. Unless the hall be reasonably small, the reduction is of little profit. Others, like Mr. Gericke, double the wood-wind instruments, but the addition does not really help matters, for the music then assumes swollen proportions, and the spirit of it, the pleasantly archaic flavor, is lost. With Haydn's orchestra in a small hall the violin solo in the finale of this symphony might be piquant. In Symphony Hall it would be ineffective, and therefore Mr. Gericke wisely gave the passage to all the first violins.

Mr. Reisenauer was already known here as a pianist of indisputable gifts and acquirements. His choice of Weber's concert piece was an unfortunate one, for the music is hopelessly antiquated. Its very modernity at the time it was composed hastened its death, yet it made a brave struggle, and even in the 70s it was popular with audiences and a show piece for virtuosos. Mr. Reisenauer took it seriously last night and triumphed with it by a pianistic tour de force. No doubt the running passages and long continued technical strains appeal to him, but it seemed a pity that the smoothness, elegance and brilliance of his technique were not better employed. Fortunately we shall soon have an opportunity to hear him in recitals. We say "fortunately," for he surely will not have the cruelty to present a Weber programme.

Engelbert Humperdinck! "O Amos Cottle! Phoebus! what a name!" His music played last night—the introduction to an act of a drama written by the daughter of the late Heinrich Porges and the Humoresque—is eminently Humperdinckian. Sir Augustus Harris spoke better than he knew at the first performance of "Haensel and Gretel" in New York, when he alluded feelingly in a Cockney manner to the composer as "Mr. Humperdinkel." Mr. Humperdinck was lately in New York; he also saw Niagara Falls and Mr. Roosevelt. We like to think of him now on the steamer sketching a symphonic poem inspired by the cataract and a symphony entitled "Roosevelt." Did not Maj. A. D. Hermann Hutter of Nuremberg compose a "Bismarck" symphony in four movements? Did not Huber compose a "Boecklin," and Bell, the Englishman, a "Walt Whitman" symphony? Mr. Roosevelt has certainly characteristics enough for four movements, indeed there is a superabundance of material. The first allegro might illustrate his passion for the chase or his military career; the slow movement, something tender yet impressive, should be entitled "Advice to American Mothers: Genesis i., 22"; as for the scherzo—is not Mr. Roosevelt himself a scherzo? The finale, of a heroic nature, might represent him as warring against railways and trusts, with a grand apotheosis and the introduction of "The Star Spangled Banner" ingeniously counterpointed.

But we wander, which is, according to the old song, the peculiar privilege of the miller. It is a good thing to hear such music as this of Humperdinck to remind us of the inanity of so many of the later German orchestral compositions. Brahms is dead, the last of the great German formalists with a romantic streak. Richard Strauss is still alive. And who are the others in Germany that have both ideas and facility of expression?

This music of Humperdinck is as the rinsings in the Bayreuth kitchen. Let it be granted that the Humoresque is a comparatively early work; that Humperdinck published it shows he has no sense of humor, although he did teach Siegfried Wagner composition. But we forget. They discovered lately in New York that "Haensel and Gretel" was intended by the composer as a side-splitting burlesque of Wagner's methods; that he therefore turned a fairy tale into a pompous epic; that he for this reason made his little fishes talk like whales. Sunbeams from cucumbers! And this music to "Kings' Children"—what is it but Wagner's orchestral dress thrown over a manikin without the semblance of facial intelligence? Moods from "Tristan" followed by a ditty for male voices given to the horns. The music would not be worth serious discussion were it not for the attempt of a clique in Germany to hail him as a direct descendant of Wagner.

The feature of the concert was the performance of Liszt's "Tasso." This symphonic poem is nearly 60 years old, yet it is today more modern than the two pieces that preceded. Liszt wrote for audiences unborn and had faith in the judgment of posterity. When he was truly inspired, as in "Tasso," there was a nobility in his thought and an elegance in the expression that are still unsurpassed in this particular kind of orchestral composition. Tschaikowsky was in some respects the greater. He was more elemental, more direct, more passionate, more overpowering; but what did not he, as well as Wagner, learn from Liszt in harmonic progressions and in orchestral color, as Liszt in turn learned from Berlioz, the father of all modern orchestration? Saint-Saens, in his symphonic poems, has caught the elegance of Liszt, but the subjects he chose, except "The Youth of Hercules," did not admit the peculiar nobility, nor is it in Saint-Saens' musical nature. Nor in "Tasso" is there any need of a detailed programme. "Lament and Triumph" is enough, if it be granted that the hearer is acquainted with Tasso. Even as absolute music, the work is beautiful, stirring, impressive.

The Boston Journal

EIGHTH SYMPHONY WAS A DELIGHTFUL TREAT

To those in whose mind still dwelt vividly the recollection of the "Young France" concert of two weeks ago, with its great monotony and its large share of unloveliness, the eighth of the Symphony series was a pure delight. There was variety in plenty, charming contrasts in style and a general brilliancy that sent the audience home in joyous and unwearied mood. To be sure, there was little that was "great," as the word is now understood in music, there were no problems of thematic mathematics nor any particular cult to be advanced. But there was a deal of honest enjoyment and some orchestral playing that was of the finest possible kind. There was also a pianist who conquered mightily by his dazzling virtuosity.

And there was, too, a "first time at these concerts" symphony by Haydn, an event of much interest when so many of the old master's works have been worn threadbare.

Alfred Reisenauer was the pianist, a man who has already won high esteem in this city, and again he showed himself an artist of enormous virility and all-compelling brilliancy.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

Haydn—Symphony in B flat major (B. & H., No. 8). (First time at these concerts.)
Weber—Concert Piece in F minor for Pianoforte and Orchestra, op. 79.
A. Reisenauer, Soloist.
Humperdinck—a Introduction to Act III. of "King's Children." b Humoresque.
Liszt—Symphonic Poem, No. 2: "Tasso: Lament and Triumph."

We could have wished a good Brahms symphony (preferably the second or third) as a lesson to the D'Indypendent party. To go back to Haydn was too great a contrast, even though the work was the most interesting symphony that we can recall by that composer. But there are other reasons why such a symphony should not be brought to our attention.

1st. It is intelligible, and who cares to hear works that he can understand? We have the serenest contempt for all musical works that we can comprehend and enjoy. What we desire is something problematical: we can find unearthly beauty in almost any work that is unintelligible.

2nd. The work is symmetrical. Everybody knows that to be at all emotional, we must begin by smashing every rule of form. Chopin adhered to the very simplest forms, therefore he must be the most unemotional of composers!

3rd. The scoring is absurdly limited. No trombones, no tubas, no gongs, no windmachine, no artillery, no anything!

4th. The absurd thing is tuneful: as if anybody wanted a tune in music. The art of Music was not meant to use tunes, it was meant—well, we are not quite sure nowadays what it meant for, but we are quite certain that it was not meant to be at all melodic.

The symphony was played with abundant spirit and won much applause; yet it must be confessed that Haydn no longer is very appetizing to our jaded musical palates, although (if we except the G minor and the "Jupiter") his symphonies wear better than those of Mozart.

We were surprised at the effect won by Weber's work. Much of the furore was due to the really great playing of Alfred Reisenauer, who was recalled 6 or 7 times, but it is evident that the work is not so old-fashioned as some have considered it.

It is quite probable that the effective tune of the Crusader's March, which plays so prominent a part in the last half of the composition, may account for the triumph. In spite of Wagner's theories (which he did not hold to himself), in spite of the hue and cry of the modern cacophonists, the people still respond to a melody, just as they have always done since the time of Herodotus.

But it must be confessed that such a work is more liable to fade than a Haydn symphony, for the latter is in a class by itself, while in just this field of dramatic "programme-music," represented by Weber's "Concert-stueck," something greater has been done (although without piano solo) by a German gentleman named Richard Strauss, and a Russian called Tschaikowsky.

Yet the number gives abundant chance for display of dash and brilliancy, and the work of the soloist is not hidden under a bushel, as is sometimes the case in a Brahms or Beethoven concerto; that is, he is not sunk into the ensemble at any time.

The march tune alluded to above is twin brother to the march of the "Lenore" symphony, and while all critics must agree that the two are a trifle vulgar, there is not the least doubt as to their winning popular suffrage at every hearing.

Mr. Reisenauer's scintillating performance deserved the great recognition it received.

We enjoyed Humperdinck's Prelude greatly. It is not as powerful as Wagner's music, but it is in the same school, well scored and with fine melodic touches combined with rich harmonies. It does not quite attain the beauty of parts of "Hansel and Gretel," but it may be classed as one of the worthy examples of the modern school of composition.

The German enjoys being very sad, and this picture of the royal children dying in the forest is not vastly different from Heine's pathetic poem, "Es fiel ein Reif in der Fruehlingsnacht," which Schumann and Mendelssohn set to tearful music.

The "Humoreske" was not in very vivid contrast. One may doubt whether instrumental music can ever become truly humorous without a "programme." Nevertheless it was a light and bright work that awakened neither joy nor animosity in the reviewer's breast.

Now Mr. Gericke let slip the leash and allowed the brasses to use as much wind as they possessed. Liszt's "Tasso" is by no means as inspired a work as that other symphonic poem, "Les Preludes." Its loftiness is rather strained and comes dangerously near to bombast. When Tasso takes to triumphing he keeps it up like a Roman Saturnalia or an old English Christmas. One climax follows another, each one louder than its predecessor.

It suggests a terrible "Katzenjammer" for the day after. Nor was it perfectly played. The bass clarinette and the oboe did some very fine work, but the brasses were crude, and in the Humperdinck selections the horns were not always sure of the embouchure.

It is not often that one can point to a technical flaw in our orchestral performances.

Louis C. Elson.

---

[131]

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, DEC 17, 1905.

MUSICAL MATTERS

Reisenauer, Soloist, at the Symphony.

Handel and Haydn's Christmas Oratorio, "The Messiah."

Concerts and Recitals of the Holiday Weeks.

The eighth Symphony program introduced the famous German pianist, Alfred Reisenauer, as soloist in Weber's F minor concert piece for piano and orchestra. The other selections were Haydn's B flat major symphony, first time at these concerts; introduction to the third act of King's Children" and the "Humoresque," by Humperdinck, and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Tasso: Lament and Triumph." Haydn's symphony was interesting as a novelty, even though much of it was formal in character. The sudden variations in tonality makes the work appear more episodic than coherent; as if the composer had experimented with the public taste just to learn what effect his musi- innovations would produce. There was evident care taken to give each choir of the band its proportional work, and the different instrumental bodies have so-called "opportunities" in one or more of the four movements. The Menuetto and the finale are the most satisfactory, the former movement being mainly a dainty dance theme in varied forms in which the brilliant ensemble work of the strings was conspicuous. The last movement is rather erratic in manner, but the effect is pleasing, and all the changes in tempo and key were given with precision and clarity.

Mr Reisenauer's interpretation of the Weber piece showed that the pianist's fame was not undeserved, for the very favorable impression made at his former recitals here was more than duplicated. He is a big player in more ways than one; an artist of consummate skill and versatility to whom technical difficulties are slight. The brilliant work, once so popular, but now rather neglected, is an excellent show piece, full of fortissimo passages, double arpeggios, glissandos, chord runs and other piano fireworks, and all of these Mr Reisenauer handled and fingered in a masterly manner. The march theme of the second movement was notably effective, and the dash and vigor of the finale was fairly thrilling. The orchestra, led by Mr Hess, gave able assistance. At the close of the performance Mr Reisenauer was called back a half-dozen times.

The sad little symphonic poem, the introduction to the third act of "King's Children," by Humperdinck, and the same composer's "Humoreske" presented great contrasts in sentiment, and both of the simple works were very pleasingly told in a musical way. The woodwinds deserve a special word for good work in the first piece. The "Lament and Triumph" was splendidly played, the magnificent finale showing the orchestra in its best form.

The program this week will include Dvorak's overture, "Nature"; the Pastorale from Bach's Christmas overture, Strube's new violin concerto No. 2 in F sharp minor (played by Mr Timothee Adamowski) and Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony.

BOSTON EVENING RECORD

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

Haydn—Symphony in B flat major (B. & H., No. 9). (First time at these concerts.)
Weber—Concert Piece in F minor for Pianoforte and Orchestra, op. 79.
A. Reisenauer, Soloist.
Humperdinck—a Introduction to Act III. of "King's Children." b Humoresque.
Liszt—Symphonic Poem, No. 2: "Tasso: Lament and Triumph."

We could have wished a good Brahms symphony (preferably the second or third) as a lesson to the D'Indypendent party. To go back to Haydn was too great a contrast, even though the work was the most interesting symphony that we can recall by that composer. But there are other reasons why such a symphony should not be brought to our attention.

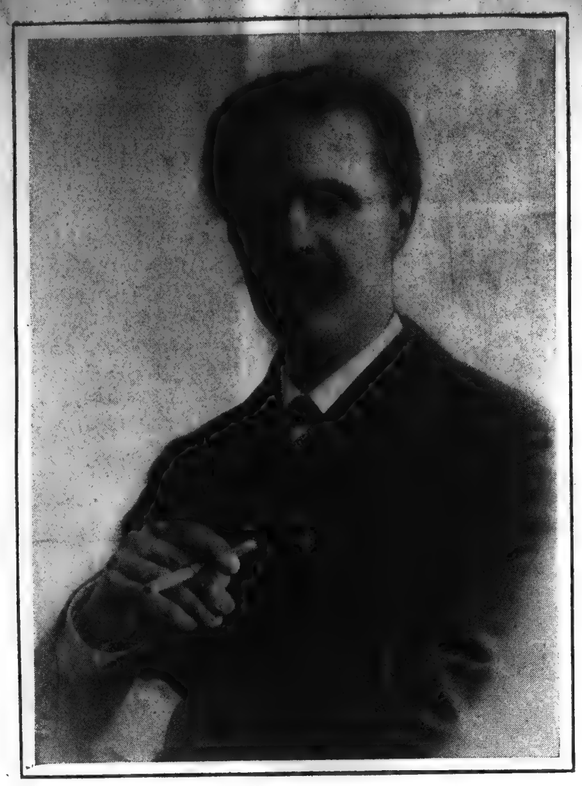
1st. It is intelligible, and who cares to hear works that he can understand? We have the serenest contempt for all musical works that we can comprehend and enjoy. What we desire is something problematical; we can find unearthly beauty in almost any work that is unintelligible.

2nd. The work is symmetrical. Everybody knows that to be at all emotional, we must begin by smashing every rule of form. Chopin adhered to the very simplest forms, therefore he must be the most unemotional of composers!

3rd. The scoring is absurdly limited. No trombones, no tubas, no gongs, no windmachine, no artillery, no anything!

4th. The absurd thing is tuneful; as if anybody wanted a tune in music. The art of Music was not meant to use tunes, it was meant—well, we are not quite sure nowadays what it meant for, but we are quite certain that it was not meant to be at all melodic.

The symphony was played with abundant spirit and won much applause; yet it must be confessed that Haydn no longer is very ... to our jaded musical palates. ... If we except the G minor and ... ter") his symphonies wear better ... of Mozart. ...



M. VINCENT D'INDY.

The French Composer who is Visiting the United States to Conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in his Own Works.

Vincent d'Indy

BY G. W. HARRIS

[In the manifestation of musical activity at the present time, France is surpassed by no other nation. Her living composers form a most interesting group. The most interesting man in that group—and, after the aged Saint-Saëns, whose work is probably done, the most accomplished and the most versatile—is M. Vincent d'Indy; for, most of the others —Massenet, Charpentier, Bruneau—have been obsessed by the national mania for the theatre. A visit from a man of such force in modern music as M. d'Indy is an event of the first importance. While here he is to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in performances of his own works, not alone in Boston, but in all the cities visited by that excellent band; to appear with the Kneisel Quartet, and also to lecture at several of the leading universities. The following sketch of his career by Mr. Harris is, therefore, of very timely interest.—EDITOR.]

IN the realm of music the most interesting and the most important event of the current busy season is the coming of M. Vincent d'Indy to our shores. Ever since the death of César Franck in 1890 M. d'Indy has been recognized at home as the foremost representative of the modern French school; indeed, he and certain other pupils of the shy, simple, gentle and kindly Franck have been humorously accused of trying to establish in music a "Republique Franckaise." They have at any rate accomplished something new in music, established a style and method of their own, recognizable at once as strikingly and unmistakably individual. They have tried many odd experiments in harmony,

1393

From INDEPENDENT
NEW YORK CITY.
Address
Date DEC 14 1905

in the order of their composition, are: "The Enchanted Forest" (1878), a frankly impressionistic "symphonic ballad" after Uhland; "The Ride of the Cid" (1879), a Moorish-Spanish scene for baritone, chorus and orchestra; a "Wallenstein Trilogy," a descriptive symphony, which was begun in 1873, but laid aside for a while and not finished until 1881; "The Song of the Bell" (1879-83); a symphony for piano and orchestra "on a French mountaineer's song" (1886); "Fervaal" (1889-95), a music-drama which has been widely heralded as the greatest thing of its kind since the later tragedies of Wagner; "Istar" symphonic variations (1896), a curiously interesting work delineating in music the story of Istar, from the Babylonian "Epic of Izdubar," by means of a unique transformation of the hackneyed theme with variations form; "The Stranger" (1898-1901), a second music-drama, presenting an allegory of the typical artist's life; and a second symphony, in B flat major (1902-3), the most difficult but also the most impressive thing he has yet done.

NEW YORK CITY.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, DEC 17, 1905.

MUSICAL MATTERS

Reisenauer, Soloist, at the Symphony.

Handel and Haydn's Christmas Oratorio, "The Messiah."

Concerts and Recitals of the Holiday Weeks.

The eighth Symphony program introduced the famous German pianist, Alfred Reisenauer, as soloist in Weber's F minor concert piece for piano and orchestra. The other selections were Haydn's B flat major symphony, first time at these concerts; introduction to the third act of King's Children" and the "Humoresque," by Humperdinck, and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Tasso: Lament and Triumph." Haydn's symphony was interesting as a novelty, even though much of it was formal in character. The sudden variations in tonality makes the work appear more episodic than coherent; as if the composer had experimented with the public taste just to learn what effect his musi- innovations would produce. There was evident care taken to give each choir of the band its proportional work, and the different instrumental bodies have so-called "opportunities" in one or more of the four movements. The Menuetto and the finale are the most satisfactory, the former movement being mainly a dainty dance theme in varied forms in which the brilliant ensemble work of the strings was conspicuous. The last movement is rather erratic in manner, but the effect is pleasing, and all the changes in tempo and key were given with precision and clarity.

Mr Reisenauer's interpretation of the Weber piece showed that the pianist's fame was not undeserved, for the very favorable impression made at his former recitals here was more than duplicated. He is a big player in more ways than one; an artist of consummate skill and versatility to whom technical difficulties are slight. The brilliant work, once so popular, but now rather neglected, is an excellent show piece, full of fortissimo passages, double arpeggios, glissandos, chord runs and other piano fireworks, and all of these Mr Reisenauer handled and fingered in a masterly manner. The march theme of the second movement was notably effective, and the dash and vigor of the finale was fairly thrilling. The orchestra, led by Mr Hess, gave able assistance. At the close of the performance Mr Reisenauer was called back a half-dozen times.

The sad little symphonic poem, the introduction to the third act of "King's Children," by Humperdinck, and the same composer's "Humoreske" presented great contrasts in sentiment, and both of the simple works were very pleasingly told in a musical way. The woodwinds deserve a special word for good work in the first piece. The "Lament and Triumph" was splendidly played, the magnificent finale showing the orchestra in its best form.

The program this week will include Dvorak's overture, "Nature"; the Pastorale from Bach's Christmas overture, Strube's new violin concerto No. 2 in F sharp minor (played by Mr Timothee Adamowski) and Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony.

BOSTON EVENING RECORD

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

Haydn—Symphony in B flat major (B. & H., No. 6). (First time at these concerts.)
Weber—Concert Piece in F minor for Piano-forte and Orchestra, op. 79.
A. Reisenauer, Soloist.
Humperdinck—a Introduction to Act III. of "King's Children." b Humoresque.
Liszt—Symphonic Poem, No. 2: "Tasso: Lament and Triumph."

We could have wished a good Brahms symphony (preferably the second or third) as a lesson to the D'Indypendent party. To go back to Haydn was too great a contrast, even though the work was the most interesting symphony that we can recall by that composer. But there are other reasons why such a symphony should not be brought to our attention.

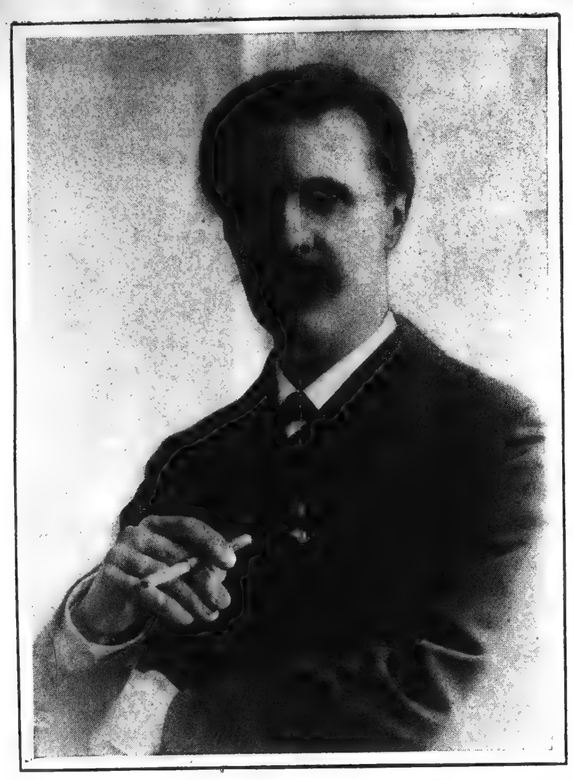
1st. It is intelligible, and who cares to hear works that he can understand? We have the serenest contempt for all musical works that we can comprehend and enjoy. What we desire is something problematical; we can find unearthly beauty in almost any work that is unintelligible.

2nd. The work is symmetrical. Everybody knows that to be at all emotional, we must begin by smashing every rule of form. Chopin adhered to the very simplest forms, therefore he must be the most unemotional of composers!

3rd. The scoring is absurdly limited. No trombones, no tubas, no gongs, no wind-machine, no artillery, no anything!

4th. The absurd thing is tuneful; as if anybody wanted a tune in music. The art of Music was not meant to use tunes, it was meant—well, we are not quite sure nowadays what it meant for, but we are quite certain that it was not meant to be at all melodic.

The symphony was played with abundant spirit and won much applause; yet it must be confessed that Haydn no longer is very appetising to our jaded musical palates, although (if we except the G minor and "Surprise") his symphonies wear better than those of Mozart.



M. VINCENT D'INDY.

The French Composer who is Visiting the United States to Conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in his Own Works.

Vincent d'Indy

BY G. W. HARRIS

[In the manifestation of musical activity at the present time, France is surpassed by no other nation. Her living composers form a most interesting group. The most interesting man in that group—and, after the aged Saint-Saëns, whose work is probably done, the most accomplished and the most versatile—is M. Vincent d'Indy; for, most of the others —Massenet, Charpentier, Bruneau—have been obsessed by the national mania for the theatre. A visit from a man of such force in modern music as M. d'Indy is an event of the first importance. While here he is to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in performances of his own works, not alone in Boston, but in all the cities visited by that excellent band; to appear with the Kneisel Quartet, and also to lecture at several of the leading universities. The following sketch of his career by Mr. Harris is, therefore, of very timely interest.—EDITOR.]

IN the realm of music the most interesting and the most important event of the current busy season is the coming of M. Vincent d'Indy to our shores. Ever since the death of César Franck in 1890 M. d'Indy has been recognized at home as the foremost representative of the modern French school; indeed, he and certain other pupils of the shy, simple, gentle and kindly Franck have been humorously accused of trying to establish in music a "Republique Franckaise." They have at any rate accomplished something new in music, established a style and method of their own, recognizable at once as strikingly and unmistakably individual. They have tried many odd experiments in harmony,

1393

From ..... NEW YORK CITY.

Address .....

Date .....

in the order of their composition, are: "The Enchanted Forest" (1878), a frankly impressionistic "symphonic ballad" after Uhland; "The Ride of the Cid" (1879), a Moorish-Spanish scene for baritone, chorus and orchestra; a "Wallenstein Trilogy," a descriptive symphony, which was begun in 1873, but laid aside for a while and not finished until 1881; "The Song of the Bell" (1879-83); a symphony for piano and orchestra "on a French mountaineer's song" (1886); "Fervaal" (1889-95), a music-drama which has been widely heralded as the greatest thing of its kind since the later tragedies of Wagner; "Istar" symphonic variations (1896), a curiously interesting work delineating in music the story of Istar, from the Babylonian "Epic of Izdubar," by means of a unique transformation of the hackneyed theme with variations form; "The Stranger" (1898-1901), a second music-drama, presenting an allegory of the typical artist's life; and a second symphony, in B flat major (1902-3), the most difficult but also the most impressive thing he has yet done.

NEW YORK CITY.

attempted to find new bases for tonal relationships, and even expressed their thought in new melodic lines. Their music is a new language, and, as always happens with the new in art, it has aroused much discussion among musicians and critics, and no little condemnation. But it is a perfectly safe prediction that this new music will ultimately be adjudged far from devoid of beauty when the world shall have become familiar enough with it to make a just appraisement.

Among French musicians Vincent d'Indy is the master craftsman. He has the ripest scholarship and the largest skill. He has gone further afield than any of the others in his experimentation with and his development of musical form and expression. But in all his experimenting he is the sincere and conscientious artist. For many years the anti-Wagnerian cabal in Paris pursued him with the bitterest hostility for his espousal of the Wagner cause, and decried him and all his works unceasingly (a condition that is now happily long past), but through it all he was content to work for his art alone, regardless of popular heed, or praise, or blame. By his long and deep study, his patient perseverance, his persistence in his search for the right idiom in which to express his musical thought, Vincent d'Indy has managed to equip himself with a mental technic as a composer which has hardly been surpassed in the history of the noble art.

Paul Marie Théodore Vincent d'Indy was born in Paris on March 27, 1851, of a wealthy family of musical amateurs—his paternal grandmother having been an excellent pianist, his father a violinist and an uncle a composer of chamber music and opéras de salon that were popular in Parisian society half a century ago. His family designed him for the law, but his ambition from early youth was to become a professional musician. Only after a struggle that lasted several years against the uncompromising opposition of his family was that ambition realized. Altho he was an accomplished pianist at fourteen, and continued his musical studies with unremitting zeal, trying his hand at composition in several of the smaller forms, it was not until after the close of the Franco-Prussian war (during which he served as a volunteer in the One Hundred and Fifth Regiment) that M. d'Indy was able to settle down to the serious work of fitting himself for his chosen profession.

In 1872 he met César Franck and entered that master's class at the Paris Conservatory; entered also Colonne's orchestra as a kettle drummer, and remained three years in order to obtain training in the details of instrumentation. He left the conservatory in 1875, but remained with Franck as a private pupil for several years thereafter, receiving from him a thoro grounding in counterpoint, fugue and composition. In the competition of 1885 M. d'Indy won the prize of 10,000 francs offered by the City of Paris for the best musical work by a French composer with his cantata, "The Song of the Bell," a setting for solo voices, double chorus and orchestra of Schiller's well-known poem. Together with Franck, Saint-Saëns, Fauré and others, he was one of the founders of the Société Nationale de Musique, which has done good service in fostering the love of symphonic and chamber music in France. Since the death of Franck in 1890, M. d'Indy has been the president of this society. In 1892 he was made a Chevalier of the Legion of Honor, and in 1896 a Commander of the Order of Charles III. of Spain. In 1895 the position of professor of composition at the conservatory was offered to him, but he declined it. The next year, together with Charles Bordes and Alexandre Guilmant, he founded a new music school in Paris, the "Schola Cantorum," of which he is the director and professor of composition.

While he appears to have kept himself fairly busy with studying, orchestral playing, chorus training, teaching and directing, the main activity of the man for the last thirty years has been writing music. His compositions extend to about sixty numbered works, and include pianoforte pieces, concertos, string quartets and other chamber works, overtures, symphonic poems, symphonies, many songs, choral ballads, cantatas, an operetta, and two music dramas. Among them, to mention only a few that are of importance—both intrinsically and as stepping stones in their author's development—

From Brooklyn, N.Y.

Address

Date DEC 16 1905

THE appearance, as conductor, of Vincent d'Indy, one of the chief exponents of the fin de siècle school of French composers, and the novelty of a program of four works of the same school, including two by the conductor himself, attracted an uncommonly large audience to the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at our Temple of Apollo—Baptist—last week Friday evening. To judge by the applause that followed each number the audience must have been favorably impressed, though judging by the aftermath of more or less competent criticism there was widespread perplexity and a diversity of opinion ranging from utter contempt to outspoken enthusiasm. For my own part I felt very much as I did after being a guest at a vegetarian banquet designed to prove to specially invited carnivora that neither fish, flesh, fowl nor even good red herring were essential to the enjoyment of a repast, and that vegetables could be cooked up in such a way that you couldn't tell them from cutlets or chicken croquettes. Most of the time I couldn't tell what I was eating, many of the things had an insipid resemblance to meat, some tasted very queerly, and a few of the queer-tasting things were pleasing because of their queerness. The net result was a sense of insufficiency—a feeling that something had been wanting to make a square meal. The pièce de résistance on the French musical menu at the Temple was d'Indy's Deuxième Symphonie in B flat. It has been pronounced utterly incomprehensible by some of the best endorsed critics and I believe it. The composer appears to be continually struggling without success to break away from the influence of Wagner and blaze a trail of his own, the result of which is to create an exasperating impression of conscious striving after originality for its own sake, in other words, of insincerity and affectation, in spite of which some bizarre effects are produced that are so strange as to be fassinating. "Saugefleurie," the other number, by the same author, a musical interpretation of a forest legend, is much more satisfying, because the spirit of Wagner is allowed to have pretty much its own way and manages to get in some charming harmonies strongly suggestive of "Tristan und Isolde." The second number, Gabriel Fauré's suite, arranged as incidental music to Maeterlinck's "Pelleas and Melisande," is as was stated in the program, "charged with pensive twlight melancholy" pre-eminently appropriate to the mystic gloom of a Maeterlinck drama. The spinning-wheel effect in the second movement is a remarkably clever piece of descriptive composition. But by all odds the most fetching thing on the program was Paul Dukas' musical interpretation of Goethe's humorous ballad, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice." Nothing better in the way of comic representation has perhaps been accomplished with music as the medium. As a whole, the program was interesting, but something from the old shop seemed wanting to give substance to the meal. The attendance included Mr. and Mrs. Franklin W. Hooper, Mr. and Mrs. R. Huntington Woodman, Mr. Edward M. Shepard, Mr. and Mrs. Stephen B. Griswold, Mr. John F. Praeger, Mr. Carll H. De Silver, Mr. and Mrs. Edwin L. Snedeker, Miss Snedeker, Mr. and Mrs. George H. Southard, Mr. and Mrs. George F. Elliott, Mrs. William B. Dudley, Mr. Matthew Hinman, Miss Hinman, Mr. J. H. Oliphant, Mrs. George F. Weeden, Miss Weeden, Mr. S. K. Probasco, Mr. Frank Julian Price, Mr. and Mrs. Russell Prentiss, Miss Sallie Ingalls, Mr. and Mrs. W. McK. Miller, Miss Josephine Barr, Miss Grace Merritt, Rev. and Mrs. Henry T. Scudder, Miss Katrina Blossom, Miss Perkins, Mr. Thomas S. Perkins, Miss Van Bergen and Miss Sadie Russell.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the world.

From TOWN & COUNTRY

Address NEW YORK CITY.

DEC 16 1905

Date

Mr. Vincent D'Indy was the visiting conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its concerts on December seventh and ninth, and, as was fitting to the occasion, his program for both concerts were made up of examples of the modern French school, the composers of which speak a language so unlike that of all other musical nations and one so advanced in some instances as to present many strange intervals and effects which formerly would have been thought most discordant. That these modern Frenchmen have something to say, however, and that this is often of serious interest, must be conceded. Of Mr. D'Indy's own numbers represented on these programs, the "Sange Fleurie" and the variations entitled "Istar" were the most charming, being much more poetical and possessing greater musical spontaneity than his symphony. Debussy's delightful sketches were of special interest, showing much originality and great beauty and subtlety of expression. Cæsar Frank's symphonic poem, "Psyche," was a richly colored performance of a work of sincerity and eloquence.

From MAIL

NEW YORK CITY.

Address

DEC 16 190

Date

The event of next week to appreciative lovers of music will be the concert in Mendelssohn Hall on Tuesday evening of the Longy Club, of Boston. The Longy Club comprises the principal players of wind instruments of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Chamber music for wind instruments is in America a little known branch of the art. The Longy Club's existence was made possible by the liberal policy of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which fosters individual effort by its members through various subsidiary organizations. There are no less than eight of these, among which the Longy Club and the Boston Symphony Quartet, which is to give its first concert of the year in New York on January 2. The idea of the club belongs to Mr. Georges Longy, the first oboe of the orchestra. He had been in similar organizations in Paris, where wind instruments are justly held in higher esteem than they seem to be elsewhere in the world; and when he came to Boston, discovering the magnificent material in the wind choirs of the orchestra, he had no trouble in getting Mr. Higginson's consent to form the club. Its success from the outset has been remarkable.

The club this year is strengthened by the presence of Mr. Sadony, the new first bassoon of the orchestra. Its roster is as follows:

Flutes—Messrs. A. Maquarre and D. Maquarre.
Oboes—Messrs. G. Longy and C. Lenom.
Clarinets—Messrs. G. Grisez and P. Mimart.
Horns—Messrs. F. Hain and H. Lorbeer.
Bassoons—Messrs. P. Sadony and J. Helleberg.
Piano—Mr. A. de Voto.

The programme for Tuesday will be as follows:

Quintet, op. 16, for oboe, clarinet, horn, bassoon and piano.....Beethoven
Nocturne, op. 33, for flute, two oboes, two clarinets, two horns and two bassoons.....Gabriel Faure
Intermezzo scerzando for flute, oboe, two clarinets, horn and bassoon, Ch. Lefebvre
Concerto in E flat for oboe.....Mozart
Sinfonietta, op. 188, for two flutes, two oboes, two clarinets, two horns and two bassoons.....Raff

ress

An event of unusual interest will be the concert of the Longy Club at Mendelssohn Hall next Tuesday evening. This club is composed of the principal players of wind instruments of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and they make a specialty of chamber music for wind instruments. This in America is almost an altogether undiscovered branch of the art. The club itself has brought to the attention of music-lovers a very considerable part of a most interesting literature. Its existence was made possible by the very liberal policy of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which fosters individual effort on the part of its members by means of various subsidiary organizations. There are no fewer than eight of these, of which the most important are the Longy Club and the Boston Symphony Quartet, which is to give its first concert of the year in New York on January 2. The idea of the club belongs to Mr. Georges Longy, the first oboe of the orchestra. He had been in similar organizations in Paris, where wind instruments are justly held in higher esteem than they seem to be elsewhere in the world; and when he came to Boston, discovering the magnificent material in the wind choirs of the orchestra, he had no trouble in getting Mr. Higginson's consent to form the club. The programme for Tuesday includes: Beethoven, quintet, op. 16, for oboe, clarinet, horn, bassoon, and piano; Gabriel Fauré (a) nocturne, op. 33, for flute, two oboes, two clarinets, two horns, and two bassoons; Charles Lefebvre (b), intermezzo scherzando, for flute, oboe, two clarinets, horn, and bassoon; Mozart, concerto in E flat, for oboe, (a) Romance, (b) Rondo; Raff, Sinfonietta, op. 188, for two flutes, two oboes, two clarinets, two horns, and two bassoons.

The second concert of the excellent Flonzaley Quartet will be given in Chamber Music Hall, Carnegie Hall, on Tuesday evening next, and will be repeated the following evening for the benefit of music students and teachers, at popular prices. Tickets for both concerts can be obtained at the door. Programme: Quartet in D, op. 18, Beethoven; "Andante Sostenuto," from quartet, op. 62, Robert Fuchs; "Vivace," from quartet, in D minor, op. 74, Max Reger; quartet, (Aus meinem Leben), Smetana.

The Volpe Symphony Society will give three concerts at Carnegie Hall on January 4, February 22, March 29. The orchestral members of this society are young musicians who, under the able direction of Mr. A. D. Volpe, are holding semi-weekly rehearsals. Mr. Volpe is a Russian, who for many years was associated with Rubinstein and Tchaikovsky in St. Petersburg. It has been his aim in America to follow the example set by these great men.

From

Address

Date

The first concert in several years by the Longy Club of Boston will be given in Mendelssohn Hall on next Tuesday evening at 8:15 o'clock. The club is composed of the principal players of wind instruments of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and they make a specialty of chamber music for wind instruments. Its existence was made possible by the liberal policy of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which fosters individual effort on the part of its members by means of various subsidiary organizations. It is an interesting fact that there are no less than eight of these, of which the most important are the Longy Club and the Boston Symphony Quartet, which is to give its first concert of the year in New-York on January 2. The idea of the club belongs to Mr. George Longy, the first oboe of the orchestra. He had been in similar organizations in Paris, where wind instruments are justly held in higher esteem than they seem to be elsewhere in the world, and when he came to Boston, discovering the magnificent material in the wind choirs of the orchestra, he had no trouble in getting Mr. Higginson's consent to form a club. Following is the programme:

Quintet, op. 16.....Beethoven
(For oboe, clarinet, horn, bassoon and piano.)
Nocturne, op. 33.....Gabriel Fauré
(For flute, two oboes, two clarinets, two horns and two bassoons.)
Intermezzo Scherzando.....Ch. Lefebvre
(For flute, oboe, two clarinets, horn and bassoon.)
Concerto in E flat.....Mozart
(For oboe.)
Sinfonietta, op. 188.....Raff
(For two flutes, two oboes, two clarinets, two horns and two bassoons.)

om

ldress NEW YORK CITY.

DEC 16 1905

ate

Modern French Music

A tradition was disregarded when Vincent d'Indy was invited to conduct a series of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The honor accorded to him was more than a personal tribute; it was the recognition of the serious aims of a group of French composers, whose unofficial head is M. d'Indy himself. The concerts he conducted consisted exclusively of compositions by members of this group—ranging from César Franck, who may be regarded as its creator, to d'Indy and Debussy, and including Chausson, Dukas, Fauré, and, youngest of them all, Albéric Magnard. The distinctive traits of this modern French music are exhibited most conspicuously in M. d'Indy's compositions. Between them and the sweet tunefulness of Gounod's music, on the one hand, and the rhythmic brilliance of Saint-Saëns's, on the other, there is the strongest contrast. D'Indy's music is heavy with dissonance, and avoids adherence to a key as a cat shuns water. One who finds it unintelligible does not thereby argue himself a musical ignoramus. A hearer who understood only English remarked after one of these concerts that it reminded him of listening to a sermon by a French preacher; the form of eloquence was obvious, but it stirred him not a whit. Compared with the German Richard Strauss, d'Indy is equally daring in his disregard for musical convention and far more successful in avoiding the commonplace. One cannot help feeling that of the two the French composer is artistically the more sincere. Nevertheless, it is hard also to escape the feeling that much of what he writes is an intellectual tour de force. Mr. Mason's sketch of d'Indy in The Outlook for March 4, 1905, will be recalled by many of our readers who are specially interested in this subject. D'Indy and his confreres are like explorers in a new musical country. Perhaps they know whither they are going. Perhaps they are making great discoveries which others will appropriate and develop. Of their seriousness there can be no doubt. It is a sign of America's musical cosmopolitanism that it has heard the music of these innovators with an open mind and with a willingness to be persuaded.

88

rom

ddress

ate

NEW YORK SUN

ss

DEC 17 1905

The first concert of the Longy Club, formed of the wood wind players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will take place at Mendelssohn Hall on Tuesday evening. The programme will consist of Beethoven's quintet, opus 16, for oboe, clarinet, horn, bassoon and piano; Gabriel Faure's nocturne, opus 33, for two clarinets, two horns and two bassoons; Lefebvre's intermezzo scherzando, for flute, oboe, two clarinets, horn and bassoon; Mozart's E flat oboe concerto, two movements, and Raff's sinfonietta, opus 188, for two flutes, two oboes, two clarinets, two horns and two bassoons.

ss

DEC 17 1905

The Longy Club, made up of principal players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will give a concert at Mendelssohn Hall on Tuesday evening. Its personnel consists of the following players: Two flutists, two oboeists, two clarinets, two horns, two bassoons. In addition the services of a pianist is enlisted. The programme to be given includes works for these instruments, in various combinations, by Beethoven, Faure, Lefebre, Mozart and Raff. It will be the first concert that this organization has given in New York for years.

188

[133]

From Brooklyn, N. Y.

Address

Date DEC 16 1905

* * *

THE appearance, as conductor, of Vincent d'Indy, one of the chief exponents of the fin de siècle school of French composers, and the novelty of a program of four works of the same school, including two by the conductor himself, attracted an uncommonly large audience to the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at our Temple of Apollo —Baptist—last week Friday evening. To judge by the applause that followed each number the audience must have been favorably impressed, though judging by the aftermath of more or less competent criticism there was widespread perplexity and a diversity of opinion ranging from utter contempt to outspoken enthusiasm. For my own part I felt very much as I did after being a guest at a vegetarian banquet designed to prove to specially invited carnivora that neither fish, flesh, fowl nor even good red herring were essential to the enjoyment of a repast, and that vegetables could be cooked up in such a way that you couldn't tell them from cutlets or chicken croquettes. Most of the time I couldn't tell what I was eating, many of the things had an insipid resemblance to meat, some tasted very queerly, and a few of the queer-tasting things were pleasing because of their queerness. The net result was a sense of insufficiency—a feeling that something had been wanting to make a square meal. The pièce de résistance on the French musical menu at the Temple was d'Indy's Deuxième Symphonie in B flat. It has been pronounced utterly incomprehensible by some of the best endorsed critics and I believe it. The composer appears to be continually struggling without success to break away from the influence of Wagner and blaze a trail of his own, the result of which is to create an exasperating impression of conscious striving after originality for its own sake, in other words, of insincerity and affectation, in spite of which some bizarre effects are produced that are so strange as to be fassinating. "Saugefleurie," the other number, by the same author, a musical interpretation of a forest legend, is much more satisfying, because the spirit of Wagner is allowed to have pretty much its own way and manages to get in some charming harmonies strongly suggestive of "Tristan und Isolde." The second number, Gabriel Fauré's suite, arranged as incidental music to Maeterlinck's "Pelleas and Melisande," is as was stated in the program, "charged with pensive twlight melancholy" pre-eminently appropriate to the mystic gloom of a Maeterlinck drama. The spinning-wheel effect in the second movement is a remarkably clever piece of descriptive composition. But by all odds the most fetching thing on the program was Paul Dukas' musical interpretation of Goethe's humorous ballad, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice." Nothing better in the way of comic representation has perhaps been accomplished with music as the medium. As a whole, the program was interesting, but something from the old shop seemed wanting to give substance to the meal. The attendance included Mr. and Mrs. Franklin W. Hooper, Mr. and Mrs. R. Huntington Woodman, Mr. Edward M. Shepard, Mr. and Mrs. Stephen B. Griswold, Mr. John F. Praeger, Mr. Carll H. De Silver, Mr. and Mrs. Edwin L. Snedeker, Miss Snedeker, Mr. and Mrs. George H. Southard, Mr. and Mrs. George F. Elliott, Mrs. William B. Dudley, Mr. Matthew Hinman, Miss Hinman, Mr. J. H. Oliphant, Mrs. George F. Weeden, Miss Weeden, Mr. S. K. Probasco, Mr. Frank Julian Price, Mr. and Mrs. Russell Prentiss, Miss Sallie Ingalls, Mr. and Mrs. W. McK. Miller, Miss Josephine Barr, Miss Grace Merritt, Rev. and Mrs. Henry T. Scudder, Miss Katrina Blossom, Miss Perkins, Mr. Thomas S. Perkins, Miss Van Bergen and Miss Sadie Russell.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the world

From TOWN & COUNTRY

Address

Date

Mr. Vincent D'Indy was the visiting conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its concerts on December seventh and ninth, and, as was fitting to the occasion, his program for both concerts were made up of examples of the modern French school, the composers of which speak a language so unlike that of all other musical nations and one so advanced in some instances as to present many strange intervals and effects which formerly would have been thought most discordant. That these modern Frenchmen have something to say, however, and that this is often of serious interest, must be conceded. Of Mr. D'Indy's own numbers represented on these programs, the "Sange Fleurie" and the variations entitled "Istar" were the most charming, being much more poetical and possessing greater musical spontaneity than his symphony. Debussy's delightful sketches were of special interest, showing much originality and great beauty and subtlety of expression. Cæsar Frank's symphonic poem, "Psyche," was a richly colored performance of a work of sincerity and eloquence.

From

Address

Date

The event of next week to appreciative lovers of music will be the concert in Mendelssohn Hall on Tuesday evening of the Longy Club, of Boston. The Longy Club comprises the principal players of wind instruments of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Chamber music for wind instruments is in America a little known branch of the art. The Longy Club's existence was made possible by the liberal policy of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which fosters individual effort by its members through various subsidiary organizations. There are no less than eight of these, among them the Longy Club and the Boston Symphony Quartet, which is to give its first concert of the season in New York

Georges Longy, the first oboe of the orchestra. He had been in similar organizations in Paris, where wind instruments are held in high esteem, and when he came to Boston, five years ago, and discovered the excellent material in the wind choirs of the orchestra, he had no trouble in getting Mr. Higginson's consent to form the club. Its success from the outset has been remarkable.

The club this year is strengthened by the presence of Mr. Sadony, the new first bassoon of the orchestra. Its roster is as follows:

Flutes—Messrs. A. Maquarre and D. Maquarre.
Oboes—Messrs. G. Longy and C. Lenom.
Clarinets—Messrs. G. Grisez and P. Mimart.
Horns—Messrs. F. Hain and H. Lorbeer.
Bassoons—Messrs. P. Sadony and J. Helleberg.
Piano—Mr. A. de Voto.

The programme for Tuesday will be as follows:

Quintet, op. 16, for oboe, clarinet, horn, bassoon and piano.....Beethoven
Nocturne, op. 33, for flute, two oboes, two clarinets, two horns and two bassoons.....Gabriel Faure
Intermezzo scerzando for flute, oboe, two clarinets, horn and bassoon, Ch. Lefebvre
Concerto in E flat for oboe.....Mozart
Sinfonietta, op. 188, for two flutes, two oboes, two clarinets, two horns and two bassoons.....Raff

m

ress

e

An event of unusual interest will be the concert of the Longy Club at Mendelssohn Hall next Tuesday evening. This club is composed of the principal players of wind instruments of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and they make a specialty of chamber music for wind instruments. This in America is almost an altogether undiscovered branch of the art. The club itself has brought to the attention of music-lovers a very considerable part of a most interesting literature. Its existence was made possible by the very liberal policy of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which fosters individual effort on the part of its members by means of various subsidiary organizations. There are no fewer than eight of these, of which the most important are the Longy Club and the Boston Symphony Quartet, which is to give its first concert of the year in New York on January 2. The idea of the club belongs to Mr. Georges Longy, the first oboe of the orchestra. He had been in similar organizations in Paris, where wind instruments are justly held in higher esteem than they seem to be elsewhere in the world; and when he came to Boston, discovering the magnificent material in the wind choirs of the orchestra, he had no trouble in getting Mr. Higginson's consent to form the club. The programme for Tuesday includes: Beethoven, quintet, op. 16, for oboe, clarinet, horn, bassoon, and piano; Gabriel Fauré (a) nocturne, op. 33, for flute, two oboes, two clarinets, two horns, and two bassoons; Charles Lefebvre (b), intermezzo scherzando, for flute, oboe, two clarinets, horn, and bassoon; Mozart, concerto in E flat, for oboe, (a) Romance, (b) Rondo; Raff, Sinfonietta, op. 188, for two flutes, two oboes, two clarinets, two horns, and two bassoons.

The second concert of the excellent Flonzaley Quartet will be given in Chamber Music Hall, Carnegie Hall, on Tuesday evening next, and will be repeated the following evening for the benefit of music students and teachers, at popular prices. Tickets for both concerts can be obtained at the door. Programme: Quartet in D, op. 18, Beethoven; "Andante Sostenuto," from quartet, op. 62, Robert Fuchs; "Vivace," from quartet, in D minor, op. 74, Max Reger; quartet, (Aus meinem Leben), Smetana.

The Volpe Symphony Society will give three concerts at Carnegie Hall on January 4, February 22, March 29. The orchestral members of this society are young musicians who, under the able direction of Mr. A. D. Volpe, are holding semi-weekly rehearsals. Mr. Volpe is a Russian, who for many years was associated with Rubinstein and Tchaikovsky in St. Petersburg. It has been his aim in America to follow the example set by these great men.

ess

The first concert of the Longy Club, formed of the wood wind players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will take place at Mendelssohn Hall on Tuesday evening. The programme will consist of Beethoven's quintet, opus 16, for oboe, clarinet, horn, bassoon and piano; Gabriel Faure's nocturne, opus 33, for two clarinets, two horns and two bassoons; Lefebvre's intermezzo scherzando, for flute, oboe, two clarinets, horn and bassoon; Mozart's E flat oboe concerto, two movements, and Raff's sinfonietta, opus 188, for two flutes, two oboes, two clarinets, two horns and two bassoons.

om

idress

ate

Modern French Music

A tradition was disregarded when Vincent d'Indy was invited to conduct a series of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The honor accorded to him was more than a personal tribute; it was the recognition of the serious aims of a group of French composers, whose unofficial head is M. d'Indy himself. The concerts he conducted consisted exclusively of compositions by members of this group—ranging from César Franck, who may be regarded as its creator, to d'Indy and Debussy, and including Chausson, Dukas, Fauré, and, youngest of them all, Albéric Magnard. The distinctive traits of this modern French music are exhibited most conspicuously in M. d'Indy's compositions. Between them and the sweet tunefulness of Gounod's music, on the one hand, and the rhythmic brilliance of Saint-Saëns's, on the other, there is the strongest contrast. D'Indy's music is heavy with dissonance, and avoids adherence to a key as a cat shuns water. One who finds it unintelligible does not thereby argue himself a musical ignoramus. A hearer who understood only English remarked after one of these concerts that it reminded him of listening to a sermon by a French preacher; the form of eloquence was obvious, but it stirred him not a whit. Compared with the German Richard Strauss, d'Indy is equally daring in his disregard for musical convention and far more successful in avoiding the commonplace. One cannot help feeling that of the two the French composer is artistically the more sincere. Nevertheless, it is hard also to escape the feeling that much of what he writes is an intellectual tour de force. Mr. Mason's sketch of d'Indy in The Outlook for March 4, 1905, will be recalled by many of our readers who are specially interested in this subject. D'Indy and his confreres are like explorers in a new musical country. Perhaps they know whither they are going. Perhaps they are making great discoveries which others will appropriate and develop. Of their seriousness there can be no doubt. It is a sign of America's musical cosmopolitanism that it has heard the music of these innovators with an open mind and with a willingness to be persuaded.

rom

ddress

ate

The first concert in several years by the Longy Club of Boston will be given in Mendelssohn Hall on next Tuesday evening at 8:15 o'clock. The club is composed of the principal players of wind instruments of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and they make a specialty of chamber music for wind instruments. Its existence was made possible by the liberal policy of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which fosters individual effort on the part of its members by means of various subsidiary organizations. It is an interesting fact that there are no less than eight of these, of which the most important are the Longy Club and the Boston Symphony Quartet, which is to give its first concert of the year in New-York on January 2. The idea of the club belongs to Mr. George Longy, the first oboe of the orchestra. He had been in similar organizations in Paris, where wind instruments are justly held in higher esteem than they seem to be elsewhere in the world, and when he came to Boston, discovering the magnificent material in the wind choirs of the orchestra, he had no trouble in getting Mr. Higginson's consent to form a club. Following is the programme:

Quintet, op. 16.....Beethoven
(For oboe, clarinet, horn, bassoon and piano.)
Nocturne, op. 33.....Gabriel Fauré
(For flute, two oboes, two clarinets, two horns and two bassoons.)
Intermezzo Scherzando.....Ch. Lefebvre
(For flute, oboe, two clarinets, horn and bassoon.)
Concerto in E flat.....Mozart
(For oboe.)
Sinfonietta, op. 188.....Raff
(For two flutes, two oboes, two clarinets, two horns and two bassoons.)

ess

The Longy Club, made up of principal players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will give a concert at Mendelssohn Hall on Tuesday evening. Its personnel consists of the following players: Two flutists, two oboeists, two clarinets, two horns, two bassoons. In addition the services of a pianist is enlisted. The programme to be given includes works for these instruments, in various combinations, by Beethoven, Faure, Lefebre, Mozart and Raff. It will be the first concert that this organization has given in New York for years.

[133]

om NEW YORK PRESS

dress

te DEC 17 1905

The first concert this season of the Longy Club will take place on next Tuesday evening in Mendelssohn Hall. This club is composed of the principal players of wind instruments in the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It is the only organization of its kind in the United States, and owes its existence to the liberal policy of the Boston orchestra, which fosters no fewer than eight subsidiary organizations, of which the most important are the Longy Club and the Boston Symphony Quartet. The club this year is strengthened by the presence of Mr. Sadony, the new first bassoon of the orchestra. The programme of the first concert is interesting. Few concertgoers have heard Beethoven's quintet for wind instruments and piano; still fewer Raff's Sinfonietta. The Mozart concerto for oboe, too, is heard rarely, and the Faure and Lefebvre works probably will be entirely new to the audience. The programme is: Beethoven, Quinete, Opus 16, for oboe, clarinet, horn, bassoon and piano; Gabriel Faure, Nocturne, Opus 33, for flute, two oboes, two clarinets, two horns and two bassoons; Ch. Lefebvre, Intermezzo scherzando, for flute, oboe, two clarinets, horn and bassoon; Mozart, Concerto for oboe in E flat; Raff, Sinfonietta, Opus 188, for two flutes, two oboes, two clarinets, two horns and two bassoons.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, DEC 10, 1905.

D'INDY AND THE LONGY CLUB.

Mr George Longy, conductor of the Longy club, has been able to arrange with Mr d'Indy to give a concert in Boston in which the program will be devoted entirely to compositions by Mr d'Indy written for wind instruments. Mr d'Indy's stay in this country is so short and his time so fully occupied with orchestral concerts that at first it seemed impossible to get a date when he was free, but by changing some of his other engagements it was finally arranged to give the concert in Potter hall tomorrow afternoon at 3.

Mr d'Indy, in common with many other composers of his school, has devoted no inconsiderable part of his talent to this rather unusual form of chamber music. Frenchmen are almost alone, nowadays, in writing for wind instruments. The reason for this is likely to be found in the fact that the French school for wind instruments, especially reed instruments, is regarded as being the best in the world.

The three works on the program have been played here by the Longy club at former concerts, but they will gain greatly in interest through the presence of the composer. The 'cellist in the trio will be Mr Josef Keller of the orchestra. In the first selection, "Chanson et Danses," Mr. d'Indy will conduct the Longy club. In the second and third, his "Fantasia on Popular French Airs" for oboe and piano, and his trio for clarinet, 'cello and piano, he will be at the piano.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

THE LONGY CLUB CONCERT.

The programmes of the Longy club of woodwind instruments are always quite out of the ordinary run of concert repertoires. That given last night, in Potter Hall, was no exception to this rule. Of course the French school was preponderant, for France is the home of the woodwind, and its musicians have written more compositions for this combination than all the composers of all other nations combined. The first number of the programme was a quintette by Caplet, for the ordinary woodwind quartette, supported by the piano. Mr. Alfred De Voto was at the latter instrument and supplemented the woodwind excellently. His attention to the ensemble is commendable. But the Caplet number was, on the whole, more remarkable for length than for depth.

Two movements from Mozart's Concerto in E flat, for oboe, gave a fine opportunity for Mr. Longy to display his perfect control of his instrument. Boston is fortunate in possessing so great a master of the instrument, probably the equal of any player in the world. In listening to this number one could not but remember that Schumann did not understand this instrument as well as the older master. The oboe is as "exigent" in holding back the breath, as other wind instruments are in calling it forth, and the composer must bear in mind that the oboeist, more than other wind-instrument players, demands periods of rest, to restore his lungs to their normal condition.

Mozart fully comprehended this, and his concerto is very practical for the chief instrument. In the deeper passages M. Longy often attained the fullness and nobility of the English horn, while in the lighter phrases all the naivete and delicacy of the oboe was revealed. The rondo of this work was, however, in that old vein, established by Ph. Em. Bach, in which a chief theme is repeated until it is bored into the memory, which is a defect. The moderns are not as fond of repetitions as their forefathers were.

The final number of the concert was a serenade by Walter Lampe, for 2 flutes, 2 oboes, English horn, 2 clarinettes, bass clarinette, 4 horns, 2 bassoons and a contrabassoon. This score was large enough to replace the orchestra upon a symphonic footing. But the work itself was not of the epic character of a symphony, nor even of the sinfonietta type.

The old serenade was a lighter style of Suite or Partita, and this less ambitious vein was properly adopted by the composer. If the work was not especially thrilling from any ideas expressed, it was at least a very interesting study of a particular kind of orchestra, and it held the attention throughout.

There was a good-sized audience present, but it is a pity that the hall was not crowded, for the Longy club is the Kneisel quartette of the woodwind—that is, it is the best organization of its kind in this country.

Louis C. Elson.

Boston Transcript

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 19, 1905

Mr. Longy's Choir of Wind Instruments in a Fresh Programme—Mr. Leutschg Takes Liszt in a Novel Way.

Last evening the Longy Club gave the first concert of this season in Potter Hall. They played this programme:

Quintette for flute, oboe, clarinet, bassoon and piano.....André Caplet
Nocturne in E-flat minor (op. 33), for flute, two oboes, two clarinets, two horns and two bassoons. (Transcription by Grovlez.) Gabriel Fauré
Intermezzo scherzando, for flute, oboe, two clarinets, horn and bassoon.....Ch. Lefèbvre
Romance and Rondo from the Concerto in E-flat major, for oboe and piano.....Mozart
Serenade (op. 7) for two flutes, two oboes, two clarinets, bass clarinet, four horns, two bassoons and contra-bassoon...Walther Lampe

Composers, even the composers of earlier centuries, seem always to have written for combinations of wind instruments in the comic vein, or at most in the spirit of light, bright fancies. When orchestras were smaller than they are now, the wind voices were more assertive. The elder composers, when they were writing for orchestra, sought full loud colors, and not half tints and faint suggestions from the acid oboe, the mournful flute and the hoarse bassoon. They were the composer's staple reds and blues, where now they are only odd and especial tints that he seeks for odd and particular effects. Yet even in those days, as soon as composers gathered wind instruments by themselves, they began to use them lightly. The oboe, the clarinet, the bassoon they set to dancing, and the traits of the instruments themselves were bound to turn the frolic into dancing. It was making a minuet for Pierrot and Columbine. Or if even they were made to sing grief—these whimsical voices,—that was because it must be the aching grief, like a child's, of Pierrot or Columbine when they add for an instant a pitiful little glimpse of sorrow. Composers of our day usually select these odd stops from their fuller orchestral organ for the same old-time uses. Or at most they empoly them to represent to the listening mind those plentiful moods of our own time that no other instruments seem to characterize half so well—the moods that make us hunt out the quiet moonlit lake, that its stillness may lull the restlessness of the day and its work.

Fauré's Nocturne was such music, while Lefebvre's Intermezzo perfectly embodied the other, the comic function, of a wind choir. André Caplet had thought too seriously with his pianoforte and quartet of woodwinds. He was making Pierrot read Hamlet. Nevertheless, Mr. Longy and his associates played it, at they played all, with a grace that was in itself as interesting as the music which it clothed. With Fauré to show the path, they led us to the still lake. With Lefebvre they led their tonal sport. With Mozart they took down a lot of old humor and old fancy from its shelf in a museum and made it live its tranquil life again. To do that was cleverest of all.

Boston Daily Globe.

TUESDAY, DEC 19, 1905.

LONGY CLUB.

First Concert of the Season Introduces the Players in a Program of Unfamiliar Music.

A small but appreciative audience heard last night the first concert of the sixth season of the Longy club in Potter hall. The program was almost entirely made up of modern French composers' writings. It opened with a quintet by Andre Chaplet for flute, oboe, clarinet, bassoon and piano, which has hardly been heard in this country. It was played from the MS scores last night. The first movement (allegro-brilliante) has two well-marked themes, each interesting, though the second one sounded like a march of brickmakers, heavy with the clay of the pits. The second movement, adagio, is modern and discouraging. Then comes a typical double-reed scherzo, jigging through transpositions a whole tone apart, and a finale with a crashing announcement for the piano.

A nocturne by Gabriel Faure, transcribed by Gabriel Groviez for flute, two oboes, two clarinets, two horns and two bassoons, was sweet, but not particularly stirring to the emotions. It faded through modulation after modulation, always with oboe repeating flute phrase, and always with a muddy harmony below. It was, however, superbly played, and was balanced by an "Intermezzo scherzando" for the same group of instruments, a syncopated, humorous, laughing, quaint thing—almost like the musical joke of a hunchback.

M. Longy played the simple romance and rondo from Mozart's concerto in E flat major, for oboe and piano, with infinite feeling, and the evening concluded with a most satisfying number, scored for instruments rarely seen even today, for they included a bass clarinet, a contra-bassoon, two bassoons, four horns, two clarinets, two flutes and two oboes.

It is a serenade, by Walther Lampe, in four beautiful movements, every one of which is full of unusual feeling. As to its tone color, the thing is positively bewildering; the composer has snatched at bits, has changed in the middle of the phrase, has played every konwn trick with his instruments and invented new changes, has laughed at you and then with you at his own humor; he has been earnest and absolutely irresponsible by turns. It was a most enjoyable experience. The next concert in the Longy

[134]

BOSTON

Published Every Day in the Year
VOL. CXVIII., NO. 172.

TUESDAY, DEC. 19, 1905.

HEAR LONGY CLUB IN POTTER HALL

Famous Organization Gives First Concert of Its Sixth Season—First Performance of Lampe's Serenade.

MR. LONGY'S SKILL IN MOZART CONCERTO

Mr. Waldemar Luetschg Plays at First Piano Recital in "Artist Course" at the Huntington Chambers Hall.

The Longy Club gave last night in Potter Hall the first concert of its sixth season. The club is now composed of Messrs. A. and D. Maquarre, flutes; Longy and Lenom, oboes; Grisez and Mimart, clarinets; Hain and Lorbeer, horns; Sadony and Helleberg, bassoons; de Voto, piano.

It was assisted by Messrs. Mueller, oboe; Fritzsche, bass clarinet; Debuchy, double bassoon, and Hess and Schumann, horns. The programme included Caplet's quintet for flute, oboe, clarinet, bassoon and piano; a transcription by Grovlez for flute, two oboes, two clarinets, two horns and two bassoons, of Gabriel Faure's Nocturne op. 33; Lefebvre's Intermezzo Scherzando for flute, oboe, two clarinets, horn and bassoon; Romance and Rondo from Mozart's concerto in E flat (oboe and piano); Walther Lampe's Serenade, op. 7, for two flutes, two oboes, English horn, two clarinets, bass clarinet, four horns, two bassoons, double bassoon. The pieces by Faure, Lefebvre and Lampe were played for the first time.

Caplet's quintet has been played here before at a Longy concert. As a whole, it is an agreeable rather than a strongly individual composition. The melodic thought is flowing, if at times thin. In the opening allegro there is a curious suggestion of an inversion of the familiar theme of the first movement of Schumann's piano quintet. The scherzo, which, by the way, was not played with the steady precision characteristic of this club, is more striking than the adagio, which is forgotten as soon as it is heard.

The transcription of Faure's nocturne seemed muddy in spots, and it has little musical interest, but the Intermezzo sparkles, and it was played brilliantly.

Lampe, born at Leipsic in 1872, studied with Knorr, Herzogenberg, and Humperdinck, and now lives in Munich. He has composed a piano trio, a 'cello sonata, a "Tragic Tonepicture" for orchestra, and this Serenade, which made a stir in Germany when it was produced there a few years ago. The combination of instruments allows massive effects, and there is continual ensemble rather than a free use of solo passages. Lampe is a modern both in harmonic treatment and in tonal colors. He evidently knows and admires Richard Strauss, but his music is not bizarre merely for the purpose of exciting the peacefully orthodox hearer. His thought is not strained, and at times it is inherently commonplace in spite of ingenious rhythmic treatment and tonal contrasts. The adagio and the finale seem after one hearing to be the strongest of the four movements. The work has one great merit, rarely found in the most modern German music—it is not prolix; it is carefully thought out and concisely expressed.

Mr. Longy played with consummate artistry two movements from an oboe concerto by Mozart—according to the programme. Mozart wrote an oboe concerto in F major, or, as some say, he wrote the first movement, and Stadler finished it; he also wrote a quartet for oboe and strings, but he spoke in a letter of another concerto that he thought of composing or might compose. Simple violin concertos of his day were often played by oboists.

The performance of the club was of a high order of excellence, with the slight exception above mentioned, and the audience, which was not a large one, applauded heartily.

The second concert will be given on Monday evening, Jan. 22.

ᵖspaper Cutting Bureau in the ... LIFE

WASHINGTON, D. C.
DEC 16 1905

Diplomatic

The Diplomatic Corps furnishes many real patrons of music who are intensely appreciative. At the last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra there were present: The French Ambassador, the Brazilian Ambassador and Mme. Nabuco and members of their staff with their wives; the Russian Ambassador and Baroness Rosen, and Baroness Elizabeth Rosen; the Mexican Ambassador and Mme. Casasus, Senor Godoy and Mme. Godoy.

SIXTH SEASON OF LONGY CLUB

The sixth season of the Longy Club was officially opened at Potter Hall last evening when the first of three scheduled concerts was given before a good sized audience. The club is still enthusiastic over the modern French school of music for wind instruments, and last night's program included a Gabriel Faure Nocturne in E flat minor and a Charles LeFebvre Intermezzo scherzando. The program opened with a quintet for flute, oboe, clarinet, bassoon and piano, Andre Caplet; and included Walther Lampe's Serenade Op. 7, and a Romance and Rondo from Mozart's concerto in E flat major for oboe and piano.

The program was one of great interest, covering a wide range of music for wind instruments. The Lampe Serenade calling for fourteen pieces, and obliging the club to call on four artists, who are not members, for assistance, was rather heavy for a chamber concert. It has beauty and a limited quantity of melody, but its great merit is that it calls out every quality of the wood and wind instruments whose possibilities, in the past have been considered rather limited.

The Faure Nocturne is interesting in a mild sort of way, and the LeFebvre number is rather pleasing. Mr. Longy and Mr. De Voto in the Mozart concerto did some of the best work of the evening, and were enthusiastically applauded. The assisting artists were F. Muller, oboe; O. Fritzsche, bass clarinet; Messrs. Hess and C. Schuman, horns.

The Boston Post

The Representative Democratic Paper of New England

Issued daily by Post Publishing Co.
DECEMBER 19, 1905. NO. 68; VOL. 181
Office 259 Washington st., Boston, Mass.

LONGY CLUB CONCERT

The Longy Club gave the first concert of this, its sixth, season, last evening at Potter Hall, assisted by Messrs. Muller, oboe; Fritzsche, bass clarinet; Hess and Schumann, horns. The following was the programme:

Quintet for flute, oboe, clarinet, bassoon and piano.....Caplet
Nocturne, Op. 33, for flute, two oboes, two clarinets, two horns and two bassoons...Faure
Intermezzo scherzando, for flute, oboe, two clarinets, horn and bassoon.....Lefebvre
Romance and rondo, from concerto, for oboe and piano.....Mozart
Serenade, Op. 7, for wind instruments, including bass clarinet and double bassoon....Lampe

These concerts are recognized as unique of their kind, and tney are full of interest in every respect. The Caplet quintet is clever as to treatment, but is monotonous as a whole. Faure's nocturne, transented by Grovelz, proved very enjoyable, as did also the number by Lefebvre. But in some ways the Lampe serenade proved to be the best number. The 14 instruments include four horns, bass clarinet and the rarely-played double bassoon. The allegro scherzando showed the possibilities of all these instruments, separate and in combination, in an especially effective manner. The finale of this number is also an admirable piece of scoring. The performance was ideal, and the work made a most favorable impression. It is certainly worth another hearing. Mr. Longy played the excerpts from the Mozart oboe concerto in his own inimitable manner. There was a fair-sized and appreciative audience present. The second concert will be Jan. 22.

ᵖspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

STAR,
WASHINGTON, D.

DEC 17

Boston Symphony Quartet.

The first concert by the Boston Symphony Quartet will be given in the ball room of the New Willard Hotel tomorrow evening. This organization, which is now in its second year, is unknown in Washington, though its members have become more or less familiar to the Washington public through their membership in the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The first violin, Prof. Willy Hess, the concert master of the orchestra; the second violin, Mr. Otto, one of the first violins of the orchestra; viola, Mr. Emile Ferir, principal viola of the parent organization, and the 'cello is Mr. Heinrich Warnke. The program for the first concert is attractive. Beginning with one of the most beautiful of Haydn's quartets, it ends with one of the most melodious works of Franz Schubert. Between the two will come a complete novelty which will then have its first performance in America, a sonata for violin and piano in G major, by Sigismond Stojowski, the eminent Polish pianist and composer, who will be at the piano, Professor Hess playing the violin part.

om NEW YORK PRESS

dress

DEC 1 [illegible]

te

The first concert this season of the Longy Club will take place on next Tuesday evening in Mendelssohn Hall. This club is composed of the principal players of wind instruments in the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It is the only organization of its kind in the United States, and owes its existence to the liberal policy of the Boston orchestra, which fosters no fewer than eight subsidiary organizations, of which the most important are the Longy Club and the Boston Symphony Quartet. The club this year is strengthened by the presence of Mr. Sadony, the new first bassoon of the orchestra. The programme of the first concert is interesting. Few concertgoers have heard Beethoven's quintet for wind instruments and piano; still fewer Raff's Sinfonietta. The Mozart concerto for oboe, too, is heard rarely, and the Faure and Lefebvre works probably will be entirely new to the audience. The programme is: Beethoven, Quinete, Opus 16, for oboe, clarinet, horn, bassoon and piano; Gabriel Faure, Nocturne, Opus 33, for flute, two oboes, two clarinets, two horns and two bassoons; Ch. Lefebvre, Intermezzo scherzando, for flute, oboe, two clarinets, horn and bassoon; Mozart, Concerto for oboe in E flat; Raff, Sinfonietta, Opus 188, for two flutes, two oboes, two clarinets, two horns and two bassoons.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, DEC 10, 1905.

D'INDY AND THE LONGY CLUB.

Mr George Longy, conductor of the Longy club, has been able to arrange with Mr d'Indy to give a concert in Boston in which the program will be devoted entirely to compositions by Mr d'Indy written for wind instruments. Mr d'Indy's stay in this country is so short and his time so fully occupied with orchestral concerts that at first it seemed impossible to get a date when he was free, but by changing some of his other engagements it was finally arranged to give the concert in Potter hall tomorrow afternoon at 3.

Mr d'Indy, in common with many other composers of his school, has devoted no inconsiderable part of his talent to this rather unusual form of chamber music. Frenchmen are almost alone, nowadays, in writing for wind instruments. The reason for this is likely to be found in the fact that the French school for wind instruments, especially reed instruments, is regarded as being the best in the world.

The three works on the program have been played here by the Longy club at former concerts, but they will gain greatly in interest through the presence of the composer. The 'cellist in the trio will be Mr Josef Keller of the orchestra. In the first selection, "Chanson et Danses," Mr d'Indy will conduct the Longy club. In the second and third, his "Fantasia on Popular French Airs" for oboe and piano, and his trio for clarinet, 'cello and piano, he will be at the piano.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

THE LONGY CLUB CONCERT.

The programmes of the Longy club of woodwind instruments are always quite out of the ordinary run of concert repertoires. That given last night, in Potter Hall, was no exception to this rule. Of course the French school was preponderant, for France is the home of the woodwind, and its musicians have written more compositions for this combination than all the composers of all other nations combined. The first number of the programme was a quintette by Caplet, for the ordinary woodwind quartette, supported by the piano. Mr. Alfred De Voto was at the latter instrument and supplemented the woodwind excellently. His attention to the ensemble is commendable. But the Caplet number was, on the whole, more remarkable for length than for depth.

Two movements from Mozart's Concerto in E flat, for oboe, gave a fine opportunity for Mr. Longy to display his perfect control of his instrument. Boston is fortunate in possessing so great a master of the instrument, probably the equal of any player in the world. In listening to this number one could not but remember that Schumann did not understand this instrument as well as the older master. The oboe is as "exigent" in holding back the breath, as other wind instruments are in calling it forth, and the composer must bear in mind that the oboeist, more than other wind-instrument players, demands periods of rest, to restore his lungs to their normal condition.

Mozart fully comprehended this, and his concerto is very practical for the chief instrument. In the deeper passages M. Longy often attained the fullness and nobility of the English horn, while in the lighter phrases all the naivete and delicacy of the oboe was revealed. The rondo of this work was, however, in that old vein, established by Ph. Em. Bach, in which a chief theme is repeated until it is bored into the memory, which is a defect. The moderns are not as fond of repetitions as their forefathers were.

The final number of the concert was a serenade by Walter Lampe, for 2 flutes, 2 oboes, English horn, 2 clarinettes, bass clarinette, 4 horns, 2 bassoons and a contrabassoon. This score was large enough to replace the orchestra upon a symphonic footing. But the work itself was not of the epic character of a symphony, nor even of the sinfonietta type.

The old serenade was a lighter style of Suite or Partita, and this less ambitious vein was properly adopted by the composer. If the work was not especially thrilling from any ideas expressed, it was at least a very interesting study of a particular kind of orchestra, and it held the attention throughout.

There was a good-sized audience present, but it is a pity that the hall was not crowded, for the Longy club is the Kneisel quartette of the woodwind—that is, it is the best organization of its kind in this country.

Louis C. Elson.

Boston Transcript

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 19, 1905

Mr. Longy's Choir of Wind Instruments in a Fresh Programme—Mr. Leutschg Takes Liszt in a Novel Way

Last evening the Longy Club gave the first concert of this season in Potter Hall. They played this programme:

Quintette for flute, oboe, clarinet, bassoon and piano.....André Caplet
Nocturne in E-flat minor (op. 33), for flute, two oboes, two clarinets, two horns and two bassoons. (Transcription by Grovlez.)
Gabriel Fauré
Intermezzo scherzando, for flute, oboe, two clarinets, horn and bassoon.....Ch. Lefèbvre
Romance and Rondo from the Concerto in E-flat major, for oboe and piano.....Mozart
Serenade (op. 7) for two flutes, two oboes, two clarinets, bass clarinet, four horns, two bassoons and contra-bassoon...Walther Lampe

Composers, even the composers of earlier centuries, seem always to have written for combinations of wind instruments in the comic vein, or at most in the spirit of light, bright fancies. When orchestras were smaller than they are now, the wind voices were more assertive. The elder composers, when they were writing for orchestra, sought full loud colors, and not half tints and faint suggestions from the acid oboe, the mournful flute and the hoarse bassoon. They were the composer's staple reds and blues, where now they are only odd and especial tints that he seeks for odd and particular effects. Yet even in those days, as soon as composers gathered wind instruments by themselves, they began to use them lightly. The oboe, the clarinet, the bassoon they set to dancing, and the traits of the instruments themselves were bound to turn the frolic into dancing. It was making a minuet for Pierrot and Columbine. Or if even they were made to sing grief—these whimsical voices—that was because it must be the aching grief, like a child's, of Pierrot or Columbine when they add for an instant a pitiful little glimpse of sorrow. Composers of our day usually select these odd stops from their fuller orchestral organ for the same old-time uses. Or at most they empoly them to represent to the listening mind those plentiful moods of our own time that no other instruments seem to characterize half so well—the moods that make us hunt out the quiet moonlit lake, that its stillness may lull the restlessness of the day and its work.

Fauré's Nocturne was such music, while Lefèbvre's Intermezzo perfectly embodied the other, the comic function, of a wind choir. André Caplet had thought too seriously with his pianoforte and quartet of woodwinds. He was making Pierrot read Hamlet. Nevertheless, Mr. Longy and his associates played it, at they played all, with a grace that was in itself as interesting as the music which it clothed. With Fauré to show the path, they led us to the still lake. With Lefèbvre they led their tonal sport. With Mozart they took down a lot of old humor and old fancy from its shelf in a museum and made it live its tranquil life again. To do that was cleverest of all.

Boston Daily Globe.

TUESDAY, DEC 19, 1905.

LONGY CLUB.

First Concert of the Season Introduces the Players in a Program of Unfamiliar Music.

A small but appreciative audience heard last night the first concert of the sixth season of the Longy club in Potter hall. The program was almost entirely made up of modern French composers' writings. It opened with a quintet by Andre Chaplet for flute, oboe, clarinet, bassoon and piano, which has hardly been heard in this country. It was played from the MS scores last night. The first movement (allegro-brilliante) has two well-marked themes, each interesting, though the second one sounded like a march of brickmakers, heavy with the clay of the pits. The second movement, adagio, is modern and discouraging. Then comes a typical double-reed scherzo, jigging through transpositions a whole tone apart, and a finale with a crashing announcement for the piano.

A nocturne by Gabriel Faure, transcribed by Gabriel Grovlez for flute, two oboes, two clarinets, two horns and two bassoons, was sweet, but not particularly stirring to the emotions. It faded through modulation after modulation, always with oboe repeating flute phrase, and always with a muddy harmony below. It was, however, superbly played, and was balanced by an "intermezzo scherzando" for the same group of instruments, a syncopated, humorous, laughing, quaint thing—almost like the musical joke of a hunchback.

M. Longy played the simple romance and rondo from Mozart's concerto in E flat major, for oboe and piano, with infinite feeling, and the evening concluded with a most satisfying number, scored for instruments rarely seen even today, for they included a bass clarinet, a contra-bassoon, two bassoons, four horns, two clarinets, two flutes and two oboes.

It is a serenade, by Walther Lampe, in four beautiful movements, every one of which is full of unusual feeling. As to its tone color, the thing is positively bewildering; the composer has snatched at bits, has changed in the middle of the phrase, has played every konwn trick with his instruments and invented new changes, has laughed at you and then with you at his own humor; he has been earnest and absolutely irresponsible by turns. It was a most enjoyable experience. The next concert in the Longy club's series occurs on Jan 22.

BOSTON HERALD

Published Every Day in the Year.
VOL. CXVIII. NO. 172.

TUESDAY, DEC. 19, 1905.

HEAR LONGY CLUB IN POTTER HALL

Famous Organization Gives First Concert of Its Sixth Season—First Performance of Lampe's Serenade.

MR. LONGY'S SKILL IN MOZART CONCERTO

Mr. Waldemar Luetschg Plays at First Piano Recital in "Artist Course" at the Huntington Chambers Hall.

The Longy Club gave last night in Potter Hall the first concert of its sixth season. The club is now composed of Messrs. A. and D. Maquarre, flutes; Longy and Lenom, oboes; Grisez and Mimart, clarinets; Hain and Lorbeer, horns; Sadony and Helleberg, bassoons; de Voto, piano.

It was assisted by Messrs. Mueller, oboe; Fritzsche, bass clarinet; Debuchy, double bassoon, and Hess and Schumann, horns. The programme included Caplet's quintet for flute, oboe, clarinet, bassoon and piano; a transcription by Grovlez for flute, two oboes, two clarinets, two horns and two bassoons, of Gabriel Faure's Nocturne op. 33; Lefebvre's Intermezzo Scherzando for flute, oboe, two clarinets, horn and bassoon; Romance and Rondo from Mozart's concerta in E flat (oboe and piano); Walther Lampe's Serenade, op. 7, for two flutes, two oboes, English horn, two clarinets, bass clarinet, four horns, two bassoons, double bassoon. The pieces by Faure, Lefebvre and Lampe were played for the first time.

Caplet's quintet has been played here before at a Longy concert. As a whole, it is an agreeable rather than a strongly individual composition. The melodic thought is flowing, if at times thin. In the opening allegro there is a curious suggestion of an inversion of the familiar theme of the first movement of Schumann's piano quintet. The scherzo, which, by the way, was not played with the steady precision characteristic of this club, is more striking than the adagio, which is forgotten as soon as it is heard.

The transcription of Faure's nocturne seemed muddy in spots, and it has little musical interest, but the Intermezzo sparkles and it was played brilliantly.

Lampe, born at Leipsic in 1872, studied with Knorr, Herzogenberg, and Humperdinck, and now lives in Munich. He has composed a piano trio, a 'cello sonata, a "Tragic Tonepicture" for orchestra, and this Serenade, which made a stir in Germany when it was produced there a few years ago. The combination of instruments allows massive effects, and there is continual ensemble rather than a free use of solo passages. Lampe is a modern both in harmonic treatment and in tonal colors. He evidently knows and admires Richard Strauss, but his music is not bizarre merely for the purpose of exciting the peacefully orthodox hearer. His thought is not strained, and at times it is inherently commonplace in spite of ingenious rhythmic treatment and tonal contrasts. The adagio and the finale seem after one hearing to be the strongest of the four movements. The work has one great merit, rarely found in the most modern German music—it is not prolix; it is carefully thought out and concisely expressed.

Mr. Longy played with consummate artistry two movements from an oboe concerto by Mozart—according to the programme. Mozart wrote an oboe concerto in F major, or, as some say, he wrote the first movement, and Stadler finished it; he also wrote a quartet for oboe and strings, but he spoke in a letter of another concerto that he thought of composing or might compose. Simple violin concertos of his day were often played by oboists.

The performance of the club was of a high order of excellence, with the slight exception above mentioned, and the audience, which was not a large one, applauded heartily.

The second concert will be given on Monday evening, Jan. 22.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World LIFE

Diplomatic

The Diplomatic Corps furnishes many real patrons of music who are intensely appreciative. At the last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra there were present: The French Ambassador, the Brazilian Ambassador and Mme. Nabuco and members of their staff with their wives; the Russian Ambassador and Baroness Rosen, and Baroness Elizabeth Rosen; the Mexican Ambassador and Mme. Casasus, Senor Godoy and Mme. Godoy.

The Boston Journal

SIXTH SEASON OF LONGY CLUB

The sixth season of the Longy Club was officially opened at Potter Hall last evening when the first of three scheduled concerts was given before a good sized audience. The club is still enthusiastic over the modern French school of music for wind instruments, and last night's program included a Gabriel Faure Nocturne in E flat minor and a Charles LeFebvre intermezzo scherzando. The program opened with a quintet for flute, oboe, clarinet, bassoon and piano, Andre Caplet; and included Walther Lampe's Serenade Op. 7, and a Romance and Rondo from Mozart's concerto in E flat major for oboe and piano.

The program was one of great interest, covering a wide range of music for wind instruments. The Lampe Serenade calling for fourteen pieces, and obliging the club to call on four artists, who are not members, for assistance, was rather heavy for a chamber concert. It has beauty and a limited quantity of melody, but its great merit is that it calls out every quality of the wood and wind instruments whose possibilities in the past have been considered rather limited.

The Faure Nocturne is interesting in a mild sort of way, and the LeFebvre number is rather pleasing. Mr. Longy and Mr. De Voto in the Mozart concerto did some of the best work of the evening, and were enthusiastically applauded. The assisting artists were F. Muller, oboe; O. Fritzsche, bass clarinet; Messrs. Hess and C. Schuman, horns.

The Boston Post

The Representative Democratic Paper of New England

Issued daily by Post Publishing Co.
DECEMBER 19, 1905. NO. 68; VOL. 181
Office 259 Washington st., Boston, Mass.

LONGY CLUB CONCERT

The Longy Club gave the first concert of this, its sixth, season, last evening at Potter Hall, assisted by Messrs. Muller, oboe; Fritsche, bass clarinet; Hess and Schumann, horns. The following was the programme:

Quintet for flute, oboe, clarinet, bassoon and piano.....Caplet
Nocturne, Op. 33, for flute, two oboes, two clarinets, two horns and two bassoons...Faure
Intermezzo scherzando, for flute, oboe, two clarinets, horn and bassoon.....Lefebvre
Romance and rondo, from concerto, for oboe and piano.....Mozart
Serenade, Op. 7, for wind instruments, including bass clarinet and double bassoon....Lampe

These concerts are recognized as unique of their kind, and tney are full of interest in every respect. The Caplet quintet is clever as to treatment, but is monotonous as a whole. Faure's nocturne, transented by Grovelz, proved very enjoyable, as did also the number by Lefebvre. But in some ways the Lampe serenade proved to be the best number. The 14 instruments include four horns, bass clarinet and the rarely-played double bassoon. The allegro scherzando showed the possibilities of all these instruments, separate and in combination, in an especially effective manner. The finale of this number is also an admirable piece of scoring. The performance was ideal, and the work made a most favorable impression. It is certainly worth another hearing. Mr. Longy played the excerpts from the Mozart oboe concerto in his own inimitable manner. There was a fair-sized and appreciative audience present. The second concert will be Jan. 22.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World STAR.

DEC 7

Boston Symphony Quartet.

The first concert by the Boston Symphony Quartet will be given in the ball room of the New Willard Hotel tomorrow evening. This organization, which is now in its second year, is unknown in Washington, although its members have become more or less familiar to the Washington public through their membership in the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The first violin is Prof. Willy Hess, the concert master of the orchestra; the second violin, Mr. Otto Roth, one of the first violins of the orchestra; the viola, Mr. Emile Ferir, principal violinist of the parent organization, and the 'cellist is Mr. Heinrich Warnke. The program for the first concert is attractive. Beginning with one of the most beautiful Beethoven quartets, it ends with one of the most melodious works of Franz Schubert. Between the two will come a complete novelty, which will then have its first performance in America, a sonata for violin and piano in G major, by Sigismond Stojowski, the eminent Polish pianist and composer, who will be at the piano, Professor Hess playing the violin part.

[134]

LIFE
From
Address WASHINGTON, D. C
DEC 18 1905
Date

Real Critics Praise French School

THE VISIT of Vincent d'Indy to Washington is one of those events which will be spoken of reverently by the grandchildren of the present race. "My grandmother lived in Washington when Richard Strauss and Vincent d'Indy visited the city, and was present at their concerts. She has often described the personal appearance of those great composers to me." Thus future generations will regard the occasion, and surely we of the present can do no less than cherish a remembrance of the event and the externals surrounding it.

Of the reviews published after d'Indy's initial appearance in America, two from Boston were of an artistic and literary excellence unsurpassed. Philip Hale wrote in the Boston Herald: "Mr. d'Indy, it should be understood, is not one of the tribe of virtuoso conductors who go from European city to city as in a triumphal car, who excite popular interest as that aroused by any bejewelled prima donna with warranted cascades of bravura, or by any tenor with a well authenticated high chest C. . . . As an honored visitor in this city, Mr. d'Indy finds many music-lovers who have a deep interest in the works of the modern French school. Nor is this interest, this acquaintanceship something sudden. Boston has always been willing to hear what composers of any nation had to say. It's German population is not so great that by showing a Chauvinistic spirit it succeeded in Germanizing thoroughly and narrowly the musical taste. Nor did the Germans, who did the pioneer work here and to whom we owe much, display an illiberal spirit. The 'Waverly' overture by Berlioz, who is still a modern among the moderns, was played here fifty-four years ago, and this great master was applauded in Boston long before the Berlioz cult was fashionable in Paris. . . . Of late years Mr. Loeffler, and after him Mr. Kneisel, Mr. Lang, local pianists and singers, Mr. Longy, and above all, Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, have made us acquainted with compositions of this modern school."

Commenting upon d'Indy's Second Symphony, Mr. Hale writes: "Let it be said at once that this symphony is a work of uncommon strength and importance. It contains deep and impressive thoughts, pages of a beauty that is almost earthly, pages that are intensely dramatic. . . . There is white heat in the passion; the average audience asks for red. There is no keener emotion than that which may be called cerebral; the average audience wishes to share in the emotion which is purely physical and often epidermic. . . . Again, the boldness of many of Mr. d'Indy's harmonic progressions, the audacity of his dissonances and his rhythms shock ears that believe the sole mission of music to be this: to soothe the process of digestion or to encourage a gentleman-like joy. What have such ears to do with the orgies of the muse? And at times Mr. d'Indy is a debauchee in his austerity."

The Boston Transcript said: "The romantic composers from Weber and Schubert through Liszt and Wagner have carried the emotional responsiveness of music far and high. We who follow them are spent with futile effort to carry these things further. It is time to pause Mr. d'Indy seems to be saying in his compositions; to turn in a new direction; to develop the intellectual responsiveness and expressiveness of music. Here, in a measure, he is at once with Richard Strauss. There can hardly be more intellectual music than 'Zarathustra,' for example; and 'Till Eulenspiegel,' with all its humor and irony, is like to it. But Strauss is equally concerned with the pictorial and descriptive development of music. He must make it mirror things, like the red hair of Don Juan's beloved or Don Quixote's wind-mills. Into that path Mr. d'Indy has not wandered. He is for the advance of music as the mirror of thoughts and ideas, their relation, contrast, and contest."

Philadelphia was moderate and sympathetic, for the most part, in its judgment of d'Indy. The Philadelphia Record sized up the situation accurately when it remarked that "to base any estimate except a purely impressionistic one of no real value upon a single hearing—such as was heard last evening—is to be nonsensical, not to say unspeakably brash."

Baltimore, too, showed a kindly spirit and desire to know more of French music. "Hereafter, when the works become more familiar to concert-goers," said the Baltimore American, "they will be still more highly enjoyed." The Baltimore Sun said: "If first impressions are lasting ones, Mr. d'Indy will always find a hearty welcome here when he chooses to come to Baltimore, for, both as director and composer, he was given a reception which he richly deserved."

New York and Washington were the only two cities which were noticeably severe in their criticisms of Vincent d'Indy and the French school. New York is habitually flippant and sarcastic in its treatment of musicians because the majority of its critics have the effrontery to suppose that the standards of musical appreciation in New York are higher than in any other city in the world. But what caused the severity of the Washington critics? Can is be possible that they were trying to imitate New York by condemning everything they could not understand?

Date DEC 1 6

Notes

IT WAS somewhat humorous that the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra should have sent out to the papers the statement that Ernest Chausson's Symphony Op. 20 "has never been printed," when there was a printed copy of it all the time at the Music Division of the Congressional Library.

The program for the first of the series of Boston Symphony Quartet concerts, on Monday next, includes the Beethoven String Quartet Op. 18, No. 6, the posthumous quartet in D Minor of Schubert, and Sigismond Stojowski's "Sonata for Piano and Violin in G Major Op. 13," to be played here for the first time, with the composer at the piano. Stojowski is a Polish pianist and composer, thirty-five years old, pupil of Delibes and Paderewski, who has written a piano concerto, orchestral works, chamber music, and pianoforte music.

WASHINGTON, D. C
DEC 17 1905

The Boston Symphony Quartet will give the first of the three evenings of chamber music in the New Willard to-morrow evening. The leader and first violin is Prof. Willy Hess, concert master of the orchestra. Its second violin, Mr. Otto Roth, ranks second among the first violins of the orchestra. Mr. Emile Ferir, viola, is the principal player of that instrument in the parent organization, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as is Mr. Heinrich Warnke, the 'cello. In chamber music, more than in orchestral, the question of the assisting artist is of utmost importance. Three of very high rank have been selected for the Washington concerts. At the first the assisting artist will be Mr. Stojowsky, a Polish pianist, who recently came to this country. Mr. Stojowsky is fortunate in having the warm admiration and friendship of Mr. Paderewski, through whose good offices he came to America.

At the second concert the assisting artist will be Miss Susan Metcalf. This country has reason to be proud of this young American woman, who to-day ranks among the great interpreters of songs now before the public. Miss Metcalf's recitals in New York are among the most important events of their kind during the season. In London and Paris she has had similar success.

At the third concert Mme. Olga Samaroff, the Russian pianist, will assist. Mme. Samaroff appeared in this country the first time last spring, and she has since then established a secure place for herself among connoisseurs. Best proof of this is that she will assist at several of the quartet's concerts, and she is one of the soloists in Boston of the orchestra.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
WASHINGTON, D. C.
TIMES.
ss 17

Boston Symphony Quartet.

An interesting musical event will be the first concert by the Boston Symphony Quartet, which will be given in the ballroom of the New Willard Hotel tomorrow evening.

This organization, which is now in its second year, is unknown in Washington, although its members have become more or less familiar to the Washington public through their connection with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The first violin is Prof. Willy Hess, the concertmaster of the orchestra; the second violin, Otto Roth, one of the first violins of the orchestra; the viola, Emile Ferir, principal violaist of the parent organization, and the cellist is Heinrich Warnke, who last fall was brought to Boston from Munich to be the principal cellist of the orchestra and the cellist of this quartet.

The program for the first concert is most attractive. Beginning with one of the most beautiful of Beethoven quartets, it ends with one of the most melodious works of the world's greatest melodist, Franz Schubert. Between the two will come a complete novelty, which will then have its first performance in America, a sonata for violin and piano in G major, by Sigismond Stojowski, the eminent Polish pianist and composer, who himself will be at the piano, Prof. Hess playing the violin part.

The sonata in G major was composed in 1893 and published in 1899. It is divided into three movements—Allegro non troppo, Allegretto capriccioso, and Theme varie. It offers the peculiarity of not having a regular finale, the last of the variations of a broad andante theme, and decidedly national in character, being the conclusion of the whole work. The second movement, a scherzo, which occasionally assumes a mazurka character, shows the author's origin. The first movement is constructed in the usual sonata form.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
NEW YORK SUN
From
Address
Date DEC 20 1905

CONCERT BY THE LONGY CLUB.

CHAMBER MUSIC PLAYED BY WIND INSTRUMENTS.

Boston Artists Heard to Advantage at Mendelssohn Hall—Bessie Abott Sings Again With the Symphony Orchestra—The Flonzaley Quartet Performs.

When the Longy Club is at home, it is the first and second flute, the two oboes, the two bassoons and two of the horns of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. When it dissociates itself from that august body its mission is the performance of wind instrument chamber music, of which not a great deal is heard in this opera stricken town. The Longy Club gave a concert here on March 8, 1904, and established a record for technical skill and artistic taste. It came to town again yesterday and was heard last evening in Mendelssohn Hall.

The programme consisted of Beethoven's quintet, opus 16, for piano, oboe, clarinet, horn and bassoon; Gabriel Faure's nocturne in E flat for flute, two oboes, two clarinets, two horns and two bassoons; Lefebvre's intermezzo scherzando for flute, oboe, two clarinets, horn and bassoon; two movements of Mozart's B flat concerto for oboe, and Raff's sinfonietta for two flutes, two clarinets, two oboes, two bassoons and two horns.

Of course the constant obstacle in the way of enjoying a whole evening of wind instrument music is the tendency of the tonal color to become monotonous. This was avoided last night by the skill with which the programme was made. The contrast afforded in the first number by the piano with the other instruments and with that number by the modern method of instrumentation employed by the two French composers represented on the list, as well as the amazing resources of tinting possessed by Mr. Longy and revealed in his oboe solo, made up a color scheme to which there could be no objection.

The Beethoven composition performed by the Longy Club is not one of the mighty master's great works. Not everything written by Beethoven was important, and this composition is one of those which we are accustomed to treat with respect simply because of the famous name signed to it. The name acquired its value after this music was conceived.

Beethoven himself was not satisfied with it in its original form and rewrote it as a string quartet, numbered opus 75. It was worth hearing, however, for the works of a great man, even when unimportant in themselves, are never without an historical interest. It was capitally played.

The two pieces by French composers displayed admirable technic in the treatment of the instrumental voices, and the first of the two added considerable intrinsic musical charm to the treatment. Taken as a whole this concert was well worth attention. It is a pity that in the multitude of our musical activities we cannot have more of this kind of entertainment, for it is certainly a relief at times to break away from the beaten paths and adventure into the byways, where the masters exercised their fancies in fireside musings.

From N. Y. TRIBUNE,
Address
Date DEC 20 1905

MUSIC.

A Concert by Wind Instruments.

The Longy Club, a body of wind instrument players from the Boston Symphony Orchestra, gave a concert in Mendelssohn Hall last night. The artists composing the club are not strangers to the music lovers of New-York. They have individually won admiration by their work in the orchestra of which they are one of the chief ornaments, and as a body devoted to the style of chamber music which they exploited last night they were heard in the same concert room as late as March of last year. Two flutes, two oboes, two clarinets, two bassoons and two horns make up the instrumental apparatus of the club, and the men are artists of an extremely fine type. Their programme last night consisted of Beethoven's quintet for pianoforte, oboe, clarinet, bassoon and horn (played by the first instruments of the organization, with the help of Mr. A. de Voto, a pianist, also of Boston), a nocturne by Gabriel Fauré, an intermezzo by C. Lefebvre and a sinfonietta by Raff, all for the eight instruments. A single solo number graced the list, a romance and rondo from what the programme described as a concerto in E flat major for oboe, which may be a transcription or a transposition, since the only oboe concerto of which Köchel makes mention is in the key of F.

All of the music, with the exception of the Beethoven quintet, which is fairly familiar to practitioners of chamber music in two arangements for pianoforte and strings, one made by Beethoven himself, and one by Ernest Naumann, was new to the local concert rooms. Music of this character was long ago voted archaic in New-York, though an organization similar to that maintained by Mr. Longy lived out a brief existence here some fifteen or twenty years ago—when the wood-wind contingent of the Philharmonic Society was better than it is now. Since then the musicians of the Aschenbroedl Club and the Tonkünstler Society have cultivated it for the delectation of their members, but not in public. It would not be surprising, however, were a local club soon to come forward composed of the excellent wood-wind players which Mr. Walter Damrosch has enlisted in the New-York Symphony Orchestra. For an unexplained reason the best players of wood-wind instruments come to us from France.

Except the French horn players and one of the bassoonists, all are members of the Longy Club. It appeared from the music played last night that composition for their instruments is also cultivated more assiduously and with more success in France than elsewhere. The compositions of Fauré and Lefebvre, especially the former, were decidedly effective, even charming, and did much to dissipate the feeling of monotony disseminated by the Beethoven quintet, with all its Mozartian beauty. This monotony is the one obstacle to the popularity of this type of chamber music, which had as many admirers a little more than a century ago as the string quartet has now. But nothing less than the perfection attained by the Longy Club can make it tolerable. Mr. Longy's oboe playing, often admired before, won new admiration in the solo number. Mr. de Voto played the pianoforte with fine taste, discrimination and artistic distinction in the quintet. The thoroughly delightful concert was heard by a small, but keenly appreciative, audience.

H. E. K.

[135]

LIFE

From ... D. C

Address ...

Date ...

Real Critics Praise French School

THE VISIT of Vincent d'Indy to Washington is one of those events which will be spoken of reverently by the grandchildren of the present race. "My grandmother lived in Washington when Richard Strauss and Vincent d'Indy visited the city, and was present at their concerts. She has often described the personal appearance of those great composers to me." Thus future generations will regard the occasion, and surely we of the present can do no less than cherish a remembrance of the event and the externals surrounding it.

Of the reviews published after d'Indy's initial appearance in America, two from Boston were of an artistic and literary excellence unsurpassed. Philip Hale wrote in the Boston Herald: "Mr. d'Indy, it should be understood, is not one of the tribe of virtuoso conductors who go from European city to city as in a triumphal car, who excite popular interest as that aroused by any bejewelled prima donna with warranted cascades of bravura, or by any tenor with a well authenticated high chest C. . . . As an honored visitor in this city, Mr. d'Indy finds many music-lovers who have a deep interest in the works of the modern French school. Nor is this interest, this acquaintanceship something sudden. Boston has always been willing to hear what composers of any nation had to say. It's German population is not so great that by showing a Chauvinistic spirit it succeeded in Germanizing thoroughly and narrowly the musical taste. Nor did the Germans, who did the pioneer work here and to whom we owe much, display an illiberal spirit. The 'Waverly' overture by Berlioz, who is still a modern among the moderns, was played here fifty-four years ago, and this great master was applauded in Boston long before the Berlioz cult was fashionable in Paris. . . . Of late years Mr. Loeffler, and after him Mr. Kneisel, Mr. Lang, local pianists and singers, Mr. Longy, and above all, Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, have made us acquainted with compositions of this modern school."

Commenting upon d'Indy's Second Symphony, Mr. Hale writes: "Let it be said at once that this symphony is a work of uncommon strength and importance. It contains deep and impressive thoughts, pages of a beauty that is almost earthly, pages that are intensely dramatic. . . . There is white heat in the passion; the average audience asks for red. There is no keener emotion than that which may be called cerebral; the average audience wishes to share in the emotion which is purely physical and often epidermic. . . . Again, the boldness of many of Mr. d'Indy's harmonic progressions, the audacity of his dissonances and his rhythms shock ears that believe the sole mission of music to be this: to soothe the process of digestion or to encourage a gentleman-like joy. What have such ears to do with the orgies of the muse? And at times Mr. d'Indy is a debauchee in his austerity."

The Boston Transcript said: "The romantic composers from Weber and Schubert through Liszt and Wagner have carried the emotional responsiveness of music far and high. We who follow them are spent with futile effort to carry these things further. It is time to pause Mr. d'Indy seems to be saying in his compositions; to turn in a new direction; to develop the intellectual responsiveness and expressiveness of music. Here, in a measure, he is at once with Richard Strauss. There can hardly be more intellectual music than 'Zarathustra,' for example; and 'Till Eulenspiegel,' with all its humor and irony, is like to it. But Strauss is equally concerned with the pictorial and descriptive development of music. He must make it mirror things, like the red hair of Don Juan's beloved or Don Quixote's wind-mills. Into that path Mr. d'Indy has not wandered. He is for the advance of music as the mirror of thoughts and ideas, their relation, contrast, and contest."

Philadelphia was moderate and sympathetic, for the most part, in its judgment of d'Indy. The Philadelphia Record sized up the situation accurately when it remarked that "to base any estimate except a purely impressionistic one of no real value upon a single hearing—such as was heard last evening—is to be nonsensical, not to say unspeakably brash."

Baltimore, too, showed a kindly spirit and desire to know more of French music. "Hereafter, when the works become more familiar to concert-goers," said the Baltimore American, "they will be still more highly enjoyed." The Baltimore Sun said: "If first impressions are lasting ones, Mr. d'Indy will always find a hearty welcome here when he chooses to come to Baltimore, for, both as director and composer, he was given a reception which he richly deserved."

New York and Washington were the only two cities which were noticeably severe in their criticisms of Vincent d'Indy and the French school. New York is habitually flippant and sarcastic in its treatment of musicians because the majority of its critics have the effrontery to suppose that the standards of musical appreciation in New York are higher than in any other city in the world. But what caused the severity of the Washington critics? Can is be possible that they were trying to imitate New York by condemning everything they could not understand?

Date ...

Notes

IT WAS somewhat humorous that the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra should have sent out to the papers the statement that Ernest Chausson's Symphony Op. 20 "has never been printed," when there was a printed copy of it all the time at the Music Division of the Congressional Library.

The program for the first of the series of Boston Symphony Quartet concerts, on Monday next, includes the Beethoven String Quartet Op. 18, No. 6, the posthumous quartet in D Minor of Schubert, and Sigismond Stojowski's "Sonata for Piano and Violin in G Major Op. 13," to be played here for the first time, with the composer at the piano. Stojowski is a Polish pianist and composer, thirty-five years old, pupil of Delibes and Paderewski, who has written a piano concerto, orchestral works, chamber music and pianoforte music.

...D. C

POST

DEC 17 1905

The Boston Symphony Quartet will give the first of the three evenings of chamber music in the New Willard to-morrow evening. The leader and first violin is Prof. Willy Hess, concert master of the orchestra. Its second violin, Mr. Otto Roth, ranks second among the first violins of the orchestra. Mr. Emile Ferir, viola, is the principal player of that instrument in the parent organization, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as is Mr. Heinrich Warnke, the 'cello. In chamber music, more than in orchestral, the question of the assisting artist is of utmost importance. Three of very high rank have been selected for the Washington concerts. At the first the assisting artist will be Mr. Stojowsky, a Polish pianist, who recently came to this country. Mr. Stojowsky is fortunate in having the warm admiration and friendship of Mr. Paderewski, through whose good offices he came to America.

At the second concert the assisting artist will be Miss Susan Metcalf. This country has reason to be proud of this young American woman, who to-day ranks among the great interpreters of songs now before the public. Miss Metcalf's recitals in New York are among the most important events of their kind during the season. In London and Paris she has had similar success.

At the third concert Mme. Olga Samaroff, the Russian pianist, will assist. Mme. Samaroff appeared in this country the first time last spring, and she has since then established a secure place for herself among connoisseurs. Best proof of this is that she will assist at several of the quartet's concerts, and she is one of the soloists in Boston of the orchestra.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

...TIMES.

DEC 17

Boston Symphony Quartet.

An interesting musical event will be the first concert by the Boston Symphony Quartet, which will be given in the ballroom of the New Willard Hotel tomorrow evening.

This organization, which is now in its second year, is unknown in Washington, although its members have become more or less familiar to the Washington public through their connection with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The first violin is Prof. Willy Hess, the concertmaster of the orchestra; the second violin, Otto Roth, one of the first violins of the orchestra; the viola, Emile Ferir, principal violaist of the parent organization, and the cellist is Heinrich Warnke, who last fall was brought to Boston from Munich to be the principal cellist of the orchestra and the cellist of this quartet.

The program for the first concert is most attractive. Beginning with one of the most beautiful of Beethoven quartets, it ends with one of the most melodious works of the world's greatest melodist, Franz Schubert. Between the two will come a complete novelty, which will then have its first performance in America, a sonata for violin and piano in G major, by Sigismond Stojowski, the eminent Polish pianist and composer, who himself will be at the piano, Prof. Hess playing the violin part.

The sonata in G major was composed in 1893 and published in 1899. It is divided into three movements—Allegro non troppo, Allegretto capriccioso, and Theme varie. It offers the peculiarity of not having a regular finale, the last of the variations of a broad andante theme, and decidedly national in character, being the conclusion of the whole work. The second movement, a scherzo, which occasionally assumes a mazurka character, shows the author's origin. The first movement is constructed in the usual sonata form.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

NEW YORK SUN

From ...

Address ...

DEC 20 1905

Date ...

CONCERT BY THE LONGY CLUB.

CHAMBER MUSIC PLAYED BY WIND INSTRUMENTS.

Boston Artists Heard to Advantage at Mendelssohn Hall—Bessie Abott Sings Again With the Symphony Orchestra—The Flonzaley Quartet Performs.

When the Longy Club is at home, it is the first and second flute, the two oboes, the two bassoons and two of the horns of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. When it dissociates itself from that august body its mission is the performance of wind instrument chamber music, of which not a great deal is heard in this opera stricken town. The Longy Club gave a concert here on March 6, 1904, and established a record for technical skill and artistic taste. It came to town again yesterday and was heard last evening in Mendelssohn Hall.

The programme consisted of Beethoven's quintet, opus 16, for piano, oboe, clarinet, horn and bassoon; Gabriel Faure's nocturne in E flat for flute, two oboes, two clarinets, two horns and two bassoons; Lefebvre's intermezzo scherzando for flute, oboe, two clarinets, horn and bassoon; two movements of Mozart's B flat concerto for oboe, and Raff's sinfonietta for two flutes, two clarinets, two oboes, two bassoons and two horns.

Of course the constant obstacle in the way of enjoying a whole evening of wind instrument music is the tendency of the tonal color to become monotonous. This was avoided last night by the skill with which the programme was made. The contrast afforded in the first number by the piano with the other instruments and with that number by the modern method of instrumentation employed by the two French composers represented on the list, as well as the amazing resources of tinting possessed by Mr. Longy and revealed in his oboe solo, made up a color scheme to which there could be no objection.

The Beethoven composition performed by the Longy Club is not one of the mighty master's great works. Not everything written by Beethoven was important, and this composition is one of those which we are accustomed to treat with respect simply because of the famous name signed to it. The name acquired its value after this music was conceived.

Beethoven himself was not satisfied with it in its original form and rewrote it as a string quartet, numbered opus 75. It was worth hearing, however, for the works of a great man, even when unimportant in themselves, are never without an historical interest. It was capitally played.

The two pieces by French composers displayed admirable technic in the treatment of the instrumental voices, and the first of the two added considerable intrinsic musical charm to the treatment. Taken as a whole this concert was well worth attention. It is a pity that in the multitude of our musical activities we cannot have more of this kind of entertainment, for it is certainly a relief at times to break away from the beaten paths and adventure into the byways, where the masters exercised their fancies in fireside musings.

From N. Y. TRIBUNE,

Address ...

DEC 20 1905

Date ...

MUSIC.

A Concert by Wind Instruments.

The Longy Club, a body of wind instrument players from the Boston Symphony Orchestra, gave a concert in Mendelssohn Hall last night. The artists composing the club are not strangers to the music lovers of New-York. They have individually won admiration by their work in the orchestra of which they are one of the chief ornaments, and as a body devoted to the style of chamber music which they exploited last night they were heard in the same concert room as late as March of last year. Two flutes, two oboes, two clarinets, two bassoons and two horns make up the instrumental apparatus of the club, and the men are artists of an extremely fine type. Their programme last night consisted of Beethoven's quintet for pianoforte, oboe, clarinet, bassoon and horn (played by the first instruments of the organization, with the help of Mr. A. de Voto, a pianist, also of Boston), a nocturne by Gabriel Fauré, an intermezzo by C. Lefebvre and a sinfonietta by Raff, all for the eight instruments. A single solo number graced the list, a romance and rondo from what the programme described as a concerto in E flat major for oboe, which may be a transcription or a transposition, since the only oboe concerto of which Köchel makes mention is in the key of F.

All of the music, with the exception of the Beethoven quintet, which is fairly familiar to practitioners of chamber music in two arangements for pianoforte and strings, one made by Beethoven himself, and one by Ernest Naumann, was new to the local concert rooms. Music of this character was long ago voted archaic in New-York, though an organization similar to that maintained by Mr. Longy lived out a brief existence here some fifteen or twenty years ago—when the wood-wind contingent of the Philharmonic Society was better than it is now. Since then the musicians of the Aschenbroedl Club and the Tonkünstler Society have cultivated it for the delectation of their members, but not in public. It would not be surprising, however, were a local club soon to come forward composed of the excellent wood-wind players which Mr. Walter Damrosch has enlisted in the New-York Symphony Orchestra. For an unexplained reason the best players of wood-wind instruments come to us from France.

Except the French horn players and one of the bassoonists, all are members of the Longy Club. It appeared from the music played last night that composition for their instruments is also cultivated more assiduously and with more success in France than elsewhere. The compositions of Fauré and Lefebvre, especially the former, were decidedly effective, even charming, and did much to dissipate the feeling of monotony disseminated by the Beethoven quintet, with all its Mozartian beauty. This monotony is the one obstacle to the popularity of this type of chamber music, which had as many admirers a little more than a century ago as the string quartet has now. But nothing less than the perfection attained by the Longy Club can make it tolerable. Mr. Longy's oboe playing, often admired before, won new admiration in the solo number. Mr. de Voto played the pianoforte with fine taste, discrimination and artistic distinction in the quintet. The thoroughly delightful concert was heard by a small, but keenly appreciative, audience.

H. E. K.

[135]

The Press Cutting Bureau is the largest in the World
Newspaper Cutting Bureau
New York Times
DEC 20 1905

THE LONGY CLUB OF BOSTON.

A Concert of Chamber Music for Wind Instruments.

The Longy Club, composed of wind instrument players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, gave a concert last evening devoted to the unfamiliar kind of music they cultivate. There is not a little music written for wind instruments by the classical and modern composers, but it is seldom heard publicly in New York, for several reasons. One is the general scarcity that has prevailed here in recent years of wind players with the fine artistic style and finish which their kind of music demands, or with the time and inclination to devote themselves to what is likely to be a rather thankless task. For while there is much that is interesting in chamber music for wind instruments, it appeals to rather a special taste, and there is little variety or warmth of tone possible in this combination of instruments. It is unmistakable that the effect soon becomes monotonous.

Mr. Longy, the thrice-admirable oboist of the Boston Orchestra, an artist of incomparable style and finesse, is the leader of the organization, which is improved in its personnel since its previous appearance in New York. There are ten players, each instrument, flute, oboe, clarinet, horn, and bassoon being twice represented. Their programme last evening brought forward several combinations of these instruments. It included Beethoven's quintet Op. 16, for piano, oboe, clarinet, horn, and bassoon; a nocturne by Fauré for one flute and two each of the other instruments; an intermezzo by Lefebvre, for two clarinets, and one each of the others; two movements from an oboe concerto by Mozart, and Raff's sinfonietta, for all the ten. Mr. Alfred de Voto of Boston played the piano part in the quintet and in the concerto.

The playing was finished in ensemble and in phrasing, pure in intonation, and delightful in the characteristic tonal color and quality of each instrument. The first horn has the true romantic horn tone, and the first bassoon is particularly admirable in its roundness and fullness and its facile and accurate execution. The performance gave much pleasure to the rather small audience that heard it. The music is charming of itself, and the glimpse it gave of an unfamiliar and somewhat remote corner of musical art was enjoyable.

POST
[illegible]
BOSTON SYMPHONY QUARTET.

First Concert Will Be Given at Willard's Hotel To-morrow Evening.

A most interesting musical event will be the first concert by the Boston Symphony Quartet, which will be given in the ballroom of the New Willard Hotel to-morrow (Monday) evening. This organization, which is now in its second year, is unknown in Washington, although its members have become more or less familiar to the Washington public through their membership in the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The first violin is Prof. Willy Hess, the concert master of the orchestra; the second violin, Mr. Otto Roth, one of the first violins of the orchestra; the viola, Mr. Emile Ferir, principal violinist of the parent organization, and the 'cellist is Mr. Heinrich Warnke, who last fall was brought to Boston from Munich to be the principal 'cellist of the orchestra and the 'cellist of this quartet.

The programme for the first concert is attractive. Beginning with one of the most beautiful Beethoven quartets, it ends with one of the most melodious works of the world's greatest melodist, Franz Schubert. Between the two will come a complete novelty, which will then have its first performance in America, a sonata for violin and piano in G major, by Sigismond Stojowski, the eminent Polish pianist and composer, who himself will be at the piano, Prof. Hess playing the violin part.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau
STAR
WASHINGTON
ess
DEC 19 1905

Boston Symphony Quartet.

The Boston Symphony quartet, an organization growing out of the Boston Symphony orchestra, gave its first concert in this city at the New Willard last night before a large and cultivated audience. The quartet consists of Prof. Willy Hess, first violin; Otto Roth, second violin; Emile Ferir, viola, and Heinrich Warnke, violoncello. These gentlemen were assisted last night by Mr. Sigismond Stojowski, a pianist, who also made his first appearance in this country last night. The program included two quartets, one by Beethoven in E flat major and a posthumous one by Schubert in D minor. Both were excellently interpreted and most artistically played, the fine shading of the second movement and the brilliant finish of the Beethoven number being especially noticeable, while the delicate treatment of the scherzo of the Schubert was equally to be commended. The second number of the program was a sonata, for violin and piano in which Mr. Stojowski appeared both as composer and performer. In both respects he was heard to advantage, the composition being musicianly with a weird melody, but finely worked out both for piano and the violin—for it was a sonata for violin and piano in G major, Mr. Hess playing the violin.

N. Y. AMERICAN
ess
DEC 22 1905

Vincent d'Indy's Glory as an Artist.

By HENRI PENE DU BOIS.

THEY discussed until dawn Vincent d'Indy. He has the glory that is rare of being discussed. The artists that all praise or detest are those whom none has studied.

"He uses symbols," said one. "I hoped that they had been drowned with the Ring in the metaphysical Rhine. And why does he bother with symbols? They are not French."

"They are French," replied another. "They are in the 'Roman de la Rose,' in the works of Rabelais, in those of Mlle. de Scudery. Then, Vincent d'Indy's symbols are not humid gnomes, a dragon ventriloquist, a Scandinavian Walhalla. The symbols of Vincent d'Indy are beings of our social humanity.

"See the 'Etranger.' He is the Artist since he is the Stranger. Artists are in exile wherever they are. He is the Ideal of beauty, of love, of devotion and of sacrifice. The emerald that he wears expresses the sacredness of his mission. He is the Apostle of Truth. His device is 'Ich diene,' for his duty is to serve."

"I do not understand Vincent d'Indy," said one.

"Because you search for complicated ideas where is only simplicity," said another. The music critics cry against his Second Symphony. They say that it is obscure. It is, on the contrary, very clear. W. J. Henderson says that the idea of it that remains in his mind is an idea of Villon. Well, that is the aim of the symphony. It is to affirm the survival of Gothic art.

"His devotion to Gothic music restricts Vincent d'Indy, I think," said one.

"He is one of the musicians that know best the music of the past," said another. "The musical forms of all times and of all countries are in his mind. He knew Liszt, Brahms, Wagner. Some trees of the forest of 'Siegfried' are in Vincent d'Indy's 'Fervaal,' but here the forest has wide avenues."

"He is an excellent teacher," said one. "I have listened to his analyses of melodic phrases and of harmonic periods. They are full of logic. They seem to apply to music the principles of the classic rhetoric of the seventeenth century in France. But if he be devoted to Christian humility he is also devoted to aristocratic conceit.

"He loves sincerely the common people, but treats it with a sort of affectionate, protective kindness. He regards the common people as a child to be guided. The popular art that he champions is not of the people, but of an aristocracy interested in the people. He wants to educate the people with art."

"It is folly," several voices said in unison.

"It is folly," they were told. "Art may not be taught. But the world may be taught that the artist is the only person that attains the freedom to say what he thinks completely, exclusively. He, alone, has the faculty to express himself."

"It is true," said one, "that Vincent d'Indy's expression is specifically musical. He uses naturally and spontaneously the syntax of music. Then, he thinks in 'accords.' Then, he is implacably logical. It was after hearing his marvellous 'Istar' that Professor Lambinet said, 'The musician deals with sounds as the geometricians with lines and the dialectician with arguments.'"

VOGUE
NEW YORK CITY.
DEC 21 190

IUSIC OF THE FRENCH SCHOOL

THe two December concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, were conducted by M. Vincent d'Indy, and devoted exclusively to French music of the younger school.

The number of actual novelties presented was not large, since other conductors have already explored the field very thoroughly, but each work gained in interest because chosen as representative of the modern style of French music which is just now making a large claim to importance.

Individuality of expression and musical idiom must be conceded to this school as the thematic structure and harmony is markedly away from that of any other country.

A new musical dialect is being developed, and although it cannot be said to have made a deep impression upon the audiences, it is always with difficulty that a new and strange musical language makes headway, among those which have been long established. In any case it has been an interesting presentation greatly enjoyed by those who have an open mind for the progress of musical thought.

M. d'Indy is a distinguished representative of the modern French school, and several of his own compositions were included among the works given at the various concerts he conducted. Interesting as all this may be no modern Wagner, Bach or Beethoven has at yet loomed great on the horizon of musical affairs; these newcomers are perchance but the forerunners of a mighty one yet to come, and beyond all doubt there will again arise a musical phrophet whose utterances will bear the impress of authority even though they may come in a new garb.

Programmes of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Vincent d'Indy.

Second symphonie, op. 57.....Vincent d'Indy
Suite, Pelleas et Melisande, Maeterlinck
Gabriel Faure
Saugefleurie, Legende.....Vincent d'Indy
L'Apprenti-sorcier.....Paul Dukas
Symphony, op. 20.....Ernest Chausson
Psyche et Eros, from Psyche, symphonic poem.....Cesar Franck
Nocturnes—I., Nuages; III., Fetes..Claude Debussy
Chant funebre.....Alberic Magnard
Istar, variations symphoniques.....Vincent d'Indy

POST
ess WASHINGTON, D. C.
DEC 19 1905

The Boston Symphony Quartet.

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Quartet, given last night at the New Willard, offered a splendidly balanced programme, which was given in the masterly manner that the name Boston Symphony carries with it.

Under the leadership of Prof. Willy Hess, the first number, Beethoven, op. 18, No. 6, was given with thoroughly artistic interpretation and intelligence; especially pleasing was the fourth movement, allegretto, quasi allegro, which was rendered with a peculiarly effective brilliancy and finish.

The second number, by Sigismond Stojowski, a sonata for piano and violin—Prof. Hess violin and the composer at the piano. The composition in itself is deserving of more than ordinary commendation, and its rendition was marked by an unusual degree of technique and fire.

Mr. Stojowski was a pupil of Paderewski, and this was his first appearance in America. The quartet in all their numbers displayed fine bowing, phrasing, and coloring.

The entire programme was as follows:

Beethoven. Quartet for two violins, viola, and violoncello, in B-flat major, Op. 18, No. 6.
(a) Allegro con brio,
(b) Allegro ma non troppo,
(c) Scherzo: Allegro,
(d) Adagio (La Malinconia)—Allegretto quasi allegro.

Sigismond Stojowski. Sonata for violin and piano, in G major, Op. 13.
(a) Allegro non troppo,
(b) Allegretto capriccioso,
(c) Theme varie: Andante maestoso—Piu mosso e con espressione—Molto vivace.

Schubert. Quartet for two violins, viola, and violoncello, in D minor (Op. posth.).
(a) Allegro,
(b) Andante con moto,
(c) Scherzo (allegro molto)—Trio,
(d) Presto.

SUNDAY HERALD
Published Every Day in the Year.
VOL. CXVIII., NO. 177.
SUNDAY, DEC. 24, 1905.

NINTH SYMPHONY CONCERT TIMELY

Programme Chosen Suitable for Christmas Season, with Thought of Nature and Man's Rejoicing Predominant.

TWO CHRISTMAS PASTORALS FEATURES

Mr. Strube's New Violin Concerto Was Admirably Played by Mr. Adamowski—Mr. Gericke Conducted Concert.

The ninth concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra was given last night in Symphony Hall. Mr. Gericke conducted and Mr. Timothee Adamowski was the solo violinist. The programme was as follows:

Overture, "Nature".....Dvorak
Pastorale from "Christmas" oratorio.....Bach
Violin concerto in F-sharp minor.....Strube
Symphony No. 6, "Pastoral".....Beethoven

It will be seen that this programme was arranged chiefly with reference to the Christmas season and the thought of nature and man rejoicing in the birth of the Saviour. The stickler for facts, "absolute facts," might say that there has been fierce dispute even among the devout over the precise date of this event, and that deep thinkers have differed as to the year, naming years between 746 and 754. A list of these disputants with the record of their conclusions may be found in Gabriel Peignot's "Recherches Historiques sur la Personne de Jesus Christ."

Joseph Scaliger proved, at least to his own satisfaction, that the divine birth was in the month of April; but Scaliger was an erratic and occasionally malicious person; not always to be trusted. Did he not at the age of 60 dance in his doctor's robe the Pyrrhic dance before his Emperor to the amazement of the latter and of all the court? Furthermore Scaliger wrote about the squaring of the circle. Not a man to be chairman of a committee or to serve as foreman of a jury.

The world at large has accepted the day that has long been celebrated with ecclesiastical pomp and household good cheer, and the association of oriental shepherds and their flocks with a raw or ice-bound December does not strike the New Englander as incongruous. In the Christmas music of today—and much of it is poor stuff—there is usually a pastoral episode, and shepherds sing or approach the cradle in the rhythm of the Siciliana.

Nor is it pure fancy to represent the historic and enviable shepherds as musical. The lot of the shepherd, as described in the Bible, was full of hardship and of danger, and it was dull. Then, as even now in Syria, he would pass an hour away in playing on some musical instrument, a little harp, a timbrel, or on something not unlike the [illegible] of Pan.

The two famous Christmas pastorals are those by Bach and Handel. Both of these compositions have been [illegible] for modern use, and neither one of them has been improved thereby. Of the two the one by Handel in the "Messiah" is by far the more poetic in its simple, naive beauty, with its air that might have come from the pipe of some shepherd clad in his sheepskin [illegible]. What matters it whether Handel heard the melody piped by pifferari in the streets of Rome, or whether the tune came to him? The music has the atmosphere of that memorable night with wondering stars. Bach's is laboriously simple; he felt the need of a certain amount of scholastic development; he was not content with an impression; his shepherds had been to a conservatory.

Dvorak's overture, which the composer wished played in company with the "Carnival" ("Life") and the "Othello" ("Love"), was performed for the second time at these concerts. It gives a glimpse of parochial nature, nature as seen in a corner of Bohemia, with a dance hall not far away, not nature the universal mother. And once or twice Siegfried entered and the Czech forest begins to murmur for him. Yet the music is often pretty, and it soothes, and so it, too, has its uses. We cannot always be listening to strains of woe and despair, to snivel and whine, or to music illustrative of the horrors in the story of Thebes or of Pelop's line.

These two amiable compositions, with Beethoven's Pastoral, filled the breasts of many with a gentle joy, and Mr. Strube's new violin concerto was not in violent contrast.

The development of Mr. Gustav Strube as a composer is worthy of curious study. He had, to begin with, a sound, diversified, practical education as a musician. There are few orchestral instruments, if any, which he cannot play, and, naturally, the piano is familiar to him. He was brought up in the composer's straight and narrow path at Leipsic, and it is not probable that he strayed from it as a teacher in the Mannheim conservatory.

In his first orchestral work he paid homage to the memory of Joan of Arc with an overture, and thus added his name to the list that fills 90 large octavo pages in Huet's "Jeanne d'Arc et la Musique," a list that begins with Adolphe Adam and ends with Widor.

His tribute was orthodox, and in his rhetoric there was nothing to disturb the most sensitive. He also wrote his symphony, without a title, without a programme, in four movements, and according to the rules.

The scherzo followed the adagio. But in his first violin concerto (1897) Mr. Strube showed clearly a tendency to be modern, in the sense of the word that is so obnoxious to those who are dismayed by the complications of latter-day music and fear lest their minds give way if they listen to the quietly heterodox or to the open and pronounced blasphemers against long established forms. He acquainted himself with forbidden dissonances; he learned new rhythms; he no longer took J. C. Lobe's treatise on instrumentation as the key to paradise. He heard music by Chabrier, Loeppler, the wild Russians, heated by vodka till they screamed in their passion, the cerebral Frenchman, the extraordinary Richard Strauss; he heard this music, and his own Rhapsody for orchestra was in 1901 frankly and delightfully nihilistic. He was perhaps equally audacious three years later in his fantastic overture, but the public accustoms itself quickly to the unusual and it hears after three years with other organs of audition and understanding. His string quartet performed here last March would have shocked his teachers. They would have mourned him as one wandering after strange gods. In his symphonic poem "Longing," produced a month later, there was a blend of sensuousness and mysticism that made a direct appeal.

Last night he came before the Symphony audience with a new violin concerto, for which Mr. Gericke wrote a cadenza. Fortunate Mr. Strube! His compositions do not grow restive from lying in a portfolio.

Frankly Melodic and in More Conventional Line.

It was said of Ambroise Thomas that he anxiously trimmed sails to catch any wind of popularity that might drive him toward the haven of success. If Mr. Strube has heard, and meditated, and assimilated, and from year to year shaped his musical expression, his speech has been his own, and he has said honestly what came to him to say.

In this concerto he is frankly melodic, and as a rule his melody is in a more conventional line than in his rhapsody and fantastic overture; but his harmonic thought is often ultra-modern, and his orchestration is super-refined. The first movement is compact and interesting throughout. The themes are fresh and the material is deftly handled by the orchestra, while the solo instrument indulges itself in arabesques and in passage work. The second movement is a reverie, a dangerous title, but in this instance the music is not soporific; it really incites to reverie rather than to sleep. It has genuine and individual beauty, and the orchestration is often charming.

The Finale, a set of variations, is ingeniously constructed, and it gives brilliant opportunities for the solo violin, but as a whole it does not equal in interest the preceding movements. The concerto is the romantic work of a well-equipped musician who understands thoroughly the violin, who delights in piquant harmonies and in unexpected combinations and oppositions of orchestral colors, who has fine poetic moments. Mr. Strube has scored his work to the great advantage of the solo instrument. His orchestral tuttis, however, are seldom truly sonorous, and the hearer longs for a marked and singing bass. Mr. Strube's orchestra is often all up in the air. Even in fantastic thoughts there should be the suggestion at least of a solid foundation.

Mr. Adamowski played exceedingly well, with virtuoso blood, and with a breath and richness of tone and a [illegible] eral versatility of musical expression that were at once appreciated. It was indeed a pleasure to hear him.

[136]

The First Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

...m ...
...dress ...

THE LONGY CLUB OF BOSTON.

A Concert of Chamber Music for Wind Instruments.

The Longy Club, composed of wind instrument players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, gave a concert last evening devoted to the unfamiliar kind of music they cultivate. There is not a little music written for wind instruments by the classical and modern composers, but it is seldom heard publicly in New York, for several reasons. One is the general scarcity that has prevailed here in recent years of wind players with the fine artistic style and finish which their kind of music demands, or with the time and inclination to devote themselves to what is likely to be a rather thankless task. For while there is much that is interesting in chamber music for wind instruments, it appeals to rather a special taste, and there is little variety or warmth of tone possible in this combination of instruments. It is unmistakable that the effect soon becomes monotonous.

Mr. Longy, the thrice-admirable oboist of the Boston Orchestra, an artist of incomparable style and finesse, is the leader of the organization, which is improved in its personnel since its previous appearance in New York. There are ten players, each instrument, flute, oboe, clarinet, horn, and bassoon being twice represented. Their programme last evening brought forward several combinations of these instruments. It included Beethoven's quintet Op. 16, for piano, oboe, clarinet, horn, and bassoon; a nocturne by Fauré for one flute and two each of the other instruments; an intermezzo by Lefebvre, for two clarinets, and one each of the others; two movements from an oboe concerto by Mozart, and Raff's sinfonietta, for all the ten. Mr. Alfred de Voto of Boston played the piano part in the quintet and in the concerto.

The playing was finished in ensemble and in phrasing, pure in intonation, and delightful in the characteristic tonal color and quality of each instrument. The first horn has the true romantic horn tone, and the first bassoon is particularly admirable in its roundness and fullness and its facile and accurate execution. The performance gave much pleasure to the rather small audience that heard it. The music is charming of itself, and the glimpse it gave of an unfamiliar and somewhat remote corner of musical art was enjoyable.

...ess ...

BOSTON SYMPHONY QUARTET.

First Concert Will Be Given at Willard's Hotel To-morrow Evening.

A most interesting musical event will be the first concert by the Boston Symphony Quartet, which will be given in the ballroom of the New Willard Hotel to-morrow (Monday) evening. This organization, which is now in its second year, is unknown in Washington, although its members have become more or less familiar to the Washington public through their membership in the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The first violin is Prof. Willy Hess, the concert master of the orchestra; the second violin, Mr. Otto Roth, one of the first violins of the orchestra; the viola, Mr. Emile Ferir, principal violinist of the parent organization, and the 'cellist is Mr. Heinrich Warnke, who last fall was brought to Boston from Munich to be the principal 'cellist of the orchestra and the 'cellist of this quartet.

The programme for the first concert is attractive. Beginning with one of the most beautiful Beethoven quartets, it ends with one of the most melodious works of the world's greatest melodist, Franz Schubert. Between the two will come a complete novelty, which will then have its first performance in America, a sonata for violin and piano in G major, by Sigismond Stojowski, the eminent Polish pianist and composer, who himself will be at the piano, Prof. Hess playing the violin part.

...ess ...

Boston Symphany Quartet.

The Boston Symphony quartet, an organization growing out of the Boston Symphony orchestra, gave its first concert in this city at the New Willard last night before a large and cultivated audience. The quartet consists of Prof. Willy Hess, first violin; Otto Roth, second violin; Emile Ferir, viola, and Heinrich Warnke, violoncello. These gentlemen were assisted last night by Mr. Sigismond Stojowski, a pianist, who also made his first appearance in this country last night. The program included two quartets, one by Beethoven in B flat major and a posthumous one by Schubert in D minor. Both were excellently interpreted and most artistically played, the fine shading of the second movement and the brilliant finish of the Beethoven number being especially noticeable, while the delicate treatment of the scherzo of the Schubert was equally to be commended. The second number of the program was a sonata for violin and piano in which Mr. Stojowski appeared both as composer and performer. In both respects he was heard to advantage, the composition being musicianly with a weird melody, but finely worked out both for piano and the violin—for it was a sonata for violin and piano in G major, Mr. Hess playing the violin.

...N. Y. ...AN
...ess ...
DEC 22 1905

Vincent d'Indy's Glory as an Artist.

By HENRI PENE DU BOIS.

THEY discussed until dawn Vincent d'Indy. He has the glory that is rare of being discussed. The artists that all praise or detest are those whom none has studied.

"He uses symbols," said one. "I hoped that they had been drowned with the Ring in the metaphysical Rhine. And why does he bother with symbols? They are not French."

"They are French," replied another. "They are in the 'Roman de la Rose,' in the works of Rabelais, in those of Mlle. de Scudery. Then, Vincent d'Indy's symbols are not humid gnomes, a dragon ventriloquist, a Scandinavian Walhalla. The symbols of Vincent d'Indy are beings of our social humanity.

"See the 'Etranger.' He is the Artist since he is the Stranger. Artists are in exile wherever they are. He is the Ideal of beauty, of love, of devotion and of sacrifice. The emerald that he wears expresses the sacredness of his mission. He is the Apostle of Truth. His device is 'Ich diene,' for his duty is to serve."

"I do not understand Vincent d'Indy," said one.

"Because you search for complicated ideas where is only simplicity," said another. The music critics cry against his Second Symphony. They say that it is obscure. It is, on the contrary, very clear. W. J. Henderson says that the idea of it that remains in his mind is an idea of Villon. Well, that is the aim of the symphony. It is to affirm the survival of Gothic art.

"His devotion to Gothic music restricts Vincent d'Indy, I think," said one.

"He is one of the musicians that know best the music of the past," said another. "The musical forms of all times and of all countries are in his mind. He knew Liszt, Brahms, Wagner. Some trees of the forest of 'Siegfried' are in Vincent d'Indy's 'Fervaal,' but here the forest has wide avenues."

"He is an excellent teacher," said one. "I have listened to his analyses of melodic phrases and of harmonic periods. They are full of logic. They seem to apply to music the principles of the classic rhetoric of the seventeenth century in France. But if he be devoted to Christian humility he is also devoted to aristocratic conceit.

"He loves sincerely the common people, but treats it with a sort of affectionate, protective kindness. He regards the common people as a child to be guided. The popular art that he champions is not of the people, but of an aristocracy interested in the people. He wants to educate the people with art."

"It is folly," several voices said in unison.

"It is folly," they were told. "Art may not be taught. But the world may be taught that the artist is the only person that attains the freedom to say what he thinks completely, exclusively. He, alone, has the faculty to express himself."

"It is true," said one, "that Vincent d'Indy's expression is specifically musical. He uses naturally and spontaneously the syntax of music. Then, he thinks in 'accords.' Then, he is implacably logical. It was after hearing his marvellous 'Istar' that Professor Lambinet said, 'The musician deals with sounds as the geometricians with lines and the dialectician with arguments.'"

VOGUE
...ss ...NEW YORK CITY.
DEC 21 1905

IUSIC OF THE FRENCH SCHOOL

THe two December concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, were conducted by M. Vincent d'Indy, and devoted exclusively to French music of the younger school.

The number of actual novelties presented was not large, since other conductors have already explored the field very thoroughly, but each work gained in interest because chosen as representative of the modern style of French music which is just now making a large claim to importance.

Individuality of expression and musical idiom must be conceded to this school as the thematic structure and harmony is markedly away from that of any other country.

A new musical dialect is being developed, and although it cannot be said to have made a deep impression upon the audiences, it is always with difficulty that a new and strange musical language makes headway, among those which have been long established. In any case it has been an interesting presentation greatly enjoyed by those who have an open mind for the progress of musical thought.

M. d'Indy is a distinguished representative of the modern French school, and several of his own compositions were included among the works given at the various concerts he conducted. Interesting as all this may be no modern Wagner, Bach or Beethoven has at yet loomed great on the horizon of musical affairs; these newcomers are perchance but the forerunners of a mighty one yet to come, and beyond all doubt there will again arise a musical phrophet whose utterances will bear the impress of authority even though they may come in a new garb.

Programmes of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Vincent d'Indy.

Second symphonie, op. 57.....Vincent d'Indy
Suite, Pelleas et Melisande, Maeterlinck
Gabriel Faure
Saugefleurie, Legende.....Vincent d'Indy
L'Apprenti sorcier.....Paul Dukas
Symphony, op. 20.....Ernest Chausson
Psyche et Eros, from Psyche, symphonic poem.....Cesar Franck
Nocturnes—I., Nuages; III., Fetes..Claude Debussy
Chant funebre.....Alberic Magnard
Istar, variations symphoniques.....Vincent d'Indy

...ess WASHINGTON, D.C.
DEC 19 1905

The Boston Symphony Quartet.

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Quartet, given last night at the New Willard, offered a splendidly balanced programme, which was given in the masterly manner that the name Boston Symphony carries with it.

Under the leadership of Prof. Willy Hess, the first number, Beethoven, op. 18, No. 6, was given with thoroughly artistic interpretation and intelligence; especially pleasing was the fourth movement, allegretto quasi allegro, which was rendered with a peculiarly effective brilliancy and finish.

The second number, by Sigismond Stojowski, a sonata for piano and violin—Prof. Hess violin and the composer at the piano. The composition in itself is deserving of more than ordinary commendation, and its rendition was marked by an unusual degree of technique and fire.

Mr. Stojowski was a pupil of Paderewski, and this was his first appearance in America. The quartet in all their numbers displayed fine bowing, phrasing, and coloring.

The entire programme was as follows:

Beethoven. Quartet for two violins, viola, and violoncello, in B-flat major, Op. 18, No. 6.
(a) Allegro con brio,
(b) Allegro ma non troppo,
(c) Scherzo: Allegro,
(d) Adagio (La Malinconia)—Allegretto quasi allegro.
Sigismond Stojowski. Sonata for violin and piano, in G major, Op. 13.
(a) Allegro non troppo,
(b) Allegretto capriccioso,
(c) Theme varie: Andante maestoso—Piu mosso e con espressione—Molto vivace.
Schubert. Quartet for two violins, viola, and violoncello, in D minor (Op. posth.).
(a) Allegro,
(b) Andante con moto,
(c) Scherzo (allegro molto)—Trio,
(d) Presto.

SUNDAY HERALD
Published Every Day in the Year.
VOL. CXVIII., NO. 177.
SUNDAY, DEC. 24, 1905.

NINTH SYMPHONY CONCERT TIMELY

Programme Chosen Suitable for Christmas Season, with Thought of Nature and Man's Rejoicing Predominant.

TWO CHRISTMAS PASTORALS FEATURES

Mr. Strube's New Violin Concerto Was Admirably Played by Mr. Adamowski—Mr. Gericke Conducted Concert.

The ninth concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra was given last night in Symphony Hall. Mr. Gericke conducted and Mr. Timothee Adamowski was the solo violinist. The programme was as follows:

Overture, "Nature".....Dvorak
Pastorale from "Christmas" oratorio.....Bach
Violin concerto in F-sharp minor.....Strube
Symphony No. 6, "Pastoral".....Beethoven

It will be seen that this programme was arranged chiefly with reference to the Christmas season and the thought of nature and man rejoicing in the birth of the Saviour. The stickler for facts, "absolute facts," might say that there has been fierce dispute even among the devout over the precise date of this event, and that deep thinkers have differed as to the year, naming years between 746 and 754. A list of these disputants with the record of their conclusions may be found in Gabriel Peignot's "Recherches Historiques sur la Personne de Jesus Christ."

Joseph Scaliger proved, at least to his own satisfaction, that the divine birth was in the month of April; but Scaliger was an erratic and occasionally malicious person; not always to be trusted. Did he not at the age of 60 dance in his doctor's robe the Pyrrhic dance before his Emperor to the amazement of the latter and of all the court? Furthermore Scaliger wrote about the squaring of the circle. Not a man to be chairman of a committee or to serve as foreman of a jury.

The world at large has accepted the day that has long been celebrated with ecclesiastical pomp and household good cheer, and the association of oriental shepherds and their flocks with a raw or ice-bound December does not strike the New Englander as incongruous. In the Christmas music of today—and much of it is poor stuff—there is usually a pastoral episode, and shepherds sing or approach the cradle in the rhythm of the Siciliana.

Nor is it pure fancy to represent the historic and enviable shepherds as musical. The lot of the shepherd, as described in the Bible, was full of hardship and of danger, and it was dull. Then, as even now in Syria, he would pass an hour away in playing on some musical instrument, a little harp, a timbrel, or on something not unlike the pipes of Pan.

Gave Two Famous Christmas Pastorals of Bach, Handel.

The two famous Christmas pastorals are those by Bach and Handel. Both these compositions have been tinkered for modern use, and neither one of them has been improved thereby. Of the two, the one by Handel in the "Messiah" is by far the more poetic in its simple, naive beauty, with its air that might have come from the pipe of some rude shepherd clad in his sheepskin mantle. What matters it whether Handel heard the melody piped by pifferari in Rome to street madonnas, or whether the tune came to him? The music has the atmosphere of that memorable night with wondering stars. Bach's is laboriously simple; he felt the need of a certain amount of scholastic development; he was not content with an impression; his shepherds had been to a conservatory.

Dvorak's overture, which the composer wished played in company with the "Carnival" ("Life") and the "Othello" ("Love"), was performed for the second time at these concerts. It gives a glimpse of parochial nature, nature as seen in a corner of Bohemia, with a dance hall not far away, not nature the universal mother. And once or twice Siegfried entered and the Czech forest begins to murmur for him. Yet the music is often pretty, and it soothes, and so it, too, has its uses. We cannot always be listening to strains of woe and despair, to snivel and whine, or to music illustrative of the horrors in the story of Thebes or of Pelop's line.

These two amiable compositions, with Beethoven's Pastoral, filled the breasts of many with a gentle joy, and Mr. Strube's new violin concerto was not in violent contrast.

The development of Mr. Gustav Strube as a composer is worthy of curious study. He had, to begin with, a sound, diversified, practical education as a musician. There are few orchestral instruments, if any, which he cannot play, and, naturally, the piano is familiar to him. He was brought up in the composer's straight and narrow path at Leipsic, and it is not probable that he strayed from it as a teacher in the Mannheim conservatory.

In his first orchestral work he paid homage to the memory of Joan of Arc with an overture, and thus added his name to the list that fills 90 large octavo pages in Huet's "Jeanne d'Arc et la Musique," a list that begins with Adolphe Adam and ends with Widor.

His tribute was orthodox, and in his rhetoric there was nothing to disturb the most sensitive. He also wrote his symphony, without a title, without a programme, in four movements, and according to the rules.

The scherzo followed the adagio. But in his first violin concerto (1897) Mr. Strube showed clearly a tendency to be modern, in the sense of the word that is so obnoxious to those who are dismayed by the complications of latter-day music and fear lest their minds give way if they listen to the quietly heterodox or to the open and pronounced blasphemers against long established forms. He acquainted himself with forbidden dissonances; he learned new rhythms; he no longer took J. C. Lobe's treatise on instrumentation as the key to paradise. He heard music by Chabrier, Loeppler, the wild Russians, heated by vodka till they screamed in their passion, the cerebral Frenchman, the extraordinary Richard Strauss; he heard this music, and his own Rhapsody for orchestra was in 1901 frankly and delightfully nihilistic. He was perhaps equally audacious three years later in his fantastic overture, but the public accustoms itself quickly to the unusual and it hears after three years with other organs of audition and understanding. His string quartet performed here last March would have shocked his teachers. They would have mourned him as one wandering after strange gods. In his symphonic poem "Longing," produced a month later, there was a blend of sensuousness and mysticism that made a direct appeal.

Last night he came before the Symphony audience with a new violin concerto, for which Mr. Gericke wrote a cadenza. Fortunate Mr. Strube! His compositions do not grow restive from lying in a portfolio.

Frankly Melodic and in More Conventional Line.

It was said of Ambroise Thomas that he anxiously trimmed sails to catch any wind of popularity that might drive him toward the haven of success. If Mr. Strube has heard, and meditated, and assimilated, and from year to year shaped his musical expression, his speech has been his own, and he has said honestly what came to him to say.

In this concerto he is frankly melodic, and as a rule his melody is in a more conventional line than in his rhapsody and fantastic overture; but his harmonic thought is often ultra-modern, and his orchestration is super-refined. The first movement is compact and interesting throughout. The themes are fresh and the material is deftly handled by the orchestra, while the solo instrument indulges itself in arabesques and in passage work. The second movement is a reverie, a dangerous title, but in this instance the music is not soporific; it really incites to reverie rather than to sleep. It has genuine and individual beauty, and the orchestration is often charming.

The Finale, a set of variations, is ingeniously constructed, and it gives brilliant opportunities for the solo violin, but as a whole it does not equal in interest the preceding movements. The concerto is the romantic work of a well-equipped musician who understands thoroughly the violin, who delights in piquant harmonies and in unexpected combinations and oppositions of orchestral colors, who has fine poetic moments. Mr. Strube has scored his work to the great advantage of the solo instrument. His orchestral tuttis, however, are seldom truly sonorous, and the hearer longs for a marked and singing bass. Mr. Strube's orchestra is often all up in the air. Even in fantastical thoughts there should be the suggestion at least of a solid foundation.

Mr. Adamowski played exceedingly well, with virtuoso blood, and with a breath and richness of tone and a general versatility of musical expression that were at once appreciated. It was, indeed, a pleasure to hear him.

[136]

...PLAYS STRUBE'S NEW
...VIOLIN CONCERTO

...Music" at the Symphony Concert
...Musical Calendar—Telegraphic
...sions of Strauss's "Salome"—
...n Performs an Opera by an Ameri-
...A Note on Loeffler's Recent Work—
...rt News

...s in a while the keenest impression ...symphony concert is that of the per... of our orchestra and of the au... and the imagination of its con... It was so yesterday afternoon with an unfamiliar overture and a new concerto on the programme. ...en in the past, when Christmas is ...the "Shepherd's Music" from Bach's ...mas Oratorio" had a place upon it. ...orchestra played it with surpassing ... of cool, transparent, flowing tone. ...er as the music is Mr. Gericke and ...en seemed to create it anew for us. ...ome from nowhere. It vanished no... And between was perfect euphony ...t edge or joint in it. There was no ... of men or instruments behind. It ... disembodied sound as the music ...the legend makes the shepherds hear. ...eethoven's "pastoral" symphony ended ...concert. (Was it appropriate to the ...too? Anyhow Beethoven played it ... when Christmas was only three days ...) And here again orchestra and con... seemed to recreate familiar music. ...band playing the symphony for the ... time could have brought such mingled ...and finesse, such cool lucidity and ...warm imagination to the music. Yet ...was hard to believe that it sounded ...ter or more alive—more new even—on ...December evening when Beethoven ...gave it in Vienna. The quality of the ...ression matched the understanding and ...sympathy of the conception. Mr. ...icke and his men made the symphony ...long, flowing, changeful yet perfectly ...portioned song. Endless were the ...l colors and shades of tonal colors ...with which they touched it. Figure and ...ornament were all spontaneous grace. ...rhythms danced. Once upon a time some ...of us liked to deny Mr. Gericke fulness ...of imagination. Of late he has been prov... his possession of it in the ultra-mod... ...ern music that is presumed to require it ...most of all. But what fuller feat of the ...imagination or of the power of a con... ...ductor over his men and his hearers than ...to recreate a symphony that began to ...be familiar fifty years ago? "Woods, ...ers and rocks send back the echoes that ...man deserves," wrote Beethoven, perhaps ...when the symphony was in his mind. Yes... ...rday conductor and orchestra seemed to ...send back also the very sounds into which ...he had transformed those echoes.

A pastoral programme Mr. Gericke was ...seemingly planning for yesterday's con... ...cert, and so with the "pastoral" symphony ...and the "Shepherds' Music" went Dvorak's ...overture "Amid Nature" which for ten ...years our orchestra has not played. Great ...things, according to the composer, were in ...mind as he wrote, even impressions of the ...sea which must be very big things in... ...deed. Yet his Nature, so far as the music ...is, is Nature as the peasant sees it who ...seems to have simple imagination as ...well as command of orchestral coloring ...to express it. The little sounds of "all out... ...doors" tickle his fancy. Shall we not hear ...the murmuring or twinkling through the ...strings and wood-winds? This peasant ...out-of-doors rollicks in the sheer joy that ...wind and sunshine, woods and stream ...give him. Lucky enough to be composer ...as well as his music rollicks and sings with him. ...Then he tires. He begins to muse, and into ...his music go his simple musing. The over... ...ture is not the music of Dvorak's prime. ...It belongs to the beginning of his decline ...when he was slowly becoming the peasant ...with that queer "throw-back" of his ad... ...vancing years—and by no means always ...a musically inspired peasant. Contrast ...it with Beethoven when both in Dvorak's ...case are "Amid Nature" and the moods ...of Beethoven feels and that he trans... ...lates into his music run deeper, broader ...and clearer with the universal appeal of ...poetry. No wonder Beethoven said he ...poetized" in the woods and sang in his ...music. Dvorak makes but a pretty oat... ...play beside that symphony. And for ...feeling, for pastoral mood does ...Dvorak with all his peasant mind and ...art match the bewigged, town-loving ...master that wrote his "Christmas Ora... ...torio" probably in his stuffy living-room ...by his Leipsic church? It is the dif... ...ference of genius in Bach from talent in ...Dvorak.

In the midst of all this "nature music," ...as Gericke has been calling it, and per... ...haps for foil to it, came Mr. Strube's new ...concerto for violin. Last spring he wrote ...it for Mr. Adamowski, and Mr. Gericke ...gave it a scholarly and musicianly cadenza, ...and performed at a single hearing in rather ...modern style. Yesterday Mr. Adamowski ...played the concerto and Mr. Strube himself ...conducted the orchestra. The listeners had ...a generous round of applause for both. It ...is pleasant to know that a composer of such ...standing comes modestly week after week among ...us, and that there is a fellow... ...ship in the same company to play it so ...well. And if Mr. Strube had ...been modest, so to say, his ...work deserved its warm ...welcome. It was a modern com... ...position, a concerto for violin ...and orchestra of the whole duty ...of the violin. The work gave him ...opportunity to impart that ...individuality. He is skilful and fanciful when he sets his solo instrument against wood winds or fuses its tone with one or another orchestral group. Almost always the result is the charm of winning euphony. The concerto is supple throughout—in the finale Mr. Strube risks no less than twelve variations on a theme in Passacaglia form—and throughout there is a fine, clear, soft plangency in the whole tonal impression. Sometimes, too, it is a brilliant plangency shining against a background of flowing sensitive phrase. So one fancies at moments one of the new Frenchmen might write a violin concerto. So too, one also fancies, when Mr. Strube lingers too persistently in the higher register of the violin, Richard Strauss might linger. But it is enough—more than enough—that at last some young composer, and one of our own, has written a concerto of spontaneous charm in itself and of lively feeling for the violin that is to play it. Yesterday it sounded the better for the fineness of Mr. Adamowski's tone and for the skill with which he fused every technical grace or accomplishment into the whole musical design.

H. T. P.

Issued Sunday by Post Publishing Co.
DECEMBER 24, 1905. NO. 13; VOL. 65

NINTH SYMPHONY CONCERT

Timothee Adamowski was the soloist of the Symphony concert last evening and the programme was as follows:

Overture, "Nature," op. 91.....Dvorak
Pastorale, from "Christmas Oratorio".....Bach
Concerto for violin (MS.).....Strube
Symphony No. 6, "Pastoral".....Beethoven

The novelty of the programme was the violin concerto played for the first time in public. It was composed somewhat less than a year ago and is in three movements. The first is moderately pleasing, the second, a "reverie," possesses a certain refinement of thought, and the finale, which includes a violin cadenza composed by Mr. Gericke, is not without a certain interest. But the work as a whole, while undoubtedly clever as to its workmanship, is one of which it may be asked, "why was it written?"

Mr. Adamowski, who made his annual appearance as soloist, played the work acceptably to the audience, although at times his intonation was a little uncertain and there were moments when the tonal quality was somewhat of the "scratchy" order.

Both composer and interpreter were loudly applauded and recalled.

The other members of the programme do not require extended comment. The Dvorak overture proved most enjoyable, even if the beginning was suggestive of the "Waldwebey" from Wagner's "Siegfried." Bach's Christmas music is as inspiring as ever, and the Beethoven symphony ended the concert in a highly satisfactory manner.

Mme. Emma Eames will sing at the rehearsal and concert this coming week and the symphony will be a new work by Amherst Webber, pianist of the Emma Eames concert company.

BOSTON SYMPHONY QUARTET

Arrangements have been completed by which the Boston Symphony Quartet will give three concerts of chamber music in Brattle Hall, Cambridge, after the first of the year. The dates are Thursday evenings, Jan. 18, Feb. 22 and March 22. At the first concert the assisting artist will be Mme. Olga Samaroff, pianist; at the second, Miss Laura Hawkins, pianist, and at the third the Hoffman String Quartet, which, with the Boston Symphony Quartet, will play Beethoven's octet. The sale of season tickets will open at the University Book Store, Cambridge, on Monday morning, Jan. 8.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau of the World
NEW YORK SUN
ress
DEC 24 1905
e

...year will be that by the Boston Symphony Quartet in Mendelssohn Hall on Tuesday evening, January 2. The quartet (Prof. Willy Hess and Messrs. Roth, Ferir and Warnke) will be assisted by Sigismond Stojowski, pianist, of the Institute of Musical Art, and by Messrs. Max Zach, viola, and Josef Keller, 'cello, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau of the World
From NEW YORK SUN
Address
Date DEC 24 1905

The next pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, January 11, and Saturday afternoon, January 13. On Thursday evening the solo artist will be Mr. Alfred Reisenauer and on Saturday afternoon Prof. Willy Hess.

From Standard Union
Address
Date

Sigismond Strojowski, professor of piano in the Musical Art Institute, will give a recital in Mendelssohn Hall immediately following his appearance there with the Boston Symphony Quartet on Jan. 2.

NEW YORK PRESS
ess
DEC 24 1905

Reisenauer will be the soloist of the next concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on the evening of January 11. Willy Hess, the orchestra's concertmaster, will have the solo honors at the concert on the following Saturday afternoon.

Boston Sunday Globe.
SUNDAY, DEC 24, 1905.

NINTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The novelty of the ninth Symphony program was Gustav Strube's concerto in F sharp minor for violin and orchestra, with Timothee Adamowski as soloist. The work is still in manuscript and its first performance was at the Friday afternoon rehearsal. The other numbers were Dvorak's overture, "Nature"; the shepherd's music from Bach's "Christmas" oratorio, and Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony. Mr Strube, who has been associated with the Boston Symphony orchestra for about 14 years, is a composer of great ability, many of his works having been performed at concerts in this city by the Symphony orchestra and other prominent musical organizations. His latest violin concerto, which is dedicated to Mr Adamowski, gives great prominence to the solo instrument, the orchestral background, though substantial, being of secondary importance. A work in short, written by a violinist for his favorite instrument, and a thoroughly interesting and sane composition through each of the three movements.

Mr Strube indulges in but few "surprises" in modulations or orchestral effects. The piece is full of melody, the score is written with a thorough understanding of the limitations, as well as the capabilities of the violin, and although abounding in brilliant passages, it is not to be classed as a "show piece," but as a scholarly contribution to musical literature, and one that is not so abstruse as to be enjoyed only by the musical expert. It is downright good music, and Mr Adamowski, who had memorized the concerto, played it splendidly, doing even better work than usual. His intonation was nearly always correct, he gave the variations of the three-note motive in the first part very sweetly, and the upper register fingering and broken phrasing in the next movement were commendable in every way. In the finale the variations of the themes were clearly shown and the difficult cadenze, written by Mr Gericke, was played dexterously and smoothly. Mr Adamowski and Mr Strube were received with great favor, before and after the concerto performance.

Mr Gericke's program was in keeping with the spirit of the season and opened with "Nature," the first of Dvorak's triple overture, "Nature," "Life," "Love." The sweet and gentle suggestiveness of the charming work was given with exquisite effect, showing the orchestra at its best in music of the simpler form. The shepherd music by Bach, this also with a pastoral atmosphere, was played expressively, and in Mr Strube's concerto, which the composer led, the work of the orchestra was as sympathetic and perfect in execution as one could reasonably desire. Beethoven's beautiful "Pastoral" symphony, grandly played throughout, closed the program.

The soloist this week will be Mme Emma Eames, who will be heard in an aria by Mozart and Schubert's "Die Allmacht." The symphony in C minor, by Amherst Webber, will be given for the first time in this country; Elgar's overture, "In the South," will be played for the first time in Boston, and the other selection announced is Tschaikowsky's "Francesca da Rimini."

BOSTON SYMPHONY QUARTET.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony quartet will be given in Jordan hall one week from tomorrow evening. The assisting artists will be Mr George Proctor, pianist, and Mr Carl Barth, cellist. The program will be as follows: Schumann, quartet in A major, op 41, No. 3; St Saens, trio for piano, violin and 'cello, in F, op 18; Schubert, quintet in C major, op 163.

om NEW YORK PRESS
ldress
te DEC 24 1905

...Boston Symphony Quartet, composed ...Willy Hess, Otto Roth, Emile Ferir and ...Heinrich Warnke, will be the first chamber ...organization heard in New York in ...this concert will take place on Jan... ...in Mendelsohn Hall. The Hesses ...assisted by Sigismond Stojowski, ...piano player, and ...

THE SPRINGFIELD SUNDAY
REPUBLICAN: DECEMBER 24, 1905

Boston Symphony Orchestra's Appearance in Springfield.

The Boston Symphony orchestra will give but one concert in Springfield this season, in the Court Square theater, on Tuesday evening, January 16. Last year two very successful concerts were given, and it was the intention of the management to make these two concerts annual fixtures. Unfortunately, this season they could not be arranged. The time of the orchestra for concerts outside of Boston is very limited, and the demand has become so great that it became necessary to make considerable alterations in the plans of this season. In these changes, it was decided that only one concert could be given in Springfield, but there is every prospect that in another year the original intention of giving two will be carried out. At its concert on the 16th the orchestra will have its usual quota of 70 musicians, under Mr Gericke. The solo artist will be the distinguished Boston violinist, Timothee Adamowski, who will have an interesting new work to present to the music-lovers of this city. Full details concerning the sale of seats, the prices and program will be given later.

New York Times
DEC 24 1905

The first concert of chamber music in the new year will be that by the Boston Symphony Quartet in Mendelssohn Hall on Tuesday evening, Jan. 2. The quartet (Prof. Willy Hess and Messrs. Otto Roth, Emile Férir, and Heinrich Warnke) will be assisted by Mr. Sigismond Stojowski, pianist, of the Institute of Musical Art, and by Messrs. Max Zach, viola, and Josef Keller, 'cello, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. 3

New York Times.
DEC 24 1905

The next pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, Jan. 11, and on Saturday afternoon, Jan. 13. The soloist on Thursday evening will be Mr. Alfred Reisenauer, and on Saturday afternoon Prof. Willy Hess. 4

N. Y. EVG. TELEGRAM
DEC 20 1905

Longy Club at M...

THE concert of chamber music for wind instruments given by the Longy Club of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Mendelssohn Hall last evening was an explanation of the pleasure which the Boston Symphony Orchestra always gives. As solos for the different instruments occurred each player showed himself an absolute master of his art; yet if all had been pipes of an organ played by one man the blending of tone could not have been more perfect.

ISABELLE URQUHART
PHOTO BY SARONY

The Beethoven Quintet, for piano, oboe, clarinet, horn and bassoon, opened the programme. The piano was the leading instrument, and it harmonized so much more perfectly with the wind instruments than it ever can with strings that a new and most delightful impression was experienced. The incidental horn solo was a marvel of sweetness.

The (a) of the second number, Gabriel Faure's Nocturne in E flat, for flute, two oboes, two clarinets, two horns and two bassoons, is another Persian Garden, the acme of hopelessness, and its perfect rendition made one revel in sadness. The (b), Intermezzo

Mendelssohn Hall.

...scherzando, for flute, oboe, two clarinets, ...horn and bassoon, by Lefebre, was in a ...much gayer vein and a splendid contrast.

The Mozart Romance and Rondo, from the Concerto in E flat major, for oboe and piano, was a wonderful exhibition of Mr. Longy's technique on the oboe and well supported by Mr. De Voto, the last tone being liquid sweetness long drawn out.

The Raff Sinfonietta, played by the entire Longy Club, caused regret only because it was the last number, and it was hard for the small but very appreciative audience to tear themselves away.

This programme, in contrast with ...compositions of Monsieur D'Indy, came ...like a balmy night in June after a sp... ...tracted late spring.

[137]

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 23, 1905

IN THE WORLD OF MUSIC

ADAMOWSKI PLAYS STRUBE'S NEW VIOLIN CONCERTO

"Nature Music" at the Symphony Concert—The Musical Calendar—Telegraphic Impressions of Strauss's "Salome"—Bremen Performs an Opera by an American—A Note on Loeffler's Recent Work—Current News

Once in a while the keenest impression of a Symphony concert is that of the perfections of our orchestra and of the authority and the imagination of its conductor. It was so yesterday afternoon even with an unfamiliar overture and a brand-new concerto on the programme. As often in the past, when Christmas is near, the "Shepherd's Music" from Bach's "Christmas Oratorio" had a place upon it. The orchestra played it with surpassing beauty of cool, transparent, flowing tone. Familiar as the music is Mr. Gericke and his men seemed to create it anew for us. It came from nowhere. It vanished nowhere. And between was perfect euphony without edge or joint in it. There was no thought of men or instruments behind. It was as disembodied sound as the music that the legend makes the shepherds hear.

Beethoven's "pastoral" symphony ended the concert. (Was it appropriate to the time, too? Anyhow Beethoven played it first when Christmas was only three days away.) And here again orchestra and conductor seemed to recreate familiar music. No band playing the symphony for the first time could have brought such mingled fire and finesse, such cool lucidity and such warm imagination to the music. Yet it was hard to believe that it sounded fresher or more alive—more new even—on that December evening when Beethoven first gave it in Vienna. The quality of the expression matched the understanding and the sympathy of the conception. Mr. Gericke and his men made the symphony one long, flowing, changeful yet perfectly proportioned song. Endless were the tonal colors and shades of tonal colors with which they touched it. Figure and ornament were all spontaneous grace. Rhythms danced. Once upon a time some of us liked to deny Mr. Gericke fulness of imagination. Of late he has been proving his possession of it in the ultra-modern music that is presumed to require it most of all. But what fuller feat of the imagination or of the power of a conductor over his men and his hearers than so to recreate a symphony that began to be familiar fifty years ago? "Woods, trees and rocks send back the echoes that man deserves," wrote Beethoven, perhaps when the symphony was in his mind. Yesterday conductor and orchestra seemed to send back also the very sounds into which he had transformed those echoes.

A pastoral programme Mr. Gericke was seemingly planning for yesterday's concert, and so with the "pastoral" symphony and the "Shepherds' Music" went Dvorak's overture "Amid Nature" which for ten years our orchestra has not played. Great things, according to the composer, were in his mind as he wrote, even impressions of the universe which must be very big things indeed. Yet his Nature, so far as the music went, is Nature as the peasant sees it who happens to have simple imagination as well and command of orchestral coloring to express it. The little sounds of "all outdoors" tickle his fancy. Shall we not hear them murmuring or twinkling through the strings and wood-winds? This peasant out-of-doors rollicks in the sheer joy that wind and sunshine, woods and stream bring him. Lucky enough to be composer too, his music rollicks and sings with him. Then he tires. He begins to muse, and into his music go his simple musing. The overture is not the music of Dvorak's prime. It belongs to the beginning of his decline when he was slowly becoming the peasant again—that queer "throw-back" of his advancing years—and by no means always the musically inspired peasant. Contrast him with Beethoven when both in Dvorak's phrase are "Amid Nature" and the moods that Beethoven feels and that he translates into his music run deeper, broader and clearer with the universal appeal of poetry. No wonder Beethoven said he "poetized" in the woods and sang in his music. Dvorak makes but a pretty oat-pipe lay beside that symphony. And for simple feeling, for pastoral mood does Dvorak with all his peasant mind and heart, match the bewigged, town-loving Cantor that wrote his "Christmas Oratorio" probably in his stuffy living-room hard by his Leipsic church? It is the difference of genius in Bach from talent in Dvorak.

In the midst of all this "nature music," as Mr. Gericke has been calling it, and perhaps for foil to it, came Mr. Strube's new concerto for violin. Last spring he wrote it for Mr. Adamowski, and Mr. Gericke added a scholarly and musicianly cadenza, as it seemed at a single hearing in rather severer style. Yesterday Mr. Adamowski played the concerto and Mr. Strube himself conducted the orchestra. The listeners had round upon round of applause for both. It is good to know that a composer of such worth sits modestly week after week among the first violins, and that there is a fellow-virtuoso in the same company to play it so [illegible] one of ourselves, so to say, his [illegible] would have deserved its warm welcome. Here at last was a modern composer who was writing a concerto for violin not because it is a part of the whole duty of man, but because the work gave him pleasure, while he sought to impart that [illegible] to his hearers. A violin concerto [illegible] rounded spontaneous and fanciful [illegible] with feeling for the in- [illegible] beauty and graces of its [illegible] [illegible] lated music [illegible] body and largeness enough in his music ideas for that. Maybe, too, the masterpieces among concertos, for the time at least, have all been written. But the concerto is music of persuasive, even fascinating lyrical and elegiac charm, bright and animated with shimmering tonal fancies that once and again flash brilliantly. Mr. Strube respects established forms, but he bends them easily and freely to his purpose and his harmonies, modulations and adornments often have a fresh and imaginative individuality. He is skilful and fanciful when he sets his solo instrument against wood winds or fuses its tone with one or another orchestral group. Almost always the result is the charm of winning euphony. The concerto is supple throughout—in the finale Mr. Strube risks no less than twelve variations on a theme in Passacaglia form—and throughout there is a fine, clear, soft plangency in the whole tonal impression. Sometimes, too, it is a brilliant plangency shining against a background of flowing sensitive phrase. So one fancies at moments one of the new Frenchmen might write a violin concerto. So too, one also fancies, when Mr. Strube lingers too persistently in the higher register of the violin, Richard Strauss might linger. But it is enough—more than enough—that at last some young composer, and one of our own, has written a concerto of spontaneous charm in itself and of lively feeling for the violin that is to play it. Yesterday it sounded the better for the fineness of Mr. Adamowski's tone and for the skill with which he fused every technical grace or accomplishment into the whole musical design.

H. T. P.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, DEC 24, 1905.

NINTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The novelty of the ninth Symphony program was Gustav Strube's concerto in F sharp minor for violin and orchestra, with Timothee Adamowski as soloist. The work is still in manuscript and its first performance was at the Friday afternoon rehearsal. The other numbers were Dvorak's overture, "Nature"; the shepherd's music from Bach's "Christmas" oratorio, and Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony. Mr Strube, who has been associated with the Boston Symphony orchestra for about 14 years, is a composer of great ability, many of his works having been performed at concerts in this city by the Symphony orchestra and other prominent musical organizations. His latest violin concerto, which is dedicated to Mr Adamowski, gives great prominence to the solo instrument, the orchestral background, though substantial, being of secondary importance. A work, in short, written by a violinist for his favorite instrument, and a thoroughly interesting and sane composition through each of the three movements.

Mr Strube indulges in but few "surprises" in modulations or orchestral effects. The piece is full of melody, the score is written with a thorough understanding of the limitations, as well as the capabilities of the violin, and although abounding in brilliant passages, it is not to be classed as a "show piece," but as a scholarly contribution to musical literature, and one that is not so abstruse as to be enjoyed only by the musical expert. It is downright good music, and Mr Adamowski, who had memorized the concerto, played it splendidly, doing even better work than usual. His intonation was nearly always correct, he gave the variations of the three-note motive in the first part very sweetly, and the upper register fingering and broken phrasing in the next movement were commendable in every way. In the finale the variations of the themes were clearly shown and the difficult cadenza, written by Mr Gericke, was played dexterously and smoothly. Mr Adamowski and Mr Strube were received with great favor, before and after the concerto performance.

Mr Gericke's program was in keeping with the spirit of the season and opened with "Nature," the first of Dvorak's triple overture, "Nature," "Life," "Love." The sweet and gentle suggestiveness of the charming work was given with exquisite effect, showing the orchestra at its best in music of the simpler form. The shepherd music by Bach, this also with a pastoral atmosphere, was played expressively, and in Mr Strube's concerto, which the composer led, the work of the orchestra was as sympathetic and perfect in execution as one could reasonably desire. Beethoven's beautiful "Pastoral" symphony, grandly played throughout, closed the program.

The soloist this week will be Mme Emma Eames, who will be heard in an aria by Mozart and Schubert's "Die Allmacht." The symphony in C minor, by Amherst Webber, will be given for the first time in this country; Elgar's overture, "In the South," will be played for the first time in Boston, and the other selection announced is Tschaikowsky's "Francesca da Rimini."

BOSTON SYMPHONY QUARTET.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony quartet will be given in Jordan hall one week from tomorrow evening. The assisting artists will be Mr George Proctor, pianist, and Mr Carl Barth, cellist. The program will be as follows: Schumann, quartet in A major, op 41, No. 3; St Saens, trio for piano, violin and 'cello, in F, op 18; Schubert, quintet in C major, op 163.

[illegible] NEW YORK PRESS

[illegible]dress

[illegible]te DEC 24 1905

The Boston Symphony Quartet, composed of Willy Hess, Otto Roth, Emile Ferir and Heinrich Warnke, will be the first chamber music organization heard in New York in 1906. The concert will take place on January 2 in Mendelssohn Hall. The Hesses will be assisted by Sigismond Stojowski, pianist; Max Zach, viola player, and Joseph Keller, 'cellist.

The Boston Post

The Representative Democratic Paper of New England

Issued Sunday by Post Publishing Co.

DECEMBER 24, 1905. NO. 13 : VOL. 68

NINTH SYMPHONY CONCERT

Timothee Adamowski was the soloist of the Symphony concert last evening and the programme was as follows:

Overture, "Nature," op. 91.....Dvorak
Pastorale, from "Christmas Oratorio".....Bach
Concerto for violin (MS.).....Strube
Symphony No. 6, "Pastoral".....Beethoven

The novelty of the programme was the violin concerto played for the first time in public. It was composed somewhat less than a year ago and is in three movements. The first is moderately pleasing, the second, a "reverie," possesses a certain refinement of thought, and the finale, which includes a violin cadenza composed by Mr. Gericke, is not without a certain interest. But the work as a whole, while undoubtedly clever as to its workmanship, is one of which it may be asked, "why was it written?"

Mr. Adamowski, who made his annual appearance as soloist, played the work acceptably to the audience, although at times his intonation was a little uncertain and there were moments when the tonal quality was somewhat of the "scratchy" order.

Both composer and interpreter were loudly applauded and recalled.

The other members of the programme do not require extended comment. The Dvorak overture proved most enjoyable, even if the beginning was suggestive of the "Waldwebey" from Wagner's "Siegfried." Bach's Christmas music is as inspiring as ever, and the Beethoven symphony ended the concert in a highly satisfactory manner.

Mme. Emma Eames will sing at the rehearsal and concert this coming week and the symphony will be a new work by Amherst Webber, pianist of the Emma Eames concert company.

BOSTON SYMPHONY QUARTET

Arrangements have been completed by which the Boston Symphony Quartet will give three concerts of chamber music in Brattle Hall, Cambridge, after the first of the year. The dates are Thursday evenings, Jan. 18, Feb. 22 and March 22. At the first concert the assisting artist will be Mme. Olga Samaroff, pianist; at the second, Miss Laura Hawkins, pianist, and at the third the Hoffman String Quartet, which, with the Boston Symphony Quartet, will play Beethoven's octet. The sale of season tickets will open at the University Book Store, Cambridge, on Monday morning, Jan. 8.

THE SPRINGFIELD SUNDAY REPUBLICAN: DECEMBER 24, 1905

Boston Symphony Orchestra's Appearance in Springfield.

The Boston Symphony orchestra will give but one concert in Springfield this season, in the Court Square theater, on Tuesday evening, January 16. Last year two very successful concerts were given, and it was the intention of the management to make these two concerts annual fixtures. Unfortunately, this season they could not be arranged. The time of the orchestra for concerts outside of Boston is very limited, and the demand has become so great that it became necessary to make considerable alterations in the plans of this season. In these changes, it was decided that only one concert could be given in Springfield, but there is every prospect that in another year the original intention of giving two will be carried out. At its concert on the 16th the orchestra will have its usual quota of 70 musicians, under Mr Gericke. The solo artist will be the distinguished Boston violinist, Timothee Adamowski, who will have an interesting new work to present to the music-lovers of this city. Full details concerning the sale of seats, the prices and program will be given later.

[illegible]ss

[illegible] DEC 24 1905

The first concert of chamber music in the new year will be that by the Boston Symphony Quartet in Mendelssohn Hall on Tuesday evening, Jan. 2. The quartet (Prof. Willy Hess and Messrs. Otto Roth, Emile Férir, and Heinrich Warnke) will be assisted by Mr. Sigismond Stojowski, pianist, of the Institute of Musical Art, and by Messrs. Max Zach, viola, and Josef Keller, 'cello, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

[illegible] Times.

[illegible]

DEC 24 1905

The next pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, Jan. 11, and on Saturday afternoon, Jan. 13. The soloist on Thursday evening will be Mr. Alfred Reisenauer, and on Saturday afternoon Prof. Willy Hess.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

NEW YORK SUN

[illegible]ress

DEC 4 1905

[illegible]e

The first concert of chamber music of the new year will be that by the Boston Symphony Quartet in Mendelssohn Hall on Tuesday evening, January 2. The quartet (Prof. Willy Hess and Messrs. Roth, Ferir and Warnke) will be assisted by Sigismond Stojowski, pianist, of the Institute of Musical Art, and by Messrs. Max Zach, viola, and Josef Keller, 'cello, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

[illegible]

From NEW YORK SUN

Address

Date

The next pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, January 11, and Saturday afternoon, January 13. On Thursday evening the solo artist will be Mr. Alfred Reisenauer and on Saturday afternoon Prof. Willy Hess.

From

Address

Date

Sigismond Strojowski, professor of piano in the Musical Art Institute, will give a recital in Mendelssohn Hall immediately following his appearance there with the Boston Symphony Quartet on Jan. 2.

[illegible]

[illegible]ess

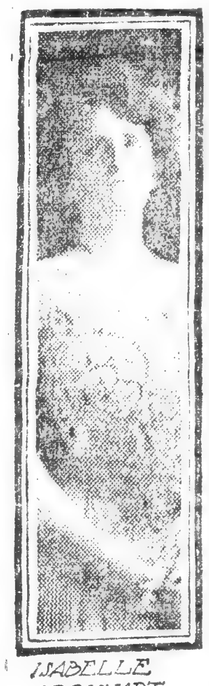
DEC 24 1905

Reisenauer will be the soloist of the next concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on the evening of January 11. Willy Hess, the orchestra's concertmaster, will have the solo honors at the concert on the following Saturday afternoon.

[illegible] EVE TELEGRAM

Longy Club at M[illegible]

THE concert of chamber music for wind instruments given by the Longy Club of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Mendelssohn Hall last evening was an explanation of the pleasure which the Boston Symphony Orchestra always gives. As solos for the different instruments occurred each player [illegible]



ISABELLE URQUHART
Photo by Marceau

Mendelssohn Hall.

[illegible]scherzando, for flute, oboe, two clarinets, horn and bassoon, by Lefebre, was in a much gayer vein and a splendid contrast. The Mozart Romance and Rondo, from the Concerto in E flat major for oboe and piano, was a wonderful exhibition of Mr. Longy's technique on the oboe and well supported by Mr. De Voto, the last tone being liquid sweetness long drawn out. The Raff Sinfoniella, played by the entire Longy Club, caused regret only because it was the last number, and it was hard for the small but very appreciative audience to tear themselves away.

This programme, in contrast with the compositions of Monsieur D'Indy, came like a balmy night in June after a protracted late spring.

[137]

From HARPERS WEEKLY, NEW YORK CITY.
Address
Date DEC 23 1905

IT is generally assumed that the modern French school of composers—the "younger Frenchmen" represented by Debussy, Fauré, D'Indy, Dukas, De Bréville, and others—depend for the singularity of their effects upon a radical departure from the traditional musical designs: that, aside from their indifference to the established harmonic and melodic codes, they are experimentalists, as well, so far as their form is concerned. The recent visit of M. Vincent D'Indy,—the leader of the school,—and his performances with the Boston Symphony Orchestra of representative works by himself and his associates, have served, in a measure, to dispel that belief. M. D'Indy has made it known in various ways that he and his colleagues are not the ruthless iconoclasts they are commonly supposed to be. A precise statement of the case would require the use of strictly musical terms; but the interesting point, as set forth by M. D'Indy, is that he and his confrères, instead of disdaining the constructive principles of the older music, claim to be but perpetuators of the traditions established by the classicists. M. D'Indy claims, for example, that the basic form of his extraordinary B-flat symphony, which has proved so formidable a stumbling-block to many of its hearers, is, in its fundamental design, as simple and comprehensible as if the date of its composition were 1791 instead of 1903; and that its novelty of effect proceeds from the new harmonic, melodic, and orchestral substance which is superimposed upon old and familiar forms. Without discussing the necessity of establishing such a position as M. D'Indy and his colleagues assume, its statement from so authoritative a source sets the work of the school in a new light. They are to be regarded, it seems, not as iconoclasts, but as innovators who, with a reverent yet indulgent eye upon the past, seek to enlarge the expressive potencies of music along what are called "legitimate" lines. The matter is important mainly for the illumination which it casts upon the æsthetic convictions of M. D'Indy and his fellows. It may be conceded that there is no reason why they should not, if they choose, adopt the structural principles of Haydn, Mozart, and Rameau, instead of inventing, after the manner of Richard Strauss, a form of their own. The point to discuss is the essential value of their achievements, from the standpoint of poetic eloquence and sheer musical inspiration.

It may be said at once that of the seven composers whose works were exploited by M. D'Indy, he himself and his young colleague, Claude Debussy, stand out conspicuously as by far the most individual and important of the group. Even the admirable and acknowledged father of the school, César Franck, so far as he was represented on M. D'Indy's programmes, suffered the general eclipse. Of M. D'Indy it may be said that he disclosed no phase of his personality that was not indicated in the estimate of his art that has already been given in this place. He demonstrated anew his fine and unimpeachable musicianship, his complete sincerity of purpose, the restraint and dignity of his musical thought. His B-flat symphony grows in power and impressiveness with each hearing: it is a noble and individual work, though it lacks something of spontaneity, and it seldom plumbs the profounder emotional depths. His "Istar," an earlier work, is a brilliant example of constructive ingenuity, and it has moments of rare eloquence. "Saugefleurie,"—a "légende d'après un conte de Robert de Bonnières,"—a still earlier work, is built upon models that have long since lost their power of persuasiveness.

The works by which Debussy was represented were not new to New York: they were the two orchestral "Nocturnes," "Nuages" and "Fêtes," produced last winter by Mr. Walter Damrosch, and their repetition served to confirm the impression formed at that time. This is music of singular and haunting beauty, as subtly imagined as it is ingeniously and exquisitely contrived. M. D'Indy presented also these works, of which the last three were new to New York: Gabriel Fauré's suite, "Pelléas et Mélisande"; Paul Dukas's brilliant and exhilarating scherzo, "L'Apprenti Sorcier" (after the ballad of Goethe); Ernest Chausson's symphony in B-flat (opus 20); a movement from César Franck's symphonic poem, "Psyché," and a "Chant funèbre" by Albéric Magnard, a pupil of D'Indy.

Of the new works, the Chausson symphony made the most definite appeal; yet, despite its sombre power and its occasional beauty, its debt to such masters as Wagner and Tschaikowsky is obvious enough to invalidate its essential worth. The "Psyché et Eros" of Franck is sonorous and effective, but lacking in distinction and saliency of ideas. Of M. Magnard's "Chant funèbre," the kindest thing that can be said is that it would better have been left unperformed.

From LIFE
Address
Date

Boston Symphony Quartet

THE APPEARANCE of Sigismund Stojowski and the Boston Symphony Quartet each for the first time in this city made of the concert at the New Willard on Monday an important musical event in our history. Stojowski, in the double role of composer and pianist, was unassuming of manner, and undoubtedly this lack of ostentation counted in his favor with the audience. His Sonata for Violin and Piano in G. Major, op. 13, is couched in a refined and intellectual style which has the advantage of being not too deep for the average comprehension. In the "Andante Maestoso" the solemnly religious theme was varied in one section by an accompaniment in sixths not unlike the familiar mode of "Kammenoi Ostrow." Richness of ideas and versatility in the mode of expression, no less than an unusual command of the intricacies of modulation, were rememberable qualities of Mr. Stojowski's composition. Schubert's familiar Quartet in D, in which Schubert's "Death and the Maiden" song forms the foundation of the second movement, and the Beethoven Quartet op. 18, No. 6, completed the program.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
AMERICA HEBREW
From
Address NEW YORK CI

The visit of Vincent D'Indy, who recently returned to France, after spending some time here as propagandist of the modern French music, has evoked much comment upon the methods of D'Indy and his fellow composers of the school in question, and it cannot be said that the general tenor of the criticisms are favorable.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
HEBREW STANDARD
NEW YORK CITY
DEC 22 1905

The Boston Symphony Quartet, composed of Prof. Willy Hess (first violin), Otto Roth (second violin), Emile Ferir (viola) and Heinrich Warnke (cello), announces three evenings of chamber music at Mendelssohn Hall on January 2, February 6 and March 7. Among the assisting artists are Mr. Sigismond Stojowski (pianist), Miss Susan Metcalfe (soprano), and Mme. Olga Samaroff (pianist).

[138]

NEW YORK CITY,
DEC 20 1905

THREE CONCERTS OF AS MANY KINDS

Wind Instruments, Strings and an Orchestra as Rival Attractions of a Busy Evening.

Three concerts, every one excellent in its way, divided the attention of music-seekers last evening. The Longy Club played chamber music for wind instruments at Mendelssohn Hall, the Flonzaley Quartet gave a programme for strings at Carnegie Chamber Music Hall, and the New York Symphony Orchestra, under Walter Damrosch's leadership, ended its Carnegie Hall list with Tschaikowsky's "Symphonie Pathetique," after Raoul Pugno had been heard in the symphony variations for piano and orchestra by Cesar Franck, and Miss Bessie Abbott had repeated the Mozart aria and the songs she had sung on Sunday afternoon.

Mr. Longy, who is the first oboe of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has gathered from that band a coterie of flute, oboe, clarinet, bassoon and horn players for the performance of the rather limited repertory of music available for such instrumental groups. Last night the club played the Beethoven quintet, opus 16, for piano, oboe, clarinet, horn and bassoon, a nocturne by Gabriel Faure for nine instruments, an intermezzo schersando by Charles Lefebvre for six of them, a romance and rondo by Mozart for oboe and piano, and a Raff sinfonietta.

The literature for wind instruments is small, because of the inescapable fact that the tone of an oboe, a flute, a clarinet, a bassoon, a horn, a trumpet, soon becomes monotonous, except when heard against a large background of orchestral sound.

In the short and colorful pieces by Faure and Lefebvre, the effect was wholly delightful, because a special result was aimed at, and the thought was admirably suited to its vehicle.

The Beethoven quintet was frankly dull. The work was not only early—almost Mozartian or even Haydnish—but it was also non-specialistic; a string quartet and the piano could as appropriately have interpreted it. The actual performances of the club left nothing to be desired.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
HEBREW STANDARD
NEW YORK
DEC 22 1905

M. Vincent d'Indy, before leaving these hospitable shores, expressed the opinion that "American audiences were undiscriminating." The distinguished French musician was probably a little embittered by the woeful but quite justifiable lack of appreciation shown by the critical assemblage at the last concert of the Kneisel Quartet. Two of his quartets were on the programme—one of them (opus 45), a well-made piece of music, fashioned after approved classical models, whose thematic contents, however, exhibited not much originality. The other (opus 7) was unmelodious, full of distressing dissonances, and showing at every point a straining for crass effects. The audience listened with American patience and politeness, and even in a perfunctory sort of way called out the composer. But the delightful Haydn quartet which followed—how rapt was the attention, how unmistakable the pleasure, how spontaneous and, in a measure, demonstrative the applause!

Really, if I did not know how kind and good a man is Franz Kneisel, I should charge him with the utmost cruelty in placing after d'Indy—Haydn.

NEW YORK COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER
DEC 20 1905

Musical No

IT was a neglected corner of c... music that the Longy Club of ... bade one enter last evening ... concert in Mendelssohn Hall. ... of accomplished players from the ... choirs of the Boston Symphony Orche... has for its aim the presentation of co... positions for wind instruments, with or without piano, which so rarely can find a place in ordinary concert or recital programmes. The public is accustomed to hearing flute, clarinet, or oboe as another voice or another hue in that many-voiced and many-hued instrument, the full orchestra. It does not associate them with extended solos, or such combinations as quartets, quintets, and the like. Musical literature, nevertheless, is rich in works for wind instruments alone. The eighteenth century composers in particular affected these combinations, and modern French writers, in their search for novelty, have copied the ancients. The mere fact that such men as Bach, Händel, and Mozart wrote for these instruments is enough to justify the existence of an organization like the Longy Club.

The programme of yesterday's concert opened with Beethoven's quintet, op. 16, for piano, oboe, clarinet, horn, and bassoon. It is a graceful work of the young Beethoven, showing strongly the influence of Mozart, and was gracefully, if a little tamely, played. More telling in performance were a modern French nocturne by Fauré and intermezzo by Lefebvre, for wind instruments without piano. Next came the romance and the rondo from Mozart's concerto in E-flat for oboe. The music was only an additional proof that Mozart, more perhaps than any other composer, had the faculty of stamping with genius anything that he touched, and the performance by Mr. Longy, admirably accompanied at the piano by Mr. de Voto, was a revelation of what the plangent-toned oboe can accomplish as a solo instrument. Finally came a sinfonietta by Raff for ten wind instruments. One could have wagered that something of the sort would come to light amid the miscellaneous and interminable outpouring of Raff, and that once found it would turn out to be, in spite of charming moments, as a whole garrulous and often trivial. And it was just in this fluent tune making of Raff, exquisitely though it was played, that the sugary voices of flute and clarinet became a little cloying, and one realized in the absence of stringed instruments, as never before in their presence, that they, after all, are the sonorous heart of the orchestra.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
NEWS
BUFFALO, N. Y.
DEC 24 1905

Symphony Concerts.

Symphony concerts with that glorious organization, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and with that admirable organization, the Pittsburg orchestra, offer musical attractions to Buffalo that are of special value. The Boston orchestra will come here February 19 to give a concert that represents an achievement of perfection that can hardly be equalled by any organization in the world.

The next concert of the Pittsburg orchestra will occur January 17 and the soloist will be Mr. Emil Paur, who is not only a conductor of ability, but also a pianist of reputation.

It is a matter of musical rejoicing that Buffalo is so well favored this season and our music lovers probably appreciate our fine advantages this season.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
TELEGRAPH
PHILA., PA
DEC 23 1905

Mr. Gericke will conduct the third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, January 8. The soloist will be Timothee Adamowski, one of the violinists of the orchestra, who is a brilliant performer and a thorough artist. He will probably play a concerto entirely new to this city.

shed: London, 1881; New York, [illegible]

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
Bulletin
PHILA., PA

Mr. Gericke will return to his place as conducter of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at its third concert in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, January 8. The soloist is to be Timothee Adamowski, one of the most brilliant violinists of the orchestra. It is likely that Adamowski will present a concerto entirely new to Philadelphia.

From HARPER'S WEEKLY.
Address NEW YORK CITY.
Date DEC 23 1905

IT is generally assumed that the modern French school of composers—the "younger Frenchmen" represented by Debussy, Fauré, D'Indy, Dukas, De Bréville, and others—depend for the distinctivity of their effects upon a radical departure from the traditional musical designs: that, aside from their indifference to the established harmonic and melodic codes, they are experimentalists, as well, so far as their form is concerned. The recent visit of M. Vincent D'Indy,—the leader of the school,—and his performances with the Boston Symphony Orchestra of representative works by himself and his associates, have served, in a measure, to dispel that belief. M. D'Indy has made it known in various ways that he and his colleagues are not the ruthless iconoclasts they are commonly supposed to be. A precise statement of the case would require the use of strictly musical terms; but the interesting point, as set forth by M. D'Indy, is that he and his confrères, instead of disdaining the constructive principles of the older music, claim to be but perpetuators of the traditions established by the classicists. M. D'Indy claims, for example, that the basic form of his extraordinary B-flat symphony, which has proved so formidable a stumbling-block to many of its hearers, is, in its fundamental design, as simple and comprehensible as if the date of its composition were 1791 instead of 1903; and that its novelty of effect proceeds from the new harmonic, melodic, and orchestral substance which is superimposed upon old and familiar forms. Without discussing the necessity of establishing such a position as M. D'Indy and his colleagues assume, its statement from so authoritative a source sets the work of the school in a new light. They are to be regarded, it seems, not as iconoclasts, but as innovators who, with a reverent yet indulgent eye upon the past, seek to enlarge the expressive potencies of music along what are called "legitimate" lines. The matter is important mainly for the illumination which it casts upon the aesthetic convictions of M. D'Indy and his fellows. It may be conceded that there is no reason why they should not if they choose, adopt the structural principles of Haydn, Mozart, and Rameau, instead of inventing, after the manner of Richard Strauss, a form of their own. The point to discuss is the essential value of their achievements, from the standpoint of poetic eloquence and sheer musical inspiration.

It may be said at once that of the seven composers whose works were exploited by M. D'Indy, he himself and his young colleague, Claude Debussy, stand out conspicuously as by far the most individual and important of the group. Even the admirable and acknowledged father of the school, César Franck, so far as he was represented on M. D'Indy's programmes, suffered the general eclipse. Of M. D'Indy it may be said that he disclosed no phase of his personality that was not indicated in the estimate of his art that has already been given in this place. He demonstrated anew his fine and unimpeachable musicianship, his complete sincerity of purpose, the restraint and dignity of his musical thought. His B-flat symphony grows in power and impressiveness with each hearing: it is a noble and individual work, though it lacks something of spontaneity, and it seldom plumbs the profounder emotional depths. His "Istar," an earlier work, is a brilliant example of constructive ingenuity, and it has moments of rare eloquence. "Saugefleurie,"—a "légende d'après un conte de Robert de Bonnières,"—a still earlier work, is built upon models that have long since lost their power of persuasiveness.

The works by which Debussy was represented were not new to New York: they were the two orchestral "Nocturnes," "Nuages" and "Fêtes," produced last winter by Mr. Walter Damrosch, and their repetition served to confirm the impression formed at that time. This is music of singular and haunting beauty, as subtly imagined as it is ingeniously and exquisitely contrived. M. D'Indy presented also these works, of which the last three were new to New York: Gabriel Fauré's suite, "Pelléas et Mélisande"; Paul Dukas's brilliant and exhilarating scherzo, "L'Apprenti Sorcier" (after the ballad of Goethe); Ernest Chausson's symphony in B-flat (opus 20); a movement from César Franck's symphonic poem, "Psyché," and a "Chant funèbre" by Albéric Magnard, a pupil of D'Indy.

Of the new works, the Chausson symphony made the most definite appeal; yet, despite its sombre power and its occasional beauty, its debt to such masters as Wagner and Tschaikowsky is obvious enough to invalidate its essential worth. The "Psyché et Eros" of Franck is sonorous and effective, but lacking in distinction and saliency of ideas. Of M. Magnard's "Chant funèbre," the kindest thing that can be said is that it would better have been left unperformed.

From ALFRED
Address
Date

Boston Symphony Quartet

THE APPEARANCE of Sigismund Stojowski and the Boston Symphony Quartet each for the first time in this city made of the concert at the New Willard on Monday an important musical event in our history. Stojowski, in the double role of composer and pianist, was unassuming of manner, and undoubtedly this lack of ostentation counted in his favor with the audience. His Sonata for Violin and Piano in C Major, op. 13, is couched in a refined and intellectual style which has the advantage of being not too deep for the average comprehension. In the "Andante Maestoso" the solemnly religious theme was carried in one section by an accompaniment in sixths not unlike the familiar mode of "Kammenoi Ostrow." Richness of ideas and versatility in the mode of expression, no less than an unusual command of the intricacies of modulation, were remembrable qualities of Mr. Stojowski's composition. Schubert's familiar Quartet in D, in which Schubert's "Death and the Maiden" song forms the foundation of the second movement, and the Beethoven Quartet op. 18, No. 6, completed the program.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From AMERICAN HEBREW NEW YORK
Address
Date

The visit of Vincent D'Indy, who recently returned to France, after spending some time here as propagandist of the modern French music, has evoked much comment upon the methods of D'Indy and his fellow composers of the school in question, and it cannot be said that the general tenor of the criticisms are favorable.

* * * * * *

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
HEBREW STANDARD NEW YORK CITY
DEC 22 1905

* * *

The Boston Symphony Quartet, composed of Prof. Willy Hess (first violin), Otto Roth (second violin), Emile Ferir (viola) and Heinrich Warnke (cello), announces three evenings of chamber music at Mendelssohn Hall on January 2, February 6 and March 7. Among the assisting artists are Mr. Sigismond Stojowski (pianist), Miss Susan Metcalfe (soprano), and Mme. Olga Samaroff (pianist).

[138]

NEW YORK CITY.
DEC 20 1905

THREE CONCERTS OF AS MANY KINDS

Wind Instruments, Strings and an Orchestra as Rival Attractions of a Busy Evening.

Three concerts, every one excellent in its way, divided the attention of music-seekers last evening. The Longy Club played chamber music for wind instruments at Mendelssohn Hall, the Flonzaley Quartet gave a programme for strings at Carnegie Chamber Music Hall, and the New York Symphony Orchestra, under Walter Damrosch's leadership, ended its Carnegie Hall list with Tschaikowsky's "Symphonie Pathetique," after Raoul Pugno had been heard in the symphony variations for piano and orchestra by Cesar Franck, and Miss Bessie Abbott had repeated the Mozart aria and the songs she had sung on Sunday afternoon.

Mr. Longy, who is the first oboe of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has gathered from that band a coterie of flute, oboe, clarinet, bassoon and horn players for the performance of the rather limited repertory of music available for such instrumental groups. Last night the club played the Beethoven quintet, opus 16, for piano, oboe, clarinet, horn and bassoon, a nocturne by Gabriel Faure for nine instruments, an intermezzo scherzando by Charles Lefebvre for six of them, a romance and rondo by Mozart for oboe and piano, and a Raff sinfonietta.

The literature for wind instruments is small, because of the inescapable fact that the tone of an oboe, a flute, a clarinet, a bassoon, a horn, a trumpet, soon becomes monotonous, except when heard against a large background of orchestral sound.

In the short and colorful pieces by Faure and Lefebvre, the effect was wholly delightful, because a special result was aimed at, and the thought was admirably suited to its vehicle.

The Beethoven quintet was frankly dull. The work was not only early—almost Mozartian or even Haydnish—but it was also non-specialistic; a string quartet and the piano could as appropriately have interpreted it. The actual performances of the club left nothing to be desired.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
HEBREW. STANDARD NEW YORK
DEC 22 1905

M. Vincent d'Indy, before leaving these hospitable shores, expressed the opinion that "American audiences were undiscriminating." The distinguished French musician was probably a little embittered by the woeful but quite justifiable lack of appreciation shown by the critical assemblage at the last concert of the Kneisel Quartet. Two of his quartets were on the programme—one of them (opus 45), a well-made piece of music, fashioned after approved classical models, whose thematic contents, however, exhibited not much originality. The other (opus 7) was unmelodious, full of distressing dissonances, and showing at every point a straining for crass effects. The audience listened with American patience and politeness, and even in a perfunctory sort of way called out the composer. But the delightful Haydn quartet which followed—how rapt was the attention, how unmistakable the pleasure, how spontaneous and, in a measure, demonstrative the applause!

Really, if I did not know how kind and good a man is Franz Kneisel, I should charge him with the utmost cruelty in placing after d'Indy—Haydn.

* * *

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
TELEGRAPH
Address

Mr. Gericke will conduct the third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, January 8. The soloist will be Timothee Adamowski, one of the violinists of the orchestra, who is a brilliant performer and a thorough artist. He will probably play a concerto entirely new to this city.

shed: London, 1881; New York, 1

NEW YORK COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER
DEC 20 1905

Musical Notes.

IT was a neglected corner of chamber music that the Longy Club of Boston bade one enter last evening at its concert in Mendelssohn Hall. This club of accomplished players from the wind choirs of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has for its aim the presentation of compositions for wind instruments, with or without piano, which so rarely can find a place in ordinary concert or recital programmes. The public is accustomed to hearing flute, clarinet, or oboe as another voice or another hue in that many-voiced and many-hued instrument, the full orchestra. It does not associate them with extended solos, or such combinations as quartets, quintets, and the like. Musical literature, nevertheless, is rich in works for wind instruments alone. The eighteenth century composers in particular affected these combinations, and modern French writers, in their search for novelty, have copied the ancients. The mere fact that such men as Bach, Händel, and Mozart wrote for these instruments is enough to justify the existence of an organization like the Longy Club.

The programme of yesterday's concert opened with Beethoven's quintet, op. 16, for piano, oboe, clarinet, horn, and bassoon. It is a graceful work of the young Beethoven, showing strongly the influence of Mozart, and was gracefully, if a little tamely, played. More telling in performance were a modern French nocturne by Fauré and intermezzo by Lefebvre, for wind instruments without piano. Next came the romance and the rondo from Mozart's concerto in E-flat for oboe. The music was only an additional proof that Mozart, more perhaps than any other composer, had the faculty of stamping with genius anything that he touched, and the performance by Mr. Longy, admirably accompanied at the piano by Mr. de Voto, was a revelation of what the plangent-toned oboe can accomplish as a solo instrument. Finally came a sinfonietta by Raff for ten wind instruments. One could have wagered that something of the sort would come to light amid the miscellaneous and interminable outpouring of Raff, and that once found it would turn out to be, in spite of charming moments, as a whole garrulous and often trivial. And it was just in this fluent tune making of Raff, exquisitely though it was played, that the sugary voices of flute and clarinet became a little cloying, and one realized in the absence of stringed instruments, as never before in their presence, that they, after all, are the sonorous heart of the orchestra.

—

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the
NEWS
BUFFALO, N. Y.
DEC 24 1905

Symphony Concerts.

Symphony concerts with that glorious organization, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and with that admirable organization, the Pittsburg orchestra, offer musical attractions to Buffalo that are of special value. The Boston orchestra will come here February 19 to give a concert that represents an achievement of perfection that can hardly be equalled by any organization in the world.

The next concert of the Pittsburg orchestra will occur January 17 and the soloist will be Mr. Emil Paur, who is not only a conductor of ability, but also a pianist of reputation.

It is a matter of musical rejoicing that Buffalo is so well favored this season and our music lovers probably appreciate our fine advantages this season.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the

—o—

Mr. Gericke will return to his place as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at its third concert in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, January 8. The soloist is to be Timothee Adamowski, one of the most brilliant violinists of the orchestra. It is likely that Mr. Adamowski will present a concerto entirely new to Philadelphia.

From ... D. C.
Address ...
Date DEC 23 190[illegible]

Among the musical people who attended the recent chamber music concerts at the New Willard were Mr. and Mrs. H. H. Freeman, Mr. and Mrs. E. H. Droop, Mr. and Mrs. Carl Droop, Mr. and Mrs. Ernest Lent, Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Evans Greene, Mr. and Mrs. William Bruce King, Miss Bertie Thompson, Mr. S. M. Fabian, Miss Mary A. Cryder, Mr. Anton Kaspar, Mr. and Mrs. Stoddard, Mrs. Painter, Mr. F. P. Reeside, Mr. and Mrs. T. Arthur Smith, Miss Tuckermann, Mr. Arthur Mayo, Mr. Josef Kaspar, Mr. and Mrs. Otto Torney Simon, Miss Clara Drew, and Dr. Franklin Howe.

Mr. W. L. Tomlins, of Chicago, gave two lectures on music at the Franklin School last week last week, and it is hoped that he may be prevailed upon to come to Washington each month if a class of 150 pupils can be arranged.

Miss Clara Drew gave a Christmas Song Cycle by Peter Cornelius on Wednesday afternoon at the Washington College of Music. It is said that this has been presented only once before in this country. Miss Drew promises a pupils' recital in January.

Julien Tiersot, librarian of the Paris Conservatoire, will give two lectures, illustrated with song, at the Hubbard-Green Memorial Hall, under the direction of Miss Mary A. Cryder. The subject of the first, on January 11, will be "Le Chant Populaire de France." On the 12th of January, the subject will be "Le Chansons Mondain de France du 13 Siecle; Jusqu'au 18 Siecle." M. Tiersot is a composer of music and the author of the "History of Popular Songs" and other works. He was crowned by the Academie des Beaux Arts.

The brother of Campanari, the singer, is Campanari the violinist. It is the singer who appears at the coming Philadelphia Orchestra concert; and meantime the violinist has just arrived from Italy and will also be heard in Washington this season.

Mr. Oscar Gareissen will begin a series of ten lectures in January on the origin, use, and development of the opera. These lectures will be illustrated with music and are certain to be interesting and instructive.

Miss Marie von Unschuld has just returned from a tour in the North. She gave a recital at Providence and also at New York, where she has return engagements.

On Christmas eve, at Trinity Church, Mr. Theodore Apple will sing "While Shepherds Watch," a new composition still in manuscript, by Oscar Franklin Comstock. Mr. Comstock's next studio recital will take place on January 9th.

Mme. Genevra Johnstone-Bishop will give scenes from several of the different operas in costume some time in the spring. At the pupils' recital given by Mme. Bishop Thursday of last week the pupils sang an unusual number of difficult arias from the standard operas in many different languages. Miss Katherine Ahlefeld, Miss Genevra Johnstone, and Miss Mary King did great credit to their teacher; the Misses Harrison showed marked improvement; Miss Mamie Boggass sang, with poise and control, and in Miss Agnes Manning's singing were traces of much earnest devotion to her art. Miss Sarah Schneider, Miss Hayes, Mrs. Edith Johnson, Miss Deborah M. Wood, Miss Narcissa O'Bannon, and Miss Anna F. Mattern also demonstrated many excellent qualities.

The Stieff pianos are used at two of the well-known schools of the city, the National Park Seminary and the Mount Vernon Seminary.

Some of the Christmas music and musical books at Droop's are more than ordinarily attractive. There is a collection of "Folk Songs of Many Nations," edited and annotated by Louis C. Elson. In many instances a history of the song is printed on the same page with the music of it.

Mr. Oscar G. Sonneck's new work dealing with the early history of music in America is another attractive book to be found at Droop's. "The Study of the History of Music," by Edward Dickinson, and a collection of songs by some American composers, in four separate volumes, are other new things to be found there.

At the third Boston Symphony concert in the New National Theater on Tuesday afternoon, January 9, the soloist will be Prof. Willy Hess, concert-master of the orchestra. Prof. Hess is one of the few really great violinists of the world, and his success in this country has been exceeded by none. Mr. Gericke will conduct.

The Representative Democratic Paper

SYMPHONY CONCERT

With Mrs. Emma Eames Story as the soloist, and two compositions new to Boston concert goers, last night's Symphony concert was more than usually attractive.

Mme. Eames' two selections were the scene "El Parte" and rondo, "Per Pieta," from the second act of Mozart's opera, "Cosi fan Tutte," and Schubert's song with orchestra, "Die Allmacht."

In both numbers the singer was at her very best. Mme. Eames was in splendid voice last night. The Mozart number was given with faultless vocal technique and with admirable phrasing, and the Schubert song, less showy, with praiseworthy breadth of expression. The greeting given the singer was most cordial.

The symphony was by Amherst Webber, a contemporary Englishman, and was heard for the first time by the Boston orchestra. It is a composition well worth a hearing, although far from a masterwork. The first movement is extremely conventional in form, but labored and not always intelligible.

The andante is a romance with splendid moments and abundant feeling. The scherzo is dainty, well constructed, and although in the conventional form, novel in its effects. The finale is the best movement of all and shows musicianship of a high order. Mr. Webber's instrumentation is admirable throughout the symphony.

The other new composition was Elgar's concert overture, "In the South," a nature study inspired by Italian skies and fields. It has rarely beautiful episodes of the pastoral sort, is well scored and always musicianly. Its chief defect is prolixity and lack of continuity.

The orchestral feature of the programme was a splendid performance of Tschaikowsky's fantasia, "Francesca da Rimini." Perhaps it was the fertile imagination, brilliant scenery and intense power of this notable composition that made Mr. Elgar's idyll seem dull by comparison, although comparison of two works so utterly divergent is of course, unfair. But Tschaikowsky's power is bound to dim the glories of any but giants of his stature. The "Francesca," with its mighty contradictions of mysterism and human poetry, love and suffering, joy and sorrow, must rank as one of the greatest works of the great Russian. The performance was wholly worthy of Mr. Gericke and his men. It held the audience breathless from the first bar to the last, and at the end the applause was the most fervent given to any number on the programme.

BOSTON AS THE MUSICAL CENTRE

Leadership in This Art, Long Maintained, Is Not Likely to Be Lost, as Men Engaged in It Are Progressive.

SYMPHONY AND THE CONSERVATORY OF MUSIC

Piano and Organ Manufacturers Keep Pace with the Demand, Which Is Now for Good Instruments Only.

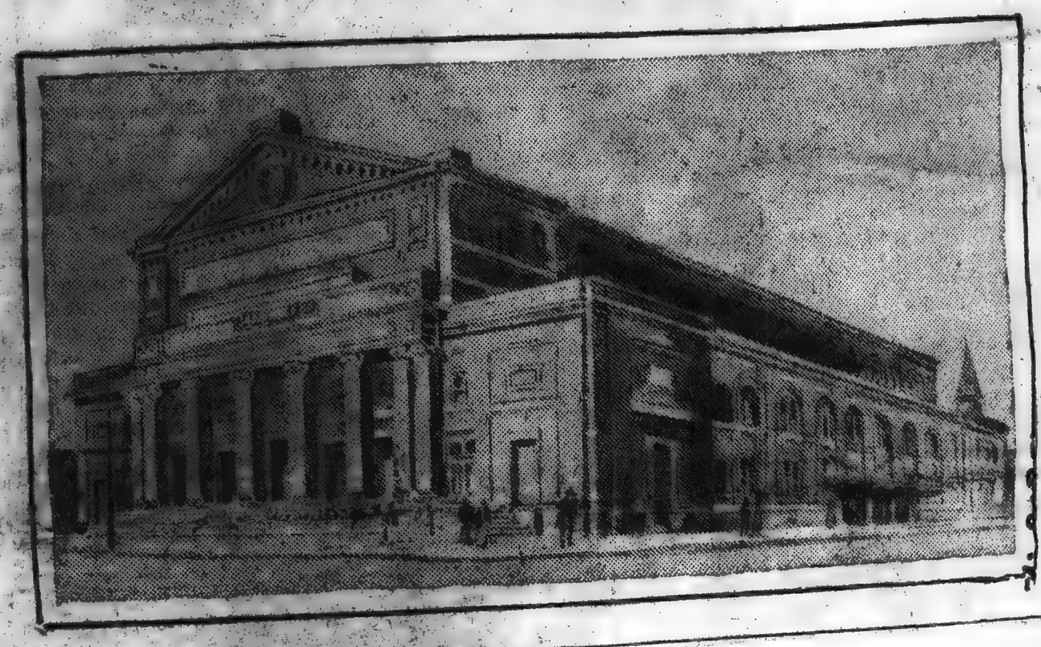
BOSTON has long had the reputation of being the musical centre of America, and the progress in all branches of music in the last year or two gives evidence that the leadership in this art is not to pass away soon. With the Symphony orchestra and the New England Conservatory of Music in the city, it is only natural that there should be also a strong list of firms to supply musical instruments for these players, and for the army of persons interested in music.

The time was when it was almost a mark of wealth to have a piano in a house. That day passed a long time ago. The presence of a piano today not only fails to be proof of any great wealth on the part of the householder, but the absence of one is more likely to indicate lack of general prosperity, though there are families, of course, in which there is no great fondness for music for music's sake.

The piano manufacturer of today turns out a highly efficient instrument in a period of time which, even as recently as 10 years ago, would have seemed marvellous. For a time there was a low grade of pianos in demand, but recently there has been a call for the best instruments at popular prices to be had. The day of the essentially cheap piano is gone.

In many parts of the United States there are almost as many pianos as there are thriving families. The organ is still popular in many places, and the traveller on many a country road at night has heard the strains of a small house organ playing the old hymns and the songs of his schoolboy days. But in the United States the piano is the king of instruments, and there is no indication that any other instrument will ever take its place. All sorts of new musical devices come and go, but the piano is likely to go on forever.

SYMPHONY HALL, BOSTON.



IMES.
WASHINGTON, D.
DEC 24 190[illegible]

...on Symphony.

At the third Boston Symphony concert in the New National Theater on Tuesday afternoon, January 9, the soloist will be Prof. Willy Hess, concert master of the orchestra. Prof. Hess is one of the few really great violinists of the world, and his success in this country has been exceeded by none. Mr. Gericke will conduct.

NEW
...ress BUFFALO, N. Y.
DEC 24 1905

...the leading musical events for the ... part of the year will be the appearances of Kubelik, of Marteau and ...ky of the Boston Symphony ...ra, of the Pittsburg orchestra, ... the Ladies' Irish choir.

Boston Sunday Globe.
SUNDAY, DEC 31, 1905.

Emma Eames With Symphony Orchestra.

Gadski In Concert Tomorrow—Reisenauer's Recitals.

Varied Announcements of a Busy Week.

Amherst Webber's C minor symphony and Sir Edward Elgar's overture, "In the South," were the orchestral novelties of the 10th Symphony program. Mme Emma Eames was the soloist in vocal compositions by Mozart and Schubert. Tochaikowsky's "Francesca da Rimini" fantasia completed the list of selections. Mr Webber is a young English musician who was here a few weeks ago as accompanist with Mme Eames' concert company, and several of his smaller compositions, mainly songs, have been received with favor in this country. The symphony played by our orchestra is new to this country and is Mr Webber's first attempt at a work on so large a scale. It is in four short movements and, according to the au-

...lines that a synopsis would be superfluous." The symphony is a creditable piece of work for so young a musician, and although there are frequent thin places in the instrumentation, the scoring generally is effective. There is not much in the first movement that indicates originality in ideas or musical expression; but in the second movement the treatment of the cello part is worthy of special mention, and in fact the string scoring throughout shows considerable skill. The scherzo is rather vague in form, and the finale is excellent not only in outline but in development and instrumentation. Mr Webber has "told his story" pleasingly and is to be congratulated for his good work. The performance by the orchestra was satisfactory, and after each movement the applause was very hearty.

Elgar's overture, "In the South," is a bright and cheery piece of music, suggesting balmy skies, pastoral joys, shepherds and their flocks, some turbulent episodes and a generally exuberant spirit which is illustrated by ever varying tempos and combinations of instruments that make up a brilliant descriptive work. It is delightfully free in form and the elaborate score is filled with exquisite "surprises," given to the different contingents of the orchestra. The orchestra played as if inspired and closed the program in a glorious manner amid showers of plaudits. The somber atmosphere of the "Francesca da Rimini" fantasia was artistically revealed in the interpretation by Mr Gericke's forces.

Mme Eames was in better voice than when she appeared here a few weeks ago and her two contributions showed that the great artist hardly did herself justice at her former recital. She sang the Mozart aria from his almost forgotten opera, "Cosi fan Tutte," with beautiful expression and clarity of tone, although somewhat lacking in warmth. In Schubert's "Allmacht" she was not so satisfactory, for Mme Eames' voice lacks the dramatic quality required to make this song impressive. Aside from that her performance was marked by ...most flawless technique ... was given dem... appreciation

Prof Willy Hess will be the soloist at the concerts this week, the last concerts before the third monthly trip. He will play Beethoven's concerto for the violin. The other works to be performed are Rubin Goldmark's "Hiawatha" overture, Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel" and Brahms' second symphony.

BOSTON SYMPHONY QUARTET.

The third concert of the Boston symphony quartet will be given in Jordan hall tomorrow evening at 8 o'clock. The assisting artists will be Mr George Proctor, pianist, and Mr Carl Barth, cellist. The program promises to be particularly attractive. All three works to be played are familiar to lovers of chamber music and are well established favorites. The concerts of this quartet grow continually in favor with Boston's music lovers, and the audiences which attend are gratifyingly large. The program for tomorrow night will be as follows: Schumann, quartet in A major, op 41, No. 3; St Sens, trio for piano, violin and 'cello in F major, op 18; Schubert, quintet in C major, op 163.

From _____

Address _____

Date _____

Among the musical people who attended the recent chamber music concerts at the New Willard were Mr. and Mrs. H. H. Freeman, Mr. and Mrs. E. H. Droop, Mr. and Mrs. Carl Droop, Mr. and Mrs. Ernest Lent, Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Evans Greene, Mr. and Mrs. William Bruce King, Miss Bertie Thompson, Mr. S. M. Fabian, Miss Mary A. Cryder, Mr. Anton Kaspar, Mr. and Mrs. Stoddard, Mrs. Painter, Mr. F. P. Reeside, Mr. and Mrs. T. Arthur Smith, Miss Tuckermann, Mr. Arthur Mayo, Mr. Josef Kaspar, Mr. and Mrs. Otto Torney Simon, Miss Clara Drew, and Dr. Franklin Howe.

Mr. W. L. Tomlins, of Chicago, gave two lectures on music at the Franklin School last week last week, and it is hoped that he may be prevailed upon to come to Washington each month if a class of 150 pupils can be arranged.

Miss Clara Drew gave a Christmas Song Cycle by Peter Cornelius on Wednesday afternoon at the Washington College of Music. It is said that this has been presented only once before in this country. Miss Drew promises a pupils' recital in January.

Julien Tiersot, librarian of the Paris Conservatoire, will give two lectures, illustrated with song, at the Hubbard-Green Memorial Hall, under the direction of Miss Mary A. Cryder. The subject of the first, on January 11, will be "Le Chant Populaire de France." On the 12th of January, the subject will be "Le Chansons Mondain de France du 13 Siecle; Jusqu'au 18 Siecle." M. Tiersot is a composer of music and the author of the "History of Popular Songs" and other works. He was crowned by the Academie des Beaux Arts.

The brother of Campanari, the singer, is Campanari the violinist. It is the singer who appears at the coming Philadelphia Orchestra concert; and meantime the violinist has just arrived from Italy and will also be heard in Washington this season.

Mr. Oscar Gareissen will begin a series of ten lectures in January on the origin, use, and development of the opera. These lectures will be illustrated with music and are certain to be interesting and instructive.

Miss Marie von Unschuld has just returned from a tour in the North. She gave a recital at Providence and also at New York, where she has return engagements.

On Christmas eve, at Trinity Church, Mr. Theodore Apple will sing "While Shepherds Watch," a new composition still in manuscript, by Oscar Franklin Comstock. Mr. Comstock's next studio recital will take place on January 9th.

Mme. Genevra Johnstone-Bishop will give scenes from several of the different operas in costume some time in the spring. At the pupils' recital given by Mme. Bishop Thursday of last week the pupils sang an unusual number of difficult arias from the standard operas in many different languages. Miss Katherine Ahlefeld, Miss Genevra Johnstone, and Miss Mary King did great credit to their teacher; the Misses Harrison showed marked improvement; Miss Mamie Boggass sang, with poise and control, and in Miss Agnes Manning's singing were traces of much earnest devotion to her art. Miss Sarah Schneider, Miss Hayes, Mrs. Edith Johnson, Miss Deborah M. Wood, Miss Narcissa O'Bannon, and Miss Anna F. Mattern also demonstrated many excellent qualities.

The Stieff pianos are used at two of the well-known schools of the city, the National Park Seminary and the Mount Vernon Seminary.

Some of the Christmas music and musical books at Droop's are more than ordinarily attractive. There is a collection of "Folk Songs of Many Nations," edited and annotated by Louis C. Elson. In many instances a history of the song is printed on the same page with the music of it.

Mr. Oscar G. Sonneck's new work dealing with the early history of music in America is another attractive book to be found at Droop's. "The Study of the History of Music," by Edward Dickinson, and a collection of songs by some American composers, in four separate volumes, are other new things to be found there.

At the third Boston Symphony concert in the New National Theater on Tuesday afternoon, January 9, the soloist will be Prof. Willy Hess, concert-master of the orchestra. Prof. Hess is one of the few really great violinists of the world, and his success in this country has been exceeded by none. Mr. Gericke will conduct.

The Boston Post

The Representative Democratic Paper

SYMPHONY CONCERT

With Mrs. Emma Eames Story as the soloist, and two compositions new to Boston concert goers, last night's Symphony concert was more than usually attractive.

Mme. Eames' two selections were the scene "Ei Parte" and rondo, "Per Pieta," from the second act of Mozart's opera, "Cosi fan Tutte," and Schubert's song with orchestra, "Die Allmacht."

In both numbers the singer was at her very best. Mme. Eames was in splendid voice last night. The Mozart number was given with faultless vocal technique and with admirable phrasing, and the Schubert song, less showy, with praiseworthy breadth of expression. The greeting given the singer was most cordial.

The symphony was by Amherst Webber, a contemporary Englishman, and was heard for the first time by the Boston orchestra. It is a composition well worth a hearing, although far from a masterwork. The first movement is extremely conventional in form, but labored and not always intelligible.

The andante is a romance with splendid moments and abundant feeling. The scherzo is dainty, well constructed, and although in the conventional form, novel in its effects. The finale is the best movement of all and shows musicianship of a high order. Mr. Webber's instrumentation is admirable throughout the symphony.

The other new composition was Elgar's concert overture, "In the South," a nature study inspired by Italian skies and fields. It has rarely beautiful episodes of the pastoral sort, is well scored and always musicianly. Its chief defect is prolixity and lack of continuity.

The orchestral feature of the programme was a splendid performance of Tschaikowsky's fantasia, "Francesca da Rimini." Perhaps it was the fertile imagination, brilliant scenery and intense power of this notable composition that made Mr. Elgar's idyll seem dull by comparison, although comparison of two works so utterly divergent is of course, unfair. But Tschaikowsky's power is bound to dim the glories of any but giants of his stature. The "Francesca," with its mighty contradictions of mysterism and human poetry, love and suffering, joy and sorrow, must rank as one of the greatest works of the great Russian. The performance was wholly worthy of Mr. Gericke and his men. It held the audience breathless from the first bar to the last, and at the end the applause was the most fervent given to any number on the programme.

BOSTON AS THE MUSICAL CENTRE

Leadership in This Art, Long Maintained, Is Not Likely to Be Lost, as Men Engaged in It Are Progressive.

SYMPHONY AND THE CONSERVATORY OF MUSIC

Piano and Organ Manufacturers Keep Pace with the Demand, Which Is Now for Good Instruments Only.

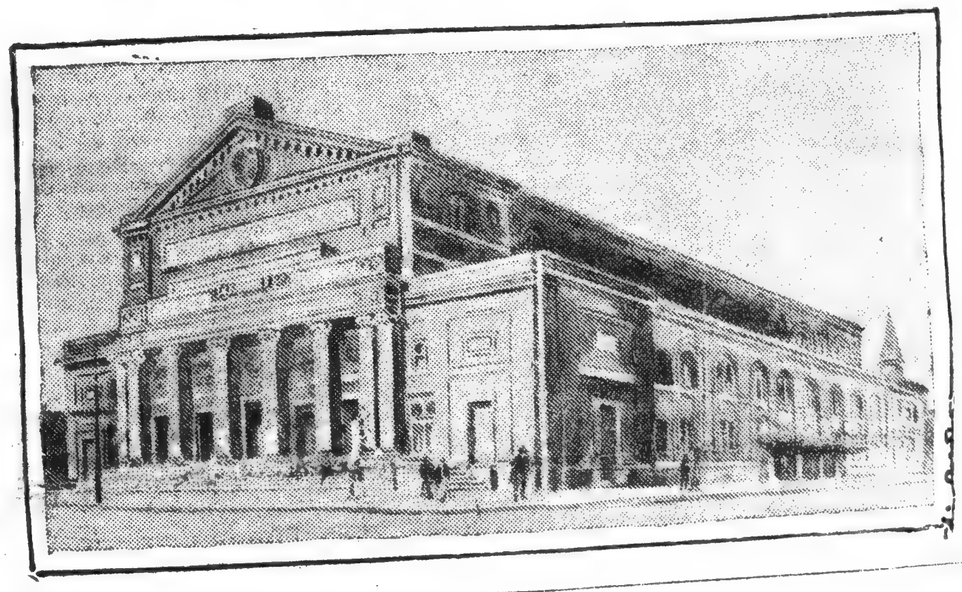
BOSTON has long had the reputation of being the musical centre of America, and the progress in all branches of music in the last year or two gives evidence that the leadership in this art is not to pass away soon. With the Symphony orchestra and the New England Conservatory of Music in the city, it is only natural that there should be also a strong list of firms to supply musical instruments for those players, and for the army of persons interested in music.

The time was when it was almost a mark of wealth to have a piano in a house. That day passed a long time ago. The presence of a piano today not only fails to be proof of any great wealth on the part of the householder, but the absence of one is more likely to indicate lack of general prosperity, though there are families, of course, in which there is no great fondness for music for music's sake.

The piano manufacturer of today turns out a highly efficient instrument in a period of time which, even as recently as 10 years ago, would have seemed marvellous. For a time there was a low grade of pianos in demand, but recently there has been a call for the best instruments at popular prices to be had. The day of the essentially cheap piano is gone.

In many parts of the United States there are almost as many pianos as there are thriving families. The organ is still popular in many places, and the traveller on many a country road at night has heard the strains of a small house organ playing the old hymns and the songs of his schoolboy days. But in the United States the piano is the king of instruments, and there is no indication that any other instrument will ever take its place. All sorts of new musical devices come and go, but the piano is likely to go on forever.

SYMPHONY HALL, BOSTON.



IMES

WASHINGTON, D.

Boston Symphony.

At the third Boston Symphony concert in the New National Theater on Tuesday afternoon, January 9, the soloist will be Prof. Willy Hess, concert master of the orchestra. Prof. Hess is one of the few really great violinists of the world, and his success in this country has been exceeded by none. Mr. Gericke will conduct.

NEW

BUFFALO, N. Y.

DEC 24 1905

The leading musical events for the early part of the year will be the appearances of Kubelik, of Marteau and Gerardy of the Boston Symphony orchestra, of the Pittsburg orchestra, and of the Ladies' Irish choir.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, DEC 31, 1905.

Emma Eames With Symphony Orchestra.

Gadski in Concert Tomorrow—Reisenauer's Recitals.

Varied Announcements of a Busy Week.

Amherst Webber's C minor symphony and Sir Edward Elgar's overture, "In the South," were the orchestral novelties of the 10th Symphony program. Mme Emma Eames was the soloist in vocal compositions by Mozart and Schubert. Tochaikowsky's "Francesca da Rimini" fantasia completed the list of selections. Mr Webber is a young English musician who was here a few weeks ago as accompanist with Mme Eames' concert company, and several of his smaller compositions, mainly songs, have been received with favor in this country. The symphony played by our orchestra is new to this country and is Mr Webber's first attempt at a work on so large a scale. It is in four short movements and, according to the author, "is written so much on traditional lines that a synopsis would be superfluous." The symphony is a creditable piece of work for so young a musician, and although there are frequent thin places in the instrumentation, the scoring generally is effective. There is not much in the first movement that indicates originality in ideas or musical expression; but in the second movement the treatment of the cello part is worthy of special mention, and in fact the string scoring throughout shows considerable skill. The scherzo is rather vague in form, and the finale is excellent not only in outline but in development and instrumentation. Mr Webber has "told his story" pleasingly and is to be congratulated for his good work. The performance by the orchestra was satisfactory, and after each movement the applause was very hearty.

Elgar's overture, "In the South," is a bright and cheery piece of music, suggesting balmy skies, pastoral joys, shepherds and their flocks, some turbulent episodes and a generally exuberant spirit which is illustrated by ever varying tempos and combinations of instruments that make up a brilliant descriptive work. It is delightfully free in form and the elaborate score is filled with exquisite "surprises," given to the different contingents of the orchestra. The orchestra played as if inspired and closed the program in a glorious manner amid showers of plaudits. The somber atmosphere of the "Francesca da Rimini" fantasia was artistically revealed in the interpretation by Mr Gericke's forces.

Mme Eames was in better voice than when she appeared here a few weeks ago and her two contributions showed that the great artist hardly did herself justice at her former recital. She sang the Mozart aria from his almost forgotten opera, "Cosi fan Tutte," with beautiful expression and clarity of tone, although somewhat lacking in warmth. In Schubert's "Allmacht" she was not so satisfactory, for Mme Eames' voice lacks the dramatic quality required to make this song impressive. Aside from that her performance was marked by brilliancy and an almost flawless technical finish. Mme Eames was given demonstrative evidences of appreciation

Prof Willy Hess will be the soloist at the concerts this week, the last concerts before the third monthly trip. He will play Beethoven's concerto for the violin. The other works to be performed are Rubin Goldmark's "Hiawatha" overture, Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel" and Brahms' second symphony.

BOSTON SYMPHONY QUARTET.

The third concert of the Boston symphony quartet will be given in Jordan hall tomorrow evening at 8 o'clock. The assisting artists will be Mr George Proctor, pianist, and Mr Carl Barth, cellist. The program promises to be particularly attractive. All three works to be played are familiar to lovers of chamber music and are well established favorites. The concerts of this quartet grow continually in favor with Boston's music lovers, and the audiences which attend are gratifyingly large. The program for tomorrow night will be as follows: Schumann, quartet in A major, op 41, No. 3; St Sens, trio for piano, violin and 'cello in F major, op 18; Schubert, quintet in C major, op 163.

[139]

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

Overture, "In die Natur".....Dvorak.
Pastorale from Christmas Oratorio.....Bach.
Concerto for Violin, No. 2.....Strube.
(New, First time.)
Soloist, Mr. T. Adamowski.
Symphony No. 6, "Pastoral".....Beethoven.

"One touch of nature makes the whole world kin." The concert of Saturday consisted of several touches of nature. There was nature according to Dvorak, and nature according to Beethoven, there were birds warbling in all keys and on all instruments, there was a severe thunder storm, and there were shepherds and other "happy peasantry" on the scene.

Dvorak's views of Nature had rather a picnic flavor; it was an artificial grove with a bowling alley, a village green and rustic dances that were called up to the reviewer's mind by the strongly rhythmic phrases of the overture. Yet at times a very diluted Siegfried appeared and one thought of "Waldesweben" and water. The work, in short, does not impress us as being as powerful as much other music from the same master.

The Bach Pastorale was as beautiful as ever. It was a fine chance for the woodwind to display itself, and the English horns and clarinettes were in excellent form. How gloriously refreshing, in these hysterical days, is the blessed serenity, the constant surety of Bach! The audience seemed to share the reviewer's opinion, for the simple and unaffected work was enthusiastically applauded.

Then came Mr. Strube's annual composition. It was with surprise and pleasure that we noted a change in the style of this composer. Instead of seeking frightful dissonances he presented a quite intelligible work, not devoid of melody.

There was still a sufficiency (perhaps an excess) of originality, and the ingenuity of the figure treatment in the first movement, the contrasts of the variations of the last movement and the experiments in odd rhythms, kept the auditor alert through all the measures. One can commend also the "violinistic" character of the work; it is written by a man who knows exactly what is feasible upon the solo instrument.

The second movement is the best of the composition. In this Adagio the composer is in what old Weller called "a referee," and he presents some very effective passages upon the G string in a poetic manner. These Mr. Adamowski gave in an impassioned manner. In fact, all through the work Mr. Adamowski was at his very best, and the technical difficulties with which the concerto was liberally strewn did not seem to trouble him in the least.

The cadenza of the last movement was written by Mr. Gericke and was brimful of double-stopping of difficult character. Not the slightest blur or lapse from intonation was noticeable in its performance, and the finale, in which Mr. Strube has taken a leaf out of Brahms' note-book, was a technical triumph.

But the work is not a concerto. It is really a set of violin solos with orchestral accompaniment. The soloist is in the foreground almost all the time, and the impression is anything but symphonic, which ought to be the result of a true concerto. The mere interpolation of an occasional "tutti" for the orchestra does not make a work orchestral.

It might not be fair to compare the work with the concertos of Brahms or of Beethoven, but if one places it beside even the second or third concerto of Bruch our meaning will be made clear. A true concerto is an orchestral work with a thread of solo interwoven through its fabric, not a solo with an obliging orchestra in the back-ground.

Mr. Strube conducted his own work, and both soloist and composer-conductor received an ovation at its close. It was certainly well directed, superbly played, and had many moments of charm, wherefore the enthusiasm was not misplaced.

Then we all went back to "Nature" and listened to the first important piece of "programme-music" ever written,—Beethoven's "pastoral symphony." It suddenly came upon us that the first 4 notes of this symphony are practically the same figure as the first notes of D'Indy's string quartette. Beethoven, however, does not wear them quite so threadbare as the modern Frenchman. A word of praise must be spoken for the clearness of the performance of the contrabass figure in the development.

Mr. Gericke loves the second movement of this symphony, but we cannot help finding it a little prolix. Beethoven's brook, like Tennyson's, seems to "go on forever." Nor do we care for those final birds, which are ticketed in the score, like poultry in a shop-window, and which tootle out alone, while the rest of the orchestra pauses in breathless suspense. The case is hopeless! We have had too much of Richard Strauss brandy and Franz Liszt pepper ever to care for musical gruel again.

Mr. Gericke spared not a single repeat, even giving the exposition of the first movement twice. The Scherzo was given finely, with perhaps a trifle of too much finesse in the village dance, and the storm was the most effective part of the whole work.

How much Beethoven effected with small means! The violoncellos and contrabasses against each other in unequal groups, the blare of the trombones (only the second time that they had been used in symphony) and the piping long notes of the piccolo, made a tempest that causes one instinctively to reach for his umbrella. There has been much bad weather in music since that time; Berlioz, St. Saens, Wagner, Rossini, Verdi, and a host of others have had their little thunder-storms, but none of them have eclipsed this particular hurricane.

The fact that Beethoven causes the shepherds to appear, after the tempest, upon the clarinette and French horn, causes one to remember that it seemed ignorant of the effect of the English horn, which is "par-excellence" the shepherd's pipe of the orchestra and has been used as such by Berlioz, Rossini, Wagner, Schumann, [illegible] genius omne, Beethoven never [illegible]

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

Amherst Webber, Symphony in C minor, (First time.)
Mozart, Recitative and Rondo from Act II., "Cosi fan Tutte."
Mme. Eames.
Tschaikowsky, Symphonic poem, "Francesca da Rimini."
Schubert, Song with orchestra "Die Allmacht."
Mme. Eames.
Elgar, Overture, "In the South." (First time.)

When Mr. Webber recently appeared as pianist and accompanist at Mme. Eames' concert we little suspected that he had a symphony up his sleeve. But he has come back to Boston with a composition in the great epic form and has won a good success at the leading symphonic concerts of America. Were the symphony the work of one of our resident composers we should have roseate adjectives flying; but we do not get as deeply excited over the stranger within our gates.

Nevertheless, the new symphony is a worthy addition to the modern repertoire. Mr. Webber has not tried to push beyond the 24 known musical keys; he has not invented a new system of musical vagueness; he has not even discovered any new chords, or dissonances, or progressions; and he employs an orchestra that is quite moderate and conservative.

The first movement makes a good impression. After an introductory lament there enters an agitated chief theme in minor against a gentle subordinate theme in major, in excellent contrast. The closing theme is again in a perturbed and fiery vein, and brings the exposition to a well-marked ending. There is no repeat of this first section; at least none was made on Saturday. The development section was not very remarkable, although it was sorrowful even to the muted-horn point, and the recapitulation was shortened. The coda was especially effective, with some fine augmentation of the figures and an excellent climax. A brief but good Sonata-Allegro.

The slow movement, which came next, seemed the weakest part of the composition. There was some tender conversation between the violins and the violoncellos, but nothing that seemed of long breath or inspired. The scherzo shows an ease in scoring that deserves recognition. There was both impetuosity and originality in this movement, a strong contrast at the trio and an especially fine returning passage.

The finale had a chief theme that seemed as if Mephistopheles were singing his serenade in Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust," but this did not weaken the movement. Here one found excellent development extending even to the fugal point, the woodwind, beginning with the bassoon, doing some contrapuntal work that was very clear and interesting.

This finale was the best movement of the entire work, and shows that there is much of promise and already much achievement in the composition of Mr. Webber. There was hearty applause, and the composer was obliged to bow his thanks from the balcony, where he sat.

We are glad to hail a new composer who is neither extreme nor radical, and we shall watch his growth with interest. Such a symphony had a good right to performance in our series, and the music dictionaries must add the name of Amherst Webber to their list.

Mme. Eames appeared to better advantage in this concert than in the recent one given in Boston. She sang the Mozart aria with much sweetness, and seems to have gained in the lower register, for her deep notes were remarkably round and full. But the high notes were not as resonant as of yore, and one suspected her of "saving her voice" all through the aria, although she sang the recitative effectively.

Mme. Eames was never a vocal spendthrift, but the economy when the alt octave was reached was too self-evident. In "bel canto" she was very smooth and tender. Her chief success, however, was made in the Schubert number.

It meant a great deal to arouse the audience to enthusiasm after the tremendous effects of the Tschaikowsky number, yet the artist did this, and did it legitimately. At the end she had reserve force enough to make a very broad and telling climax. She was recalled several times, and floral tributes were also in evidence.

"Francesca da Rimini" was a blaze of orchestral brilliancy plus musical ideas. Such music still causes us to hope that out of Russia there may yet come a physician for our ailing and suffering art of Music. It was not in the obvious effects of howling winds or fierce crashes that the triumph of the work lay, but whether in mighty climaxes or in the simplest solos there was a graphic portrayal of Dante's poem. The utter sadness of Paolo and his love; the brooding melancholy that hung over the doomed pair, from these touches to the roar of infernal tempests, every musical thought was played as if the orchestra were quite in love with the work.

Yet we may single out the passages for flute, for clarinette and for the muted violoncellos as being most nobly performed. At the end the enthusiasm of the public burst forth in a torrent; rarely have we seen such a demonstration at these concerts. After Mr. Gericke had twice acknowledged the plaudits he caused the orchestra to rise and share in the ovation, which then went up to fever heat.

We do not think for an instant that the fact that everybody took such delight in the work is proof that it is weaker music than that which cannot be understood!

Dr. Elgar shrivelled somewhat before the chromatic whirlwinds. His "In the South" is an Italian picture, but unfortunately Berlioz, Richard Strauss and Charpentier had been in Italy before him. When we heard the powerful rumblings and the fortissimo touches of the overture we did not think of ancient legions marching on the Appian Way, we only felt that the Chianti and the Fritto Misto had disagreed with the Englishman.

Even the tender viola theme, well played by Mr. Ferir, could not make headway against the glorious melodic touches of Tschaikowsky. We are certain that, had London heard this work in the same juxtaposition that we did at this concert, there would not have been so much enthusiastic writing about it.

The coda climax was the most effective portion of the composition, as it ought to be, but we scarcely feel inclined to rank this opus with Elgar's set of orchestral variation.

Louis C. Elson.

Boston Transcript
124 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON, MASS.
SATURDAY, DECEMBER 30, 1905

IN THE WORLD OF MUSIC

A BRILLIANT SYMPHONY CONCERT YESTERDAY

A Masterpiece of Tschaikovski's, Elgar's Italian Overture and a New and Unpretentious Symphony—Many Concerts Next Week—The Month's Calendar—Runciman Writes Sensibly of Programme Music

Altogether, the Symphony concert, yesterday, was the most brilliant, thus far, of the series. One of the masterpieces of the music of our time, Tschaikovsky's "Francesca da Rimini," was played in a fashion that revealed much of its pictorial and imaginative power, something of the passionate creative instinct behind it, and all of its tonal bite and beauty. For the first time we in Boston heard the eager, changeful and richly colored overture, "In the South," to which Italy, and spring in Italy, inspired Elgar. A new symphony by a young Englishman, Amherst Webber, disclosed, and very unexpectedly, a composer who was content to please the ear and the fancy—the rarest of reserves among the strenuous young symphonists, big with ideas and ambitions, of today. Finally an eminent singer from the Metropolitan Opera House, Mme. Eames, sang with all her singular individuality of tone and purity of phrasing in an air from Mozart and with a new breadth of voice and manner in Schubert's "Almighty." No audience on a Friday afternoon, since the concerts of the winter began, has applauded so often, spontaneously, and heartily. After Tschaikovsky's fantasia it had Mr. Gericke bowing at least half as many times as it had Mme. Eames after her singing.

Perhaps this was token that here in Boston at least "Francesca da Rimini," hissed and hooted once in stupid Berlin, has come into its own. Some of Tschaikovsky's music—and most of all his "Pathetic" symphony—has been played so persistently that every shortcoming in it seems to glare at the listener. As much of it is coming with familiarity to seem only sound and fury with the inevitable contrasts and reactions—more illustrative of the Slav temperament and the peculiar phases of it in Tschaikovsky than of the art of music large and naked. But his orchestral fantasias, which are really symphonic poems, hold their own and heighten it. Repetition has not staled them. Tschaikovsky's imagination and invention rarely flag in them. They seem indeed to lift him out of himself. In many respects, moreover, they are models of what such descriptive music should be—largely yet poignantly delineative, pliant yet not splintering the logic of musical form and development, surcharged with imagination, yet giving all that it kindles rich and legitimate expression in the normal terms of potent melody, striking harmonies, and significant modulations. Perhaps it was cold baths, as Tschaikovsky, often absorbed in his physical well-being, wrote in a letter. Perhaps it was the fires, as his brother hints, that a first hearing of "Carmen" lighted in him. But certainly "Francesca" at each new hearing seems the most inspired of all these fantasias—one of the authentic and enduring achievements of the music of our time.

Not in Berlin or in Paris has the large delineative power of music, its power to summon atmosphere and to suggest what may not be spoken or written or wrought in paint or marble so poignantly, been carried higher than in the wind-lashed, shuddering, shivering, tortured hell that begins Tschaikovsky's tone-poem. The bitter winds streak and smite through the long crescendos. Pale averted ghosts flitter and gibber in the figuration. And then Francesca and Paolo come entwined, their pain forgetting in the joy of their embrace, in that wonderful melody for clarinet and violins—the climax of Tschaikovsky's melodic invention—that suggests them, the longing of them, the tragedy of them, the faint background of the garden where they read and kissed, and the wan awakening when Lanciotto came. Give but the title for a clew and some faint notion of the tale, some little spark of answering imagination, and the suggestive power and the searching beauty of music can hardly go further. And with superb sense of imaginative contrast it is a darker and louder-moaning hell that Tschaikovsky sends to close over them. Our orchestra, and especially Mr. Grisez in the clarinet melody, seemed often to seize and impart his very imaginings.

It fares ill with music, unless it all be masterpieces, that stands side by side with "Francesca da Rimini" on a concert programme, and it fared especially ill yesterday with Elgar's new overture. To put it prosaically, a year ago last spring Sir Edward "ran down" from London to Italy. Everyone who has ever done it knows the downright elation of leaving London on a gray, wet morning and emerging the next afternoon in a warm flood of Italian sky and sunshine. You must do something, if it is only to jump up and down, in the sheer elation of it all. Sir Edward naturally betook himself to music-making, and the joy that was warm within him speaks in the beginning of the overture. (In form it is very free, indeed—a loose series of thematic sequences with an occasional long-drawn melody.) Then he began to take thought of the Italy around him and also—it is easy to suspect—of the Italy of poetry, old and new. It is a land where gentle shepherds pipe. They shall and do in an episode of the overture. It is a land where Cæsars and their armies strode up and down, and stride they do through many long pages of music paper slashingly and weightily. It is a land of melancholy retrospects. Shall we muse upon its contrasts in fine-drawn and slowly-curving plaintive melody? But, after all, it is the land of the joy of life and light, and so the long overture ends as it began.

An ingenious and imaginative series of mood-pictures, but rather too ingenious to seem quite spontaneous, except at the beginning. Listening brought little of the sense of a burning creative instinct behind as did the hearing of Tschaikovsky's tone-poem. Elgar made his overture. Strenuously he seeks melodies, but they are either short-breathed or long-winded. They will not stand—the miracle of that clarinet melody aside—beside the Russian's inventions. Intricate is Elgar's score, far more intricate than all Tschaikovsky's chromatics, and very richly and variously, even gorgeously, colored. But often it leaves a persistent impression of bright scrappiness, as though we listeners were looking into an instrumental kaleidoscope with Elgar turning it very briskly. It is all interesting; the beginning, the end and the striding Romans are great fun to hear, but it is not Elgar at his best.

Mr. Webber with his symphony was in very good company indeed and by simplicity and unpretentiousness held his place in it. These are the days of strenuous young composers who would put the universe—or a little less—into their first symphonies, and in a new form besides. Mr. Webber is content with the traditional structure and sequence of a symphony. He is academic by free choice, but very seldom dryly so. Still more is he content with themes that are only tonal fancies without any hint of that besetting universe and its woes in them or in their development. Like our Mr. Strube a week ago in his new violin concerto, Mr. Webber seems only to seek spontaneity, pleasant fancy and charm. Often he gains them. He has written a short, light, continent and graceful symphony that is agreeable musical entertainment. Such entertainment is worth the having, but very rarely in these days will these mighty young symphonists deign to give it us. There is individuality in this willingness and still more in one curious trait of Mr. Webber's music. At a first hearing it is a temptation at least to call his an operatic symphony. He has spent much of his working years in opera houses in New York and in London, and as our ears heard them yesterday, there was distinct operatic cut and flavor in his melodies and his treatment of them. A sort of romance (Andante) makes the slow movement of the symphony. It seemed mainly the broad, luscious cantilena dear to romantic tenors. It is easy to fancy vague tinkling echoes of ballet music here and there in the bright, delicate scherzo. The dark introduction to the final movement might prefigure a tragic scene of music-drama, and now and again is there a faint smell of the footlights in the first? Rubinstein wrote a "dramatic" symphony. Perhaps Mr. Webber, and unconsciously, has written an "operatic" one.

H. T. P.

/ / + / /

Concerts Next Week

Brahms's second symphony, in which our orchestra and our conductor shine, is the chief number on the programme for the eleventh pair of Symphony concerts on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening next. Rubin Goldmark's overture, "Hiawatha"—the music of an American composer who is a relative of the more noted Goldmark of Vienna—begins the programme. For "middle pieces" come Richard Strauss's ironic and biting scherzo, "Der Eulenspiegel" and Beethoven's concerto for violin, with Mr. Hess, the concert master of the orchestra, to play the solo part, for the first time here, though at home in Germany it has long been in his repertory. The following week the band pays its monthly visit to New York and other cities.

Mr. Hess's quartet from the principal strings of our orchestra gives the third of its current series of chamber concerts in Jordan Hall at eight o'clock on Monday evening, with George Proctor, the pianist, and Carl Barth, the 'cellist, to assist it. All three of the numbers that make the programme are familiar: Schumann's string quartet in A-major (Op. 41, No. 3) Saint-Saëns's trio for piano, violin and 'cello, to be played by Mr. Proctor, Mr. Hess and Mr. Warnke; and Schubert's quintet (Op. 163), for two violins, viola and two 'cellos, for which Mr. Barth joins the quartet. A month or two ago "the Kneisels" played the same quartet of Schumann's for us.

The Hess Quartet will also give three chamber concerts in Brattle Hall at Cambridge on the evenings of Thursdays, Jan. 18, Feb. 22 and March 22. At the first of these concerts Olga Samaroff, the excellent pianist, will join Mr. Hess in Richard Strauss's early sonata for violin. At the second Miss Hawkins, the pianist, and Max Hess, first horn of the Symphony Orchestra, will assist Mr. Hess, the violinist, in Brahms's rarely heard "Waldhorn" trio. At the third the Hoffmann Quartet will join the Hess Quartet for Mendelssohn's octet for strings. Tickets for the series go on sale at the University Book Store Jan. 1.

The Boston Orchestral Club of Amateurs, under the direction of Mr. Longy of the Symphony Orchestra, gives a concert on Tuesday evening at eight o'clock in Jordan Hall. Mr. Gilibert, the admirable French baritone, long liked here, assists the club. No programme of the concert has reached us.

[140]

PHOTO BY CHICKERING

MR. ROTH MR. HESS MR. FERIR MR. WARNKE

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY QUARTET.

SUNDAY HERALD

Published Every Day in the Year.
VOL. CXVIII., NO. 184.

SUNDAY, DEC. 31, 1905.

PLAY SYMPHONY NEW TO BOSTON

Orchestra at Tenth Concert Gives Work Written a Few Years Ago by Amherst Webber, an Englishman.

The programme of the 10th concert given last night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Gericke conductor, in Symphony Hall, was as follows:

Symphony in C minor.....Webber
Scene and rondo from "Cosi fan tutte".Mozart
"Francesca da Rimini".....Tschaikowsky
Song, "The Almighty".....Schubert
Overture, "In the South".....Elgar

The symphony and the overture were played for the first time in Boston; the symphony, played for the first time in this country, was composed in England about three years ago, and it was performed at Warsaw in October 1904.

Mr. Amherst Webber is an Englishman. He was born at Cannes; he studied music at Dresden and Paris; he took a musical degree as well as the degree of M. A. at Oxford; he has been a repetiteur in London and New York opera houses; he has written an opera, which was produced successfully last June, and when he was about 35 years old he girded up his loins and said to himself: "Lo, I will write a symphony." Nor was there any one to shake his determination.

Few composers have the patience to wait, as Brahms did, till they are 43 before they allow the public to know their first symphony. When we studied music in certain German cities we used awestruck at long-haired youths who had composed at least one symphony apiece, and we remember in Munich a singularly gifted being who confided to us after he had put down two or three quarts of beer that he had written three symphonies, each one of them a masterpiece, but for some reason Hermann Levi would not produce any one of them, and he hinted at something revengeful and sinister in the conductor's refusal. The years have slipped away and the dust must now be thick on those inspired manuscripts, if the amiable enthusiasts themselves are not now dust.

The young composer today when he feels urged by the demon within him to write an orchestral work chooses, as a rule, a subject for a symphonic poem. He wishes to paint in tones a legend, heroic episode, moving tale or to translate a picture or a statue or a cathedral into music. (We have often wondered [illegible] has chosen "The Stock Exchange" for a title, with a generative [illegible] of greed, and with a [illegible] which for dramatic purposes [illegible] more significance than [illegible].) But Mr. [illegible] education [illegible] numerable sketches for "Orpheus and Eurydice" or "Orestes Pursued by the Furies" to be painted in the good old classical manner?

Mr. Webber said of his symphony: It is written so much on traditional lines that any synopsis for the benefit of an audience would be superfluous. A long discussion of the merits and failings of the work itself would also be superfluous, for the symphony is evidently by a man who has melodic fertility and certain symphonic ideas; but his melody is not often distinguished and he is not yet able to carry out fully his ideas or to express them with conviction. In the first movement, for instance, there is thematic material to serve amply a skilful technician's purpose, but in working out this material there is repetition with modifications rather than true and logical development.

There is the intention, the purpose; there are some excellent ideas; there are here and there effective colors and contrasts of colors, but the movement is episodic, the music is at times thin, and it limps. The second movement, which is practically a romance, has a prettiness that recalls to us the favorite exhibition piece of the best pianist in the village where we spent our boyhood. This piece was entitled "Moonlight on the Hudson." It was a sweet thing, and the pianist, a rather elderly maiden with a long curl, took off her rings before she began to play.

The scherzo has the elements of immediate and passing popularity, and in the finale Mr. Webber shows, perhaps too plainly, that he has written exercises in fugue.

We have no sympathy with those who assail a composer because he comes before the public with a first symphony. No doubt Mr. Webber will compose a better one, now that he has heard his first. He is a modest man, and he probably judges his own work more severely today than do they who are not so much interested in it. Let him remember that a distinction may be made between a tune and a melody. Mr. Vernon Blackburn once defined the former as a melody that is over-ripe.

The themes in this symphony are occasionally tunes, and there are whole pages that might well go into an operetta. The audience was well disposed, and Mr. Webber bowed in acknowledgement of the applause.

Tschaikowsky, it seems, was not wholly satisfied with his wind-storm music in "Francesca da Rimini," but he expressed his disappointment before he had orchestrated the pages. He composed the fantasia "with love," and he believed that this love for the work had brought success.

The fantasia is familiar to the Symphony audience, but never has it been played here with so much dramatic intensity, and never has it seemed so emotionally impressive. It is not a flawless work, and as a whole it must be ranked below the composer's "Romeo and Juliet," and his fifth symphony; but what a wealth of imagination there is in it! What directness and poignancy of appeal! Two of the chief characteristics of the man are revealed in this music: his grim and murky despair at the thought of the question of all questions; his ineffable tenderness when reminded of the woe of any human being.

The performance of this fantasia was the chief feature of the concert, and it is a pleasure to record the fact that the applause was spontaneous and long continued so that Mr. Gericke was forced to bow again and again in acknowledgment, nor was the audience satisfied until the orchestra had risen from the seats. Conductor and players richly deserved the tribute.

Some months ago President Hadley of Yale University, in giving an honorary degree to Sir Edward Elgar, characterized him in a loud and manly voice as the greatest living musician, not knowing that Mr. Humperdinck would be in New York in December, and might possibly visit New Haven to hold sweet [illegible] with a critic of such force, [illegible] discrimination. An English [illegible] disregarded and [illegible] been knighted and given honorary degrees. These honors, it is true, have put Elgar in a class to be viewed always with suspicion, but he may yet rise above the inevitable rewards of conventional mediocrity in art.

No work by him that has been performed here explains the extraordinary pother made in England, where many hail him as greater than Richard Strauss, and some speak of him as a modern and improved Bach. In the more important compositions that we have heard there are pages which show an indisputable talent, but there is also much that is inherently commonplace, much that is sentimental, much that is peculiarly dull, dull with an Elgarian dulness. He is certainly skilled in the art of orchestration. His vocabulary is rich and highly colored, and there is often a marked incongruity between the vapid or jejune or maudlin thought and its expression.

This overture, we are told by those near Sir Edward, is intended to suggest the joy of living in Italy with its historic past and its present beauty. The music, then, should be both pictorial and suggestive. According to Mr. Jaeger's analysis, there is the melancholy produced by "contemplating the contrast between the eternal rejuvenescence of nature and the instability of man's greatest and proudest achievements"; the Roman legions enter and do their duty; there is a "lonely shepherd's plaintive song floating toward the serene azure of the Italian sky"; there are many other things, among them a motto-phrase which stands throughout the overture for "Sunshine, the Open Air and Cheery Optimist."

While "In the South" does not deserve the extravagant eulogies provoked by the first performance in London, it nevertheless is an unusually well constructed work, with passages of genuine eloquence. Perhaps the most disappointing episode is that said to be suggested by the thought of the Roman legions—the episode that reminded Mr. Blackburn—who worships Sir Edward—of the famous sentence in Sir Thomas Browne's "Urn Burial."

Here Sir Thomas and Mr. Blackburn himself rose to far more imaginative height than Sir Edward. But Elgar is seldom, if ever, imaginative. He at times has fancy—which is not the same thing. Judging from the purely technical standpoint, this overture is often masterly. Furthermore, it is remarkably euphonic, both in massive effects and in charming detail—as in the episode in which the solo viola was beautifully played by Mr. Ferir.

On the whole this overture is by far the most interesting orchestral work by Elgar that we have heard, not so much from any distinction in thematic material, but from the use of this material and by reason of a breadth and spontaneity of thought that we miss in his other works.

Who, however, hearing the overture, would have thought that Italy was in the composer's mind, had it not been for the assurance given by Elgar's commentators?

The performance was admirable in all respects; but such performances are now the rule, not the exception, under Mr. Gericke's baton.

Mme. Eames sang Fiordiligi's scene and rondo from the second act of "Cosi fan tutte" and Schubert's "The Almighty." She is a lyric, not dramatic soprano and this song of Schubert is not for her. A woman must have a powerful voice, one that is powerful without effort, in elemental nature, and dramatic authority to make this declamation effective.

Her technical performance was better in certain respects than when she sang here recently in concert, yet it was not what we have a right to expect from this singer, and young students hearing her last night could learn by noticing what to avoid.

Nevertheless, her technical shortcomings might have been pardoned or ignored, had she shown an active mind or a sympathetic soul in her interpretation of the Scene and Rondo. There was little or no interpretation. Her performance was unintelligent; it was [illegible] heartless. The nearer thought of the ancient orator on whose lips icicles formed while he was speaking.

Mme. Eames was heartily applauded.

The Boston Journal

TWO NOVELTIES AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Contributed by Englishmen to Program — Mme. Eames Appears Twice — Tschaikowsky Work Superbly Rendered.

The tenth Symphony concert was notable for its two novelties, both, curiously enough, by Englishmen. One was a full-fledged symphony, the work of Amherst Webber, a man whose name had never before been seen on our programs as a composer. The work is frankly a return to the placidity and classicism of the Brahms style; no attempt is made to stun or even to surprise; no strivings for the tumultuous orchestration or the impressionistic tone-color of today's moderns are to be found. The result, is pleasing for its very lack of pretension, and it shows Mr. Webber to be a man of taste, a musician of accomplishments and a force that ought to be seriously reckoned with in the musical development of England.

The other Briton, the well-known and over-lauded Elgar, was represented by his overture "In the South." The work might bear any title; it is in no way unmistakably expressive of Italy. It has much beauty, however, some passages of deep and sonorous suggestiveness and is, on the whole, the best specimen of Elgar's industry that has yet come across the ocean.

But spite of the "first-times," the great and overwhelming feature of the concert was the irresistibly emotional and splendidly virtuoso performance of Tschaikowsky's great "Francesca da Rimini" tone-poem. Never has it had such a reading in this city, and Mr. Gericke and the men themselves had to arise and bow to the enthusiasm.

Mme. Eames sang a bit from "Cosi Fan Tutti" and Schubert's "The Almighty." In neither did she appear to any special advantage.

[141]

TUESDAY, JAN. 2, 1906.

SYMPHONY QUARTET.

Spirit of Romanticism in Work of Schumann Fully Appreciated by Players at Third Concert.

The Boston Symphony quartet (Messrs. Hess, Roth, Ferir and Warnke) gave its third concert last night in Jordan Hall. The programme included Schumann's quartet in A major, op. 41, No. 3; Saint-Saens' piano trio in F major, op. 18; Schubert's quintet in C major, op. 163. Messrs. George Proctor, pianist, and Carl Barth, 'cellist, assisted.

The concert was a very agreeable one, although it passed the limit of an hour and a half, after which chamber music is heard only with sated ears and inward uneasiness. It is always a pleasure to hear the quartet of Schumann, with its fine spirit of romanticism, which was appreciated fully last evening by the players and the audience. The composer of this quartet and other works alive with the same spirit was misunderstood and sneered at in his own time by many, and his music was to them foolishness, as is to some the music of d'Indy and Debussy today. His modernity was not of the kind that through immediate and general popularity was moribund almost from the time of its birth.

Saint-Saens' trio is nearly 40 years old. The andante and scherzo are still fresh, but the first movement and the finale have gone with the gliding years. The chief theme of the andante has a quaint folk-song flavor, and the scherzo is characteristic of the composer's period, when he had ideas as well as fluency and technical skill. Much of this music is too plainly constructed, but how excellent the workmanship, and what elegance in the finish! Mr. Proctor played with the requisite dash and crispness, but with an unnecessary waste of physical energy in the chord attack of forte passages, indulging himself in a few mannerisms which with a little care he could easily discard, and with benefit to his general performance.

Schubert's euphonious quintet is familiar to all frequenters of chamber music. The audience was quick to applaud. The fourth concert will be given on Feb. 5.

Journal

PROCTOR AND BARTH ASSIST SYMPHONY FOUR

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Quartet season was given at Jordan Hall last evening, with George Proctor and Carl Barth assisting. There was a fair-sized audience, including an unusually large proportion of fashionables. The program consisted of a quartet in A major, op. 41, No. 3, Schumann; a Saint-Saens trio for piano, violin and 'cello, and a Schubert quintet for two violins, viola and two 'cellos in C major, op. 163.

In the trio Mr. Proctor played with delightful spirit, and showed himself in every respect worthy of the company he was in. Mr. Barth in the quintet was always to be relied upon, and the members of the quartet played with their customary skill and finish.

The Boston Post

The Representative Democratic Paper of New England

Issued daily by Post Publishing Co.
JANUARY 2, 1906. NO. 2; VOL. 182
Office 330 Washington st., Boston, Mass.

BOSTON SYMPHONY QUARTET

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Quartet was given last evening at Jordan Hall before the usual large and fashionable audience. Messrs. George Proctor, pianist, and Carl Barth, 'cellist, were the assisting artists, in the following programme:

Quartet, A major, Op. 41, No. 3, Schumann; Trio for piano, violin and 'cello, Saint-Saens; Quintet in C major, Op. 163, Schubert.

This proved a pleasing and enjoyable programme. The assisting artists contributed much toward the artistic results that made the concert one of the best in the series thus far. The fourth concert will be Monday evening, Feb. 5.

Times.

DEC 31 1905

BOSTON SYMPHONY QUARTET.

New York became acquainted last Spring with the Hess Quartet of Boston, which, giving one concert in Mendelssohn Hall, was more than cordially received by the newspapers and by the public. This quartet was composed of Prof. Willy Hess, Otto Roth, Emile Ferir, and Rudolph Krasselt, all of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. During the Summer the management decided to change the name of this chamber music organization to the Boston Symphony Quartet, in order that it might be more closely identified as an integral part of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The quartet will this season give three concerts in New York, the first of which will take place next Tuesday night, Jan. 2, in Mendelssohn Hall at 8:15 o'clock. Prof. Willy Hess, the first violin, is the concert master of the orchestra. The quartet has been playing together steadily since early in the Autumn.

This first concert will be the début of Sigismond Stojowski of the piano department of the Institute of Musical Art as an ensemble player and a composer, for the second number on the programme is a sonata for violin and piano, which he will play with Prof. Hess. This work is in G major and its opus number is thirteen. It was composed in 1898 and published six years later in Paris. It is divided into three movements and has the peculiarity of having no regular finale, the last movement being a set of variations on a broad andante theme. The second movement, a scherzo, is strongly Polish in color. The programme is as follows: Beethoven quartet, Op. 18, No. 6; sonata for violin and pianoforte, in G major, Op. 18, Sigismond Stojowski; sextet in B flat major, Op. 18, Brahms. The assisting soloists will be Sigismond Stojowski, pianist; Max Zach, viola; Josef Keller, violoncello.

[142]

SYMPHONY QUARTET.

Third Concert of Present Series Given at Jordan Hall, Under Concertmeister Hess' Direction.

The third in this season's series of concerts by the Boston Symphony quartet took place last night in Jordan hall under extremely favorable conditions. Perhaps it occurred to more than one that it was an ideal way to begin the new year to pay the deserved tribute of close attention to one of the finest string quartets in America. Doubtless others realized that in reality it was a 12-number concert, albeit distributed among but three composers—four movements to each master. The three B's of the program—Schumann, Saint-Saens and Schubert, taken in this way, afforded an astonishing contrast. A more dignified, scholarly opening for a concert of this class could hardly have been devised than the lovely Schumann quartet in A major, translated by these players with a breadth of style and unexaggerated manner delightful to meditate upon. Mr Hess gave a most poetic reading to the score. Few works for chamber concert use are so thoroughly charged with beauty as this quartet, with its extra "allegro molto" movement thrown in for good measure.

Then came the Saint-Saens trio, for Mr Hess, Mr Warnke and Mr George Proctor, pianist. The latter played with delightful expressiveness and abandon, after he had overcome a certain overweening anxiety as to the readiness of his associate artists—and interpreted the beautiful and haunting second or andante movement like the sincere musician he seems to be. There's nothing quite like this movement with its weird, druidical motif, gathering strength from single string beginning to its glorious ensemble climax; then faint as "the horns of elfland fading into distance with its peculiar chiming accompaniments.

The Schubert quintet, with Mr Carl Barth as assisting artist, was given royally: and here, indeed, did the true metal of the organization which Mr Hess heads ring out for its true worth. This quintet is heard but seldom, and more is the pity, for its second, or adagio movement, is indescribably lovely, with its wonderful pizzicato melody and delicious measures for 'cello and solo violin. It was a brilliant ending to a concert of unusual impressiveness, brilliantly played, with a memorable scherzo and an allegretto well-nigh beyond the power even of these musicians. Mr Barth's part, played so beautifully aided, of course, in making this the complete success it proved to be. The fourth concert of the series takes place Monday evening Feb 5, at Jordan hall.

BOSTON EVENING RECORD

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

Amherst Webber, Symphony in C minor. (First time.)

Mozart, Recitative and Rondo from Act II., "Cosi fan Tutte."
Mme. Eames.

Tschaikowsky, Symphonic poem, "Francesca da Rimini."

Schubert, Song with orchestra "Die Allmacht."
Mme. Eames.

Elgar, Overture, "In the South." (First time.)

When Mr. Webber recently appeared as pianist and accompanist at Mme. Eames' concert we little suspected that he had a symphony up his sleeve. But he has come back to Boston with a composition in the great epic form and has won a good success at the leading symphonic concerts of America. Were the symphony the work of one of our resident composers we should have roseate adjectives flying; but we do not get as deeply excited over the stranger within our gates.

Nevertheless, the new symphony is a worthy addition to the modern repertoire. Mr. Webber has not tried to push beyond the 24 known musical keys; he has not invented a new system of musical vagueness; he has not even discovered any new chords, or dissonances, or progressions; and he employs an orchestra that is quite moderate and conservative.

We are glad to hail a new composer who is neither extreme nor radical, and we shall watch his growth with interest. Such a symphony had a good right to performance in our series, and the music dictionaries must add the name of Amherst Webber to their list.

Mme. Eames appeared to better advantage in this concert than in the recent one given in Boston. She sang the Mozart aria with much sweetness, and seems to have gained in the lower register, for her deep notes were remarkably round and full. But the high notes were not as resonant as of yore, and one suspected her of "saving her voice" all through the aria although she sang the recitative effectively.

Louis C. Elson.

Jordan Hall. Symphony Quartet.

It makes the diversion of an hour to consider how the great minds in music have approached the string quartet. Grieg has made it the very voice of Scandinavia in the one work he wrote for it. D'Indy, of the moderns, forgets the world in its presence, and writes for it like a John of Patmos. In his last years, Beethoven, having passed beyond suffering and reached a point where his mind had ceased to be concerned with the woes any more than with the joys of earth, went to the string quartet for communion with this refined new self of his. We have hardly yet found out what they said to each other. But even they conformed to what seems a rule, that the string quartet shall compel every mind that touches it to write autobiography. Schumann bent to this compulsion, certainly, in the quartet of his that we heard last night. And therein it is not unkind or unfair to Schumann to say is the source of its peculiarities.

Schumann, as long as he can lock arms with you and take you for an intimate walk, is the gayest of companions, with a mind teeming with fancies and a heart bubbling over with affection. He will pat the heads of passing children, and expound the sermons in the stones. Give him even some new character to impersonate, and that character's life to depict, and he will do that with all the impersonal joy of a painter or a carpenter at his work. He will be Manfred with the same gusto and the same easy, natural mastery that he was Florestan and Eusebius. But give him a string quartet and set him to brooding upon himself, and he promptly fell into what, when we speak colloquially, we call "the blues." It's a state into which the artistic mind seems to pass with especial ease. We know what it wrought with the minds of Schumann and de Maupassant. The imagination, turned inward upon itself, conjures up baseless sorrows, phantom grudges against nothing. And this is what we hear in the last quartet of Schumann—a lovely discontent in the first movement, so like moods of our own and so beautifully expressed that our love of the music is intensified by perfect understanding. But by the third and the last movements Schumann has entered a fog of abstraction. We cannot follow and only stand by and observe, puzzled and pitying. If Schumann had written more quartets he might have reached sooner than he did that condition which finally carried him away. As it was, by this third quartet he seems to have wearied of the form. He seems to have heard warnings from his better self to leave it. We hear this determination in such bright moments as there are in this last one.

The Boston Symphony Quartet played this Schumann music last night as if in understanding of all these things. It was indeed their playing that stimulated the listener to these considerations. Schumann complains, in his first movement; and they complained—with the warmth and tenderness that were never apart from Schumann except in his few thickest moments. The rest of the quartet, wherein its composer is in such grave difficulties with himself, they played just as we listeners would have wished to play if the fiddles and the necessary cunning had been in our fingers. They did it in a deprecating lightness. They nursed the fevered Schumann, as it were, and would not let him make too much of his own delirium. And if there still are wanting in the Symphony Quartet a few of those technical excellences which can only come after years of association, these last night were all covered under the intelligence and lightness of their playing.

With Mr. Barth to assist them, they played the Schubert quintet with the same capable intelligence. Schubert had no need to fear strings. There was no combination of instruments that he could not set to work upon his inexhaustible fund of melody. This quintet of his would clamor in vain for a place among his greatest achievements, but then Schubert never stinted anything that he touched, and there are spaces in this work where he has matched the beauty if not the conciseness of his B minor symphony.

Saint-Saëns, in his early trio for violin, 'cello and pianoforte, certainly approached stringed instruments in no awe of their holiness. He set his three priests to warbling vers de société, making music that must have been grateful in the salons of forty years ago. It runs along like a Macaulay essay; you can pick up its thread at any point with perfect intelligence. But it needs the salon setting. You pine for a vis-à-vis and the opportunity to talk, except in the moments—which are not numerous—where Saint-Saëns really breaks in and makes you listen. Mr. George Proctor, and with him Mr. Hess and Mr. Warnke, played it better than it deserved.

In the last-named, where two violins are employed, Mr. Carl Barth was added to the regular forces. This made up a shapely, conservative programme, which one could comfortably enjoy without much theorizing or apologizing. But it was too long, and the Schumann quartette leaves something to be desired in its construction. It charms by sheer force of musical ideas, not by their fitness to the vehicle of expression.

The slow movement suggests the piano, the finale would be far better if it were an orchestral work. One hears an echo of a Schumann symphony in every measure. Not even the excellent, broad and powerful performance of the Boston Symphony Quartette could make one believe that it was really an ideal string quartette.

In this the Schubert quintette succeeded better. Although Schubert was not the polyphonic superior of Schumann, he had a melodic and singable character in his music that suits to the strings and is not suggestive of piano or of orchestra. His matter is not so powerful as that of Schumann, but lightness of touch is not a thing to be underrated in music.

These 2 chamber works showed the Boston Symphony quartette to best advantage. Their earnest and masculine playing fitted the Schumann work splendidly, and they seemed not less at home in the melodic Schubert measures. The finale of the Schumann quartette was especially powerful and deserved the applause it won, although the first violin and the violoncello could balance better; the former being too strong and the latter too light, at times.

The St. Saens trio sinned a little in the matter of length, its slow movement being especially prolix and often uninspired. The three artists played excellently. Mr. George Proctor is evidently growing constantly in chamber-music. His attention to the ensemble, his surety, his exquisite shading, all call for high praise.

The Scherzo is the gem of the work, and this was played with a daintiness that cannot be described; it was the perfection of good chamber-music.

The bizarre touches of the finale were also finely carried out and the trio became the star point of the concert, spite of its handicap in the length of its Andante.

Louis C. Elson.

N. Y. EVG SUN

JAN 2 - 1906

Sigismund Stojowski, to-night's new pianist with the Boston Symphony Quartet, is to be heard also at the Young People's Symphony matinée on Saturday, under Frank Damrosch. He is piano chief at Mr. Damrosch's new endowed Institute of Musical Art. With Willy Hess to-night he will play his own sonata for piano and violin. Beethoven's quartet op. 18, No. 6, and a Brahms sextet, op. 18, complete Mr. Hess's programme.

MAIL

NEW YORK CITY.

DEC 30 1905

The Boston Symphony Quartet, comprising Willy Hess and Otto Roth, violins; Emile Perir, viola, and Heinrich Warnke, violoncello, will give its first New York concert of the season at Mendelssohn Hall on Tuesday evening next.

The assisting artist will be Sigismund Stojowski, head of the piano department of the new Institute of Musical Art; Max Zach, viola, and Josef Keller, 'cello. The programme:

Quartet for two violins, viola and violoncello in B-flat major, op. 18, No. 6, Beethoven
Sonata for violin and pianoforte in G major, op. 13.....Sigismond Stojowski
Sextet for two violins, two violas and two violoncellos in B-flat major, op. 18 .....Brahms

From N. Y. TRIBUNE

Address

Date DEC 31 1905

Mr. Stojowski's sonata is in G major and is in three movements, the finale being a series of variations on a melody in moderate tempo. The second movement, a scherzo, is said to have a Polish tinge. The other pieces to be played at the concert of the Boston Symphony Quartet are Beethoven's Quartet in B flat, op. 18, No. 6, and Brahms's sextet in the same key for two violins, two violas and two violincellos. The quartet will have the help in this number of Max Zach and Josef Keller, also of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

From NEW YORK SUN

Address

Date DEC 31 1905

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Quartet will take place at Mendelssohn Hall on Tuesday evening. The programme will consist of Beethoven's quartet, opus 18, No. 6, the G major sonata for violin and piano, the [illegible] sextet, opus 18, Sigismond [illegible]

New York Times.

DEC 31 1905

Sigismond Stojowski, Professor of Piano in the Institute of Musical Art, will give a recital in Mendelssohn Hall immediately following his appearance there with the Boston Symphony Quartet.

BOSTON HERALD
Published Every Day in the Year.
VOL. CXIX., NO. 2.
TUESDAY, JAN. 2, 1906.

SYMPHONY QUARTET.

Spirit of Romanticism in Work of Schumann Fully Appreciated by Players at Third Concert.

The Boston Symphony quarter (Messrs. Hess, Roth, Ferir and Warnke) gave its third concert last night in Jordan Hall. The programme included Schumann's quartet in A major, op. 41, No. 3; Saint-Saens' piano trio in F major, op. 18; Schubert's quintet in C major, op. 163. Messrs. George Proctor, pianist, and Carl Barth, 'cellist, assisted.

The concert was a very agreeable one, although it passed the limit of an hour and a half, after which chamber music is heard only with sated ears and inward uneasiness. It is always a pleasure to hear the quartet of Schumann, with its fine spirit of romanticism, which was appreciated fully last evening by the players and the audience. The composer of this quartet and other works alive with the same spirit was misunderstood and sneered at in his own time by many, and his music was to them foolishness, as is to some the music of d'Indy and Debussy today. His modernity was not of the kind that through immediate and general popularity was moribund almost from the time of its birth.

Saint-Saens' trio is nearly 40 years old. The andante and scherzo are still fresh, but the first movement and the finale have gone with the gliding years. The chief theme of the andante has a quaint folk-song flavor, and the scherzo is characteristic of the composer's period, when he had ideas as well as fluency and technical skill. Much of this music is too plainly constructed, but how excellent the workmanship, and what elegance in the finish! Mr. Proctor played with the requisite dash and crispness, but with an unnecessary waste of physical energy in the chord attack of forte passages, indulging himself in a few mannerisms which with a little care he could easily discard, and with benefit to his general performance.

Schubert's euphonious quintet is familiar to all frequenters of chamber music. The audience was quick to applaud. The fourth concert will be given on Feb. 5.

Journal

PROCTOR AND BARTH ASSIST SYMPHONY FOUR

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Quartet season was given at Jordan Hall last evening, with George Proctor and Carl Barth assisting. There was a fair-sized audience, including an unusually large proportion of fashionables. The program consisted of a quartet in A major, op. 41, No. 3, Schumann; a Saint-Saens trio for piano, violin and 'cello, and a Schubert quintet for two violins, viola and two 'cellos in C major, op. 163.

In the trio Mr. Proctor played with delightful spirit, and showed himself in every respect worthy of the company he was in. Mr. Barth in the quintet was always to be relied upon, and the members of the quartet played with their customary skill and finish.

The Boston Post
The Representative Democratic Paper of New England
Issued daily by Post Publishing Co.
JANUARY 2, 1906. NO. 2; VOL. 182
Office 259 Washington st., Boston, Mass.

BOSTON SYMPHONY QUARTET

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Quartet was given last evening at Jordan Hall before the usual large and fashionable audience. Messrs. George Proctor, pianist, and Carl Barth, 'cellist, were the assisting artists, in the following programme:

Quartet, A major, Op. 41, No. 3, Schumann; Trio for piano, violin and 'cello, Saint-Saens; Quintet in C major, Op. 163, Schubert.

This proved a pleasing and enjoyable programme. The assisting artists contributed much toward the artistic results that made the concert one of the best in the series thus far. The fourth concert will be Monday evening, Feb. 5.

BOSTON SYMPHONY QUARTET.

New York became acquainted last Spring with the Hess Quartet of Boston, which, giving one concert in Mendelssohn Hall, was more than cordially received by the newspapers and by the public. This quartet was composed of Prof. Willy Hess, Otto Roth, Emile Ferir, and Rudolph Krasselt, all of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. During the Summer the management decided to change the name of this chamber music organization to the Boston Symphony Quartet, in order that it might be more closely identified as an integral part of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The quartet will this season give three concerts in New York, the first of which will take place next Tuesday night, Jan. 2, in Mendelssohn Hall at 8:15 o'clock. Prof. Willy Hess, the first violin, is the concert master of the orchestra. The quartet has been playing together steadily since early in the Autumn.

This first concert will be the début of Sigismond Stojowski of the piano department of the Institute of Musical Art as an ensemble player and a composer, for the second number on the programme is a sonata for violin and piano, which he will play with Prof. Hess. This work is in G major and its opus number is thirteen. It was composed in 1893 and published six years later in Paris. It is divided into three movements and has the peculiarity of having no regular finale, the last movement being a set of variations on a broad andante theme. The second movement, a scherzo, is strongly Polish in color. The programme is as follows: Beethoven quartet, Op. 18, No. 6; sonata for violin and pianoforte, in G major, Op. 13, Sigismond Stojowski; sextet in B flat major, Op. 18, Brahms. The assisting soloists will be Sigismond Stojowski, pianist; Max Zach, viola; Josef Keller, violoncello.

[142]

Boston Daily Globe
TUESDAY, JAN. 2, 1906.

SYMPHONY QUARTET.

Third Concert of Present Series Given at Jordan Hall, Under Concertmeister Hess' Direction.

The third in this season's series of concerts by the Boston Symphony quartet took place last night in Jordan hall under extremely favorable conditions. Perhaps it occurred to more than one that it was an ideal way to begin the new year to pay the deserved tribute of close attention to one of the finest string quartets in America. Doubtless others realized that in reality it was a 12-number concert, albeit distributed among but three composers—four movements to each master. The three S's of the program—Schumann, Saint-Saens and Schubert, taken in this way, afforded an astonishing contrast. A more dignified, scholarly opening for a concert of this class could hardly have been devised than the lovely Schumann quartet in A major, translated by these players with a breadth of style and unexaggerated manner delightful to meditate upon. Mr Hess gave a most poetic reading to the score. Few works for chamber concert use are so thoroughly charged with beauty as this quartet, with its extra "allegro molto" movement thrown in for good measure.

Then came the Saint-Saens trio, for Mr Hess, Mr Warnke and Mr George Proctor, pianist. The latter played with delightful expressiveness and abandon, after he had overcome a certain overweening anxiety as to the readiness of his associate artists—and interpreted the beautiful and haunting second or andante movement like the sincere musician he seems to be. There's nothing quite like this movement with its weird, druidical motif, gathering strength from single string beginning to its glorious ensemble climax; then faint as "the horns of elfland fading into distance with its peculiar chiming accompaniments.

The Schubert quintet, with Mr Carl Barth as assisting artist, was given royally; and here, indeed, did the true metal of the organization which Mr Hess heads ring out for its true worth. This quintet is heard but seldom, and more is the pity, for its second, or adagio movement, is indescribably lovely, with its wonderful pizzicato melody and delicious measures for 'cello and solo violin. It was a brilliant ending to a concert of unusual impressiveness, brilliantly played, with a memorable schergo and an allegretto well-nigh beyond the power even of these musicians. Mr Barth's part, played so beautifully aided, of course, in making this the complete success it proved to be. The fourth concert of the series takes place Monday evening Feb 5, at Jordan hall.

BOSTON EVENING RECORD

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

Amherst Webber, Symphony in C minor. (First time.)
Mozart, Recitative and Rondo from Act II., "Cosi fan Tutte."
Mme. Eames.
Tschaikowsky, Symphonic poem, "Francesca da Rimini."
Schubert, Song with orchestra "Die Allmacht."
Mme. Eames.
Elgar, Overture, "In the South." (First time.)

When Mr. Webber recently appeared as pianist and accompanist at Mme. Eames' concert we little suspected that he had a symphony up his sleeve. But he has come back to Boston with a composition in the great epic form and has won a good success at the leading symphonic concerts of America. Were the symphony the work of one of our resident composers we should have roseate adjectives flying; but we do not get as deeply excited over the stranger within our gates.

Nevertheless, the new symphony is a worthy addition to the modern repertoire. Mr. Webber has not tried to push beyond the 24 known musical keys; he has not invented a new system of musical vagueness; he has not even discovered any new chords, or dissonances, or progressions; and he employs an orchestra that is quite moderate and conservative.

We are glad to hail a new composer who is neither extreme nor radical, and we shall watch his growth with interest. Such a symphony had a good right to performance in our series, and the music dictionaries must add the name of Amherst Webber to their list.

Mme. Eames appeared to better advantage in this concert than in the recent one given in Boston. She sang the Mozart aria with much sweetness, and seems to have gained in the lower register, for her deep notes were remarkably round and full. But the high notes were not as resonant as of yore, and one suspected her of "saving her voice" all through the aria, although she sang the recitative effectively.

Louis C. Elson.

24 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON, MASS.
TUESDAY, JANUARY 2, 1906.

Jordan Hall: Boston Symphony Quartet

It makes the diversion of an hour to consider how the great minds in music have approached the string quartet. Grieg has made it the very voice of Scandinavia in the one work he wrote for it. D'Indy, of the moderns, forgets the world in its presence, and writes for it like a John of Patmos. In his last years, Beethoven, having passed beyond suffering and reached a point where his mind had ceased to be concerned with the woes any more than with the joys of earth, went to the string quartet for communion with this refined new self of his. We have hardly yet found out what they said to each other. But even they conformed to what seems a rule, that the string quartet shall compel every mind that touches it to write autobiography. Schumann bent to this compulsion, certainly, in the quartet of his that we heard last night. And therein, it is not unkind or unfair to Schumann to say is the source of its peculiarities.

Schumann, as long as he can lock arms with you and take you for an intimate walk, is the gayest of companions, with a mind teeming with fancies and a heart bubbling over with affection. He will pat the heads of passing children, and expound the sermons in the stones. Give him even some new character to impersonate and that character's life to depict, and he will do that with all the impersonal joy of a painter or a carpenter at his work. He will be Manfred with the same gusto and the same easy, natural mastery that he was Florestan and Eusebius. But give him a string quartet and set him to brooding upon himself, and he promptly fell into what, when we speak colloquially, we call "the blues." It's a state into which the artistic mind seems to pass with especial ease. We know what it wrought with the minds of Schumann and de Maupassant. The imagination, turned inward upon itself, conjures up baseless sorrows, phantom grudges against nothing. And this is what we hear in the last quartet of Schumann—a lovely discontent in the first movement, so like moods of our own and so beautifully expressed that our love of the music is intensified by perfect understanding. But by the third and the last movements Schumann has entered a fog of abstraction. We cannot follow and only stand by and observe, puzzled and pitying. If Schumann had written more quartets he might have reached sooner than he did that condition which finally carried him away. As it was, by this third quartet he seems to have wearied of the form. He seems to have heard warnings from his better self to leave it. We hear this determination in such bright moments as there are in this last one.

The Boston Symphony Quartet played this Schumann music last night as if in understanding of all these things. It was indeed their playing that stimulated the listener to these considerations. Schumann complains, in his first movement; and they complained—with the warmth and tenderness that were never apart from Schumann except in his few thickest moments. The rest of the quartet, wherein its composer is in such grave difficulties with himself, they played just as we listeners would have wished to play if the fiddles and the necessary cunning had been in our fingers. They did it in a deprecating lightness. They nursed the fevered Schumann, as it were, and would not let him make too much of his own delirium. And if there still are wanting in the Symphony Quartet a few of those technical excellences which can only come after years of association, these last night were all covered under the intelligence and lightness of their playing.

With Mr. Barth to assist them, they played the Schubert quintet with the same capable intelligence. Schubert had no need to fear strings. There was no combination of instruments that he could not set to work upon his inexhaustible fund of melody. This quintet of his would clamor in vain for a place among his greatest achievements, but then Schubert never stinted anything that he touched, and there are spaces in this work where he has matched the beauty if not the conciseness of his B minor symphony.

Saint-Saëns, in his early trio for violin, 'cello and pianoforte, certainly approached stringed instruments in no awe of their holiness. He set his three priests to warbling vers de société, making music that must have been grateful in the salons of forty years ago. It runs along like a Macaulay essay; you can pick up its thread at any point with perfect intelligence. But it needs the salon setting. You pine for a vis-à-vis and the opportunity to talk, except in the moments—which are not numerous — where Saint-Saëns really breaks in and makes you listen. Mr. George Proctor, and with him Mr. Hess and Mr. Warnke, played it better than it deserved.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

THE HESS QUARTETTE CONCERT.

Programme.

Quartette in A major, Op. 41, No. 3...Schumann
Trio for piano, violin and violoncello, Op. 10. St. Saens
Mr. George Proctor, pianist.
Quintette, C major, Op. 163.....Schubert

In the last-named, where two violoncellos are employed, Mr. Carl Barth was added to the regular forces. This made up a shapely, conservative programme, which one could comfortably enjoy without much theorizing or apologizing. But it was too long, and the Schumann quartette leaves something to be desired in its construction. It charms by sheer force of musical ideas, not by their fitness to the vehicle of expression.

The slow movement suggests the piano, the finale would be far better if it were an orchestral work. One hears an echo of a Schumann symphony in every measure. Not even the excellent, broad and powerful performance of the Boston Symphony Quartette could make one believe that it was really an ideal string quartette.

In this the Schubert quintette succeeded better. Although Schubert was not the polyphonic superior of Schumann, he had a melodic and singable character in his music that suits to the strings and is not suggestive of piano or of orchestra. His matter is not so powerful as that of Schumann, but lightness of touch is not a thing to be underrated in music.

These 2 chamber works showed the Boston Symphony quartette to best advantage. Their earnest and masculine playing fitted the Schumann work splendidly, and they seemed not less at home in the melodic Schubert measures. The finale of the Schumann quartette was especially powerful and deserved the applause it won, although the first violin and the violoncello could balance better, the former being too strong and the latter too light, at times.

The St. Saens trio sinned a little in the matter of length, its slow movement being especially prolix and often uninspired. The three artists played excellently. Mr. George Proctor is evidently growing constantly in chamber-music. His attention to the ensemble, his surety, his exquisite shading, all call for high praise.

The Scherzo is the gem of the work, and this was played with a daintiness that cannot be described; it was the perfection of good chamber-music.

The bizarre touches of the finale were also finely carried out and the trio became the star point of the concert, spite of its handicap in the length of its Andante.

Louis C. Elson.

N. Y. EVG JOUR
JAN 2 - 1906

Sigismund Stojowski, to-night's new pianist with the Boston Symphony Quartet, is to be heard also at the Young People's Symphony matinée on Saturday, under Frank Damrosch. He is piano chief at Mr. Damrosch's new endowed Institute of Musical Art. With Willy Hess to-night he will play his own sonata for piano and violin. Beethoven's quartet op. 18, No. 6, and a Brahms sextet, op. 18, complete Mr. Hess's programme.

MAIL

NEW YORK CITY.
DEC 30 1905

The Boston Symphony Quartet, comprising Willy Hess and Otto Roth, violins; Emile Perir, viola, and Heinrich Warnke, violoncello, will give its first New York concert of the season at Mendelssohn Hall on Tuesday evening next.

The assisting artist will be Sigismund Stojowski, head of the piano department of the new Institute of Musical Art; Max Zach, viola, and Josef Keller, 'cello. The programme:

Quartet for two violins, viola and violoncello in B-flat major, op. 18, No. 6, Beethoven
Sonata for violin and pianoforte in G major, op. 13.....Sigismond Stojowski
Sextet for two violins, two violas and two violoncellos in B-flat major, op. 18 .....Brahms

From N. Y. TRIBUNE

Address

Date

Mr. Stojowski's sonata is in G major and is in three movements, the finale being a series of variations on a melody in moderate tempo. The second movement, a scherzo, is said to have a Polish tinge. The other pieces to be played at the concert of the Boston Symphony Quartet are Beethoven's Quartet in B flat, op. 18, No. 6, and Brahms's sextet in the same key for two violins, two violas and two violincellos. The quartet will have the help in this number of Max Zach and Josef Keller, also of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

m NEW YORK SUN
DEC 31 1905
te

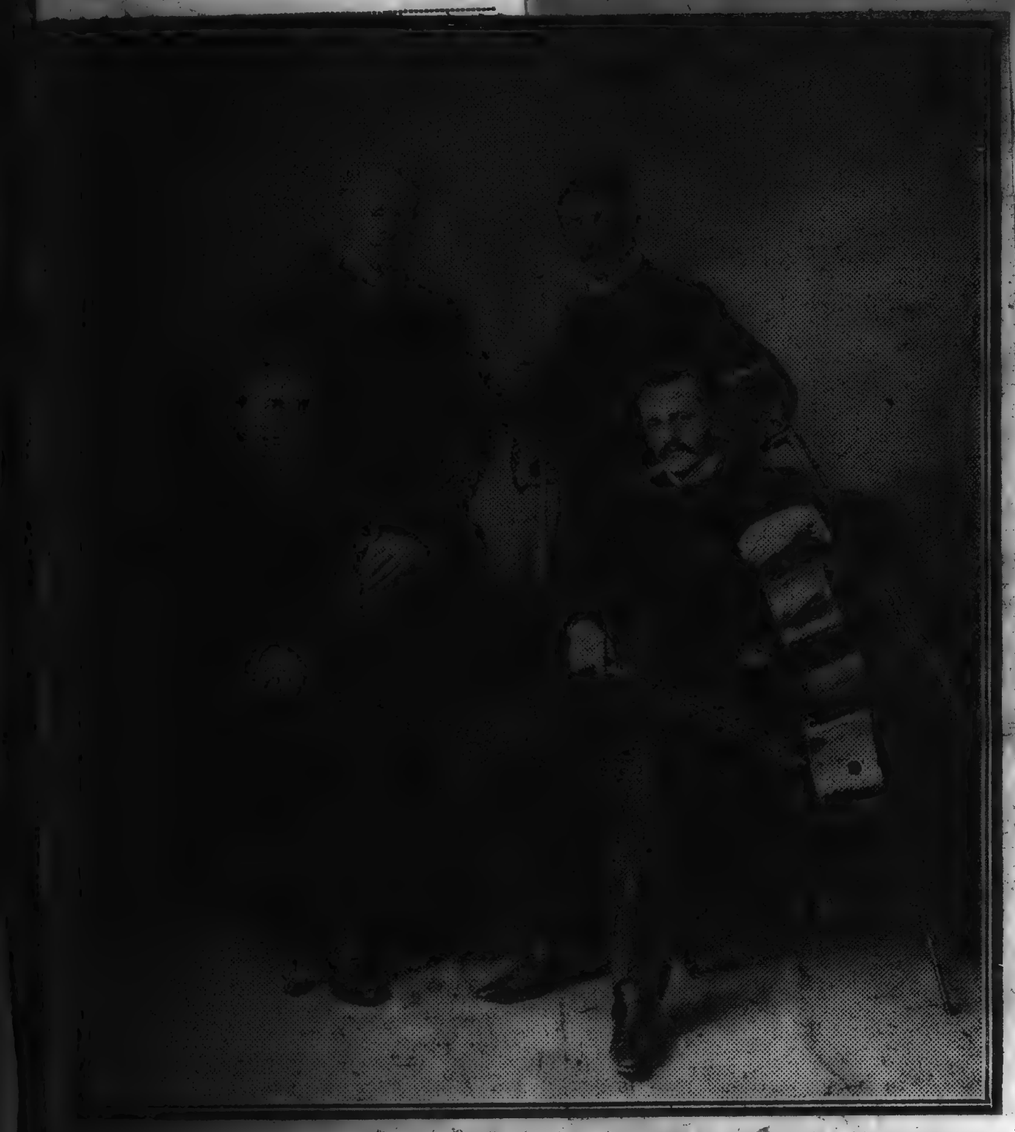
The first concert of the Boston Symphony Quartet will take place at Mendelssohn Hall on Tuesday evening. The programme will consist of Beethoven's quartet, opus 18, No. 6; Stojowski's G major sonata for violin and piano, and Brahms's string sextet, opus 18. Sigismund Stojowski will be the pianist.

Established: London, 1803; New York, 18

Sigismund Stojowski, Professor of Piano in the Institute of Musical Art, will give a recital in Mendelssohn Hall immediately following his appearance there with the Boston Symphony Quartet on Jan. 2.

New York Times.

DEC 31 1905



Boston Symphony Quartet, at Mendelssohn Hall, Tuesday night.

NEW YORK PRESS

DEC 31 1905

DEC 31 1905

Reisenauer and Willy Hess will be the soloists respectively of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concerts on January 11 and 12. The pianist will be heard in Weber's "Concertstueck"; the violinist in Spohr's ninth concerto.

...shed: London, 1881; New York, 1884

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

NEW YORK EV'G POST

...ess DEC 30 1905

The Boston Symphony Quartet, consisting of leading players in the Boston orchestra, will give a concert at Mendelssohn Hall next Tuesday evening with the assistance of Mr. S. Stojowski, Max Zach, Josef Keller. Programme: Beethoven's quartet in B flat, op. 18, a sonata for violin and piano by Stojowski, and the Brahms sextet in B flat.

NEW YORK HERALD

JAN 3 - 1906

BOSTON SYMPHONY QUARTET CONCERT

Organization Makes Its Reappearance in Mendelssohn Hall in Chamber Music Selections.

CHANGE IN ITS MEMBERSHIP

Mr. Heinrich Warnke Succeeds Mr. Rudolf Krasselt as Violoncellist, and Work of the Company Is Improved.

In a chamber music concert which had several features of special interest the Boston Symphony Quartet made its reappearance in Mendelssohn Hall last night.

Since this organization was first heard here last year its membership has undergone a change in the substitution of Mr. Heinrich Warnke for Mr. Rudolf Krasselt as violoncellist. It is fair to say, in the light of the quartet's playing last night, both that this change has proved beneficial and that Professor Willy Hess has brought the combined work of the four instruments to an artistic point considerably in advance of that reached last year.

The chief soloist was Mr. Sigismond Stojowski, for whom the occasion served as a public introduction both as pianist and composer. Other assisting artists were Mr. Max Zach, violin, and Mr. Josef Keller, 'cellist.

The programme opened with Beethoven's familiar B flat major quartet, the sixth in opus 18. To this work the most painstaking study has evidently been brought by the men from Boston, and they played it not only with excellent balance and a great deal of dash, but frequently with high polish as well.

Mr. Stojowski's sonata for violin and piano followed, the composer at the keyboard. This piece proved dull as a whole, although well performed.

The programme closed with a vigorous but rather uneven interpretation of Brahm's sextet in B flat major, opus 18.

New York Times.

JAN 3 - 1906

BOSTON SYMPHONY QUARTET.

First Concert of Their Series of Three in Mendelssohn Hall.

A year ago Prof. Willy Hess, concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, gave the first concert here of the string quartet he had formed with the leading members of the string band of the orchestra, who had succeeded the members of the Kneisel Quartet in their positions. Now they come again to give a series of three concerts, the first of which took place last evening in Mendelssohn Hall. They have now the title of the Boston Symphony Quartet, emphasizing thus Mr. Higginson's intention of cultivating chamber music in the same way and on the same plane as he cultivates symphonic music; for the quartet has the same sort of support and backing as the orchestra.

The retirement of Mr. Krasselt, the first 'cellist of the orchestra, made necessary a corresponding change in the quartet through the substitution of Mr. Warnke, but at the other desks the same players sit—Mr. Roth as second violin, and Mr. Férir as viola. The organization has made a great gain in many of the qualities that constitute the excellences of a string quartet, notably in precision of ensemble and in the flexibility and freedom with which that precision is maintained. There is still something to be desired in beauty and distinction of tone, and a more perfect fusion of the four instruments will come with time.

The programme included Beethoven's quartet Op. 18, No. 6, a sonata for piano and violin by Sigismund Stojowski and Brahm's sextet in B flat Op. 18. In the ... the quartet had the assistance of ... Zach, viola, and Josef Keller, violoncello. There were a splendid energy ... elasticity in the playing of Beetho... quartet, as well as much refinement ... delicacy of nuance, and Brahms's ... sextet, one of his most spontaneous and original works, one that helped ... in establishing his early reputation, ... presented with vigor, if not with ... the same finish that marked the ... of the other.

Stojowski's sonata had a special ... as being the work of a musician ... in New York. Mr. Stojowski ... the head of the piano department ... the Institute of Musical Art. He ... played the pinao part of his ... and thus made his first public ... here as a pianist. He has ... much, but very little of his ... important work is known here. ... a composer and as an executive ... made an extremely agreeable ... The sonata, which is in three ... lacks the usual slow move... which is to a certain extent ... in the finale, a theme with va... ther very original nor very deep, ... charming and graceful music, ... which a copious fancy plays. ... nothing that storms the heights ... that grates upon the ear, but ... effluous and effectively, some... brilliantly, written for both the ... and the violin. The piquant rhythms ... first allegro, the suggestion of ... of melody and expression in ... capriccioso, the ingenious ... imitation in both these move... the rich elaboration of the ... the listener with a sense ... Mr. Stojowski ... with much crisp... of Hess entered ... of the work.

NEW YORK STAATS-ZEITUNG

JAN 3 - 1906

Kammermusik.

Das „Bostoner Symphny Quartett" erschien gestern Abend, bei seinem ersten Konzert in Mebelssohn Hall, in etwas anderer Zusammenstellung, als im Vorjahre: Krasselt, der Cellist, ist ausgeschieden und Heinrich Warnke ist an seine Stelle getreten. Willy Heß spielt aber nach wie vor die erste Violine, und er spielt sie manchmal ein wenig gar zu sehr als Erster; Otto Roth spielt die zweite Violine dagegen mit reichlich viel Diskretion, und Emile Ferir spielt die Viola.

Das Programm erlaubte gestern den vier Herren nur in einer Nummer sich als Quartettisten zu bethätigen, in dem letzten der sechs Quartette Opus 18 von Beethoven. Sorgfalt der Vorbereitung und gesunde Musikerschaft in der Ausführung ließen sich in allen vier Sätzen verspüren; aber in Bezug auf Ausfeilung des Vortrages und Abtönung der Nuancen bleibt noch ziemlich viel zu thun übrig. Manches forzando kam gar zu brutal heraus. Nun, das Quartett ist jung, und wenn es seinen Personalbestand nicht so bald wieder zu ändern braucht, werden sich die Resultate einträchtlichen Zusammenarbeitens schon zeigen. Herr Heß aber sollte darnach trachten, das häufige „Pfeifen" der Saiten und das gelegentliche Kratzen des Bogens zu vermeiden.

Es scheint daß nur Uebereifer daran schuld ist.

Die Schlußnummer des Programms bildete das Brahms'sche Sextett in B-dur, opus 18 von Brahms. Die Ausführung, an der sich auch noch Max Zach und Joseph Keller, Mitglieder des Bostoner Symphonieorchesters, betheiligten, war eine recht sympathische.

Als Mittelnummer des Programms wurde eine Novität, eine Sonate für Violine und Klavier von Sigismond Stojowski dargeboten. Der Komponist selbst spielte den Klavierpart. Der erste Satz der Sonate ist der unbedeutendste. Er enthält keine gehaltvollen Themen, und deren Ausarbeitung ist bis zum direkt Uninteressanten konventionell. Der zweite Satz enthält einige hübsche Einfälle, die ein wenig nach Grieg schmecken; auch ist es geschickt und effektvoll gearbeitet. Die Variationen, die den letzten Satz bilden, erinnern mit ihren kanonischen Nachahmungen an den letzten Satz der César Franck'schen Sonate. Auch sie verrathen mehr Geschick der Mache, als der erste Satz. Es läßt sich nicht sagen, daß die Sonate als Ganzes einen starken Beweis für Stojowski's kompositorische Begabung gegeben hätte.

From N. Y. TRIBUNE,

Address

Date DEC 31 1905

At the concert of the Boston Symphony Quartet in Mendelssohn Hall on Tuesday evening Mr. Sigismund Stojowski will present himself in the character of a composer, as which he is well known in Europe, especially in Paris where in 1891 he produced a pianoforte concerto in F sharp minor, and in 1893 (at a Colonne concert) a symphony in D minor. Mr. Stojowski, when he came to New-York as professor of the pianoforte at the Institute of Musical Art, was hailed as a pupil of Paderewski. He did study with that artist, but it was after he had pursued to a finish regular courses in Cracow under Zelenski, and at the Paris Conservatoire where in 1887, 1888 and 1889 he was a pupil of Diemer in pianoforte playing and Delibes in composition. At his first concours he carried off the first prize in both classes. Besides the symphony and concerto mentioned he has composed the sonata for pianoforte and violin which he will play with Mr. Willy Hess next Tuesday, another sonata for pianoforte and violoncello, a set of variations for stringed instruments, an orchestral suite, many pieces for pianoforte, of which a serenade has been played in public by Paderewski and a piece for chorus and orchestra entitled "Le Printemps." Mr. Stojowski was born in Strelce, Poland, on May 2, 1870.

From NEW YORK SUN

Address

JAN 3 1906

BOSTON SYMPHONY QUARTET.

A New Piano and Violin Sonata by Stojowski Heard at Its Concert.

The Boston Symphony Quartet gave the first concert of its current season in Mendelssohn Hall last night. The programme consisted of Beethoven's quartet in B flat, opus 18, No. 6; Sigismond Stojowski's sonata in G major for piano and violin, opus 13, and Brahms's sextet for strings, opus 18, B flat major. Mr. Stojowski, who is a pupil of Paderewski and is at the head of the piano department of the Institute of Musical Art, played the piano part of his own composition, which was heard for the first time here.

It proved to be a graceful though not profound composition, written with feeling for Polish musical idioms and with temperament. The violin part is the more important of the two and affords abundant opportunities for a good player of impassioned style. It is a three movement sonata, with a scherzando movement in the middle and a theme and variations for the finale.

This finale is engaging in material and effective in construction. The first movement, however, is the most substantial of the three. Prof. Willy Hess, the leader of the quartet, played the violin part with splendid enthusiasm and brilliancy of style. Mr. Stojowski's treatment of the piano was somewhat modest, a rare trait in chamber music performance on the keyboard.

In the Brahms sextet, with which the concert concluded, the quartet had the aid of Max Zach, second viola, and J. Keller, second 'cello. The playing of the quartet in the Beethoven number was characterized by vigor and an impetuosity which carried the last movement to a pace somewhat too fast for polish. The weak spot in this organization last night seemed to be the 'cello, of which the tone was dry and lacking in vibrancy.

NEW YORK PRESS

JAN 3 - 1906

Boston Symphony Quartet.

Health, vigor and energy are the dominant characteristics of the Boston Symphony Quartet, which gave its first concert of the season last night in Mendelssohn Hall. These admirable traits are also prominent in the individual work of Willy Hess, the first violin, who unquestionably is the controlling spirit of the organization. As is often the case, however, the excellent qualities of these players are the source of their shortcomings, too. Health and energy when carried too far, may obliterate all signs of ingratiating sentiment. Temperamental impulse and dash, when not sufficiently curbed, may result not only in harshness of tone quality and lack of unanimity, but also in impure intonation. The Hessians were heard to best advantage in Beethoven's quartet in B flat major, opus 18, No. 6. But in Brahms's beautiful sextet in B flat major, opus 18, in which the services of Max Zach, viola player, and Josef Keller, 'cellist, were enlisted their faults were irritatingly in evidence. The theme of the andante was played in a singularly out and dried, unsympathetic manner; this movement as well as the final rondo (Poco allegretto graizioso) was taken at a relentlessly fast tempo; the dynamical balance of the whole performance was far from satisfactory, and the intonation was at times lamentable.

The remaining number on the programme was a novelty—Sigismond Stojowski's sonata for piano and violin, in G major, opus 13. It is doubtful whether the work will upset the musical equilibrium of New York, notwithstanding the fact that Stojowski is head of the piano department in the new musical institute, but it is a well-made, effective composition, written by a man who evidently knows the capacity of the violin as well as that of the piano, and it was performed brilliantly and con amore by Mr. Hess and the composer.

NEW YORK WORLD

JAN 3 - 1906

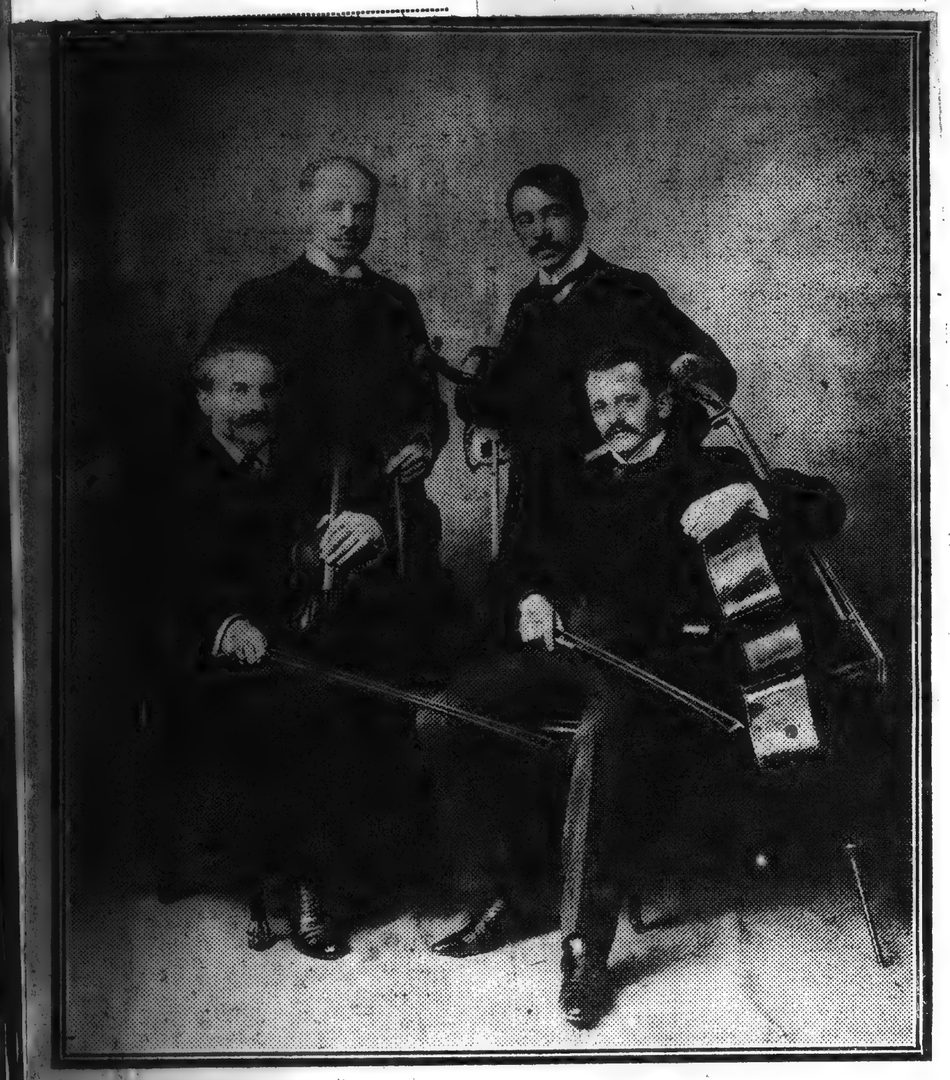
BOSTON SYMPHONY QUARTET

The Boston Symphony Quartet made its first appearance of this season at Mendelssohn Hall last night. This aggregation of players is made up of the four first players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the concertmaster of the orchestra, Willy Hess; the first viola, Emile Ferir; the first 'cellist, Henrich Warnke, and Otto Roth, who plays the second violin of the quartet.

The playing of these four artists showed them to be the exacting and conscientious performers they have long since proved to be by their orchestral work.

The programme began with Beethoven's quartet Op. No. 6 and concluded with Brahms's sextet, Op. No. 18, in which latter number this quartet had the assistance of two additional members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra —Max Zach, violin player, and Joseph Keller, violincellist. This quartet is to be heard here twice again during the present season.

New York Times
DEC 31 1905



Boston Symphony Quartet, at Mendelssohn Hall, Tuesday night.

New York Times
JAN 3 - 1906

BOSTON SYMPHONY QUARTET.

First Concert of Their Series of Three in Mendelssohn Hall.

A year ago Prof. Willy Hess, concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, gave the first concert here of the string quartet he had formed with the leading members of the string band of the orchestra, who had succeeded the members of the Kneisel Quartet in their positions. Now they come again to give a series of three concerts, the first of which took place last evening in Mendelssohn Hall. They have now the title of the Boston Symphony Quartet, emphasizing thus Mr. Higginson's intention of cultivating chamber music in the same way and on the same plane as he cultivates symphonic music; for the quartet has the same sort of support and backing as the orchestra.

The retirement of Mr. Krasselt, the first 'cellist of the orchestra, made necessary a corresponding change in the quartet through the substitution of Mr. Warnke, but at the other desks the same players sit—Mr. Roth as second violin, and Mr. Férir as viola. The organization has made a great gain in many of the qualities that constitute the excellences of a string quartet, notably in precision of ensemble and in the flexibility and freedom with which that precision is maintained. There is still something to be desired in beauty and distinction of tone, and a more perfect fusion of the four instruments will come with time.

The programme included Beethoven's quartet Op. 18, No. 6, a sonata for piano and violin by Sigismund Stajowski and Brahms's sextet in B flat Op. 18. In the last the quartet had the assistance of Max Zach, viola, and Josef Keller, violoncello. There were a splendid energy and elasticity in the playing of Beethoven's quartet, as well as much refinement and delicacy of nuance, and Brahms's superb sextet, one of his most spontaneous and original works, one that helped most in establishing his early reputation, was presented with vigor, if not with quite the same finish that marked the playing of the other.

Mr. Stojowski's sonata had a special interest as being the work of a musician now resident in New York. Mr. Stojowski is now at the head of the piano department of the Institute of Musical Art. He himself played the pinao part of his sonata and thus made his first public appearance here as a pianist. He has composed much, but very little of his more important work is known here. Both as a composer and as an executive artist he made an extremely agreeable impression. The sonata, which is in three movements, lacks the usual slow movement, a lack which is to a certain extent made up in the finale, a theme with variations.

It is neither very original nor very deep, but it is charming and graceful music, through which a copious fancy plays. There is nothing that storms the heights and nothing that grates upon the ear, but all is mellifluous and effectively, sometimes brilliantly, written for both the piano and the violin. The piquant rhythms of the first allegro, the suggestion of Polish turns of melody and expression in the allegretto capriccioso, the ingenious passages of imitation in both these movements, and the rich elaboration of the variations strike the listener with a sense of freshness and pleasure. Mr. Stojowski played the piano part with much crispness and delicacy, and Prof. Hess entered [illegible] into the spirit of the work.

[illegible] York Tämes
JAN 3 - 1906

Kammermusik.

Das „Bostoner Symphny Quartett" erschien gestern Abend, bei seinem ersten Konzert in Medelssohn Hall, in etwas anderer Zusammenstellung, als im Vorjahre: Krasselt, der Cellist, ist ausgeschieden und Heinrich Warnke ist an seine Stelle getreten. Willy Heß spielt aber nach wie vor die erste Violine, und er spielt sie manchmal ein wenig gar zu sehr als Erster; Otto Roth spielt die zweite Violine dagegen mit reichlich viel Diskretion, und Emile Ferir spielt die Viola.

Das Programm erlaubte gestern den vier Herren nur in einer Nummer sich als Quartettisten zu bethätigen, in dem letzten der sechs Quartette Opus 18 von Beethoven. Sorgfalt der Vorbereitung und gesunde Musikerschaft in der Ausführung ließen sich in allen vier Sätzen verspüren; aber in Bezug auf Ausfeilung des Vortrages und Abtönung der Nuancen bleibt noch ziemlich viel zu thun übrig. Manches sforzando kam gar zu brutal heraus. Nun, das Quartett ist jung, und wenn es seinen Personalbestand nicht so bald wieder zu ändern braucht, werden sich die Resultate einträchtlichen Zusammenarbeitens schon zeigen. Herr Heß aber sollte darnach trachten, das häufige „Pfeifen" der Saiten und das gelegentliche Kratzen des Bogens zu vermeiden.

Es scheint daß nur Uebereifer daran schuld ist.

Die Schlußnummer des Programms bildete das Brahms'sche Sextett in B-dur, opus 18 von Brahms. Die Ausführung, an der sich auch noch Max Zach und Joseph Keller, Mitglieder des Bostoner Symphonieorchesters, betheiligten, war eine recht sympathische.

Als Mittelnummer des Programms wurde eine Novität, eine Sonate für Violine und Klavier von Sigismond Stojowski dargeboten. Der Komponist selbst spielte den Klavierpart. Der erste Satz der Sonate ist der unbedeutendste. Er enthält keine gehaltvollen Themen, und deren Ausarbeitung ist bis zum direkt Uninteressanten konventionell. Der zweite Satz enthält einige hübsche Einfälle, die ein wenig nach Grieg schmecken; auch ist es geschickt und effektvoll gearbeitet. Die Variationen, die den letzten Satz bilden, erinnern mit ihren kanonischen Nachahmungen an den letzten Satz der César Franck'schen Sonate. Auch sie verrathen mehr Geschick der Mache, als der erste Satz. Es läßt sich nicht sagen, daß die Sonate als Ganzes einen starken Beweis für Stojowski's kompositorische Begabung gegeben hätte.

NEW YORK P[illegible]
DEC 31 1905

Reisenauer and Willy Hess will be the soloists respectively of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concerts on January 11 and 13. The pianist will be heard in Weber's "Concertstueck"; the violinist in Spohr's ninth concerto.

'shed: London, 1881; New York, 1884

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
NEW YORK EV'G POST
DEC 30 1905

The Boston Symphony Quartet, consisting of leading players in the Boston orchestra, will give a concert at Mendelssohn Hall next Tuesday evening with the assistance of Mr. S. Stojowski, Max Zach, Josef Keller. Programme: Beethoven's quartet in B flat, op. 18, a sonata for violin and piano by Stojowski, and the Brahms sextet in B flat.

NEW YORK HERALD
JAN 3 - 1906

BOSTON SYMPHONY QUARTET CONCERT

Organization Makes Its Reappearance in Mendelssohn Hall in Chamber Music Selections.

CHANGE IN ITS MEMBERSHIP

Mr. Heinrich Warnke Succeeds Mr. Rudolf Krasselt as Violoncellist, and Work of the Company Is Improved.

In a chamber music concert which had several features of special interest the Boston Symphony Quartet made its reappearance in Mendelssohn Hall last night.

Since this organization was first heard here last year its membership has undergone a change in the substitution of Mr. Heinrich Warnke for Mr. Rudolf Krasselt as violoncellist. It is fair to say, in the light of the quartet's playing last night, both that this change has proved beneficial and that Professor Willy Hess has brought the combined work of the four instruments to an artistic point considerably in advance of that reached last year.

The chief soloist was Mr. Sigismond Stojowski, for whom the occasion served as a public introduction both as pianist and composer. Other assisting artists were Mr. Max Zach, violin, and Mr. Josef Keller, 'cellist.

The programme opened with Beethoven's familiar B flat major quartet, the sixth in opus 18. To this work the most painstaking study has evidently been brought by the men from Boston, and they played it not only with excellent balance and a great deal of dash, but frequently with high polish as well.

Mr. Stojowski's sonata for violin and piano followed, the composer at the keyboard. This piece proved dull as a whole, although well performed.

The programme closed with a vigorous but rather uneven interpretation of Brahm's sextet in B flat major, opus 18.

NEW YORK WORL[illegible]
ss
JAN 3 - 1906

BOSTON SYMPHONY QUARTET

The Boston Symphony Quartet made its first appearance of this season at Mendelssohn Hall last night. This aggregation of players is made up of the four first players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the concertmaster of the orchestra, Willy Hess; the first viola, Emile Forir; the first 'cellist, Henrich Warnke, and Otto Roth, who plays the second violin of the quartet.

The playing of these four artists showed them to be the exacting and conscientious performers they have long since proved to be by their orchestral work.

The programme began with Beethoven's quartet Op. No. 6 and concluded with Brahms's sextet, Op. No. 18, in which latter number this quartet had the assistance of two additional members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—Max Zach, violin player, and Joseph Kellar, violincellist. This quartet is to be heard here twice again during the present season.

[illegible] TRIBUNE
[illegible]
DEC 31 1905

At the concert of the Boston Symphony Quartet in Mendelssohn Hall on Tuesday evening Mr. Sigismund Stojowski will present himself in the character of a composer, as which he is well known in Europe, especially in Paris where in 1891 he produced a pianoforte concerto in F sharp minor, and in 1893 (at a Colonne concert) a symphony in D minor. Mr. Stojowski, when he came to New-York as professor of the pianoforte at the Institute of Musical Art, was hailed as a pupil of Paderewski. He did study with that artist, but it was after he had pursued to a finish regular courses in Cracow under Zelenski, and at the Paris Conservatoire where in 1887, 1888 and 1889 he was a pupil of Diemer in pianoforte playing and Delibes in composition. At his first concours he carried off the first prize in both classes. Besides the symphony and concerto mentioned he has composed the sonata for pianoforte and violin which he will play with Mr. Willy Hess next Tuesday, another sonata for pianoforte and violoncello, a set of variations for stringed instruments, an orchestral suite, many pieces for pianoforte, of which a serenade has been played in public by Paderewski and a piece for chorus and orchestra entitled "Le Printemps." Mr. Stojowski was born in Strelce, Poland, on May 2, 1870.

[illegible] NEW YORK SU[illegible]
[illegible]
JAN 3 1906

BOSTON SYMPHONY QUARTET.

A New Piano and Violin Sonata by Stojowski Heard at Its Concert.

The Boston Symphony Quartet gave the first concert of its current season in Mendelssohn Hall last night. The programme consisted of Beethoven's quartet in B flat, opus 18, No. 6; Sigismond Stojowski's sonata in G major for piano and violin, opus 13, and Brahms's sextet for strings, opus 18, B flat major. Mr. Stojowski, who is a pupil of Paderewski and is at the head of the piano department of the Institute of Musical Art, played the piano part of his own composition, which was heard for the first time here.

It proved to be a graceful though not profound composition, written with feeling for Polish musical idioms and with temperament. The violin part is the more important of the two and affords abundant opportunities for a good player of impassioned style. It is a three movement sonata, with a scherzando movement in the middle and a theme and variations for the finale.

This finale is engaging in material and effective in construction. The first movement, however, is the most substantial of the three. Prof. Willy Hess, the leader of the quartet, played the violin part with splendid enthusiasm and brilliancy of style. Mr. Stojowski's treatment of the piano was somewhat modest, a rare trait in chamber music performance on the keyboard.

In the Brahms sextet, with which the concert concluded, the quartet had the aid of Max Zach, second viola, and J. Keller, second 'cello. The playing of the quartet in the Beethoven number was characterized by vigor and an impetuosity which carried the last movement to a pace somewhat too fast for polish. The weak spot in this organization last night seemed to be the 'cello, of which the tone was dry and lacking in vibrancy.

NEW YORK PRE[illegible]
ss
JAN 3 - 1906

Boston Symphony Quartet.

Health, vigor and energy are the dominant characteristics of the Boston Symphony Quartet, which gave its first concert of the season last night in Mendelssohn Hall. These admirable traits are also prominent in the individual work of Willy Hess, the first violin, who unquestionably is the controlling spirit of the organization. As is often the case, however, the excellent qualities of these players are the source of their shortcomings, too. Health and energy when carried too far, may obliterate all signs of ingratiating sentiment. Temperamental impulse and dash, when not sufficiently curbed, may result not only in harshness of tone quality and lack of unanimity, but also in impure intonation. The Hessians were heard to best advantage in Beethoven's quartet in B flat major, opus 18, No. 6. But in Brahms's beautiful sextet in B flat major, opus 18, in which the services of Max Zach, viola player, and Josef Keller, 'cellist, were enlisted their faults were irritatingly in evidence. The theme of the andante was played in a singularly cut and dried, unsympathetic manner; this movement as well as the final rondo (Poco allegretto grazioso) was taken at a relentlessly fast tempo; the dynamical balance of the whole performance was far from satisfactory, and the intonation was at times lamentable.

The remaining number on the programme was a novelty—Sigismond Stojowski's sonata for piano and violin, in G major, opus 13. It is doubtful whether the work will upset the musical equilibrium of New York, notwithstanding the fact that Stojowski is head of the piano department in the new musical institute, but it is a well-made, effective composition, written by a man who evidently knows the capacity of the violin as well as that of the piano, and it was performed brilliantly and con amore by Mr. Hess and the composer.

Address
Date JAN -- 1906

Of concerts there has been a glut; and of prime importance among all of them was the novelty introduced by the Boston Symphony Orchestra of having brought over to this country Vincent d'Indy, the eminent French composer. At the head of the Boston men he conducted works of the new French school, including some of his own compositions, giving two entire programmes up to that purpose. It must be frankly admitted that the affairs proved very tedious. The d'Indy symphony did not reveal any new beauties under the baton of its composer, and a Chausson work of the same genre proved but little better. Some short compositions by Magnard, Faure, Debussy, Dukas, d'Indy and César Franck spiced the two affairs with variety and novelty. But two whole programmes of the modern French in music are about one and one-half too many for our restless ears. The chief disappointment, however, lay in d'Indy himself, who proved to be a conductor of little personality—if one is to judge by the efect he had upon the men who played under him—and one who told us little new about the works by himself and his own countrymn. He beats time with his head mostly in the score and not—as the old comparison suggested—with the score in his head; and the men follow as this body of excellent players would follow any leader. But of huge moments of exquisite shadings there are none that stamp d'Indy a great conductor. His visit to this country was an interesting departure for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, but it was principally the interest of anticipation. To much greater advantage was the Kneisel Quartet concert at which two-thirds of the programme was devoted to d'Indy's music, the composer playing the piano part of one of the early quartets himself. The latter one of these two works presented was a highly interesting and at times a fascinating one, most cleverly made, and wonderfully played by the Kneisels. D'Indy's visit to this country will be remembered more by music historians than it will be recalled by music lovers.

RARDY
st appearing here this season

Hall
KIRKBY LUNN
English contralto who will appear with the New York Oratorio Society in February

...s
DEC 31 1905

The third pair of Boston Symphony Concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, Jan. 11, and on Saturday afternoon, Jan. 13. The soloist at the first concert will be Alfred Reisenauer, and at the second concert Prof. Willy Hess. Mr. Reisenauer will play Weber's "Concertstück" for piano and orchestra, and Prof. Hess will play Spohr's ninth concerto for the violin. The other numbers on the Thursday evening programme will be Rubin Goldmark's overture "Hiawatha," Tschaikowsky's orchestral fantasia "Francesca da Rimini," and Brahms's symphony, No. 2, in D major. The orchestral numbers to be played on Saturday afternoon, Jan. 13, will be Schumann's symphony, No. 1, in B flat; Richard Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel's lustige Streiche" and Elgar's overture "In the South."

+ + +

rom HERALD
ddress BALTIMORE MD

The Third Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert.

The third Boston Symphony Orchestra concert will be given at the Lyric on Wednesday evening January 10. The soloist will be the pianist, Alfred Neisenauer, who will play Weber's "Concertstuck" for piano and orchestra. The other works on the program will be Schumann's symphony No. 1 in B flat, Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" and Sir Edward Elgar's overture, "In the South."

N. Y. EVG. SUN
JAN - 1 1906

These are busy days, but what shall be said of the second week immediately following? Then the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play twice or thrice, while Safonoff will devote a special Philharmonic pair to the Tschaikowsky "Pathétique." The New York Symphony Orchestra will be heard both before and after, on two successive Sundays and Tuesdays, under Walter Damrosch and Felix Weingartner, respectively. The Philadelphia Orchestra, with a new pianist, Arthur Rubinstein, will return to town. Five great concerts rang the old year out. A full score in its first fortnight ring the new year in. Twenty in two weeks! Whoever heard the like of it; before this greatest season of great American orchestras?

INDEPENDENT
NEW YORK CITY,
DEC 28 1905

Boston Symphony Orchestra in Modern French Music

For the first time in its history the December concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra were presided over by another than its regular conductor. The visiting conductor was M. Vincent d'Indy, of Paris, the recognized leader of the latest "movement" in French music, as Mr. G. W. Harris told our readers two weeks ago.

M. d'Indy's visit was the most interesting and important event of the present "music season." He came not as a "star" conductor to exploit his own virtuosity, but as a composer and as the bringer of good and worthy new music by other composers of the school he represents. The Boston Symphony Orchestra is just about as nearly perfect as any to be found the world around, and the performances in which M. d'Indy took part were all on the high plane of dignified artistic endeavor with which its ministrations have long made us familiar. Most of the music he played, despite many strange new elements in it, was extremely interesting and admirable.

The most important work on his programs was his own Second Symphony, in B flat, opus 57—a big thing, in the best meaning of that term; replete with learning, wrought out with consummate skill in orchestral writing, almost forbiddingly difficult in parts and at times austere to the verge of harshness; yet, as a whole, noble, impressive and compelling in its appeal.

M. d'Indy's "Saugefleurie" (Wild Sage) Legend for orchestra, after one of Robert de Bonnières's dainty little fairy tales in verse, proved to be an altogether happy piece of musical narration, as pretty, graceful and dainty as the poem it illustrates. His "Istar" symphonic variations, a work which a Bordeaux professor has styled "an inductive symphony" (because in it the composer "by degrees unfolds from initial complexity the simple idea which was wrapped up therein, and appears only at the close, like Isis unveiled, like a scientific law discovered and formulated") is again a tone-poem of beauty, originality, imagination and power.

Alberic Magnard's "Chant funèbre" was a very doleful dirge indeed, and much too long. But the rest of M. d'Indy's offering—Gabriel Fauré's "Pelleas et Melisande" suite, Ernest Chausson's B flat symphony, César Franck's "Psyche and Eros," Claude Debussy's fascinating "Nocturnes," and "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," a jocund scherzo by Paul Dukas—is all music that will bear repeated performance here. M. Vincent d'Indy will be cordially welcomed, should he ever care to come again to America.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau
From NEW YORK SUN
Address
DEC 31 1905

The third pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, January 11, and on Saturday afternoon, January 13. The soloist at the Thursday concert will be Alfred Reisenauer and on Saturday afternoon Prof. Willy Hess, Mr. Reisenauer playing Weber's "Concertstück" and Mr. Hess Spohr's ninth concerto for the violin. The other numbers on Thursday evening's programme will be Rubin Goldmark's overture, "Hiawatha"; Tschaikowsky's "Francesca da Rimini," and Brahms's Symphony, No. 2, in D major. The orchestral numbers for Saturday afternoon will be Schumann's Symphony, No. 1, in B flat; Richard Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegels lustige Streiche" and Elgar's overture, "In the South."

Standard Union
Brooklyn, N. Y.
DEC 30 1905

The third Boston symphony concert will be given in the Baptist Temple on Friday evening, Jan. 12. The soloist will be the distinguished German pianist, Alfred Reisenauer. He will play Weber's "Concertstuck," a most attractive work which is all too seldom heard in our concert halls. The rest of the programme will be Mendelssohn's overture, "A Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage," Beethoven's Symphony No. 6, in F major; the "Pastoral"; the prelude to Act III. of Humperdinck's "Konigskinder," and Liszt's symphonic poem, No. 2, "Tasso: Lamento and Trionfo."

NEW YORK CITY,
JAN 3 - 1906

MUSIC FOR STRI... AND BY A PIA...

Boston Symphony Quartet and Alf... Reisenauer Concert-Givers at Mendelssohn Hall.

The Boston Symphony Quartet, comprising Messrs. Willy Hess, Otto Roth, Emile Ferir and Heinrich Warn... all of them distinguished members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, began last night a series of three concerts at Mendelssohn Hall. A good audience came out to hear the organization, and the impression carried away was one of spirited and generally well-balanced performances.

The programme included Beethoven's early quartet in B flat major, opus 18, No. 6; a sonata for violin and piano by Sigismund Stojowski, in G major, opus 18, and Brahms's string sextet in B flat major, opus 18. Mr. Stojowski, who is the latest recruit to the city's group of resident pianists, assisted in his sonata, while Max Zach, viola, and Josef Keller, 'cello, helped the quartet in the Brahms piece.

The general effect of the four strings heard by themselves only in the Beethoven music, was, as already stated, pleasing. The combined tone had solidity, clarity and elasticity. The three lower voices each contributed in due proportion, and their singing was sustained and of a fine breadth and quality.

If Mr. Hess were a thought less dominating, his playing would doubtless be freer from scratching and from flaws of intonation than it was last night. It would also be the better for a little more restraint, a firmer poise, an avoidance of violent contrasts.

Mr. Stojowski's sonata is well made, and it declares a clear allegiance to the creed that melody is the soul of music. The themes are distinct, but not distinguished; they have also a northern, almost a Scandinavian tinge, rather than any discernible Polish character. The second and third movements were more ingratiating than the first. The composer proved himself a pianist of excellent powers, with a firm but liquid touch and all the technique demanded by the score. Mr. Stojowski will soon appear again in concert, when his qualities will doubtless be further disclosed.

The Brahms sextet played last night is not often heard here. It is one of the Hamburg composer's least interesting pieces of concerted music, and even the skillful efforts of Mr. Hess and his colleagues could not disguise the fact.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
n N. YORK EV'G POST

Boston Symphony Quartet.

When the Kneisel Quartet first began to give concerts in New York it had small audiences—like the one that heard the concert given at Mendelssohn Hall last night by the Boston Symphony Quartet. But if this Quartet continues to improve as it has since last year, it may share the happy fate of the Kneisels, although it cannot be denied that, generally speaking, a good deal more chamber music is offered in this city than the public cares for. Prof. Hess and his associates were not particularly happy in their programme. Beethoven's quartet, op. 18, No. 6, is one of his weakest works, though it has interesting details. It was played with much spirit and excellent precision, while the euphony and intonation here and there left something to be desired. At the other end of the programme was the famous Brahms sextet, op. 18, which was also well played, on the whole. In the middle number a sonata for violin and piano, the composer, Mr. Sigismond Stojowski, played the pianoforte part with easy technique, but rather dryly. It is a work of which the first and third movements seemed empty and tiresome. The allegretto capriccioso has a dainty theme, which takes hold of the memory.

[144]

From ... CITY.
Address ...
Date ...

Of concerts there has been a glut; and of prime importance among all of them was the novelty introduced by the Boston Symphony Orchestra of having brought over to this country Vincent d'Indy, the eminent French composer. At the head of the Boston men he conducted works of the new French school, including some of his own compositions, giving two entire programmes up to that purpose. It must be frankly admitted that the affairs proved very tedious. The d'Indy symphony did not reveal any new beauties under the baton of its composer, and a Chausson work of the same genre proved but little better. Some short compositions by Magnard, Faure, Debussy, Dukas, d'Indy and César Franck spiced the two affairs with variety and novelty. But two whole programmes of the modern French in music are about one and one-half too many for our restless ears. The chief disappointment, however, lay in d'Indy himself, who proved to be a conductor of little personality—if one is to judge by the efect he had upon the men who played under him—and one who told us little new about the works by himself and his own countrymen. He beats time with his head mostly in the score and not—as the old comparison suggested—with the score in his head; and the men follow as this body of excellent players would follow any leader. But of huge moments of exquisite shadings there are none that stamp d'Indy a great conductor. His visit to this country was an interesting departure for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, but it was principally the interest of anticipation. To much greater advantage was the Kneisel Quartet concert at which two-thirds of the programme was devoted to d'Indy's music, the composer playing the piano part of one of the early quartets himself. The latter one of these two works presented was a highly interesting and at times a fascinating one, most cleverly made, and wonderfully played by the Kneisels. D'Indy's visit to this country will be remembered more by music historians than it will be recalled by music lovers.

RARDY
t appearing here this season

Hall
KIRKBY LUNN
English contralto who will appear with the New York Oratorio Society in February

...s ...

The third pair of Boston Symphony Concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, Jan. 11, and on Saturday afternoon, Jan. 13. The soloist at the first concert will be Alfred Reisenauer, and at the second concert Prof. Willy Hess. Mr. Reisenauer will play Weber's "Concertstück" for piano and orchestra, and Prof. Hess will play Spohr's ninth concerto for the violin. The other numbers on the Thursday evening programme will be Rubin Goldmark's overture "Hiawatha," Tschaikowsky's orchestral fantasia "Francesca da Rimini," and Brahms's symphony, No. 2, in D major. The orchestral numbers to be played on Saturday afternoon, Jan. 13, will be Schumann's symphony, No. 1, in B flat; Richard Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel's lustige Streiche" and Elgar's overture "In the South."

+ + +

rom ...
ddress ...

The Third Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert.

The third Boston Symphony Orchestra concert will be given at the Lyric on Wednesday evening January 10. The soloist will be the pianist, Alfred Neisenauer, who will play Weber's "Concertstuck" for piano and orchestra. The other works on the program will be Schumann's symphony No. 1 in B flat, Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" and Sir Edward Elgar's overture, "In the South."

...ss ...

These are busy days, but what shall be said of the second week immediately following? Then the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play twice or thrice, while Safonoff will devote a special Philharmonic pair to the Tschaikowsky "Pathétique." The New York Symphony Orchestra will be heard both before and after, on two successive Sundays and Tuesdays, under Walter Damrosch and Felix Weingartner, respectively. The Philadelphia Orchestra, with a new pianist, Arthur Rubinstein, will return to town. Five great concerts rang the old year out. A full score in its first fortnight ring the new year in. Twenty in two weeks! Whoever heard the like of it; before this greatest season of great American orchestras?

INDEPENDENT
NEW YORK CITY,
DEC 28 1905

Boston Symphony Orchestra in Modern French Music

For the first time in its history the December concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra were presided over by another than its regular conductor. The visiting conductor was M. Vincent d'Indy, of Paris, the recognized leader of the latest "movement" in French music, as Mr. G. W. Harris told our readers two weeks ago.

M. d'Indy's visit was the most interesting and important event of the present "music season." He came not as a "star" conductor to exploit his own virtuosity, but as a composer and as the bringer of good and worthy new music by other composers of the school he represents. The Boston Symphony Orchestra is just about as nearly perfect as any to be found the world around, and the performances in which M. d'Indy took part were all on the high plane of dignified artistic endeavor with which its ministrations have long made us familiar. Most of the music he played, despite many strange new elements in it, was extremely interesting and admirable.

The most important work on his programs was his own Second Symphony, in B flat, opus 57—a big thing, in the best meaning of that term; replete with learning, wrought out with consummate skill in orchestral writing, almost forbiddingly difficult in parts and at times austere to the verge of harshness; yet, as a whole, noble, impressive and compelling in its appeal.

M. d'Indy's "Saugefleurie" (Wild Sage) Legend for orchestra, after one of Robert de Bonnières's dainty little fairy tales in verse, proved to be an altogether happy piece of musical narration, as pretty, graceful and dainty as the poem it illustrates. His "Istar" symphonic variations, a work which a Bordeaux professor has styled "an inductive symphony" (because in it the composer "by degrees unfolds from initial complexity the simple idea which was wrapped up therein, and appears only at the close, like Isis unveiled, like a scientific law discovered and formulated") is again a tone-poem of beauty, originality, imagination and power.

Alberic Magnard's "Chant funèbre" was a very doleful dirge indeed, and much too long. But the rest of M. d'Indy's offering—Gabriel Fauré's "Pelleas et Melisande" suite, Ernest Chausson's B flat symphony, César Franck's "Psyche and Eros," Claude Debussy's fascinating "Nocturnes," and "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," a jocund scherzo by Paul Dukas—is all music that will bear repeated performance here. M. Vincent d'Indy will be cordially welcomed, should he ever care to come again to America.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau
From ...
Address ...

The third pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, January 11, and on Saturday afternoon, January 13. The soloist at the Thursday concert will be Alfred Reisenauer and on Saturday afternoon Prof. Willy Hess. Mr. Reisenauer playing Weber's "Concertstück" and Mr. Hess Spohr's ninth concerto for the violin. The other numbers on Thursday evening's programme will be Rubin Goldmark's overture, "Hiawatha"; Tschaikowsky's "Francesca da Rimini," and Brahms's Symphony, No. 2, in D major. The orchestral numbers for Saturday afternoon will be Schumann's Symphony, No. 1, in B flat; Richard Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegels lustige Streiche" and Elgar's overture, "In the South."

...k, 1884

Standard Union
Brooklyn, N. Y.
JAN 3 0 1906

The third Boston symphony concert will be given in the Baptist Temple on Friday evening, Jan. 12. The soloist will be the distinguished German pianist, Alfred Reisenauer. He will play Weber's "Concertstuck," a most attractive work which is all too seldom heard in our concert halls. The rest of the programme will be Mendelssohn's overture, "A Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage," Beethoven's Symphony No. 6, in F major; the "Pastoral" the prelude to Act III. of Humperdinck's "Konigskinder," and Liszt's symphonic poem, No. 2, "Tasso: His Lament and Triumph."

[144]

MAY
NEW YORK CITY,
JAN 3 - 1906

MUSIC FOR STRINGS AND BY A PIANIST

Boston Symphony Quartet and Alfred Reisenauer Concert-Givers at Mendelssohn Hall.

The Boston Symphony Quartet, comprising Messrs. Willy Hess, Otto Roth, Emile Ferir and Heinrich Warnke, all of them distinguished members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, began last night a series of three concerts at Mendelssohn Hall. A good audience came out to hear the organization, and the impression carried away was one of spirited and generally well-balanced performances.

The programme included Beethoven's early quartet in B flat major, opus 18, No. 6; a sonata for violin and piano by Sigismund Stojowski, in G major, opus 13, and Brahms's string sextet in B flat major, opus 18. Mr. Stojowski, who is the latest recruit to the city's group of resident pianists, assisted in his sonata, while Max Zach, viola, and Josef Keller, 'cello, helped the quartet in the Brahms piece.

The general effect of the four strings, heard by themselves only in the Beethoven music, was, as already stated, pleasing. The combined tone had solidity, clarity and elasticity. The three lower voices each contributed in due proportion, and their singing was sustained and of a fine breadth and quality.

If Mr. Hess were a thought less dominating, his playing would doubtless be freer from scratching and from flaws of intonation than it was last night. It would also be the better for a little more restraint, a firmer poise, an avoidance of violent contrasts.

Mr. Stojowski's sonata is well made, and it declares a clear allegiance to the creed that melody is the soul of music. The themes are distinct, but not distinguished; they have also a northern, almost a Scandinavian tinge, rather than any discernible Polish character. The second and third movements were more ingratiating than the first. The composer proved himself a pianist of excellent powers, with a firm but liquid touch and all the technique demanded by the score. Mr. Stojowski will soon appear again in concert, when his qualities will doubtless be further disclosed.

The Brahms sextet played last night is not often heard here. It is one of the Hamburg composer's least interesting pieces of concerted music, and even the skillful efforts of Mr. Hess and his colleagues could not disguise the fact.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
YORK EV'G POS

Boston Symphony Quartet.

When the Kneisel Quartet first began to give concerts in New York it had small audiences—like the one that heard the concert given at Mendelssohn Hall last night by the Boston Symphony Quartet. But if this Quartet continues to improve as it has since last year, it may share the happy fate of the Kneisels, although it cannot be denied that, generally speaking, a good deal more chamber music is offered in this city than the public cares for. Prof. Hess and his associates were not particularly happy in their programme. Beethoven's quartet, op. 18, No. 6, is one of his weakest works, though it has interesting details. It was played with much spirit and excellent precision, while the euphony and intonation here and there left something to be desired. At the other end of the programme was the famous Brahms sextet, op. 18, which was also well played, on the whole. In the middle number a sonata for violin and piano, the composer, Mr. Sigismond Stojowski, played the pianoforte part with easy technique, but rather dryly. It is a work of which the first and third movements seemed empty and tiresome. The allegretto capriccioso has a dainty theme, which takes hold of the memory.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
GLOBE
NEW YORK COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER
JAN 3 - 1906

...Symphony Quartet gave ...first of its three concerts at ...Mendelssohn Hall last evening. ...players, with one exception, were ...that composed the quartet when ...a concert here last season. Mr. ..., 'cellist, now takes the place of ...rasselt, whom he succeeded as first ... of the Boston Symphony Or... The other players, as before, are ...Willy Hess, first violin; Otto Roth, ... violin; Emile Ferir, viola—all ... the Boston orchestra. Last night ... four were heard together in Bee... ...'s B-flat major quartet, op. 18. ... They had the assistance of Max ... viola, and Josef Keller, 'cello, in ...mann's sextet in B-flat major, op. 18. ...mund Stojowsky, now at the head of ... piano department of the Institute of ...usical Art, made his first appearance ... as a pianist, playing with Prof. ... his own sonata for violin and piano ... major.

...year ago the playing of this quartet ...eated four accomplished soloists who ...ened for the evening to be playing ...ther. Last night it was evident that ...ation and practice have gone far ...rd welding the four solo voices into ...quine ensemble. One quality of their ...g that makes the attainment of this ...t ensemble slow, though it promises ...nately splendid effectiveness, is the ...d temperament of the players and ...unusual dash and vitality of their ...ng. Prof. Hess, too, still dominates ...quartet a thought too much, and ex... as his playing was yesterday in ... more delicate passages he was by no ...ans certain of his tone. And Mr. ...rnke, skilful 'cellist though he is, was ...again disappointing through the thin, dry ...s of his instrument.

...Beethoven quartet and the Brahms ...ett were both played with abundant ...irit, and so was Mr. Stojowski's sonata, ...which was heard for the first time here. ...The sonata is agreeable music, and Mr. ...Stojowski is an admirable ensemble ...pianist.

N. Y. EV'G SUN
JAN 3 - 1906

The Boston Symphony Quartet, which ...ened its season at Mendelssohn Hall last ...ght, did not have to go begging very far ...r an audience. Even in the same year ...th fifty chamber music shows, and the ...Marum, the Schulz, the Flonzaley, the Olive ...Mead and other quartets immediately to ...follow, there was serious interest in four ...e men from the East. For theirs is the ...est graft or budding of that Wizard ...bank of music, Col. Higginson, upon ...stern and rockbound parent stock. The ...ston Symphony Orchestra has previously ...ded sports and off-shoots like the ...heisels, the Longy Club, the Adamowski ..., and has supplied no small share of ...best music heard in America for the ...t twenty-five years. Anything with the ...ston Symphony hallmark was sure of a ...st hearing.

...e orchestra since last year has taken ...o itself a new 'cellist in Krasselt's place, ...the quartet presented one change of ...rsonnel. Willy Hess, Otto Roth and Emil ...r remained, while the free and manly ...rick Warnke was naturally the least ...mitted" in the ensemble of an open... ...eethoven quartet, op. 18, No. 6. As... ...tion of any previous condition or ...requires time in anti-imperialist ... When Max Zach, viola, and Josef ... 'cello, were further added for the ...ding sextet, op. 18, of Brahms, the ...ions numbers—in particular, the ...scherzo—were like a whole Boston ...heard over long distance tele...

...soloist, a New Yorker appeared, and ...mund Stojowski turned the musical ...e upside down by abstracting melody ...modesty itself. Instead of heaping ...n Pelion in the grand piano style, he ...first composed an excellent sonata ...the piano part utterly subordinate to ...violin, and then he played it last night ...a self-abnegation that gave the glory ...entirely to Prof. Hess. We don't know all ...Prof. Stojowski's friends were saying ...in lightning French in the lobby ...They might truly have told him ...modesty, unique among the million ...was deserving of violets, not to ...ore. He plays a recital shortly.

INQUIRER
PHILA., PA.
DEC 31 1905

...Symphony Concert.

...n Symphony concert will be ...Music on Monday even... ...being Mr. Timothee ...owski will play a new ...orchestra by Gustav ...of the members of the orchestra. Mr. Strube ...

From Wy Tribune
Address
Date Jan 2-06

MUSIC.

The Boston Quartet.

That the kernel of the Boston Symphony Orchestra should be a body of chamber music players seems to have been a part of Major Higginson's purpose ever since he called his noble concert organization into existence. For nearly two decades Mr. Franz Kneisel and the artists whom he gathered around him fulfilled the lovely mission with ever increasing efficiency, and carried the evangel of the highest chastity, beauty and seriousness in music throughout the length and breadth of the land.

Then came the time when orchestral duties and labors became onerous and threatened interference with the higher work. The missioners ceased to be a voice crying in the wilderness; a hundred congregations were eagerly awaiting their refining ministrations, and they took the step which enabled them to devote themselves wholly to the higher calling. Their places were supplied and the newcomers were organized into a body and sent out to follow in the footsteps of their predecessors. The first experiment was a failure; the second was not. A highly efficient string quartet is not created in a day, however, no matter how excellent its material. Much time, great labor, whole-hearted and self-sacrificing devotion are necessary to bring the members into a harmonious manner of thinking and feeling. When Professor Hess and his companions visited us last season it was made plain that the material was efficient, though not as homogeneous as was desirable. There has been a change in the personnel, Mr. Warnke taking the place of Mr. Krasselt as player of the violoncello; but also there has been a change in the particular most highly essential. That was the first observation invited by the concert given in Mendelssohn Hall last night. The quartet is rapidly acquiring homogeneity of utterance and an individual style and voice. Professor Hess still dominates it, perhaps a little unduly, but his associates have gained greater freedom and the readings of the body greater elasticity.

The fine virile spirit spoke out of the last two movements of Beethoven's quartet in B flat (op. 18, No. 6), which opened the meeting, though the performance suffered from an unruly E string on the first violin, which "piped and whistled in his sound" unintermittently. Splendid energy, sanity, lucidity and eloquence spoke also in the sextet in the same key by Brahms which brought the concert to a close, in the performance of which Messrs. Hess, Roth, Ferir and Warnke had the capable assistance of Max Zach, viola, and Josef Keller, violoncello, also members of Mr. Gericke's Boston band.

Between quartet and sextet Messrs. Hess and Sigismond Stojowski played a sonata for violin and pianoforte composed by the pianist, a Polish musician of excellent repute abroad, who has joined New-York's artistic colony. So admirable was the performance of both artists that the beauties of the composition were carried home to the consciousness of every hearer. The sonata is not of the heaven storming order. It is content to proclaim sensuous beauty, to give pleasure. Yet in its structure there is an interesting intellectual irritant. From beginning to end of its first two movements there is ingenious dalliance with close canonic imitation. The finale is a theme and variations in which the desire for sustained melody is gratified and also the Slavic love for national color. The instruments move with gracious interdependence, and thus illustrate capitally one achievement of modernity. The audience that heard the concert was not numerous, but in it were scores of intelligent and devoted lovers of chamber music, and their applause was frequent and cordial.

PRESS
PHILA., PA
DEC 31 1905

The third Boston symphony concert will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, January 8, the soloist being Timothee Adamowski. Mr. Adamowski will play a new concerto for violin and orchestra by Gustav Strube, one of the members of the orchestra. The concerto, which is the second Mr. Strube has written for violin, is in F sharp minor. Adamowski played it in Boston on December 22 and 23 with much success, the verdict being that it was a very valuable addition to the literature for the violin. The other numbers will be Rubin Goldmark's overture "Hiawatha;" Tschaikowsky's "Francesca da Rimini" and Brahms' Symphony No. 2, in D major.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
PUBLIC LEDGER
PHILA., PA
DEC 31 1905

A new concerto for violin and orchestra by Gustav Strube will be given at the next concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music on January 8.

The composer is a member of the orchestra, the new concerto being the second he has written for the violin. It was played in Boston, just before Christmas, the general verdict being most favorable. Mr. Adamowski will play the solo part. Rubin Goldmark's characteristic overture, "Hiawatha," is also announced for this concert, together with Tschaikowsky's "Francesca da Rimini." The symphony will be Brahms's ... in D major.

TELEGRAPH
PHILA., PA
DEC 30 1905

The third Boston Symphony concert will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, January 8, the soloist being Mr. Timothee Adamowski, Mr. Adamowski will play a new concerto for violin and orchestra by Gustav Strube, a member of the Orchestra. The concerto, which is the second Mr. Strube has written for the violin, is in F-sharp minor. Mr. Adamowski played it for the first time in Boston on December 22 and 23 with much success, the verdict being that it was a very valuable addition to the literature for the violin. The other numbers will be Rubin Goldmark's overture "Hiawatha;" Tschaikowsky's "Francesca da Rimini" and Brahms' Symphony No. 2 in D major.

RECORD
PHILA.
DEC 31 1905

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Adamowski to Be the Soloist at Coming Concert.

The third Boston Symphony Concert will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, January 8, the soloist being Timothee Adamowski. Adamowski will play a new concerto for violin and orchestra by Gustav Strube, one of the members of the Orchestra. The concerto, which is the second Mr. Strube has written for violin, is in F-sharp minor. Mr. Adamowski played it in Boston on December 22 and 23 with much success, the verdict being that it was a very valuable addition to the literature for the violin. The other numbers will be Rubin Goldmark's overture "Hiawatha," Tschaikowsky's "Francesca da Rimini" and Brahms' Symphony No. 2, in D major.

NEW
BALTIMORE, MD
DEC 30 1905

REISENAUER AS SOLOIST.

Will Make His Appearance With Next Boston Symphony Concert.

The third Boston Symphony concert will be given at the Lyric on Wednesday evening, January 10. The soloist will be the distinguished pianist Alfred Reisenauer, who will play Weber's "Concertstueck" for piano and orchestra. The other works of the programme will be Schumann's Symphony No. 1 in B flat, Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" and Sir Edward Elgar's overture, "In the South."

...Union
...m
Brooklyn
...ress
JAN
...te

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The new string quartet which takes the place of the Kneisel organization in the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a concert last evening in Mendelssohn Hall, which established the local reputation of the performers at once. The members of the quartet are Willy Hess, concertmeister of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, first violin; Otto Roth, second violin; Emile Ferir, viola; and Heinrich Warnke, violoncello. The assisting artists were Sigismund Stojowski, piano; Max Zach, viola; Josef Keller, 'cello. The programme included the Beethoven quartet in B-flat major, op. 18, No. 6, and the Brahms sextet in B flat major, op. 13. The novelty was a sonata for violin and piano by Mr. Stojowski, played by Mr. Hess and the composer.

SUNDAY ...
Published Every Day in the Year.
VOL. CXIX. NO. 7.
SUNDAY, JAN. 7, 1906.

FAMILIAR PIECES GAVE PLEASURE

Symphony Concert Greatly Enjoyed—The Overture to "Hiawatha" Pleasing, but Name Not Inappropriate.

MR. HESS EXCELLENT IN BEETHOVEN CONCERTO

Played with Ease of Accomplished Virtuoso and Taste of Sound Musician—Reisenauer Recital.

The Boston symphony orchestra gave its 11th concert last night in Symphony Hall. Mr. Gericke conducted. The programme was as follows:

Overture to "Hiawatha".....Rubin Goldmark
Concerto in D Major, for violin.....Beethoven
"Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks".....R. Strauss
Symphony in D Major, No. 2.....Brahms

This concert, though it was too long, gave great pleasure to many. Mr. Gericke has a peculiar gift for presenting Brahms in the best light, and the symphony chosen last night is one of the composer's most genial works. The Rondo of Strauss, which, when it was performed here, seemed to many highly respectable and earnest souls the music of a madman, and to some purists the abomination of desolation, now is accepted, yea, enjoyed, and it seems simple after acquaintance with Strauss'... "Heldenleben"... and "Don Quixote."

Rubin Goldmark is the nephew of his uncle, and he is thus handicapped, for, hearing his music, some watch intently to find traces of the composer of the "Sakuntala" overture, and all are bound to make comparisons. The "Hiawatha" overture was played here about six years ago, but we doubt whether anyone who heard it then remembered a section or even a phrase. The first inquiry after a second hearing is "Why Hiawatha?" As far as the significance or the color of the music is concerned, The piece might better be entitled "Bajazet" or "Nall." There is no suggestion of American forest life, there is no reminder of Lo, the poor Indian. And, by the way, how would any one differentiate in music between American forest life and the forest life of another country? This seems to be a reasonable question. The first thing to be avoided, of course, is any reminder of Seigfried.

Few German composers can escape from the hero when they portray a forest scene today. As soon as they enter the wood the trees begin to weave the old familiar spell, and the hearer expects every moment to see Mime enter and hear the dragon roar. Just as when a modern German composer gives a solo phrase to an English horn, Tristan is discovered on the stage.

Mr. Goldmark does not take us into Siegfried's forest, though now and then we catch glimpses of it, but he gives us little or no suggestion of fresh and free out-door life. His themes and harmonies are oriental in their languor and sultriness rather than occidental. In this respect the mulatto Coleridge-Taylor has fared better in his treatment of Longfellow's poem, but Mr. MacDowell has been more successful in his "Indian" suite, and not because he used Indian folk-tunes for some of his thematic material, but because he had the imagination of the western mind. Mr. Goldmark is an oriental, and his musical expression is that of his family.

Let all thought of "Hiawatha" be dismissed, and the hearer may well find a mild pleasure in the overture, for the music is sonorous and euphonious, there are pleasing themes, there are climaxes, and the workmanship is solid. These qualities are readily taken by some for individuality and imagination. Let us not be misunderstood. The overture was composed when Mr. Goldmark, then not a man of robust health, was 24 years old. It was composed when he was director of a conservatory. The music under these circumstances nevertheless was highly creditable to him. But he is the nephew of his uncle.

Mr. Hess gave an excellent performance of Beethoven's concerto. Some may have wished to hear him in another concerto, and we could easily sympathize with them. It would do Beethoven's concerto no harm to put it on the shelf for several years, as far as these Symphony concerts are concerned. But no one refused to pay Mr. Hess ready tribute for his performance. He played with the ease of the accomplished virtuoso and with the taste of the sound musician, and his triumph before the audience was complete.

We have heard "Till Eulenspiegel" played with a more marked flow of musical adventure and in a vein of more rollicking spirit. Last night there was once or twice the thought of disconnected episodes and Till taking his pleasure seriously, like Froissart's Englishmen. But with this exception the performance as a whole was orchestrally brilliant. Nor could Mr. Goldmark have complained in any respect, if he had been present, of the interpretation of his overture.

[45]

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
GLOBE
NEW YORK COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER
JAN 3 - 1906

THE Boston Symphony Quartet gave the first of its three concerts at Mendelssohn Hall last evening. The players, with one exception, were those that composed the quartet when it gave a concert here last season. Mr. Warnke, 'cellist, now takes the place of Mr. Krasselt, whom he succeeded as first 'cellist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The other players, as before, are Prof. Willy Hess, first violin; Otto Roth, second violin; Emile Ferir, viola—all from the Boston orchestra. Last night these four were heard together in Beethoven's B-flat major quartet, op. 18, No. 6. They had the assistance of Max Zach, viola, and Josef Keller, 'cello, in Brahms's sextet in B-flat major, op. 18. Sigismond Stojowsky, now at the head of the piano department of the Institute of Musical Art, made his first appearance here as a pianist, playing with Prof. Hess his own sonata for violin and piano in G major.

A year ago the playing of this quartet suggested four accomplished soloists who happened for the evening to be playing together. Last night it was evident that association and practice have gone far toward welding the four solo voices into a genuine ensemble. One quality of their playing that makes the attainment of this perfect ensemble slow, though it promises ultimately splendid effectiveness, is the marked temperament of the players and the unusual dash and vitality of their playing. Prof. Hess, too, still dominates the quartet a thought too much, and exquisite as his playing was yesterday in the more delicate passages he was by no means certain of his tone. And Mr. Warnke, skilful 'cellist though he is, was again disappointing through the thin, dry tone of his instrument.

The Beethoven quartet and the Brahms sextet were both played with abundant spirit, and so was Mr. Stojowski's sonata, which was heard for the first time here. The sonata is agreeable music, and Mr. Stojowski is an admirable ensemble pianist.

NEW YORK SUN
JAN 3 - 1906

The Boston Symphony Quartet, which opened its season at Mendelssohn Hall last night, did not have to go begging very far for an audience. Even in the same year with fifty chamber music shows, and the Marum, the Schulz, the Flonzaley, the Olive Mead and other quartets immediately to follow, there was serious interest in four wise men from the East. For theirs is the latest graft or budding of that Wizard Burbank of music, Col. Higginson, upon a stern and rockbound parent stock. The Boston Symphony Orchestra has previously yielded sports and off-shoots like the Kneisels, the Longy Club, the Adamowski Trio, and has supplied no small share of the best music heard in America for the last twenty-five years. Anything with the Boston Symphony hallmark was sure of a first hearing.

As the orchestra since last year has taken to itself a new 'cellist in Krasselt's place, so the quartet presented one change of personnel. Willy Hess, Otto Roth and Emil Ferir remained, while the free and manly Heinrich Warnke was naturally the least "assimilated" in the ensemble of an opening Beethoven quartet, op. 18, No. 6. Assimilation of any previous condition or race, requires time in anti-imperialist Boston. When Max Zach, viola, and Josef Keller, 'cello, were further added for the concluding sextet, op. 18, of Brahms, the sonorous numbers—in particular, the dashing scherzo—were like a whole Boston orchestra heard over long distance telephone.

For soloist, a New Yorker appeared, and M. Sigismund Stojowski turned the musical universe upside down by abstracting melody from modesty itself. Instead of heaping Ossa on Pelion in the grand piano style, he had first composed an excellent sonata with the piano part utterly subordinate to the violin, and then he played it last night in a self-abnegation that gave the glory entirely to Prof. Hess. We don't know all that Prof. Stojowski's friends were saying to him in lightning French in the lobby afterward. They might truly have told him that his modesty, unique among the million pianists, was deserving of violets, not to say an encore. He plays a recital shortly.

INQUIRER
PHILA., PA.
DEC 31 1905

The Boston Symphony Concert.

The third Boston Symphony concert will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, January 8, the soloist being Mr. Timothee Adamowski. Mr. Adamowski will play a new concerto for violin and orchestra by Gustav Strube, one of the members of the orchestra. The concerto, which is the second Mr. Strube has written for violin, is in F-sharp minor. Mr. Adamowski played it in Boston on December 22 and 23 with much success, the verdict being that it was a very valuable addition to the literature for the violin. The other numbers will be Rubin Goldmark's overture "Hiawatha," Tschaikowsky's "Francesca da Rimini" and Brahms' Symphony No. 2, in D major.

from N Y Tribune
address
date Jan 2 - 06

MUSIC.

The Boston Quartet.

That the kernel of the Boston Symphony Orchestra should be a body of chamber music players seems to have been a part of Major Higginson's purpose ever since he called his noble concert organization into existence. For nearly two decades Mr. Franz Kneisel and the artists whom he gathered around him fulfilled the lovely mission with ever increasing efficiency, and carried the evangel of the highest chastity, beauty and seriousness in music throughout the length and breadth of the land.

Then came the time when orchestral duties and labors became onerous and threatened interference with the higher work. The missioners ceased to be a voice crying in the wilderness; a hundred congregations were eagerly awaiting their refining ministrations, and they took the step which enabled them to devote themselves wholly to the higher calling. Their places were supplied and the newcomers were organized into a body and sent out to follow in the footsteps of their predecessors. The first experiment was a failure; the second was not. A highly efficient string quartet is not created in a day, however, no matter how excellent its material.

Much time, great labor, whole-hearted and self-sacrificing devotion are necessary to bring the members into a harmonious manner of thinking and feeling. When Professor Hess and his companions visited us last season it was made plain that the material was efficient, though not as homogeneous as was desirable. There has been a change in the personnel, Mr. Warnke taking the place of Mr. Krasselt as player of the violoncello; but also there has been a change in the particular most highly essential. That was the first observation invited by the concert given in Mendelssohn Hall last night. The quartet is rapidly acquiring homogeneity of utterance and an individual style and voice. Professor Hess still dominates it, perhaps a little unduly, but his associates have gained greater freedom and the readings of the body greater elasticity.

The fine virile spirit spoke out of the last two movements of Beethoven's quartet in B flat (op. 18 No. 6), which opened the meeting, though the performance suffered from an unruly E string on the first violin, which "piped and whistled in his sound" unintermittently. Splendid energy, sanity, lucidity and eloquence spoke also in the sextet in the same key by Brahms which brought the concert to a close, in the performance of which Messrs. Hess, Roth, Ferir and Warnke had the capable assistance of Max Zach, viola, and Josef Keller, violoncello, also members of Mr. Gericke's Boston band.

Between quartet and sextet Messrs. Hess and Sigismond Stojowski played a sonata for violin and pianoforte composed by the pianist, a Polish musician of excellent repute abroad, who has joined New-York's artistic colony. So admirable was the performance of both artists that the beauties of the composition were carried home to the consciousness of every hearer. The sonata is not of the heaven storming order. It is content to proclaim sensuous beauty, to give pleasure. Yet in its structure there is an interesting intellectual irritant. From beginning to end of its first two movements there is ingenious dalliance with close canonic imitation. The finale is a theme and variations in which the desire for sustained melody is gratified and also the Slavic love for national color. The instruments move with gracious interdependence, and thus illustrate capitally one achievement of modernity. The audience that heard the concert was not numerous, but in it were scores of intelligent and devoted lovers of chamber music, and their applause was frequent and cordial.

PRESS

The third Boston symphony concert will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, January 8, the soloist being Timothee Adamowski. Mr. Adamowski will play a new concerto for violin and orchestra by Gustav Strube, one of the members of the orchestra. The concerto, which is the second Mr. Strube has written for violin, is in F sharp minor. Adamowski played it in Boston on December 22 and 23 with much success, the verdict being that it was a very valuable addition to the literature for the violin. The other numbers will be Rubin Goldmark's overture "Hiawatha;" Tschaikowsky's "Francesca da Rimini" and Brahms' Symphony No. 2, in D major.

* * *

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
PUBLIC LEDGER
PHILA.
DEC 31 1905

A new concerto for violin and orchestra by Gustav Strube will be given at the next concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music on January 8.

The composer is a member of the orchestra, the new concerto being the second he has written for the violin. It was played in Boston, just before Christmas, the general verdict being most favorable. Mr. Adamowski will play the solo part. Rubin Goldmark's characteristic overture, "Hiawatha," is also announced for this concert, together with Tschaikowsky's "Francesca da Rimini." The symphony will be Brahms's No. 2 in D major.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau of the World
TELEGRAPH.
DEC 30 1905

The third Boston Symphony concert will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, January 8, the soloist being Mr. Timothee Adamowski. Mr. Adamowski will play a new concerto for violin and orchestra by Gustav Strube, a member of the Orchestra. The concerto, which is the second Mr. Strube has written for the violin, is in F sharp minor. Mr. Adamowski played it for the first time in Boston on December 22 and 23 with much success, the verdict being that it was a very valuable addition to the literature for the violin. The other numbers will be Rubin Goldmark's overture "Hiawatha," Tschaikowsky's "Francesca da Rimini," and Brahms' Symphony No. 2 in D major.

RECORD
DEC 31 1905

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Adamowski to Be the Soloist at Coming Concert.

The third Boston Symphony Concert will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, January 8, the soloist being Timothee Adamowski. Adamowski will play a new concerto for violin and orchestra by Gustav Strube, one of the members of the Orchestra. The concerto, which is the second Mr. Strube has written for the violin, is in F-sharp minor. Mr. Adamowski played it in Boston on December 22 and 23 with much success, the verdict being that it was a very valuable addition to the literature for the violin. The other numbers will be Rubin Goldmark's overture "Hiawatha," Tschaikowsky's "Francesca da Rimini" and Brahms' Symphony No. 2, in D major.

NEW YORK
DEC 31 1905

REISENAUER AS SOLOIST.

Will Make His Appearance With Next Boston Symphony Concert.

The third Boston Symphony concert will be given at the Lyric on Wednesday evening, January 10. The soloist will be the distinguished pianist Alfred Reisenauer, who will play Weber's "Concertstueck" for piano and orchestra. The other works of the programme will be Schumann's Symphony No. 1 in B flat, Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" and Sir Edward Elgar's overture, "In the South."

m
ress
te

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The new string quartet which takes the place of the Kneisel organization in the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a concert last evening in Mendelssohn Hall, which established the local reputation of the performers at once. The members of the quartet are Willy Hess, concertmeister of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, first violin; Otto Roth, second violin; Emile Ferir, viola; and Heinrich Warnke, violoncello. The assisting artists were Sigismund Stojowski, piano; Max Zach, viola; Josef Keller, 'cello. The programme included the Beethoven quartet in B-flat major, op. 18, No. 6, and the Brahms sextet in B flat major, op. 13. The novelty was a sonata for violin and piano by Mr. Stojowski, played by Mr. Hess and the composer.

SUNDAY HERALD
Published Every Day in the Year.
VOL. CXIX. NO. 7.
SUNDAY, JAN. 7, 1906.

FAMILIAR PIECES GAVE PLEASURE

Symphony Concert Greatly Enjoyed—The Overture to "Hiawatha" Pleasing, but Name Not Inappropriate.

MR. HESS EXCELLENT IN BEETHOVEN CONCERTO

Played with Ease of Accomplished Virtuoso and Taste of Sound Musician—Reisenauer Recital.

The Boston symphony orchestra gave its 11th concert last night in Symphony Hall. Mr. Gericke conducted. The programme was as follows:

Overture to "Hiawatha".....Rubin Goldmark
Concerto in D Major, for violin.....Beethoven
"Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks".....R. Strauss
Symphony in D Major, No. 2.....Brahms

This concert, though it was too long, gave great pleasure to many. Mr. Gericke has a peculiar gift for presenting Brahms in the best light, and the symphony chosen last night is one of the composer's most genial works. The Rondo, of Strauss, which, when it was performed here, seemed to many highly respectable and earnest souls the music of a madman, and to some purists the abomination of desolation, now is accepted, yea, enjoyed, and it seems simple after acquaintance with Strauss' "Heldenleben" and "Don Quixote."

Rubin Goldmark is the nephew of his uncle, and he is thus handicapped, for, hearing his music, some watch intently to find traces of the composer of the "Sakuntala" overture, and all are bound to make comparisons. The "Hiawatha" overture was played here about six years ago, but we doubt whether anyone who heard it then remembered a section or even a phrase. The first inquiry after a second hearing is "Why Hiawatha?" As far as the significance or the color of the music is concerned, The piece might better be entitled "Bajazet" or "Nali." There is no suggestion of American forest life, there is no reminder of Lo, the poor Indian. And, by the way, how would any one differentiate in music between American forest life and the forest life of another country? This seems to be a reasonable question. The first thing to be avoided, of course, is any reminder of Seigfried.

Few German composers can escape from the hero when they portray a forest scene today. As soon as they enter the wood the trees begin to weave the old familiar spell, and the hearer expects every moment to see Mime enter and hear the dragon roar. Just as when a modern German composer gives a solo phrase to an English horn, Tristan is discovered on the stage.

Mr. Goldmark does not take us into Siegfried's forest, though now and then we catch glimpses of it, but he gives us little or no suggestion of fresh and free out-door life. His themes and harmonies are oriental in their languor and sultriness rather than occidental. In this respect the mulatto Coleridge-Taylor has fared better in his treatment of Longfellow's poem, but Mr. MacDowell has been more successful in his "Indian" suite, and not because he used Indian folk-tunes for some of his thematic material, but because he had the imagination of the western mind. Mr. Goldmark is an oriental, and his musical expression is that of his family.

Let all thought of "Hiawatha" be dismissed, and the hearer may well find a mild pleasure in the overture, for the music is sonorous and euphonious, there are pleasing themes, there are climaxes, and the workmanship is solid. These qualities are readily taken by some for individuality and imagination. Let us not be misunderstood. The overture was composed when Mr. Goldmark, then not a man of robust health, was 24 years old. It was composed when he was director of a conservatory. The music under these circumstances nevertheless was highly creditable to him. But he is the nephew of his uncle.

Mr. Hess gave an excellent performance of Beethoven's concerto. Some may have wished to hear him in another concerto, and we could easily sympathize with them. It would do Beethoven's concerto no harm to put it on the shelf for several years, as far as these Symphony concerts are concerned. But no one refused to pay Mr. Hess ready tribute for his performance. He played with the ease of the accomplished virtuoso and with the taste of the sound musician, and his triumph before the audience was complete.

We have heard "Till Eulenspiegel" played with a more marked flow of musical adventure and in a vein of more rollicking spirit. Last night there was once or twice the thought of disconnected episodes and Till taking his pleasure seriously, like Froissart's Englishmen. But with this exception the performance as a whole was orchestrally brilliant. Nor could Mr. Goldmark have complained in any respect, if he had been present, of the interpretation of his overture.

MR. REISENAUER'S RE-

NEW DELIGHTS IN THE OLD MELODIES

Eleventh Symphony Concert Saturday Presented Strauss, Beethoven and Brahms Works.

The eleventh Symphony concert, though devoid of any new thing, had much to please in a serene and happy way. Even Richard Straus' "Till Eulenspiegel," that once made old Music Hall audiences sit up and wonder what stuff and nonsense was being uttered by the orchestra, is now "just as easy." And the rest was absolute placidity.

Goldmark, the younger, wrote his "Hiawatha" overture when he was traveling in the Rocky mountains, we are told. It bears no trace of any impression that the great out-of-doors might have made on a different composer. Coleridge-Taylor, the English negro, did infinitely better in flavor and suggestiveness before he had ever seen America. This work is merely a well made, pleasant overture of no distinction.

The Strauss tone-comedy grows clearer and really more beautiful with each hearing, although Saturday night's performance of it was not equal in spirit and effervescence to that of the Philadelphia orchestra last season under Strauss' own baton.

The peaceful and classic Brahms Symphony in D major made a very deep impression. Mr. Gericke is a master interpreter of the great Viennese, and his orchestra is responsive to his will, whether in this or any other work.

Mr. Hess played the Beethoven violin concerto with admirable care and taste, and was rapturously applauded.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, JAN 7, 1905.

Concert Master Willy Hess was the soloist at the 11th Symphony rehearsal and concert, playing the Beethoven D major violin concerto. The other program numbers were the overture to Goldmark's "Hiawatha," "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," Strauss and Brahms second symphony. The Hiawatha music has little of the typical Indian peculiarities of harmony and suggestiveness of rough life in the forest. Goldmark taking a more poetic view of his subject when arranging his tone pictures. It is a cleverly written work, fragmentary in most of its thematic material, some of which is admirably developed, and interesting as a whole. The performance was smooth, the excellence of the crescendo passages in the climax being worthy of special note. The phrases given to the horns were also played with splendid tonality.

Prof Hess has established himself in a prominent position by his playing, his musical endowments having been shown in many ways since he became a member of the orchestra, and his interpretation of Beethoven's great violin concerto further increased his artistic standing in this city. The concerto, with the problematic four D sharps and three cadenzas, is a masterpiece of its kind, and the player who can interpret it in the proper spirit is an artist beyond question. Mr Hess' reading of the first movement was about as satisfying as one could expect to hear, all the ornamentations being given with a musical beauty that left little to be desired as to purity, though a little fuller tone one would have been acceptable at times. In the second movement the pianissimo figurations were never lost, and every shade of the larghetto was shown in exquisite tonal colors. The closing part was, perhaps, the most brilliantly performed, for Mr Hess exhibited an abandon and a confidence in execution that he had not previously shown. The applause with which he was greeted at the close of the performance was so prolonged that the artist was recalled a half dozen times to the stage.

Richard Strauss evidently indulged in some musical pranks when he wrote the "Till Eulenspiegel" piece, for it is full of odd and chaotic measures, rapid changes in tempo, strange modulations and freakish instrumentation, a whimsical tone puzzle that amuses—and that's about all. The proper effect was produced by Mr Gericke's men who, after a splendid performance of the concerto, showed to equal advantage in this merry trifle by the audacious Richard. The Brahms symphony was given impressively.

There will be no Symphony concerts this week, as the orchestra will be away on its third monthly trip. For the next pair of concerts, Jan 19 and 20, Miss Adele Aus der Ohe will be the soloist, playing Beethoven's E-flat major pianoforte concerto. The symphony in B-flat major, by Ernest Chausson, will be played for the first time in Boston, and Weber's "Freischutz" overture and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Orpheus," will complete the program.

IN THE WORLD OF MUSIC

MR. HESS SURPRISES A SYMPHONY AUDIENCE

A Remarkable Performance of Beethoven's Violin Concerto—The Concerts of Next Week and Weeks to Come—Mr. Converse's First Opera—Sembrich in Boston Twenty-Two Years Ago and the Transcript's Impression of Her—A Grist of Musical Miscellany

Unless Mr. Hess is a man of very continuous inspiration, he will hardly play Beethoven's concerto for violin tonight as he played it yesterday afternoon. Not often in his life—it was easy to surmise—has he played as he did then, and certainly we that have watched him for more than a year as the concert-master of our orchestra have never guessed that even at his best such mastery of the power of sound and such feeling for the beauty of it lay in him. The many that have inadequately performed it have made Beethoven's concerto a cause for doubts and fears. Of a Kreisler, a Heerman, or an Ysaye at his best, we may expect it without such trepidation. But when we see our concert-masters week after week sitting at their desk at the head of the first violins, we are prone to forget that they also are virtuosi, though they do not wander every year or two half across the world. We used to do that with Mr. Kneisel until his playing of some concerto reminded us anew of his real worth. We have had hardly time as yet to become so accustomed to Mr. Hess. We are still in a measure discovering him, and there was surprise to heighten the impression—if it were not a Symphony concert sensation would be the word—that he made yesterday. On no Friday afternoon this winter has there been such spontaneous applause, and, much more significantly, such rapt listening as rewarded him.

In solo passages in his orchestral work, and in his own quartet, Mr. Hess has taught us to expect warmth and vigor in his playing. Yesterday they rose to controlled fire that burned the whiter because it was so tempered. The best quality of his tone is its bright life. It might be broader and deeper. Now and then it even misses some of the darker colorings of the music to which it is giving being and voice. But the glow of it is unmistakable and insistent. It sparkled through the rondo that ends the concerto. It touched brilliancy in the ceaseless ornament and elaboration of the opening allegro. It spread over the larghetto like sunshine burnishing the flowing stream of a still river. It is a fine fire, clear and white, not red and smoky. And out of this fire comes a supple and responsive life that makes that tone nearly irresistible. When Clement played the concerto "for the first time on any stage" in Vienna, nearly a hundred years ago, it could hardly have come to him more as a new and living thing than it seemed to come yesterday to Mr. Hess. At moments he touched the virtuoso's uttermost feat, the re-creation of familiar music, and he touched it chiefly by the life that was in his tone.

Like a thing of life, it bent to every curve and figure of the music. Or it flowed over long reaches of broader melody. Or it seemed to leap to meet some cascade of ornament. A hundred tonal tints flashed and sparkled, brightened or faded in it. The intensity and the suppleness of it were equally steady. And always it was transparent. It was like a mirror through which the listener saw Beethoven's music, but a mirror that gave it life and sent back emotion to them that were looking into it. Other violinists have played Beethoven's concerto more broadly, more nobly, if you will, with more of what we like to call the grand style. But there is not one to recall that has played it with such a quivering sense of the life in the music, with such a fine and penetrating fire, as did Mr. Hess. The others, maybe, "interpret" the concerto. He made it alive again with the very breath of life. To do that may even be the finer and the more difficult achievement. For it sinks the man in the music. It has been our custom to reserve the soloist at the Symphony concerts for the supplementary review of Monday. After such a performance as Mr. Hess's was yesterday, it is the orchestra's part of the concerto, though Brahms and Richard Strauss made it, that falls into second place. H. T. P.

/ / + / /

Concerts Next Week

The Symphony Orchestra is making its monthly journey next week to New York and other cities south of us. Schumann's first symphony, Brahms's second, Tschaikovsky's "Francesca," and Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel," in all of which it has distinguished itself this winter, are on the programme for the concerts abroad. At some of them Mr. Hess is to play Beethoven's concerto for violin; and at others, Mr. Reisenauer, Weber's "Concert-stück" for piano. Here the next pair of Symphony concerts falls on Jan. 19 and 20. Then Miss Aus der Ohe will be the pianist, and Chausson's eloquent symphony and Liszt's "Orpheus" the chief numbers on the programme.

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

Rubin Goldmark. Overture, "Hiawatha."
Beethoven. Concerto for violin.
Soloist, Prof. Willy Hess.
Richard Strauss, "Till Eulenspiegel."
Brahms, Symphony No. 2.

We are glad that Mr. Rubin Goldmark did not think it necessary, in composing his "Hiawatha" overture, to seek out aboriginal themes and label them "Indian melodies." There is really nothing to exploit in the melodies or themes of the red men. Many of them are tribal rather than national music, few of them are attractive, and not one of them is familiar to the auditor, either in contents or in style, as folk-music always ought to be.

We have heard Burton's Indians, have investigated at the Trans-Mississippi exposition, have had the advantage of conference with America's greatest authority on this subject—Dr. Walter Fewkes—and have studied Baker, Fillmore, Cushing, Fletcher and Krehbiel, and believe that interesting as the Indian music may be to the ethnologist, it offers nothing substantial to the musician.

Therefore we are glad to hear a "Hiawatha" who did not present aboriginal figures. More important, however, was the lack of any Indian suggestion of any kind. "Hiawatha" might have been named "Abelard" or "George Washington" without disturbing the auditor's fancy. There was great beauty in the chief theme, and some woodland warbling in the coda, but nothing that very graphically pictured the hero as set forth by Longfellow. It was pleasing, well-formed and musicianly writing, promising much beeter things. It is something of a handicap (as Napoleon III. discovered) to be "le neveu de son Oncle," and in this case Uncle Karl overshadows the younger Goldmark, who has, however, done better and more characteristic things than this overture.

The chief triumph of the concert was won by the soloist. After the performance of the Beethoven concerto, Prof. Willy Hess ("Willy," by the way, is not the diminutive of "William") was recalled 5 times with very great enthusiasm. He deserved the tribute. We have heard the concerto given with more breadth, but never with more ease or with better ensemble. The intonation was flawless, and the perfection of the passages in high position and the purity of the difficult phrases in double-stopping were notable. The cadenzas were the acme of brilliancy, and the orchestra throughout supported its chief violinist loyally.

The orchestral peak of the concert was "Till Eulenspiegel," which was performed with a technique that we do not believe any other orchestra in the world could have equalled. It was not made quite as broadly humorous as Strauss gives it, but the jests and gibes were clearly brought out, nevertheless, and the stately pomp of the burghers and philistines was put in good contrast with the squeaking figure of the arch-rogue, who was as lively as the Irishman's flea.

There is genius in every measure of this work, which is one of the strongest justifications of programme-music in existence. One requires no printed book to follow the chief points of this story—the music tells it all. The shrill mockery of Till, the pomposity of some of his enemies, the wild cries of "catch him!" after one of his pranks, the village dance, the final capture, the sentence to death, the doleful wails of the repentant Till, and his final squeak as his wind is cut off, all of these points are self-apparent, and require no warrant from the composer, who has altered the old version which allows Till finally to cheat the gallows.

There was great applause after the performance, and Mr. Gericke and the orchestra deserve the highest praise. Very few can imagine how much of labor such a smooth performance of so difficult a work represented.

Sir Edward Elgar recently stated in one of his lectures that if Strauss chose he could give us one of the greatest of symphonies. We wish that this chief orchestral genius of the present would so choose and leave for a little while his extremes, as represented by the "Domestica" and "Salome," and give to the world one masterpiece in the good old form. When one listens to such a recent work as the second symphony of Brahms one is convinced that the lemon is by no means squeezed dry, that there is much yet to be said in the symphonic form.

The symphony received an authoritative performance in which every beauty was well conserved. Especially the third movement, rather an intermezzo than a scherzo, with its quaint wood-wind passages (not altogether unlike the Pastorale of Bach's "Christmas Oratorio") was delightful.

There was an exodus before the last part of this work. Possibly it was not to be considered as an especial "Brahms exodus," for the programme was almost a half-hour longer than usual, and suburbanites have their regular habits. But those who stayed to the end heard a glorious climax to a great work; it was altogether a masterly interpretation of a masterpiece.

Louis C. Elson.

Issued Sunday by [illegible]
JANUARY 7, 1906. NO. 3; [illegible]

BOSTON SYMPHONY QUARTET

The sale of season tickets for three concerts of the Boston Symphony quartet in Cambridge will begin [illegible] row morning at the University Store, Cambridge. The concerts will be given in Brattle Hall on Thursday evenings, Jan. 18, Feb. 22 and March 22 at 8 o'clock. At the first concert the assisting artist will be Mme. Olga Samaroff, pianist.

At the second concert the assisting artists will be Miss Laura Hawkins, pianist, and Mr. Max Hess, French horn.

At the third concert, the assisting artists will be the Hoffmann String Quartet, who, with the Boston Symphony Quartet, will play Mendelssohn's Octet for strings.

[illegible]spaper Cutting Bureau in the World

TELEGRAPH.

PHILA., PA.

JAN 6 - 1906

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will [illegible] itself again at its concert on Monday evening. Mr. Gericke will resume his place as leader, which he gave up to M. d'Indy at the last concert. The management, by the way, makes the following statement regarding rumors of a change of policy:—

"It is necessary to correct an impression which seems to have become more or less general, that the coming of Mr. d'Indy meant the beginning of a new policy in the management of the Orchestra, and that 'guest' conductors will be a feature of every season. So far as can be seen the policy of the Orchestra in the future will be the same as it has been in the past. The success of the Orchestra has proved incontestably that best results are obtainable only when a band is continuously under the same conductor. It is possible, in case there should be another school of composition as distinctive and as special as that of the 'younger' Frenchmen, that the Boston Symphony Orchestra would invite its chief exponent to conduct a series of its concerts in this music as it did Mr. d'Indy. But the idea of having special conductors, even one in a season, has never been entertained."

The soloist at Monday's concert will be Mr. Timothee Adamowski, one of the most admired violinists of the Orchestra, and he will present to Philadelphia a new concerto for the violin by Mr. Gustav Strube, one of his colleagues among the first violins of the Orchestra.

The programme is as follows:—

Rubin Goldmark.....Overture, "Hiawatha"
Gustav Strube.....Concerto for Violin and Orchestra, No. 2, in F sharp minor.
Tschaikowsky.....Orchestral Fantasia, "Francesca da Rimini," Op. 32.
Brahms.....Symphony No. 2, in D Major, Op. 73

[illegible]

[illegible] PA.

JAN 6-

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's third concert at the Academy of Music next Monday evening will be given with Mr. Gericke back in his accustomed place as director, presenting a typical program. The soloist is to be Timothe Adamowski, one of the most admired violinists of the orchestra, who will present a new concerto by Gustav Strube, one of his colleagues among the first violins of the orchestra. The concerto was written last year, is still in manuscript, and had its first performance in Boston, December 22, last. The other numbers for next Monday evening are: Overture, "Hiawatha," Rubin Goldmark; orchestral fantasia, "Francesca da Remini," Tschaikowsky; Symphony No. 2, D-major, Brahms.

The management of the Boston Orchestra finds it necessary to correct the impression which seems to have become more or less general, that the coming of Vincent d'Indy to conduct a few concerts meant the beginning of a new policy, and that "great" conductors will be a feature of every season. So far as can be seen the policy of the orchestra in the future will be the same as it has been in the past. It it possible that in case there should be another school of composition as distinctive and as special as that of the "younger" Frenchmen, the Boston Symphony Orchestra would invite its chief exponent to conduct a series of its concerts in this music as did Mr. d'Indy, but the idea of having special conductors, even one in a season, has never been entertained.

[illegible]spaper Cutting Bureau in the World

INQUIRER

PHILA., PA.

JAN 7- 1906

The Boston Orchestra

The Boston Symphony Orchestra [illegible] the third concert for the season at the Academy of Music to-morrow evening under the direction of Mr. Wilhelm Gericke. [illegible] evening program has been arranged [illegible]. It comprises Rubin Goldmark's "Hiawatha," Tschaikowsky's orchestra entitled "Francesca da Rimini," Brahms' symphony in D major, No. [illegible]. School played the latter a short time ago, it may be interesting to compare [illegible] performance. The assisting artist [illegible] Adamowski, who is to play a concerto for the violin written by Gustav Strube, one of his colleagues, which has not yet been published, still in manuscript [illegible] it is in the [illegible] said to be very [illegible]

[146]

The Boston Journal

NEW DELIGHTS IN THE OLD MELODIES

Eleventh Symphony Concert Saturday Presented Strauss, Beethoven and Brahms' Works.

The eleventh Symphony concert, though devoid of any new thing, had much to please in a serene and happy way. Even Richard Straus' "Till Eulenspiegel," that once made old Music Hall audiences sit up and wonder what stuff and nonsense was being uttered by the orchestra, is now "just as easy." And the rest was absolute placidity.

Goldmark, the younger, wrote his "Hiawatha" overture when he was traveling in the Rocky mountains, we are told. It bears no trace of any impression that the great out-of-doors might have made on a different composer. Coleridge-Taylor, the English negro, did infinitely better in flavor and suggestiveness before he had ever seen America. This work is merely a well made, pleasant overture of no distinction.

The Strauss tone-comedy grows clearer and really more beautiful with each hearing, although Saturday night's performance of it was not equal in spirit and effervescence to that of the Philadelphia orchestra last season under Strauss' own baton.

The peaceful and classic Brahms Symphony in D major made a very deep impression. Mr. Gericke is a master interpreter of the great Viennese, and his orchestra is responsive to his will, whether in this or any other work.

Mr. Hess played the Beethoven violin concerto with admirable care and taste, and was rapturously applauded.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, JAN 7, 1905.

Concert Master Willy Hess was the soloist at the 11th Symphony rehearsal and concert, playing the Beethoven D major violin concerto. The other program numbers were the overture to Goldmark's "Hiawatha," "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," Strauss and Brahms second symphony. The Hiawatha music has little of the typical Indian peculiarities of harmony and suggestiveness of rough life in the forest, Goldmark taking a more poetic view of his subject when arranging his tone pictures. It is a cleverly written work, fragmentary in most of its thematic material, some of which is admirably developed, and interesting as a whole. The performance was smooth, the excellence of the croscendo passages in the climax being worthy of special note. The phrases given to the horns were also played with splendid tonality.

Prof Hess has established himself in a prominent position by his playing, his musical endowments having been shown in many ways since he became a member of the orchestra, and his interpretation of Beethoven's great violin concerto further increased his artistic standing in this city. The concerto, with the problematic four D sharps and three cadenzas, is a masterpiece of its kind, and the player who can interpret it in the proper spirit is an artist beyond question Mr Hess' reading of the first movement was about as satisfying as one could expect to hear, all the ornamentations being given with a musical beauty that left little to be desired as to purity, though a little fuller tone one would have been acceptable at times. In the second movement the pianissimo figurations were never lost, and every shade of the larghetto was shown in exquisite tonal colors. The closing part was, perhaps, the most brilliantly performed, for Mr Hess exhibited an abandon and a confidence in execution that he had not previously shown. The applause with which he was greeted at the close of the performance was so prolonged that the artist was recalled a half dozen times to the stage.

Richard Strauss evidently indulged in some musical pranks when he wrote the "Till Eulenspiegel" piece, for it is full of odd and chaotic measures, rapid changes in tempo, strange modulations and freakish instrumentation, a whimsical tone puzzle that amuses—and that's about all. The proper effect was produced by Mr Gericke's men who, after a splendid performance of the concerto, showed to equal advantage in this merry trifle by the audacious Richard. The Brahms symphony was given impressively.

There will be no Symphony concerts this week, as the orchestra will be away on its third monthly trip. For the next pair of concerts, Jan 19 and 20, Miss Adele Aus der Ohe will be the soloist, playing Beethoven's E-flat major pianoforte concerto. The symphony in B-flat major, by Ernest Chausson, will be played for the first time in Boston, and Weber's "Freischuts" overture and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Orpheus," will complete the program.

SOUSA AT SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Transcript

324 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON, MASS.

IN THE WORLD OF MUSIC

MR. HESS SURPRISES A SYMPHONY AUDIENCE

A Remarkable Performance of Beethoven's Violin Concerto—The Concerts of Next Week and Weeks to Come—Mr. Converse's First Opera—Sembrich in Boston Twenty-Two Years Ago and the Transcript's Impression of Her—A Grist of Musical Miscellany

Unless Mr. Hess is a man of very continuous inspiration, he will hardly play Beethoven's concerto for violin tonight as he played it yesterday afternoon. Not often in his life—it was easy to surmise—has he played as he did then, and certainly we that have watched him for more than a year as the concert-master of our orchestra have never guessed that even at his best such mastery of the power of sound and such feeling for the beauty of it lay in him. The many that have inadequately performed it have made Beethoven's concerto a cause for doubts and fears. Of a Kreisler, a Heerman, or an Ysäye at his best, we may expect it without such trepidation. But when we see our concert-masters week after week sitting at their desk at the head of the first violins, we are prone to forget that they also are virtuosi, though they do not wander every year or two half across the world. We used to do that with Mr. Kneisel until his playing of some concerto reminded us anew of his real worth. We have had hardly time as yet to become so accustomed to Mr. Hess. We are still in a measure discovering him, and there was surprise to heighten the impression—if it were not a Symphony concert sensation would be the word—that he made yesterday. On no Friday afternoon this winter has there been such spontaneous applause, and, much more significantly, such rapt listening as rewarded him.

In solo passages in his orchestral work, and in his own quartet, Mr. Hess has taught us to expect warmth and vigor in his playing. Yesterday they rose to controlled fire that burned the whiter because it was so tempered. The best quality of his tone is its bright life. It might be broader and deeper. Now and then it even misses some of the darker colorings of the music to which it is giving being and voice. But the glow of it is unmistakable and insistent. It sparkled through the rondo that ends the concerto. It touched brilliancy in the ceaseless ornament and elaboration of the opening allegro. It spread over the largetto like sunshine burnishing the flowing stream of a still river. It is a fine fire, clear and white, not red and smoky. And out of this fire comes a supple and responsive life that makes that tone nearly irresistible. When Clement played the concerto "for the first time on any stage" in Vienna nearly a hundred years ago, it could hardly have come to him more as a new and living thing than it seemed to come yesterday to Mr. Hess. At moments he touched the virtuoso's uttermost feat, the re-creation of familiar music, and he touched it chiefly by the life that was in his tone.

Like a thing of life, it bent to every curve and figure of the music. Or it flowed over long reaches of broader melody. Or it seemed to leap to meet some cascade of ornament. A hundred tonal tints flashed and sparkled, brightened or faded in it. The intensity and the suppleness of it were equally steady. And always it was transparent. It was like a mirror through which the listener saw Beethoven's music, but a mirror that gave it life and sent back emotion to them that were looking into it. Other violinists have played Beethoven's concerto more broadly, more nobly, if you will, with more of what we like to call the grand style. But there is not one to recall that has played it with such a quivering sense of the life in the music, with such a fine and penetrating fire, as did Mr. Hess. The others, maybe, "interpret" the concerto. He made it alive again with the very breath of life. To do that may even be the finer and the more difficult achievement. For it sinks the man in the music. It has been our custom to reserve the soloist at the Symphony concerts for the supplementary review of Monday. After such a performance as Mr. Hess's was yesterday, it is the orchestra's part of the concerto, though Brahms and Richard Strauss made it, that falls into second place. H. T. P.

/ / + / /

Concerts Next Week

The Symphony Orchestra is making its monthly journey next week to New York and other cities south of us. Schumann's first symphony, Brahms's second, Tschaikovsky's "Francesca," and Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel," in all of which it has distinguished itself this winter, are on the programme for the concerts abroad. At some of them Mr. Hess is to play Beethoven's concerto for violin; and at others, Mr. Reisenauer, Weber's "Concert-stück" for piano. Here the next pair of Symphony concerts falls on Jan. 19 and 20. Then Miss Aus der Ohe will be the pianist, and Chausson's eloquent symphony and Liszt's "Orpheus" the chief numbers on the programme.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

Rubin Goldmark. Overture, "Hiawatha."
Beethoven. Concerto for violin.
Soloist, Prof. Willy Hess.
Richard Strauss, "Till Eulenspiegel."
Brahms, Symphony No. 2.

We are glad that Mr. Rubin Goldmark did not think it necessary, in composing his "Hiawatha" overture, to seek out aboriginal themes and label them "Indian melodies." There is really nothing to exploit in the melodies or themes of the red men. Many of them are tribal rather than national music, few of them are attractive, and not one of them is familiar to the auditor, either in contents or in style, as folk-music always ought to be.

We have heard Burton's Indians, have investigated at the Trans-Mississippi exposition, have had the advantage of conference with America's greatest authority on this subject—Dr. Walter Fewkes—and have studied Baker, Fillmore, Cushing, Fletcher and Krehbiel, and believe that interesting as the Indian music may be to the ethnologist, it offers nothing substantial to the musician.

Therefore we are glad to hear a "Hiawatha" who did not present aboriginal figures. More important, however, was the lack of any Indian suggestion of any kind. "Hiawatha" might have been named "Abelard" or "George Washington" without disturbing the auditor's fancy. There was great beauty in the chief theme, and some woodland warbling in the coda, but nothing that very graphically pictured the hero as set forth by Longfellow. It was pleasing, well-formed and musicianly writing, promising much beeter things. It is something of a handicap (as Napoleon III. discovered) to be "le neveu de son Oncle," and in this case Uncle Karl overshadows the younger Goldmark, who has, however, done better and more characteristic things than this overture.

The chief triumph of the concert was won by the soloist. After the performance of the Beethoven concerto, Prof. Willy Hess ("Willy," by the way, is not the diminutive of "William") was recalled 5 times with very great enthusiasm. He deserved the tribute. We have heard the concerto given with more breadth, but never with more ease or with better ensemble. The intonation was flawless, and the perfection of the passages in high position and the purity of the difficult phrases in double-stopping were notable. The cadenzas were the acme of brilliancy, and the orchestra throughout supported its chief violinist loyally.

The orchestral peak of the concert was "Till Eulenspiegel," which was performed with a technique that we do not believe any other orchestra in the world could have equalled. It was not made quite as broadly humorous as Strauss gives it, but the jests and gibes were clearly brought out, nevertheless, and the stately pomp of the burghers and philistines was put in good contrast with the squeaking figure of the arch-rogue, who was as lively as the Irishman's flea.

There is genius in every measure of this work, which is one of the strongest justifications of programme-music in existence. One requires no printed book to follow the chief points of this story—the music tells it all. The shrill mockery of Till, the pomposity of some of his enemies, the wild cries of "catch him!" after one of his pranks, the village dance, the final capture, the sentence to death, the doleful wails of the repentant Till, and his final squeak as his wind is cut off, all of these points are self-apparent and require no warrant from the composer, who has altered the old version which allows Till finally to cheat the gallows.

There was great applause after the performance, and Mr. Gericke and the orchestra deserve the highest praise. Very few can imagine how much of labor such a smooth performance of so difficult a work represented.

Sir Edward Elgar recently stated in one of his lectures that if Strauss chose he could give us one of the greatest of symphonies. We wish that this chief orchestral genius of the present would so choose and leave for a little while his extremes, as represented by the "Domestica" and "Salome," and give to the world one masterpiece in the good old form. When one listens to such a recent work as the second symphony of Brahms one is convinced that the lemon is by no means squeezed dry, that there is much yet to be said in the symphonic form.

The symphony received an authoritative performance in which every beauty was well conserved. Especially the third movement, rather an intermezzo than a scherzo, with its quaint wood-wind passages (not altogether unlike the Pastorale of Bach's "Christmas Oratorio") was delightful.

There was an exodus before the last part of this work. Possibly it was not to be considered as an especial "Brahms exodus," for the programme was almost a half-hour longer than usual, and suburbanites have their regular habits. But those who stayed to the end heard a glorious climax to a great work; it was altogether a masterly interpretation of a masterpiece.

Louis C. Elson.

The Boston [illegible]

The Representative Democratic Paper of New England

Issued Sunday by Post Publishing Co.
JANUARY 7, 1906. NO. 1. VOL. 39

BOSTON SYMPHONY QUARTET

The sale of season tickets for the three concerts of the Boston Symphony Quartet in Cambridge will begin tomorrow morning at the University Book Store, Cambridge. The concerts will be given in Brattle Hall on Thursday evenings, Jan. 18, Feb. 22 and March 22 at 8 o'clock. At the first concert the assisting artist will be Mme. Olga Samaroff pianist.

At the second concert the assisting artists will be Miss Laura Hawkins, pianist, and Mr. Max Hess, French horn.

At the third concert, the assisting artists will be the Hoffmann String Quartet, who, with the Boston Symphony Quartet, will play Mendelssohn's Octet for strings.

[illegible] Clipping Bureau in the World

TELEGRAPH.

JAN 6 - 1906

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will be itself again at its concert on Monday evening. Mr. Gericke will resume his place as leader, which he gave up to M. d'Indy at the last concert. The management, by the way, makes the folowing statement regarding rumors of a change of policy:—

"It is necessary to correct an impression which seems to have become more or less general, that the coming of Mr. d'Indy meant the beginning of a new policy in the management of the Orchestra, and that "guest" conductors will be a feature of every season. So far as can be seen the policy of the Orchestra in the future will be the same as it has been in the past. The success of the Orchestra has proved incontestably that best results are obtainable only when a band is continuously under the same conductor. It is possible, in case there should be another school of composition as distinctive and as special as that of the 'younger' Frenchmen, that the Boston Symphony Orchestra would invite its chief exponent to conduct a series of its concerts in this music as it did Mr. d'Indy. But the idea of having special conductors, even one in a season, has never been entertained."

The soloist at Monday's concert will be Mr. Timothee Adamowski, one of the most admired violinists of the Orchestra, and he will present to Philadelphia a new concerto for the violin by Mr. Gustav Strube, one of his colleagues among the first violins of the Orchestra.

The programme is as follows:—

Rubin Goldmark.....Overture, "Hiawatha"
Gustav Strube
Concerto for Violin and Orchestra, No. 2, in F sharp minor.
Tschaikowsky
Orchestral Fantasia, "Francesca da Rimini," Op. 39.
Brahms....Symphony No. 2, in D Major, Op. 73

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's third concert at the Academy of Music next Monday evening will be given with Mr. Gericke back in his accustomed place as director, presenting a typical program. The soloist is to be Timothe Adamowski, one of the most admired violinists of the orchestra, who will present a new concerto by Gustav Strube, one of his colleagues among the first violins of the orchestra. The concerto was written last year, is still in manuscript, and had its first performance in Boston, December 22, last. The other numbers for next Monday evening are: Overture, "Hiawatha," Rubin Goldmark; orchestral fantasia, "Francesca da Remini," Tschaikowsky; Symphony No. 2, D-major, Brahms.

The management of the Boston Orchestra finds it necessary to correct the impression which seems to have become more or less general, that the coming of Vincent d'Indy to conduct a few concerts meant the beginning of a new policy, and that "great" conductors will be a feature of every season. So far as can be seen the policy of the orchestra in the future will be the same as it has been in the past. It it possible that in case there should be another school of composition as distinctive and as special as that of the "younger" Frenchmen, the Boston Symphony Orchestra would invite its chief exponent to conduct a series of its concerts in this music as did Mr. d'Indy, but the idea of having special conductors, even one in a season, has never been entertained.

[illegible] Clipping Bureau in the World

INQUIRER

JAN 7 - 1906

The Boston Orchestra

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its third concert for the season at the Academy of Music to-morrow evening under the direction of Mr. Wilhelm Gericke. An interesting program has been arranged for the occasion. It comprises Rubin Goldmark's overture "Hiawatha," Tschaikowsky's fantasie for orchestra entitled "Francesca di Rimini," and Brahms' symphony in D major, No. 2. Mr. Scheel played the latter a short time ago, and it may be interesting to compare the performances. The assisting artist will be Mr. T. Adamowski, who is to be heard in a concerto for the violin written by Mr. Gustav Strube, one of his colleagues in the orchestra, which has not yet been produced here. It is still in manuscript and its novelty is absolute. It is in the key of F sharp minor, and is said to be very interesting.

[146]

PRESS
PHILA., PA.
JAN 7 - 1906

...cert in the Academy of ...morrow evening, the Boston ...Orchestra will again be under ...rection of Mr. Gericke and will give ...program. The last concert was ...ctly of special character, having ...devoted entirely to modern French ..., and under the personal direction ... Vincent d'Indy. While critical ...regarding this music is by no ... unanimous, the management is ...ughly content with the results of ...experiment, for the bringing of Mr. ... gave an unusual fillip of interest ... season.

It is necessary to correct an im... which seems to have become ...ersal, that the coming of ... meant the beginning of a new ... in the management of the orches... that "guest" conductors will be ... of every season. So far as can ... the policy of the orchestra in ... will be the same as it has been ... past. The success of the orchestra ... incontestably that best results ... obtainable only when a band is con... under the same conductor. It ... possible, in case there should be an... school of composition as distinctive ... special as that of the "younger" ... opinion that the Boston Symphony ... would invite its chief exponent ... conduct a series of its concerts in this ... as it did Mr. d'Indy. But the idea ... having special conductors, even one in ..., has never been entertained.

The soloist at to-morrow's concert will ... Mr. Timothee Adamowski, one of the ... admired violinists of the orchestra, ... will present to Philadelphia a new ...rto for the violin by Mr. Gustav ..., one of his colleagues among the ... violins of the orchestra. Mr. Stoube ... regarded as a man of very great talent. ... published works include a violin con... a symphony, several overtures, ... chamber music and some works ...ices and orchestra. This particular ...rto was written last year and com... last Summer. It is still in manu... and had its first performance in ... on Friday afternoon, December 22 ... was most enthusiastically re...

...ogram in full is as follows:—
...work .....Overture, Hiawatha.
...Concerto for Violin and Or... sharp minor.
...hestral Fantasia, 'Frances...
...Symphony No. 2, in D Major, Op. 73

RECORD
PHILA., PA
JAN - 7 1906

THE WORLD OF MUSIC

Boston Symphony Orchestra to Pa... Us Another Visit.

ADAMOWSKI TO BE THE SOLOIST

A Lecture by Rubin Goldmark on "Tristan"—Kaltenborn Quartet In Concert—Other Events of Interest.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra to-morrow evening in the Academy of Music will again be under the direction of Mr. Gericke, and will give a typical program. The last concert was distinctly of special character, having been devoted entirely to modern French music, and under the personal direction of Vincent d'Indy. While critical opinion regarding this music is by no means unanimous, the management is thoroughly content with the results of the experiment, for the bringing of Mr. d'Indy gave an unusual fillip of interest to the season.

TIMOTHEE ADAMOWSKI.

The soloist of to-morrow evening's concert will be Mr. Timothee Adamowski, one of the most admired violinists of the orchestra, and he will present to Philadelphia a new concerto for the violin by Gustav Strube, one of his colleagues among the first violins of the orchestra. Not the least factor in the high success of the Boston Symphony has been the very unusual high grade of musicians who are in its ranks. In the violins, first and second, alone there are at least a dozen virtuosos of very first rank, such men as Hess, Adamowski, Strube, Hoffman, Krafft and Barleben.

One of the most admirable features of Mr. Gericke's rule has been his encouragement of individual effort on the part of the men under him. As a result the orchestra has developed at least two composers whose works are very seriously regarded, not only by musicians in this country, but in Europe as well. One is Charles Martin Loeffler, who retired from the orchestra two years ago to devote himself entirely to composition, and the other is Gustav Strube, whose violin concerto Mr. Adamowski will play here. All of the works by these two men have had their first performances with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and their names are always to be found on the programs during a season.

Mr. Strube is regarded as a man of very great talent. His published works include a violin concerto, a symphony, several overtures, some chamber music and some works for voices and orchestra. This particular concerto was written last year and completed last summer. It is still in manuscript and had its first performance in Boston, on Friday afternoon, December 22 last. It was most enthusiastically received.

The program in full will be as follows:
Rubin Goldmark.....Overture "Hiawatha"
Gustave Strube.....Concerto for Violin and Orchestra No. 2 in F sharp minor
Tschaikowsky.....Orchestral Fantasia "Francesca da Rimini" Op. 32
Brahms.....Symphony No 2 in D major Op. 73
Timothee Adamowski.

PUBLIC LEDGER
PHILA., PA
JAN 7 - 1906

...Boston Symphony Orchestra in its third concert of this season at the Academy of Music tomorrow night, under Mr. Gericke, will bring forward two of its members, Gustav Strube, as the composer, and Timothee Adamowski, as the executant of a new concerto for the violin. Mr. Adamowski is personally the best known of the players in the orchestra. A popular solo violinist in his youth, he was one of the first engaged when this organization was established in Boston a quarter of a century ago, and he has remained faithful, while most of his early associates have dropped away. For many years he played at the second desk, but since the resignation of Mr. Kneisel and Mr. Loeffler he has shared the first desk with the concert master. At home in Boston he holds a foremost rank among the musicians of the city, and, though he has been infrequently heard here as a soloist in the last few years, he is always warmly welcome as an artist, while his marriage with a well-known Philadelphia woman has enlarged the circle of those who hold him in personal esteem. Mr. Strube is one of his associates in the fine body of violinists in this orchestra. Like his former colleague, Mr. Loeffler, he has won recognition as a composer, having already published a violin concerto, a symphony, more than one overture and some chamber music. The present concerto, which is still in manuscript, was played at Boston last month, and was warmly received there, and its performance by Mr. Adamowski tomorrow cannot fail of interest. The concert will be preceded by the "Hiawatha" overture of Rubin Goldmark—the Western composer, not Carl, of "The Queen of Sheba"—and followed by Tschaikiwsky's symphonic fantasia, "Francesca da Rimini." The symphony, which comes at the end of the programme, is Brahms's second, in D major, which was played by the Philadelphia Orchestra a few weeks ago.

...BULLET
...PHILA PA
JAN 9 - 1906

The Boston Orchestra

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, once more under the leadership of Mr. Gericke, was heard at the Academy of Music last night in a typical and interesting program of which the notable feature was the concerto in F-sharp minor for violin and orchestra, composed by Mr. Strube, one of the first violins of the orchestra and played here for the first time. The composition, which was finished only last summer, is musicianly and interesting and gave Mr. Adamowski, also a member of the orchestra, a splendid opportunity to display his virtuosity. In the second movement, a reverie in slow time, full of quaint poetry and gentle mournfulness, Mr. Adamowski, to whom, by the way, the work is dedicated, proved himself master likewise of the emotional part of his art. A Passacaglia with which the concerto ends and which contains a brilliant cadenza written by Mr. Gericke himself, made severe demands upon the soloist and exhibited Mr. Strube's skill in orchestration.

The overture, likewise by a native composer, was the "Hiawatha" of Rubin Goldmark, a nephew of the famous composer of the "Queen of Sheba," heard here last week. The composition, conceived while Mr. Goldmark was sojourning among the Rockies in search of health, is full of fresh ideas and skilful rhythm.

The symphony, Brahms's familiar No. 2, was played exquisitely and formed a pleasing contrast to the Tschaikowsky fantasia, "Francesca da Rimini," which immediately preceded it. In those two numbers the orchestra was at its best, the descriptive passages of the fantasia being especially well done.

TELEGRAPH
PHILA., PA
JAN 9 - 1906

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

Orchestra Give Third Performance of Their Series at Academy of Music.

Despite the inclement weather a considerable audience gathered at the Academy of Music last night to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra, although, of course, the ranks were lessened by the combination of the storm and the unusual interest of this week's playbills at the various theatres. Those who remained faithful, however, were rewarded by an admirable performance and an uncommonly attractive programme. The opening number was a "Hiawatha Overture" by Rubin Goldmark, who must be classed as an American composer, having been born and brought up in this country, though a nephew of Karl Goldmark. This overture was composed in the Rocky Mountains when its author was sojourning there in search of health. It is inspired by the romance and poetry of the idealized savage who is typified by its subject, but has not been built up on a basis of Indian folksongs at all, though there is a hint of such music here and there. It is a beautiful work, suave and gracious, impressive and full of gentle dignity; but it might as well apply to any heroic ideal as to the brave of the setting sun. Save for a touch of plaintive melody now and then, there is no special suggestion of Indian character about it, but it has a massive sweep that intimates a heroic quality.

The soloist of the evening was Mr. Adamowski, who gave Gustav Strube's Concerto in F sharp minor. Mr. Strube, who is one of the first violins of the Orchestra, conducted this number and shared the hearty applause that was bestowed upon soloist and composer alike. It was the first time this work, which is dedicated to Mr. Adamowski, has been given here, and it was well received. Mr. Gericke has written an elaborate cadenza for the final movement. The second and third movements of the composition are more pleasing than the first, which, though well written in its orchestral score, is not inspired, although there are passages all the way through that are of decided beauty. There is no weakness in Tschaikowsky's Fantasia from Dante's "Francesca da Rimini," which followed the concerto. It is a whirlwind, which the Orchestra rendered magnificently with more than their ordinary spirit.

The closing number was Brahms' Symphony No. 2 in D major, a most satisfying work. After a short acquaintance one can settle comfortably back to as complete an enjoyment of Brahms as to Beethoven, with as much confidence and certainty of contentment. Last night's symphony, which has been heard twice before here this season, becomes even more impressive on further hearing and is decidedly one of the biggest of all the big works for orchestra.

All through the concert last night the visitors played in their finest form and showed what an almost perfect organization they make. Mr. Gericke's interpretations were beyond question at all times.

...The First Established ... NORTH AMERICAN
...Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
...PHILA., PA
JAN 7 - 1906

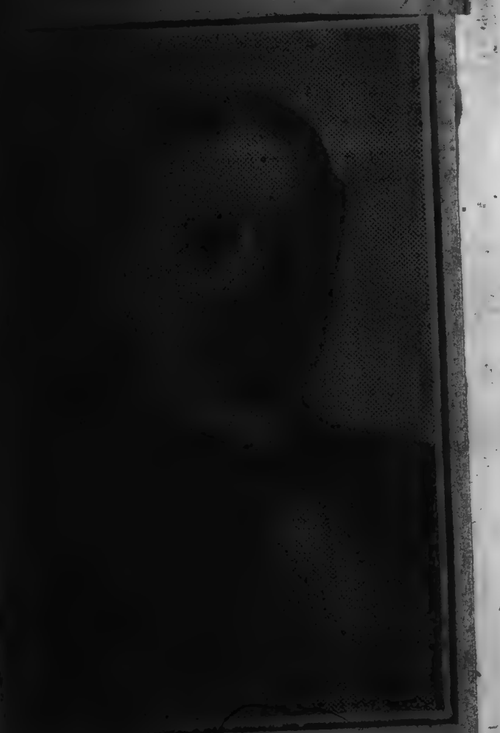
Adamowski to Play New Concerto.

...three symphony concerts will appeal to ... lovers at the Academy of Music ... week—one tomorrow evening by the ... Orchestra under William Gericke, ... usual Friday and Saturday per... by Conductor Scheel's Phila... orchestra.

...Boston organization is bringing ... composers to the front—two of ... numbers on its programme for to... concert are by Americans. The ...watha" overture is by Rubin Gold... of New York—a nephew, by the ... of the famous composer of "The ... of Sheba." Timothee Adamowski ... play a violin concerto in G sharp ... by Gustav Strube, of Boston, who ... one of the sixteen first violin of ... band.

...be has written much music for ... rendering, this concerto, finish... year, being his latest and most ... work. It is still in manuscript, ... played in public for the first time ... Adamowski in Boston two weeks ...

...symphony at this Boston Orchestra ... be ...rahm's second, in D ... Tschaikowsky's "Francesca ..." fantasia is to be given for ...ssure.



TIMOTHEE ADAMOWSKI

...Wieniawski con... the famous Hart... ...t, an ideal cham... ...n. Marie Zeckwer... ...Zeckwer, Haupt...

RECORD
PHILA., PA
JAN 9 - 1906

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

Timothee Adamowski the Soloist at an Interesting Concert.

Coming after the Vincent D'Indy visit, which gave such particular zest to the December concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, last evening's affair at the Academy could not fail to partake somewhat of the nature of an anti-climax. Nevertheless there was considerable interest in the program and a particularly warm welcome for that always admirable violinist, Timothee Adamowski.

Perhaps there was a certain thought in the selection of Mr. Adamowski's number of displaying the all-round equipment of Mr. Gericke's string choir, for the concerto was by Gustave Strube, another of the Boston's notable first violins. But in any event the work deserves a hearing, especially in view of the slender stock of modern works for the solo violin; it is musicianly and melodious; it is genuinely charming at many moments, and, best of all, it is spontaneous in its whole aspect—never labored or mechanical. Not a masterpiece by a goodly measure, but eminently agreeable and most admirably played.

In the purely orchestral portion of the program Tschaikowski's brilliant-hued and warmly passionate fantasia, "Francesca da Rimini," easily took first place. Beside this wonderfully expressive tone-poem the more popular and more pretentious symphony, the now almost hackneyed "Pathetique," falls into relative insignificance. Magnificently played as this lovely work certainly was last evening, its manifold beauties were simply irresistible.

Rubin Goldmark's "Hiawatha" overture and Brahm's Second Symphony brought the list to an end. Of the former it need only be remarked that it proved pleasing rather than epoch-making in any sense, while except to note that the noble symphony was very excellently played, there is no occasion for comment.

...Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the PRESS
...PHILA., PA
JAN 9 - 1906

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Adamowski as Soloist in a New Concerto by Strube.

Program.

Rubin Goldmark,
Overture to "Hiawatha"
Strube..Concerto in F-sharp minor, for violin and orchestra. First time at these concerts.
T. Adamowski, soloist.
Tschaikowsky..."Francesca da Rimini," orchestral fantasia, after Dante, Op. 32.
Brahms,
Symphony No. 2, in D major, Op. 73

The Boston Orchestra has been appearing of late under the batons of various conductors and last evening it completed the round as it were giving a concert with two in charge, Mr. Gericke, for the Goldmark, Tschaikowsky and Brahms numbers, and Gustav Strube for his own concerto which was led by T. Adamowski as soloist.

It cannot be said that the concert eclipsed brilliant memories of the past; in fact, save for the beautiful orchestral tone and the usual virtuosity in the Tschaikowsky and Brahms numbers it was rather dull since neither the concerto nor Adamowski's interpretation of it was particularly inspiriting. Like all trained artists Mr. Strube is able to turn out a concerto which is musically and skilfully put together, but it is singularly devoid of charm, and Mr. Adamowski was so palpably out at times in the matter of tone that the effect was very disagreeable.

Goldmark's overture was a picturesque feature of the concert, but after all the satisfying things were the "Francesca da Rimini" number, and Brahms second symphony, old favorites with orchestra and audience.

[147]

PRESS
PHILA., PA.
JAN 1 - 1905

At the concert in the Academy of Music to-morrow evening, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will again be under the direction of Mr. Gericke and will give a typical program. The last concert was distinctly of special character, having been devoted entirely to modern French music, and under the personal direction of Mr. Vincent d'Indy. While critical opinion regarding this music is by no means unanimous, the management is thoroughly content with the results of the experiment, for the bringing of Mr. d'Indy gave an unusual fillip of interest to the season.

But it is necessary to correct an impression which seems to have become more or less general, that the coming of Mr. d'Indy meant the beginning of a new policy in the management of the orchestra and that "guest" conductors will be a feature of every season. So far as can be seen the policy of the orchestra in the future will be the same as it has been in the past. The success of the orchestra has proved incontestably that best results are obtainable only when a band is continuously under the same conductor. It is possible, in case there should be another school of composition as distinctive and as special as that of the "younger" Frenchmen that the Boston Symphony Orchestra would invite its chief exponent to conduct a series of its concerts in this music as it did Mr. d'Indy. But the idea of having special conductors, even one in a season, has never been entertained.

The soloist at to-morrow's concert will be Mr. Timothee Adamowski, one of the most admired violinists of the orchestra, and he will present to Philadelphia a new concerto for the violin by Mr. Gustav Strube, one of his colleagues among the first violins of the orchestra. Mr. Stoube is regarded as a man of very great talent. His published works include a violin concerto, a symphony, several overtures, some chamber music and some works for voices and orchestra. This particular concerto was written last year and completed last Summer. It is still in manuscript and had its first performance in Boston on Friday afternoon, December 22 last. It was most enthusiastically received.

The program in full is as follows:—

Rubin Goldmark.....Overture. Hiawatha.
Gustav Strube...Concerto for Violin and Orchestra. No. 2. in F sharp minor.
Tschaikowsky...Orchestral Fantasia. "Francesca da Rimini." Op. 89.
Brahms....Symphony No. 2. in D Major, Op. 73

* * *

The First Established and Largest Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World PRESS CUTTING BUREAU AMERICAN
PHILA.

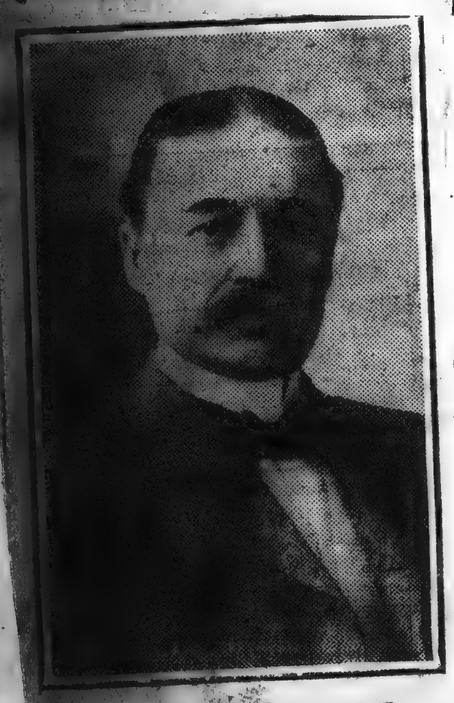
Adamowski to Play New Concerto.

Three symphony concerts will appeal to music lovers at the Academy of Music this week—one tomorrow evening by the Boston Orchestra under William Gericke, and the usual Friday and Saturday performances by Conductor Scheel's Philadelphia Orchestra.

The Boston organization is bringing native composers to the front—two of the numbers on its programme for tomorrow's concert are by Americans. The "Hiawatha" overture is by Rubin Goldmark, of New York—a nephew, by the way, of the famous composer of "The Queen of Sheba." Timothee Adamowski is to play a violin concerto in G sharp minor, by Gustav Strube, of Boston, who plays one of the sixteen first violin of Mr. Gericke's band.

Mr. Strube has written much music for orchestral rendering, this concerto, finished last year, being his latest and most admired work. It is still in manuscript, and was played in public for the first time by Mr. Adamowski in Boston two weeks ago.

The symphony at this Boston Orchestra concert will be Brahm's second, in D major, and Tschaikowsky's "Francesca da Rimini" fantasia is to be given for good measure.



TIMOTHEE ADAMOWSKI

...hony Espaquole" and a Wiemawski con...erto. Visanki is one of the famous Hart...ann-Hekking Quartet, an ideal cham...r music organization. Marie Zeckwer ...prano, and Camille Zeckyer, pianist ...o also appear in this entertain... ...Helen Pulaski as ...ist.

RECORD
[illegible]

THE WORLD OF MUSIC

Boston Symphony Orchestra to Pay Us Another Visit.

ADAMOWSKI TO BE THE SOLOIST

A Lecture by Rubin Goldmark on "Tristan"—Kaltenborn Quartet in Concert—Other Events of Interest.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra tomorrow evening in the Academy of Music will again be under the direction of Mr. Gericke, and will give a typical program. The last concert was distinctly of special character, having been devoted entirely to modern French music, and under the personal direction of Vincent d'Indy. While critical opinion regarding this music is by no means unanimous, the management is thoroughly content with the results of the experiment, for the bringing of Mr. d'Indy gave an unusual fillip of interest to the season.

TIMOTHEE ADAMOWSKI.

The soloist of to-morrow evening's concert will be Mr. Timothee Adamowski, one of the most admired violinists of the orchestra, and he will present to Philadelphia a new concerto for the violin by Gustav Strube, one of his colleagues among the first violins of the orchestra. Not the least factor in the high success of the Boston Symphony has been the very unusual high grade of musicians who are in its ranks. In the violins, first and second, alone there are at least a dozen virtuosos of very first rank, such men as Hess, Adamowski, Strube, Hoffman, Krafft and Barleben.

One of the most admirable features of Mr. Gericke's rule has been his encouragement of individual effort on the part of the men under him. As a result the orchestra has developed at least two composers whose works are very seriously regarded, not only by musicians in this country, but in Europe as well. One is Charles Martin Loeffler, who retired from the orchestra two years ago to devote himself entirely to composition, and the other is Gustav Strube, whose violin concerto Mr. Adamowski will play here. All of the works by these two men have had their first performances with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and their names are always to be found on the programs during a season.

Mr. Strube is regarded as a man of very great talent. His published works include a violin concerto, a symphony, several overtures, some chamber music and some works for voices and orchestra. This particular concerto was written last year and completed last summer. It is still in manuscript and had its first performance in Boston, on Friday afternoon, December 22 last. It was most enthusiastically received.

The program in full will be as follows:

Rubin Goldmark.....Overture "Hiawatha"
Gustave Strube.....Concerto for Violin and Orchestra No. 2 in F sharp mino
Tschaikowsky.....Orchestral Fantasia "Francesca da Rimini" Op. 3(
Brahms.....Symphony No 2 in D major Op. 73
Timothee Adamowski.

PUBLIC LEDGER
PHILA., PA.
JAN 2 - 1905

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, in its third concert of this season at the Academy of Music tomorrow night, under Mr. Gericke, will bring forward two of its members, Gustav Strube, as the composer, and Timothee Adamowski, as the executant of a new concerto for the violin. Mr. Adamowski is personally the best known of the players in the orchestra. A popular solo violinist in his youth, he was one of the first engaged when this organization was established in Boston a quarter of a century ago, and he has remained faithful, while most of his early associates have dropped away. For many years he played at the second desk, but since the resignation of Mr. Kneisel and Mr. Loeffler he has shared the first desk with the concert master. At home in Boston he holds a foremost rank among the musicians of the city, and, though he has been infrequently heard here as a soloist in the last few years, he is always warmly welcome as an artist, while his marriage with a well-known Philadelphia woman has enlarged the circle of those who hold him in personal esteem. Mr. Strube is one of his associates in the fine body of violinists in this orchestra. Like his former colleague, Mr. Loeffler, he has won recognition as a composer, having already published a violin concerto, a symphony, more than one overture and some chamber music. The present concerto, which is still in manuscript, was played at Boston last month, and was warmly received there, and its performance by Mr. Adamowski tomorrow cannot fail of interest. The concert will be preceded by the "Hiawatha" overture of Rubin Goldmark—the Western composer, not Carl, of "The Queen of Sheba"—and followed by Tschaikiwsky's symphonic fantasia, "Francesca da Rimini." The symphony, which comes at the end of the programme, is Brahms's second, in D major, which was played by the Philadelphia Orchestra a few weeks ago.

* * *

[illegible] 1905

The Boston Orchestra

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, once more under the leadership of Mr. Gericke, was heard at the Academy of Music last night in a typical and interesting program of which the notable feature was the concerto in F-sharp minor for violin and orchestra, composed by Mr. Strube, one of the first violins of the orchestra and played here for the first time. The composition, which was finished only last summer, is musicianly and interesting and gave Mr. Adamowski, also a member of the orchestra, a splendid opportunity to display his virtuosity. In the second movement, a reverie in slow time, full of quaint poetry and gentle mournfulness, Mr. Adamowski, to whom, by the way, the work is dedicated, proved himself master likewise of the emotional part of his art. A Passacaglia with which the concerto ends and which contains a brilliant cadenza written by Mr. Gericke himself, made severe demands upon the soloist and exhibited Mr. Strube's skill in orchestration.

The overture, likewise by a native composer, was the "Hiawatha" of Rubin Goldmark, a nephew of the famous composer of the "Queen of Sheba," heard here last week. The composition, conceived while Mr. Goldmark was sojourning among the Rockies in search of health, is full of fresh ideas and skilful rhythm.

The symphony, Brahms's familiar No. 2, was played exquisitely and formed a pleasing contrast to the Tschaikowsky fantasia, "Francesca da Rimini," which immediately preceded it. In those two numbers the orchestra was at its best, the descriptive passages of the fantasia being especially well done.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
PRESS
PHILA.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Adamowski as Soloist in a New Concerto by Strube.

Program.

Rubin Goldmark,
Overture to "Hiawatha"
Strube..Concerto in F-sharp minor, for violin and orchestra. First time at these concerts.
T. Adamowski, soloist.
Tschaikowsky.."Francesca da Rimini," orchestral fantasia, after Dante, Op. 32.
Brahms,
Symphony No. 2, in D mapor, Op. 73

The Boston Orchestra has been appearing of late under the batons of various conductors and last evening it completed the round as it were giving a concert with two in charge, Mr. Geriche, for the Goldmark, Tschaikowsky and Brahms numbers, and Gustav Strube for his own concerto which was led by T. Adamowski as soloist.

It cannot be said that the concert eclipsed brilliant memories of the past; in fact, save for the beautiful orchestral tone and the usual virtuosity in the Tschaikowsky and Brahms numbers it was rather dull since neither the concerto nor Adamowski's interpretation of it was particularly inspiriting. Like all trained artists Mr. Strube is able to turn out a concerto which is musically and skilfully put together, but it is singularly devoid of charm, and Mr. Adamowski was so palpably out at times in the matter of tone that the effect was very disagreeable.

Goldmark's overture was a picturesque feature of the concert, but after all the satisfying things were the "Francesca da Rimini" number, and Brahms second symphony, old favorites with orchestra and audience.

TELEGRAPH
PHILA., PA.
ess [illegible]

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

Orchestra Give Third Performance of Their Series at Academy of Music.

Despite the inclement weather a considerable audience gathered at the Academy of Music last night to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra, although, of course, the ranks were lessened by the combination of the storm and the unusual interest of this week's playbills at the various theatres. Those who remained faithful, however, were rewarded by an admirable performance and an uncommonly attractive programme. The opening number was a "Hiawatha Overture" by Rubin Goldmark, who must be classed as an American composer, having been born and brought up in this country, though a nephew of Karl Goldmark. This overture was composed in the Rocky Mountains when its author was sojourning there in search of health. It is inspired by the romance and poetry of the idealized savage who is typified by its subject, but has not been built up on a basis of Indian folksongs at all, though there is a hint of such music here and there. It is a beautiful work, suave and gracious, impressive and full of gentle dignity; but it might as well apply to any heroic ideal as to the brave of the setting sun. Save for a touch of plaintive melody now and then, there is no special suggestion of Indian character about it, but it has a massive sweep that intimates a heroic quality.

The soloist of the evening was Mr. Adamowski, who gave Gustav Strube's Concerto in F sharp minor. Mr. Strube, who is one of the first violins of the Orchestra, conducted this number and shared the hearty applause that was bestowed upon soloist and composer alike. It was the first time this work, which is dedicated to Mr. Adamowski, has been given here, and it was well received. Mr. Gericke has written an elaborate cadenza for the final movement. The second and third movements of the composition are more pleasing than the first, which, though well written in its orchestral score, is not inspired, although there are passages all the way through that are of decided beauty. There is no weakness in Tschaikowsky's Fantasia from Dante's "Francesca da Rimini," which followed the concerto. It is a whirlwind, which the Orchestra rendered magnificently with more than their ordinary spirit.

The closing number was Brahms' Symphony No. 2 in D major, a most satisfying work. After a short acquaintance one can settle comfortably back to as complete an enjoyment of Brahms as to Beethoven, with as much confidence and certainty of contentment. Last night's symphony, which has been heard twice before here this season, becomes even more impressive on further hearing and is decidedly one of the biggest of all the big works for orchestra.

All through the concert last night the visitors played in their finest form and showed what an almost perfect organization they make. Mr. Gericke's interpretations were beyond question at all times.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

Timothee Adamowski the Soloist at an Interesting Concert.

Coming after the Vincent D'Indy visit, which gave such particular zest to the December concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, last evening's affair at the Academy could not fail to partake somewhat of the nature of an anti-climax. Nevertheless there was considerable interest in the program and a particularly warm welcome for that always admirable violinist, Timothee Adamowski.

Perhaps there was a certain thought in the selection of Mr. Adamowski's number of displaying the all-round equipment of Mr. Gericke's string choir, for the concerto was by Gustave Strube, another of the Boston's notable first violins. But in any event the work deserves a hearing, especially in view of the slender stock of modern works for the solo violin; it is musicianly and melodious; it is genuinely charming at many moments, and, best of all, it is spontaneous in its whole aspect—never labored or mechanical. Not a masterpiece by a goodly measure, but eminently agreeable and most admirably played.

In the purely orchestral portion of the program Tschaikowski's brilliant-hued and warmly passionate fantasia, "Francesca da Rimini," easily took first place. Beside this wonderfully expressive tone-poem the more popular and more pretentious symphony, the now almost hackneyed "Pathetique," falls into relative insignficance. Magnificently played as this lovely work certainly was last evening, its manifold beauties were simply irresistible.

Rubin Goldmark's "Hiawatha" overture and Brahm's Second Symphony brought the list to an end. Of the former it need only be remarked that it proved pleasing rather than epoch-making in any sense, while except to note that the noble symphony was very excellently played, there is no occasion for comment.

[147]

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
NORTH AMERICAN.
PHILA., PA.
JAN 9 - 1906

BOSTON ORCHESTRA'S NEW CONCERTO A HIT

It is by Strube, of the Gericke Corps—Played Here Frst Time.

SKILFULLY DEVELOPED

By William R. Lester

A. Brahm's symphony—in the second in D major—Rubin Goldmark's "Hiawatha" overture, and Tschaikowsky's wierdly pathetic Francesca da Rimini fantasia were the orchestral compositions on the Boston Orchestra's programme at the Academy of Music last evening.

Conductor Gericke's reading of these picturesque and widely variant musical works was sincere, scholarly and dignified—an impressive disclosure of artistic temperament joined with rare technical proficiency.

Violinist Timothee Adamowski, the soloist, played for the first time here a manuscript concert by Gustav Strube, one of Mr. Gericke's corps of violin players.

This composition was completed early last year, and was heard in public for the first time three weeks ago in Boston.

It is in three closely associated movements—a somewhat conventional allegro; a dreamy adagro; and a set of variations on an effective and original theme—in the minor mode. These latter are charmingly and skilfully developed. The final variations—an elaborate coda, with brilliant instrumental passages for free orchestra, is prefaced by a dazzling cadena written by Conductor Gericke—a supreme test of violin technique which bordered on the sensational.

Wondrous lyrical invention and graceful, resourceful thematic treatment characterize Mr. Strube's composition. Its rare beauty and high artistic quality were emphasized by Mr. Adamowski's broad, vigorous and brilliant interpretation of the solo passages. The new concerto is a noteworthy and valuable addition to the Boston band's repertoire.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
POST
WASHINGTON, D.
JAN 7 - 1906

Boston Symphony Concert.

At its next Washington concert, in the New National Theater, on Tuesday afternoon, January 9, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will again be under the direction of Mr. Gericke, and will give a typical programme. The last concert was distinctly of a special order, having been devoted entirely to modern French music and under the direction of Mr. Vincent d'Indy. While critical opinion regarding this music is not at all unanimous, the bringing of Mr. d'Indy to this country gave an unusual interest to the season.

It is necessary to correct a general impression that the coming of Mr. d'Indy meant the beginning of a new policy in the management of the orchestra, and that "guest" conductors will be a feature of future seasons. The policy of the orchestra in the future will usually be the same as it has been in the past. The success of the orchestra has proved incontestably that best results are obtainable only when a band works continuously under the same conductor. It is possible, in case there should come another school of composition as distinctive and as special as that of the "younger" Frenchmen that the Boston Symphony Orchestra might invite its chief exponent to conduct a series of concerts in this music, as it did Mr. d'Indy.

Tuesday's concert will introduce Prof. Willy Hess, of the orchestra, as soloist. Prof. Hess is one of the greatest violin virtuosi in the world, possessing a commanding technique, temperament, faultless taste, and a profound musical knowledge. Boston is notoriously the most critical city in this country in respect to violinists, and Prof. Hess' success there last year, when he made his debut, was on the sensational order. This success he has repeated in New York, Philadelphia, and the other cities where he has played. The work he has chosen for his debut in Washington is Bruch's Concerto in G minor. The programme is as follows:

Schumann—Symphony in B-flat, No. 1, Op. 38.
Bruch—Concerto for Violin and Orchestra in G minor.
Bach—Pastoral from "The Christmas Oratorio."
Liszt—Symphonic Poem, No. 2, "Tasso: Lament and Triumph."
Solo artist, Prof. Willy Hess.

TIMES.
WASHINGTON,
JAN 7 - 1906

National—Boston Symphony Orchestra.

At its next Washington concert in the New National Theater, on Tuesday afternoon, January 9, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will again be under the direction of Mr. Gericke and will give a typical program. The last concert was distinctly of a special order, having been devoted entirely to modern French music and under the direction of Vincent d'Indy. While critical opinion regarding this music is not at all unanimous, the management is thoroughly content with the results of the experiment, for the bringing of Mr. d'Indy to this country gave an unusual fillip of interest to the season.

But it is necessary to correct an impression which seems to have become more or less general, that the coming of Mr. d'Indy meant the beginning of a new policy in the management of the orchestra and that "guest" conductors will be a feature of future seasons. Nothing could be further from the truth. So far as can be seen, the policy of the orchestra in the future will be the same as it has been in the past.

Tuesday's concert will introduce Prof. Willy Hess, of the orchestra, as soloist. On this trip he plays in New York and Washington. Prof. Hess is one of the greatest violin virtuosi in the world, possessing a commanding technique, temperament, faultless taste and a profound musical knowledge. Boston is notoriously the most critical city in this country in respect to violinists, and Prof. Hess' success there last year when he made his debut was on the sensational order. This success he has repeated in New York, Philadelphia, and the other cities where he has played. The work he has chosen for his debut in Washington is Bruch's Concerto in G minor.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
INQUIRER.
PHILA., PA.
JAN 9 1906

MUSIC AT THE ACADEMY

Third Concert for the Season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, gave its third concert for the season at the Academy of Music last evening, when a large audience enjoyed the irreproachable performance of a well arranged and interesting program. The symphony was the D-major of Brahms, No. 2, and this beautiful work, which is a favorite with Mr. Scheel and which was admirably given by him a few weeks ago, received an interpretation of extraordinary eloquence, dignity, lucidity and charm.

It is all lovely and each of its four movements was played in a manner leaving nothing to be desired, but perhaps that of the four which made the deepest impression was the exquisite allegretto, with its delicious passages for the brasses and wood wind. The brasses in the Boston organization are unsurpassed. Perhaps it would not be too much to say that they are unequaled, but certainly in the quality of the tone which they produce and in the purity of their intonation they have no superior. They are entirely free from the metallic harshness which is so commonly the bane of this orchestral department, and their work last night in its perfect finish and consummate art could hardly be over praised.

The other numbers on the program were Rubin Goldmark's poetic "Hiawatha" overture, which was good to hear, and the "Francesca da Rimini" fantasia of Tschaikowsky, which although it has its fine moments somewhat strains the attention in the excess of its elaboration, yet it is intensely emotional, and the wild passions of the story which it illustrates were movingly communicated.

The assisting artist was Mr. Timothee Adamowski, whose execution of an interesting concerto for the violin written by Mr. Gustave Strube, one of his colleagues in the orchestra, well deserved in its mingled delicacy and strength, in its technical efficiency and intellectual power, the applause which it elicited.

TIMES.
WASHINGTON, D.
JAN 4 - 1906

NEXT BOSTON SYMPHONY OFFERS GOOD PROGRAM

The third Boston Symphony Concert will be given in the New National Theater next Tuesday at 4:30 p. m.

The soloist, Prof. Willy Hess, will play Bruch's G Minor Concerto for the violin. The orchestral numbers will be Schumann's Symphony, No. 1, in B flat major: The "Pastoral," from "Bach's Christmas Oratorio," and Lisst's symphonic poem, "Tasso's Lament and Triumph."

Prof. Willy Hess, the soloist at this concert, is the concert master of the orchestra, and his appearance in this role is awaited with great interest.

STAR
WASHINGTON, D.
JAN 7 - 1906

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

At its next Washington concert in the New National Theater, on Tuesday afternoon, January 9, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will again be under the direction of Mr. Gericke and will give a typical program. The last concert was distinctly of a special order, having been devoted entirely to modern French music and under the direction of Mr. Vincent d'Indy. While critical opinion regarding this music is not at all unanimous, the management is thoroughly content with the results of the experiment, for the bringing of Mr. d'Indy to this country gave an unsual fillip of interest to the season.

But it is necessary to correct an impression which seems to have become more or less general that the coming of Mr. d'Indy meant the beginning of a new policy in the management of the orchestra, and that "guest" conductors will be a feature of future seasons. Nothing could be farther from the truth. So far as can be seen the policy of the orchestra in the future will be the same as it has been in the past.

Tuesday's concert will introduce Prof Willy Hess of the orchestra as soloist. The work he has chosen for his debut in Washington is Bruch's concerto in G minor. The other orchestral numbers are Schumann's symphony in B flat, No. 1, op. 38; Bach's pastoral from "The Christmas Oratorio" and Lisza's symphonic poem, No. 2, "Tasso: Lament and Triumph."

PO
WASHINGTON, D.
JAN 10 1906

THIRD SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Boston Musicians, Under Mr. Gericke, Give a Fine Programme.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the third concert of its present season in the National Theater yesterday afternoon. Mr. Gericke conducted, after having yielded his desk to Vincent d'Indy for the December concert, and everything was as merry as the proverbial marriage bell.

The audience was large, well dressed, and well pleased with the programme, which, with one exception, was devoted to the German composers. Turn about is fair play, and the Teutons must be given their innings. France may have forgotten 1870, but her musicians doubtless recall other dates.

Schumann never sounded so well and so sane as he did in his first symphony in B-flat major yesterday. This is not only true of him, when compared with some of the very modern efforts, but also when pitted against parts of his own music; for the B-flat symphony is his spring song, sung before any clouds (Debussy's or otherwise) had loomed upon the horizon of his reason. It is one of the most beautiful examples of optimistic writing which any one has given. Mr. Gericke, by the way, seems bent on presenting the brighter side of composers this season, and in the present instance he gave a characteristic of Schumann's which is very familiar to local concert-goers. Yesterday's symphony was a great favorite with the late lamented Washington Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Gericke's interpretation of all this good feeling, while strictly held within his classical and suave methods, was none the less sympathetic. The orchestra never played better.

The pastorale from Bach's "Christmas Oratorio," and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Tasso: Lament and Triumph," were the other two numbers for the orchestra. The old contrapuntist and the piano-playing abbe afforded an interesting contrast. Certainly Mr. Gericke should feel very much at home with the former, and he almost threatened to get real noisy in the Liszt number. He recollected, however, and Boston was saved the chagrin of having her orchestra play anything but forte.

Prof. Willy Hess, the concertmeister of the orchestra, was the soloist. He scored a triumph, and he deserved every bit of it. His playing of the great Bruch concerto recalled a gentleman of the old school. In the allegro was displayed all the polish and finish; in the adagio all the nobility, and in the finale all of the kindliness and wit. It was violin playing of the first water, considered from any one or all of the points from which that instrument may be viewed.

STAR
WASHINGTON, D. C.
DEC 31 1905

Boston Symphony Concert.

The third Boston Symphony concert will be given in the New National Theater on Tuesday afternoon, January 9, at 4:30 o'clock. The soloist will be Prof. Willy Hess, who will play Busch's G-minor concerto for the violin. The orchestral numbers will be Schumann's Symphony, No. 1, in B-flat major; the "Pastoral" from Bach's "Christmas Oratorio" and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Tasso's Lament and Triumph."

STA
WASHINGTON,
JAN 10 1906

Boston Symp...

The third concert of the B... Orchestra series took place ... tional Theater yesterday after... attendance was one of the la... season and one of the most ... was demonstrative also, bestow... plause with discriminative ju... Gericke was again in his place at ... ductor's desk, and the playing w... ways under his direction, all that ... desired. The program was a pleas... and its interpretation eminently s... tory. It opened with Schumann's first ... phony in B flat major, which has ... favorite of this orchestra and which is ... dently a favorite of its audiences. It ... never better interpreted or better ... It seemed as if Mr. Gericke had caught ... spirit of the composer, and obeyed his ... gestion that it should express the ... ness of spring from the very begin... The other two numbers by the orch... were Bach's pastorale from the "Christmas Ovation" and Liszt's symphonic po... "Tasso: Lament and Triumph." T... were played with that finish and artistic effect that characterize all the work of the orchestra. The Liszt composition, with which the program closed, was played exceptionally well, the sharp contrast between the two main themes being brought out with fine effect.

Mr. Willey Hess, the concert master of the orchestra, was the soloist, playing Max Bruch's concerto in G minor for violin and orchestra. His playing was of the highest standard, was straightforward, musicianly and intelligent. All the technical difficulties of the great work were overcome with ease.

TIMES
WASHINGTON, D.
JAN 10 1906

BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAM FAMILIAR, BUT WELL DONE

What might well be termed a typical matinee program was presented to a brilliant audience by the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon. The concert was also the occasion for a reunion of old friends. Gericke again held the baton, and in his own inimitable way interpreted with intelligence and good judgment a series of compositions by famous German masters.

Notwithstanding that each number was a noble work, and was played with artistic finish, yet a more diversified program, even if it must be a German one day, would have been far more gratifying. The Schumann B flat symphony is as familiar as a nursery rhyme, Bruch's No. 1 concerto for violin has almost been played into fragments, although Prof. Willy Hess did well with it; the "Pastorale," from Bach's Christmas Oratorio, another old friend, and last, but by no means least, Liszt's symphonic Poem No. 2, "Tasso:" "Lament and Triumph," much in evidence as a graduation test for conservatory orchestras.

The four movements of the symphony were played without a flaw, the responsive themes in the Andante for muted horns, then strings, then wood wind were beautifully done. Schumann tells in poetic pathos his hopes, disappointments, and joys, the sparkling Scherzo in particular giving color to his ideal.

Endowed with a splendid technique particularly in double stops and work in the upper positions, Prof. Hess scored a distinguished success in his performance of the Bruch Concerto. What he lacks is the tone power necessary to make his Cadenza efforts clearly heard. A little more power of tone would also add to his performance.

The Bach number is too well known to need much comment other than to say that it was given an excellent reading by Mr. Gericke. And the same can be said of the Liszt composition.

AMERICAN, Phila.
From
Address WASHINGTON, D.C.
Date JAN 6 - 1906

Boston Symphony Tuesday

THE PROGRAM for the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert on Tuesday consists mostly of works already performed here by the Washington Symphony Orchestra; and a majority of the audience will have been thus prepared for a complete enjoyment and appreciation of the music. The program opens with the Symphony in B Flat (No. 1) of Schumann, and is followed by Beethoven's Violin Concerto, the solo to be taken by Willy Hess. Bach's Pastorale from the Christmas Oratorio, and Liszt's Second Symphonic Poem, "Tasso" (Lament and Triumph), will complete the afternoon's delectation.

[148]

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
NORTH AMERICAN.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA'S NEW CONCERTO A HIT

It is by Strube, of the Gericke Corps—Played Here Frst Time.

SKILFULLY DEVELOPED

By William R. Lester

A. Brahm's symphony—in the second in D major—Rubin Goldmark's "Hiawatha" overture, and Tschaikowsky's wieirdly pathetic Francesca da Rimini fantasia were the orchestral compositions on the Boston Orchestra's programme at the Academy of Music last evening.

Conductor Gericke's reading of these picturesque and widely variant musical works was sincere, scholarly and dignified—an impressive disclosure of artistic temperament joined with rare technical pronciency.

Violinist Timothee Adamowski, the soloist, played for the first time here a manuscript concert by Gustav Strube, one of Mr. Gericke's corps of violin players.

This composition was completed early last year, and was heard in public for the first time three weeks ago in Boston.

It is in three closely associated movements—a somewhat conventional allegro; a dreamy adagro; and a set of variations on an effective and original theme—in the minor mode. These latter are charmingly and skilfully developed. The final variations—an elaborate coda, with brilliant instrumental passages for free orchestra, is prefaced by a dazzling cadena written by Conductor Gericke—a supreme test of violin technique which bordered on the sensational.

Wondrous lyrical invention and graceful, resourceful thematic treatment characterize Mr. Strube's composition. Its rare beauty and high artistic quality were emphasized by Mr. Adamowski's broad, vigorous and brilliant interpretation of the solo passages. The new concerto is a noteworthy and valuable addition to the Boston band's repertoire.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
INQUIRER

ess

MUSIC AT THE ACADEMY

Third Concert for the Season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, gave its third concert for the season at the Academy of Music last evening, when a large audience enjoyed the irreproachable performance of a well arranged and interesting program. The symphony was the D-major of Brahms, No. 2, and this beautiful work, which is a favorite with Mr. Scheel and which was admirably given by him a few weeks ago, received an interpretation of extraordinary eloquence, dignity, lucidity and charm.

It is all lovely and each of its four movements was played in a manner leaving nothing to be desired, but perhaps that of the four which made the deepest impression was the exquisite allegretto, with its delicious passages for the brasses and wood wind. The brasses in the Boston organization are unsurpassed. Perhaps it would not be too much to say that they are unequaled, but certainly in the quality of the tone which they produce and in the purity of their intonation they have no superior. They are entirely free from the metallic harshness which is so commonly the bane of this orchestral department, and their work last night in its perfect finish and consummate art could hardly be over praised.

The other numbers on the program were Rubin Goldmark's poetic "Hiawatha" overture, which was good to hear, and the "Francesca da Rimini" fantasia of Tschaikowsky, which although it has its fine moments somewhat strains the attention in the excess of its elaboration, yet it is intensely emotional, and the wild passions of the story which it illustrates were movingly communicated.

The assisting artist was Mr. Timothee Adamowski, whose execution of an interesting concerto for the violin written by Mr. Gustave Strube, one of his colleagues in the orchestra, well deserved in its mingled delicacy and strength, in its technical efficiency and intellectual power, the applause which it elicited.

Paper Cutting Bureau in the World
POST

WASHINGTON, D.

JAN 7 - 1906

Boston Symphony Concert.

At its next Washington concert, in the New National Theater, on Tuesday afternoon, January 9, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will again be under the direction of Mr. Gericke, and will give a typical programme. The last concert was distinctly of a special order, having been devoted entirely to modern French music and under the direction of Mr. Vincent d'Indy. While critical opinion regarding this music is not at all unanimous, the bringing of Mr. d'Indy to this country gave an unusual interest to the season.

It is necessary to correct a general impression that the coming of Mr. d'Indy meant the beginning of a new policy in the management of the orchestra, and that "guest" conductors will be a feature of future seasons. The policy of the orchestra in the future will usually be the same as it has been in the past. The success of the orchestra has proved incontestably that best results are obtainable only when a band works continuously under the same conductor. It is possible, in case there should come another school of composition as distinctive and as special as that of the "younger" Frenchmen that the Boston Symphony Orchestra might invite its chief exponent to conduct a series of concerts in this music, as it did Mr. d'Indy.

Tuesday's concert will introduce Prof. Willy Hess, of the orchestra, as soloist. Prof. Hess is one of the greatest violin virtuosi in the world, possessing a commanding technique, temperament, faultless taste, and a profound musical knowledge. Boston is notoriously the most critical city in this country in respect to violinists, and Prof. Hess' success there last year, when he made his debut, was on the sensational order. This success he has repeated in New York, Philadelphia, and the other cities where he has played. The work he has chosen for his debut in Washington is Bruch's Concerto in G minor. The programme is as follows:

Schumann—Symphony in B-flat, No. 1, Op. 38.
Bruch—Concerto for Violin and Orchestra in G minor.
Bach—Pastoral from "The Christmas Oratorio."
Liszt—Symphonic Poem, No. 2, "Tasso: Lament and Triumph."
Solo artist, Prof. Willy Hess.

TIMES.

JAN 7

National—Boston Symphony Orchestra.

At its next Washington concert in the New National Theater, on Tuesday afternoon, January 9, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will again be under the direction of Mr. Gericke and will give a typical program. The last concert was distinctly of a special order, having been devoted entirely to modern French music and under the direction of Vincent d'Indy. While critical opinion regarding this music is not at all unanimous, the management is thoroughly content with the results of the experiment, for the bringing of Mr. d'Indy to this country gave an unusual fillip of interest to the season.

But it is necessary to correct an impression which seems to have become more or less general that the coming of Mr. d'Indy meant the beginning of a new policy in the management of the orchestra and that "guest" conductors will be a feature of future seasons. Nothing could be further from the truth. So far as can be seen, the policy of the orchestra in the future will be the same as it has been in the past

Tuesday's concert will introduce Prof. Willy Hess, of the orchestra, as soloist. On this trip he plays in New York and Washington. Prof. Hess is one of the greatest violin virtuosi in the world, possessing a commanding technique, temperament, faultless taste and a profound musical knowledge. Boston is notoriously the most critical city in this country in respect to violinists, and Prof. Hess' success there last year when he made his debut was on the sensational order. This success he has repeated in New York, Philadelphia, and the other cities where he has played. The work he has chosen for his debut in Washington in Bruch's Cencerto in G minor.

TIMES.

WASHINGTON, D.

JAN 4 - 1906

NEXT BOSTON SYMPHONY OFFERS GOOD PROGRAM

The third Boston Symphony Concert will be given in the New National Theater next Tuesday at 4:30 p. m.

The soloist, Prof. Willy Hess, will play Bruch's G Minor Concerto for the violin. The orchestral numbers will be Schumann's Symphony, No. 1, in B flat major. The "Pastoral," from "Bach's Christmas Oratorio," and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Tasso's Lament and Triumph."

Prof. Willy Hess, the soloist at this concert, is the concert master of the orchestra, and his appearance in this city is anticipated with great interest.

[148]

STAR

WASHINGTON, D.

JAN 7 - 1906

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

At its next Washington concert in the New National Theater, on Tuesday afternoon, January 9, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will again be under the direction of Mr. Gericke and will give a typical program. The last concert was distinctly of a special order, having been devoted entirely to modern French music and under the direction of Mr. Vincent d'Indy. While critical opinion regarding this music is not at all unanimous, the management is thoroughly content with the results of the experiment, for the bringing of Mr. d'Indy to this country gave an unsual fillip of interest to the season.

But it is necessary to correct an impression which seems to have become more or less general that the coming of Mr. d'Indy meant the beginning of a new policy in the management of the orchestra, and that "guest" conductors will be a feature of future seasons. Nothing could be farther from the truth. So far as can be seen the policy of the orchestra in the future will be the same as it has been in the past.

Tuesday's concert will introduce Prof Willy Hess of the orchestra as soloist. The work he has chosen for his debut in Washington is Bruch's concerto in G minor. The other orchestral numbers are Schumann's symphony in B flat, No. 1, op. 38; Bach's pastoral from "The Christmas Oratorio" and Lisza's symphonic poem, No. 2, "Tasso: Lament and Triumph."

ess

JAN 10 1906

THIRD SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Boston Musicians, Under Mr. Gericke, Give a Fine Programme.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the third concert of its present season in the National Theater yesterday afternoon. Mr. Gericke conducted, after having yielded his desk to Vincent d'Indy for the December concert, and everything was as merry as the proverbial marriage bell.

The audience was large, well dressed, and well pleased with the programme, which, with one exception, was devoted to the German composers. Turn about is fair play, and the Teutons must be given their innings. France may have forgotten 1870, but her musicians doubtless recall other dates.

Schumann never sounded so well and so sane as he did in his first symphony in B-flat major yesterday. This is not only true of him, when compared with some of the very modern efforts, but also when pitted against parts of his own music; for the B-flat symphony is his spring song, sung before any clouds (Debussy's or otherwise) had loomed upon the horizon of his reason. It is one of the most beautiful examples of optimistic writing which any one has given. Mr. Gericke, by the way, seems bent on presenting the brighter side of composers this season, and in the present instance he gave a characteristic of Schumann's which is very familiar to local concert-goers. Yesterday's symphony was a great favorite with the late lamented Washington Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Gericke's interpretation of all this good feeling, while strictly held within his classical and suave methods, was none the less sympathetic. The orchestra never played better.

The pastorale from Bach's "Christmas Oratorio," and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Tasso: Lament and Triumph," were the other two numbers for the orchestra. The old contrapuntist and the piano-playing abbe afforded an interesting contrast. Certainly Mr. Gericke should feel very much at home with the former, and he almost threatened to get real noisy in the Liszt number. He recollected, however, and Boston was saved the chagrin of having her orchestra play anything but forte.

Prof. Willy Hess, the concertmeister of the orchestra, was the soloist. He scored a triumph, and he deserved every bit of it. His playing of the great Bruch concerto recalled a gentleman of the old school. In the allegro was displayed all the polish and finish; in the adagio all the nobility, and in the finale all of the kindliness and wit. It was violin playing of the first water, considered from any one or all of the points from which that instrument may be viewed.

STAR

WASHINGTON, D. C

DEC 31 09

Boston Symphony Concert.

The third Boston Symphony concert will be given in the New National Theater on Tuesday afternoon, January 9, at 4:30 o'clock. The soloist will be Prof. Willy Hess, who will play Busch's G-minor concerto for the violin. The orchestral numbers will be Schumann's Symphony, No. 1, in B-flat major; the "Pastoral" from Bach's "Christmas Oratorio" and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Tasso's Lament and Triumph."

STAR

ess WASHINGTON,

JAN 10 1906

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra series took place at the National Theater yesterday afternoon, and the attendance was one of the largest of the season and one of the most brilliant. It was demonstrative also, bestowing its applause with discriminative judgment. Mr. Gericke was again in his place at the conductor's desk, and the playing was, as always under his direction, all that could be desired. The program was a pleasing one and its interpretation eminently satisfactory. It opened with Schumann's first symphony in B flat major, which has been a favorite of this orchestra and which is evidently a favorite of its audiences. It was never better interpreted or better played. It seemed as if Mr. Gericke had caught the spirit of the composer, and obeyed his suggestion that it should express the joyousness of spring from the very beginning. The other two numbers by the orchestra were Bach's pastorale from the "Christmas Ovation" and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Tasso: Lament and Triumph." These were played with that finish and artistic effect that characterize all the work of this orchestra. The Liszt composition, with which the program closed, was played exceptionally well, the sharp contrast between the two main themes being brought out with fine effect.

Mr. Willey Hess, the concert master of the orchestra, was the soloist, playing Max Bruch's concerto in G minor for violin and orchestra. His playing was of the highest standard, was straightforward, musicianly and intelligent. All the technical difficulties of the great work were overcome with ease.

TIMES

BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAM FAMILIAR, BUT WELL DONE

What might well be termed a typical matinee program was presented to a brilliant audience by the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon. The concert was also the occasion for a reunion of old friends. Gericke again held the baton, and in his own inimitable way interpreted with intelligence and good judgment a series of compositions by famous German masters.

Notwithstanding that each number was a noble work, and was played with artistic finish, yet a more diversified program, even if it must be a German day, would have been far more gratifying. The Schumann B flat symphony is as familiar as a nursery rhyme, Bruch's No. 1 concerto for violin has almost been played into fragments, although Prof. Willy Hess did well with it; the "Pastorale," from Bach's Christmas Oratorio, another old friend, and last, but by no means least, Liszt's symphonic Poem No. 2, "Tasso;" "Lament and Triumph," much in evidence as a graduation test for conservatory orchestras.

The four movements of the symphony were played without a flaw, the responsive themes in the Andante for muted horns, then strings, then wood wind were beautifully done. Schumann tells in poetic pathos his hopes, disappointments, and joys, the sparkling Scherzo in particular giving color to his ideal.

Endowed with a splendid technique, particularly in double stops and work in the upper positions, Prof. Hess scored a distinguished success in his performance of the Bruch Concerto. What he lacks is the tone power necessary to make his Cadenza efforts clearly heard. A little more power of tone would also add to his performance.

The Bach number is too well known to need much comment other than to say that it was given an excellent reading by Mr. Gericke. And the same can be said of the Liszt composition.

AMERICAN, Washington, D. C.
From
Address
Date JAN 6 - 1906

Boston Symphony Tuesday

THE PROGRAM for the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert on Tuesday consists mostly of works already performed here by the Washington Symphony Orchestra; and a majority of the audience will have been thus prepared for a complete enjoyment and appreciation of the music. The program opens with the Symphony in B Flat (No. 1) of Schumann, and is followed by Beethoven's Violin Concerto, the solo to be taken by Willy Hess. Bach's Pastorale from the Christmas Oratorio, and Liszt's Second Symphonic Poem, "Tasso" (Lament and Triumph), will complete the afternoon's delectation.

WASHINGTON, D.
JAN 4 190

...third Boston Symphony concert will be given in the New National Theatre on Tuesday afternoon, January 9, at 4 o'clock. The soloist will be Prof. Willy Hess, the concertmaster of the orchestra, and his appearance in this city is anticipated with great interest. Seats are on sale at T. Arthur Smith's ticket office.

AMERICAN.
BALTIMORE, MD.
DEC 31 1905

Every now and then someone shows a disposition to scold or criticise the Baltimore public for not patronizing musical enterprises which are put before them.

This is hardly fair, for no one can be expected to take what he does not call for, and probably does not want. If people want things which are offered to them, especially if well advertised, they take them and pay for them. But if people do not take things they do not want there is no occasion for blame or scolding, even if the offerer is disappointed. This is particularly true in the matter of music. People do not care much for it about Christmas time, especially people who are busy with Christmas affairs and whose homes are full of Christmas enjoyments. People so situated prefer to stay indoors unless something is offered which they are very anxious to hear.

It is evident that this was not the case with the concert by the Philadelphia Orchestra during the past week. This orchestra has been heard several times in Baltimore, so that it does not appeal to Baltimoreans on the score of novelty, and the Baltimore musical public is not yet convinced of its entire musical excellence.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra came to Baltimore with 60 musicians for its first concert. But, although it was almost unknown at the time, it took in over $1,200. For its second concert the receipts were still larger, and they have increased steadily until they are now far beyond $2,000 a night. But the musical people of the city are fully convinced that they get their money's worth. They all have their individual preferences among conductors and as to programs, but they are sure of hearing something they like and of having it well played.

The last concert by the Boston Orchestra was something of an exception to the rule, and, as anticipated, the sales fell off in proportion. The partrons were not generally satisfied with a full program of modern French music, nor did they entirely like the visiting French conductor. To give the reason why should lead into a long and useless discussion. People do not want what they are not reasonably sure that they will like, and as this is a free country they are not compelled to patronize doubtful enterprises. Washington started a venture of this kind three years ago, and depended on Baltimore for patronage and support. But after one concert here the venture was given up in this city. The attempt was made to capture Baltimore by the bluff of alleged solidity; but it would not work. The greatness of its leader was extolled by its manager. But the effort was unavailing. The first note of the concert excited suspicion. It looked afterward as if all the orchestra rehearsal had been given to have that first note stunningly precise, as if the entire reputation of the conductor depended on it. The concert was a failure, in spite of the marked success of the first note.

The Philadelphia leader came with a program of the most modern music, which is yet struggling to win its way in the musical world. But the only success of the evening was the one old-fashioned Mozart number, sung by Campanari. It was a suspicious program, which Mr. Gericke would hardly have offered, and it was not a success. It was not assimilated. Musical people do not like to live entirely on musical mince pie and plum pudding, even at Christmas time.

The orchestra would no doubt have been much more successful in a Mozart, Beethoven or Schubert symphony for one substantial number on the program. And then the brassy, showy Goldmark and Strauss numbers would have met a more welcome reception as musical dessert.

It is very natural for a conductor to believe in himself. They all do so, more or less, especially until they have rubbed sufficiently against events. Conductor Scheel undobutedly believes in his own mode of directing. But it has been quietly observed that his way is not the way that Theodore Thomas directed, nor the way of Von Bulow or of Tschaikowsky, nor like the way that Nikisch or Von der Stucken direct now. It is not the way that Berlioz, the founder of the modern orchestra, directed directors to direct. The habit of posing and dramatic air-beating, with particular "wiggles," as if intedned for the guidance of inexperienced musicians, are all forbidden by Berlioz.

Of course, if there are enough Baltimoreans, whether musical or unmusical, who wish to hear nothing but extreme modern music directed in Mr. Scheel's peculiar manner they will appear and patronize him whenever he appears and make the visiting orchestra a success.

But it would be better for all lovers of music in Baltimore if they would unite in some kind of an association to establish and maintain a permanent Baltimore orchestra which could render programs of the best music of all nations, whether old or new, under some approved and well-trained conductor.

...of occasional symphony con... could then afford from 20... opportunity to...

AMERICA
BALTIMORE, MD.
DEC 31 1905

Boston Symphony Concert.

The third Boston Symphony concert will be given in the Lyric on Wednesday evening, January 10. The solist will be the distinguished pianist, Alfred Reisenauer, who will play Weber's "Concertstueck," for piano and orchestra. The other works on the program will be Schumann's Symphony, No. 1, in B flat; Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," and Sir Edward Elgar's overture "In the South."

HERALD
BALTIMORE, MD.
JAN 4 - 1906

Boston Symphony's Third Concert.

At its next Baltimore concert in the Lyric on Wednesday evening, January 10, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will again be under the direction of Mr. Gericke and will give a typical program. The December concert was distinctly of a special order, having been devoted entirely to modern French music and under the personal direction of Mr. Vincent d'Indy. While critical opinion regarding this music is by no means unanimous, the management is thoroughly content with the results of the experiment, for the bringing of Mr. d'Indy to this country gave an unusual fillip of interest to the season.

But it is necessary to correct an impression which seems to have become more or less general, that the coming of Mr. d'Indy meant the beginning of a new policy in the management of the orchestra and that "guest" conductors will be a feature of every season. This is not at all true. So far as can be seen, the policy of the orchestra will be in the future what it has been in the past. It is possible, in case there should be another school of composition as distinctive and as special as that of the "younger" Frenchmen, that the Boston Symphony Orchestra might invite its chief exponent to conduct a series of concerts of this music, but the idea of having special conductors, even in one season, has never been entertained.

The solo artist at the coming concert will be the pianist, Alfred Reisenauer. Mr. Reisenauer needs no introduction to the Baltimore public. He will play Weber's Concertstuck," a brilliant and melodious work. The program in full is as follows:

Schumann—Symphony No. 1, in B-flat major, Op. 38.
Weber—Concert piece for pianoforte and orchestra in F minor, Op. 79.
Richard Strauss—Tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," Op. 28.
Sir Edward Elgar (first time)—Overture, "In the South."

SUN.
BALTIMORE, M...
JAN 7 -

IN HARMONY'S REALM

Three Events Of Unusual Importance Take Place This Week.

This week will be one of unusual interest to Baltimore music lovers, who will have the opportunity of attending three events of much importance—the third Boston Symphony concert at the Lyric on Wednesday evening, the appearance at the same hall on Friday evening of Mme. Johanna Gadski and the young Polish pianist, Arthur Rubinstein, and the sixth of the Peabody recitals on Friday afternoon.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will again be under the direction of Mr. Gericke, and will give a typical program. The December concert was of a special order, and was devoted to modern French music, under the personal direction of Mr. Vincent d'Indy. While critical opinion is by no means unanimous, the management is thoroughly content with the results of the experiment, for the bringing of Mr. d'Indy to this country gave an unusual fillip of interest to the season.

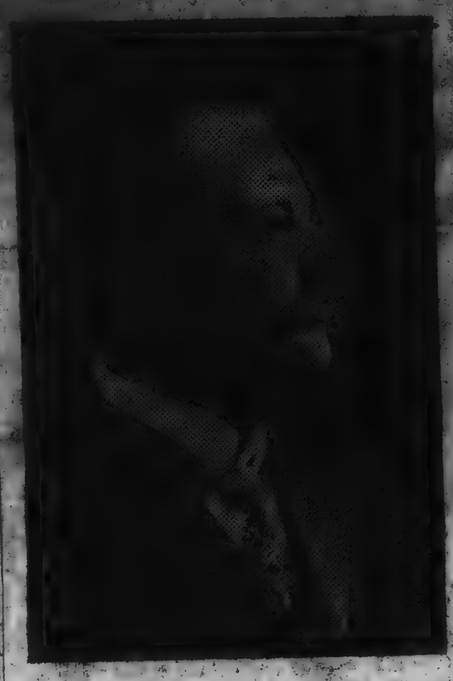
But the impression that the coming of Mr. d'Indy meant the beginning of a new policy in the management of the orchestra and that "guest" conductors will be a feature of every season is not at all true. So far as can be seen, the policy of the orchestra will be in the future what it has been in the past. It is possible, in case there should be another school of composition as distinctive and as special as that of the "younger" Frenchmen, that the orchestra might invite its chief exponent to conduct a series of concerts of this music; but the idea of having special conductors, even in one season, has never been entertained.

The solo artist will be the pianist, Alfred Reisenauer. Now in his second tour of America, he has more than confirmed the flattering verdict rendered by the public when he first played over here. He will play Weber's "Concertstuck," a brilliant and melodious work. With this he had an almost sensational success when he played with the orchestra in Boston three weeks ago. One of the most attractive offerings of the year is furnished by the rest of the program. It comprises Schumann's first symphony, Richard Strauss' fascinating rondo, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," and a work new to Baltimore; Sir Edward Elgar's overture, "In the South." Sir Edward Elgar is the greatest of English composers.

Apropos of this concert, it is interesting to note that Miss Susan Bray Dungan, the directress of the Virgil Clavier Piano School, will give another "musical lecture" tomorrow evening, at which she will give an analysis of Wednesday's program. These lectures, to which admittance is free, are ... an able ... are of inter...

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the ...
...ess BALTIMORE, MD.
JAN 10 1906

At The Lyric Tonight



Alfred Reisenauer, piano soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

HERALD
BALTIMORE, MD.
JAN 11 1906

The Musical World

The Boston Symphony Concert.

The third Boston Symphony concert was given last night at the Lyric, Alfred Reisenauer, pianist, being the soloist. The orchestral portion of the program consisted of Schumann's Symphony in B flat major, No. 1; Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," and a concert overture "In the South," by Edward Elgar, while the piano number was Weber's "Koncertstueck" in F minor, for pianoforte and orchestra.

While an occasional change of director for the Boston Symphony Orchestra is an exceedingly hazardous proceeding, it, nevertheless, has, at least, one advantage; it causes the regular director, Mr. Gericke, to be more thoroughly appreciated and respected. Of course, the organization, in its present high state of efficiency, will always play well and give a sound interpretation of any work it is called upon to perform, but this power to produce effects is entirely due to the thorough schooling and drilling to which it is subjected by Mr. Gericke. Still, the difference between its work of the last concert and the work of that of last evening is strongly contrasted, in favor of the more recent one. And this is not in reference to the compositions produced, but to the style of production. Under Mr. Gericke there is a polish and refinement that was not so strongly in evidence under Monsieur D'Indy. And here, it would be well to remark, that while Mr. Gericke's readings have always been those of a scholar, they have been occasionally lacking in temperamental qualities. Recently, however, the director has exhibited more warmth and more geniality, while his scholarliness has suffered no loss.

The last performance in Baltimore of the Schumann Symphony by the Boston organization some year or two ago, was not by any means an ideal performance. Mr. Gericke at that time exhibited a chilliness of mood that represented repression rather than expression. Last night conditions were different and he infused into his men a warmth of feeling and a sympathy with the music that gave a tone and color of exceptional beauty. Truly, the symphony is an enormous conception, and when painted in its true colors, as it was yesterday evening, it stands out as one of the greatest and most musical of all modern symphonic writing.

The Strauss and Elgar works are fine examples of modern orchestral music, and exhibit the highest pinnacle to which modern instrumentation has attained. Both works owe their influence to Teutonic training, the one composer being a German and the other having studied in Germany. But while a certain similarity exists in the modern orchestral coloring and in the fact that both men had something to say, there is a decided contrast in the tales they tell. Strauss exhibits a humorous vein, in imitating the pranks of his jesters and makes his hearers feel as they would in the jester's presence, that they never know what is coming next. Elgar pursues a more serious strain, and is perhaps a trifle less descriptive. Both works are full of continuous beauty, and never for a moment is the attention diverted by an uninteresting passage.

It is generally conceded that Alfred Reisenauer is a great pianist, and therefore, of course, he must be so. But if he be really great he is at the same time remarkably uninteresting. First, he elected to play a composition that was scarcely consistent with the remainder of the program, and secondly, he failed to give any expression to the work. He is a pianist devoid of magnetism and, therefore, aroused but little real musical enthusiasm. Technical facilities he appears to possess in abundance, but there it ends. It may be that as a soloist without orchestra, and left to his own devices, he might create an entirely different impression, but that which he left behind him after last night's performance was disappointing.

NE...
from
BALTIMORE, MD.
ddress
JAN 6 -

MR. REISENAUER, SOLOIST.

Programme At The Next Boston Symphony Concert.

At its next Baltimore concert in the Lyric, on Wednesday evening, January 10, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will again be under the direction of Mr. Gericke, and will give a typical programme. The solo artist at the coming concert will be the distinguished pianist, Alfred Reisenauer. Mr. Reisenauer needs no introduction to the Baltimore public. Now, in his second tour of America, he has more than confirmed the flattering verdict rendered by the public when he first played over here. He must be grouped among those few pianists who really deserve the appellation of great. He will play Weber's "Concertstueck," a brilliant and melodious work.

The remainder of the programme makes one of the most attractive offerings of the year. It comprises Schumann's First Symphony, Richard Strauss' fascinating rondo, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," and a work new in Baltimore, Sir Edward Elgar's overture, "In the South." Sir Edward Elgar is the greatest of English composers, and this is said to be one of his most charming works. The programme in full is as follows:

Schumann—Symphony No. 1, in D flat major, Op. 38.
Weber—Concert piece for pianoforte and orchestra, in F minor, Op. 79.
Richard Strauss—Tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," Op. 28.
Sir Edward Elgar—Overture, "In the South." (First time.)
Solo Artist—Mr. Alfred Reisenauer.

...Paper Cutting Bureau ...
AMERICAN.
BALTIMORE, MD
JAN 7 - 1906

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

At its next Baltimore concert, in the Lyric, on Wednesday, January 10, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will again be under the direction of Mr. Gericke and will give a typical program. The December concert was distinctly of a special order, having been devoted entirely to modern French music and under the personal direction of Mr. Vincent d'Indy. While critical opinion regarding this music is by no means unanimous, the management is thoroughly content with the results of the experiment, for the bringing of Mr. d'Indy to this country gave an unusual fillip of interest to the season. But the idea of having special conductors, even in one season, has never been entertained.

The solo artist at the coming concert will be the distinguished pianist, Alfred Reisenauer. Mr. Reisenauer needs no introduction to the Baltimore public. Now in his second tour of America, he has more than confirmed the flattering verdict rendered by the public when he first played over here. He must be grouped among those few pianists who really deserve the appellation of great. He will play Weber's "Concertstuck," a brilliant and melodious work which is heard all too seldom in our concert halls. With this he had an almost sensational success when he played with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston three weeks ago, winning a half score of recalls.

The remainder of the program makes one of the most attractive offerings of the year. It comprises Schumann's First Symphony, Richard Strauss' fascinating Rondo, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," and a work new to Baltimore; Sir Edward Elgar's overture, "In the South." Sir Edward Elgar is the greatest of English composers and this is said to be one of his most charming works. The program in full is as follows:

Schumann—
Symphony No. 1, in B flat major. Op. 38.
Weber—
Concert piece for pianoforte and orchestra, in F minor. Op. 79.
Richard Strauss—
Tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks." Op. 28.
Sir Edward Elgar—
Overture, "In the South." (First time.)
Solo artist, Mr. Alfred Reisenauer.

...Bureau in the World
...ERICAN. HEBREW
...m NEW YORK CITY.
dress
JAN 5 - 190...
te

The third pair of Boston Symphony Concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening Jan. 11, and on Saturday afternoon, Jan. 13. The soloist at the first concert will be Alfred Reisenauer, and at the second concert Prof. Willy Hess. Mr. Reisenauer will play Weber's "Concertstuck" for piano and orchestra, and Prof. Hess will play Spohr's ninth concerto for the violin. The other numbers on the Thursday evening programme will be Rubin Goldmark's overture "Hiawatha," Tschaikowsky's orchestral fantasia "Francesca da Rimini," and Brahm's symphony, No. 2, in D major. The orchestral numbers to be played on Saturday afternoon, Jan. 13, will be Schumann's symphony, No. 1, in B flat; Richard Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel's Lustige Streiche" and Elgar's overture "In the South."

[149]

POST
ss WASHINGTON, D.
JAN 4 19

The third Boston Symphony concert will be given in the New National Theater, on Tuesday afternoon, January 9, at 4:30 o'clock. The soloist will be Prof. Willy Hess, the concertmaster of the orchestra, and his appearance in this city is anticipated with great interest. Seats now on sale at T. Arthur Smith's ticket office.

AMERICAN.
BALTIMORE, MD.
DEC 31 1905

Every now and then someone shows a disposition to scold or criticise the Baltimore public for not patronizing musical enterprises which are put before them.

This is hardly fair, for no one can be expected to take what he does not call for, and probably does not want. If people want things which are offered to them, especially if well advertised, they take them and pay for them. But if people do not take things they do not want there is no occasion for blame or scolding, even if the offerer is disappointed. This is particularly true in the matter of music. People do not care much for it about Christmas time, especially people who are busy with Christmas affairs and whose homes are full of Christmas enjoyments. People so situated prefer to stay indoors unless something is offered which they are very anxious to hear.

It is evident that this was not the case with the concert by the Philadelphia Orchestra during the past week. This orchestra has been heard several times in Baltimore, so that it does not appeal to Baltimoreans on the score of novelty, and the Baltimore musical public is not yet convinced of its entire musical excellence.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra came to Baltimore with 60 musicians for its first concert. But, although it was almost unknown at the time, it took in over $1,200. For its second concert the receipts were still larger, and they have increased steadily until they are now far beyond $2,000 a night. But the musical people of the city are fully convinced that they get their money's worth. They all have their individual preferences among conductors and as to programs, but they are sure of hearing something they like and of having it well played.

The last concert by the Boston Orchestra was something of an exception to the rule, and, as anticipated, the sales fell off in proportion. The partrons were not generally satisfied with a full program of modern French music, nor did they entirely like the visiting French conductor. To give the reason why should lead into a long and useless discussion. People do not want what they are not reasonably sure that they will like, and as this is a free country they are not compelled to patronize doubtful enterprises. Washington started a venture of this kind three years ago, and depended on Baltimore for patronage and support. But after one concert here the venture was given up in this city. The attempt was made to capture Baltimore by the bluff of alleged solidity; but it would not work. The greatness of its leader was extolled by its manager. But the effort was unavailing. The first note of the concert excited suspicion. It looked afterward as if all the orchestra rehearsal had been given to have that first note stunningly precise, as if the entire reputation of the conductor depended on it. The concert was a failure, in spite of the marked success of the first note.

The Philadelphia leader came with a program of the most modern music, which is yet struggling to win its way in the musical world. But the only success of the evening was the one old-fashioned Mozart number, sung by Campanari. It was a suspicious program, which Mr. Gericke would hardly have offered, and it was not a success. It was not assimilated. Musical people do not like to live entirely on musical mince pie and plum pudding, even at Christmas time.

The orchestra would no doubt have been much more successful in a Mozart, Beethoven or Schubert symphony for one substantial number on the program. And then the brassy, showy Goldmark and Strauss numbers would have met a more welcome reception as musical dessert.

It is very natural for a conductor to believe in himself. They all do so, more or less, especially until they have rubbed sufficiently against events. Conductor Scheel undobutedly believes in his own mode of directing. But it has been quietly observed that his way is not the way that Theodore Thomas directed, nor the way of Von Bulow or of Tschaikowsky, nor like the way that Nikisch or Von der Stocken direct now. It is not the way that Berlioz, the founder of the modern orchestra, directed directors to direct. The habit of posing and dramatic air-beating, with particular "wiggles," as if intedned for the guidance of inexperienced musicians, are all forbidden by Berlioz.

Of course, if there are enough Baltimoreans, whether musical or unmusical, who wish to hear nothing but extreme modern music directed in Mr. Scheel's peculiar manner they will appear and patronize him whenever he appears and make the visiting orchestra a success.

But it would be better for all lovers of music in Baltimore if they would unite in some kind of an association to establish and maintain a permanent Baltimore orchestra which could render programs of the best music of all nations, whether old or new, under some approved and well-equipped conductor.

Instead of occasional symphony concerts, the city conid then afford from 20 to 30 a year, giving all an opportunity to [illegible] correct taste by hearing frequently [illegible] works of Mozart, Haydn, [illegible] Schumann, Brahms [illegible]

AMERICA
ress BALTIMORE, MD.
e

Boston Symphony Concert.

The third Boston Symphony concert will be given in the Lyric on Wednesday evening, January 10. The solist will be the distinguished pianist, Alfred Reisenauer, who will play Weber's "Concertstueck," for piano and orchestra. The other works on the program will be Schumann's Symphony, No. 1, in B flat; Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," and Sir Edward Elgar's overture "In the South."

HERALD
ess JAN 4 - 1906

Boston Symphony's Third Concert.

At its next Baltimore concert in the Lyric on Wednesday evening, January 10, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will again be under the direction of Mr. Gericke and will give a typical program. The December concert was distinctly of a special order, having been devoted entirely to modern French music and under the personal direction of Mr. Vincent d'Indy. While critical opinion regarding this music is by no means unanimous, the management is thoroughly content with the results of the experiment, for the bringing of Mr. d'Indy to this country gave an unusual fillip of interest to the season.

But it is necessary to correct an impression which seems to have become more or less general, that the coming of Mr. d'Indy meant the beginning of a new policy in the management of the orchestra and that "guest" conductors will be a feature of every season. This is not at all true. So far as can be seen, the policy of the orchestra will be in the future what it has been in the past. Its success has proved incontestably that best results can be obtained only when a band works continuously under the same conductor. It is possible, in case there should be another school of composition as distinctive, and as special as that of the "younger" Frenchmen, that the Boston Symphony Orchestra might invite its chief exponent to conduct a series of concerts of this music as it did Mr. d'Indy. But the idea of having special conductors, even in one season, has never been entertained.

The solo artist at the coming concert will be the pianist, Alfred Reisenauer. Mr. Reisenauer needs no introduction to the Baltimore public. He will play Weber's Concertstuck," a brilliant and melodious work. The program in full is as follows:

Schumann—Symphony No. 1, in B-flat major, Op. 38.
Weber—Concert piece for pianoforte and orchestra in F minor, Op. 79.
Richard Strauss—Tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," Op. 28.
Sir Edward Elgar (first time)—Overture, "In the South."

SUN.
ess BALTIMORE, MD.
JAN 7 -

IN HARMONY'S REALM

Three Events Of Unusual Importance Take Place This Week.

This week will be one of unusual interest to Baltimore music lovers, who will have the opportunity of attending three events of much importance—the third Boston Symphony concert at the Lyric on Wednesday evening, the appearance at the same hall on Friday evening of Mme. Johanna Gadski and the young Polish pianist, Arthur Rubinstein, and the sixth of the Peabody recitals on Friday afternoon.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will again be under the direction of Mr. Gericke, and will give a typical program. The December concert was of a special order, and was devoted to modern French music, under the personal direction of Mr. Vincent d'Indy. While critical opinion is by no means unanimous, the management is thoroughly content with the results of the experiment, for the bringing of Mr. d'Indy to this country gave an unusual fillip of interest to the season.

But the impression that the coming of Mr. d'Indy meant the beginning of a new policy in the management of the orchestra and that "guest" conductors will be a feature of every season is not at all true. So far as can be seen, the policy of the orchestra will be in the future what it has been in the past. It is possible, in case there should be another school of composition as distinctive and as special as that of the "younger" Frenchmen, that the orchestra might invite its chief exponent to conduct a series of concerts of this music; but the idea of having special conductors, even in one season, has never been entertained.

The solo artist will be the pianist, Alfred Reisenauer. Now in his second tour of America, he has more than confirmed the flattering verdict rendered by the public when he first played over here. He will play Weber's "Concertstuck," a brilliant and melodious work. With this he had an almost sensational success when he played with the orchestra in Boston three weeks ago. One of the most attractive offerings of the year is furnished by the rest of the program. It comprises Schumann's first symphony, Richard Strauss' fascinating rondo, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," and a work new to Baltimore; Sir Edward Elgar's overture, "In the South." Sir Edward Elgar is the greatest of English composers.

Apropos of this concert, it is interesting to note that Miss Susan Bray Dungan, the directress of the Virgil Clavier Piano School, will give another "musical lecture" tomorrow evening, at which she will give an analysis of Wednesday's program. These lectures, to which admittance is free, are given in an able manner and are of interest and benefit.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
NEW
ess
JAN 10 1906

At The Lyric Tonight

Alfred Reisenauer, piano soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

HERALD
JAN 11

The Musical World

The Boston Symphony Concert.

The third Boston Symphony concert was given last night at the Lyric, Alfred Reisenauer, pianist, being the soloist. The orchestral portion of the program consisted of Schumann's Symphony in B flat major, No. 1; Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," and a concert overture "In the South," by Edward Elgar, while the piano number was Weber's "Koncertstueck" in F minor, for pianoforte and orchestra.

While an occasional change of director for the Boston Symphony Orchestra is an exceedingly hazardous proceeding, it, nevertheless, has, at least, one advantage; it causes the regular director, Mr. Gericke, to be more thoroughly appreciated and respected. Of course, the organization, in its present high state of efficiency, will always play well and give a sound interpretation of any work it is called upon to perform, but this power to produce effects is entirely due to the thorough schooling and drilling to which it is subjected by Mr. Gericke. Still, the difference between its work of the last concert and the work of that of last evening is strongly contrasted, in favor of the more recent one. And this is not in reference to the compositions produced, but to the style of production. Under Mr. Gericke there is a polish and refinement that was not so strongly in evidence under Monsieur D'Indy. And here, it would be well to remark, that while Mr. Gericke's readings have always been those of a scholar, they have been occasionally lacking in temperamental qualities. Recently, however, the director has exhibited more warmth and more geniality, while his scholarliness has suffered no loss.

The last performance in Baltimore of the Schumann Symphony by the Boston organization some year or two ago, was not by any means an ideal performance. Mr. Gericke at that time exhibited a chilliness of mood that represented repression rather than expression. Last night conditions were different and he infused into his men a warmth of feeling and a sympathy with the music that gave a tone and color of exceptional beauty. Truly, the symphony is an enormous conception, and when painted in its true colors, as it was yesterday evening, it stands out as one of the greatest and most musical of all modern symphonic writing.

The Strauss and Elgar works are fine examples of modern orchestral music, and exhibit the highest pinnacle to which modern instrumentation has attained. Both works owe their influence to Teutonic training, the one composer being a German and the other having studied in Germany. But while a certain similarity exists in the modern orchestral coloring and in the fact that both men had something to say, there is a decided contrast in the tales they tell. Strauss exhibits a humorous vein, in imitating the pranks of his jesters and makes his hearers feel as they would in the jester's presence, that they never know what is coming next. Elgar pursues a more serious strain, and is perhaps a trifle less descriptive. Both works are full of continuous beauty, and never for a moment is the attention diverted by an uninteresting passage.

It is generally conceded that Alfred Reisenauer is a great pianist, and therefore, of course, he must be so. But if he be really great he is at the same time remarkably uninteresting. First, he elected to play a composition that was scarcely consistent with the remainder of the program, and secondly, he failed to give any expression to the work. He is a pianist devoid of magnetism and, therefore, aroused but little real musical enthusiasm. Technical facilities he appears to possess in abundance, but there it ends. It may be that as a soloist without orchestra, and left to his own devices, he might create an entirely different impression, but that which he left behind him after last night's performance was disappointing.

NE
from
ddress
ate JAN 6 -

MR. REISENAUER, SOLOIST.

Programme At The Next Boston Symphony Concert.

At its next Baltimore concert in the Lyric, on Wednesday evening, January 10, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will again be under the direction of Mr. Gericke, and will give a typical programme. The solo artist at the coming concert will be the distinguished pianist, Alfred Reisenauer. Mr. Reisenauer needs no introduction to the Baltimore public. Now, in his second tour of America, he has more than confirmed the flattering verdict rendered by the public when he first played over here. He must be grouped among those few pianists who really deserve the appellation of great. He will play Weber's "Concertstueck," a brilliant and melodious work.

The remainder of the programme makes one of the most attractive offerings of the year. It comprises Schumann's First Symphony, Richard Strauss' fascinating rondo, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," and a work new in Baltimore, Sir Edward Elgar's overture, "In the South." Sir Edward Elgar is the greatest of English composers, and this is said to be one of his most charming works. The programme in full is as follows:

Schumann—Symphony No. 1, in D flat major, Op. 38.
Weber—Concert piece for pianoforte and orchestra, in F minor, Op. 79.
Richard Strauss—Tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," Op. 28.
Sir Edward Elgar—Overture, "In the South." (First time.)
Solo Artist—Mr. Alfred Reisenauer.

Paper Cutting Bureau in the World
AMERICAN.
JAN 7 1906

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

At its next Baltimore concert, in the Lyric, on Wednesday, January 10, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will again be under the direction of Mr. Gericke and will give a typical program. The December concert was distinctly of a special order, having been devoted entirely to modern French music and under the personal direction of Mr. Vincent d'Indy. While critical opinion regarding this music is by no means unanimous, the management is thoroughly content with the results of the experiment, for the bringing of Mr. d'Indy to this country gave an unusual fillip of interest to the season. But the idea of having special conductors, even in one season, has never been entertained.

The solo artist at the coming concert will be the distinguished pianist, Alfred Reisenauer. Mr. Reisenauer needs no introduction to the Baltimore public. Now in his second tour of America, he has more than confirmed the flattering verdict rendered by the public when he first played over here. He must be grouped among those few pianists who really deserve the appellation of great. He will play Weber's "Concertstuck," a brilliant and melodious work which is heard all too seldom in our concert halls. With this he had an almost sensational success when he played with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston three weeks ago, winning a half score of recalls.

The remainder of the program makes one of the most attractive offerings of the year. It comprises Schumann's First Symphony, Richard Strauss' fascinating Rondo, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," and a work new to Baltimore; Sir Edward Elgar's overture, "In the South." Sir Edward Elgar is the greatest of English composers and this is said to be one of his most charming works. The program in full is as follows:

Schumann—
Symphony No. 1, in B flat major. Op. 38.
Weber
Concert piece for pianoforte and orchestra, in F minor. Op. 79
Richard Strauss
Tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks." Op. 28.
Sir Edward Elgar
Overture, "In the South." (First time.)
Solo artist, Mr. Alfred Reisenauer.

Paper Cutting Bureau in the World
AMERICAN.
om NEW YORK CITY.
dress
te JAN 5 - 190

The third pair of Boston Symphony Concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening Jan. 11, and on Saturday afternoon, Jan. 13. The soloist at the first concert will be Alfred Reisenauer, and at the second concert Prof. Willy Hess. Mr. Reisenauer will play Weber's "Concertstuck" for piano and orchestra, and Prof. Hess will play Spohr's ninth concerto for the violin. The other numbers on the Thursday evening programme will be Rubin Goldmark's overture "Hiawatha, Tschaikowsky's orchestral fantasia "Francesca da Rimini," and Brahm's symphony, No. 2, in D major. The orchestral numbers to be played on Saturday afternoon, Jan. 13, will be Schumann's symphony, No. 1, in B flat; Richard Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel's Lustige Streiche" and Elgar's overture "In the South."

AMERICA
BALTIMORE, MD
JAN 11

AT THE LYRIC

Third Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The third concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place last evening at the Lyric before a large audience. The orchestra was directed again by Mr. Gericke, whose return to this duty was heartily acknowledged. He presented the following program:

Schumann—
Symphony in B flat major, No. 1, Op. 38.
1. Andante un poco maestoso; allegro molto vivace.
2. Larghetto.
3. Scherzo; Molto vivace. Trio I. Molto piu vivace. Trio II.
4. Allegro animato e grazioso.

Weber—
Concert piece in F minor for pianoforte and orchestra.

Strauss—
"Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," Op. 28.

Elgar—
Concert overture, "In the South," Op. 50. (First time at these concerts.)
Soloist—Mr. Alfred Reisenauer.

The program afforded a good chronological view of the entire period of program music, as this school of composers started with Von Weber, who had said that "he hated tone-pictures with titles." Still he felt impelled to explain this concert piece, and the custom has gone on growing from that time, about 90 years ago, to the present.

The most effective member of the evening was Richard Strauss' opus No. 28, "in rondo form," put on programs "Tyll Ehlenspiegel's Merry Pranks." This old legendary German funmaker was an exact counterpart of Shakespeare's Autolycus, the clown in "The Winter's Tale." Like his German predecessor, he comes in singing his jolly song.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
MAIL
NEW YORK CITY.
JAN 6- 1906

Wilhelm Gericke has resumed his duties as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and he has arranged these programmes for next week's concerts at Carnegie Hall:

THURSDAY EVENING.

Overture, "Hiawatha"...Rubin Goldmark
Concert piece in F minor for pianoforte and orchestra, Op. 79.....Weber
Orchestral Fantasia, "Francesca da Rimini, Op. 32.....Tschaikowsky
Symphony No. 2 in D major, Op. 73.....Brahms
Solo Artist, Mr. Alfred Reisenauer.

SATURDAY AFTERNOON.

Symphony No. 1, in B flat major, Op. 38.....Schumann
Concerto for violin in D minor, No. 9.....Spohr
Tone Poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," Op. 28..Richard Strauss
Overture, "In the South,".....Elgar
(First time at these concerts.)
Solo Artist, Prof. Willy Hess.

The Philadelphia Orchestra, under direction of Fritz Scheel, will give a second concert Monday evening in Carnegie Hall. Arthur Rubinstein, the young Polish pianist, will then make his American debut. The programme:

Overture, "Liebesfruhling."
Georg Schumann
Symphony No. 2, D major, op. 73,
Johannes Brahms
Concerto for piano and orchestra, opus 22, G minor..Camille Saint-Saens
Arthur Rubinstein.
Symphonic prologue to Sophocles's "Oedipus Rex," opus 11.
Max Schillings

NEW YORK EV'G POST
JAN 6 1906

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has no intention of taking up the plan of "guest-conductors." Now that Vincent d'Indy is back in Paris, Mr. Gericke has resumed his place. He will conduct two concerts at the Carnegie Hall next week. The Thursday evening programme includes Rubin Goldmark, overture, "Hiawatha"; Weber, concert piece for pianoforte and orchestra; Tschaikovsky, orchestral fantasia, "Francesca da Rimini"; Brahms, symphony No. 2. Solo artist, Mr. Alfred Reisenauer. Saturday afternoon programme includes Schumann, symphony No. 1; Spohr, concerto for violin in D; Richard Strauss, tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks"; Elgar, overture, "In the South." Solo artist, Professor Willy Hess.

N. Y. TRIBUNE,
JAN 7 - 1906

PROFESSOR WILLY HESS.
Violinist who will play Spohr's ninth concert at the Boston Orchestra's next Saturday afternoon.

Here is a statement which comes with official sanction from Boston, touching the concerts given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of M. Vincent d'Indy: "The last pair of concerts were distinctly of a special order, having been devoted entirely to modern French music, and under the personal direction of Mr. Vincent d'Indy. While critical opinion regarding this music is by no means unanimous, the management is thoroughly content with the result of the experiment, for the bringing of Mr. d'Indy to this country gave an unusual fillip of interest to the season. But it is necessary to correct an impression which seems to have become more or less general, that the coming of Mr. d'Indy meant the beginning of a new policy in the management of the orchestra and that "guest" conductors will be a feature of every season. This is not at all true. So far as can be seen, the policy of the orchestra in the future will be the same as that of the past. The success of the orchestra has proved conclusively that best results are obtainable only when a band works continuously under one conductor. It is possible, in case there should be another school of composition as distinctive and special as that of the "younger" Frenchmen that the Boston Symphony Orchestra would invite its chief exponent to conduct a series of its concerts in this music as it did Mr. d'Indy. But the idea of having special conductors, even one in a season, has never been entertained."

Mr. Gericke will return with the Boston Orchestra for two concerts in the Borough of Manhattan on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon of this week, and one concert in Brooklyn on Friday evening. The New-York programme will be as follows:

THURSDAY EVENING.

Overture, "Hiawatha".....Goldmark
Concert piece, in F minor, for pianoforte and orchestra, Op. 79.....Weber
Orchestral fantaisie, "Francesca da Rimini," Op. 32.....Tschaikowsky
Symphony No. 2, in D major, Op. 73.....Brahms
Solo artist, Alfred Reisenauer.

SATURDAY AFTERNOON.

Symphony No. 1, in B flat, Op. 38.....Schumann
Concerto for violin, in D minor, No. 9.....Spohr
Tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," Op. 28.....Strauss
Overture, "In the South".....Elgar
(First time at these concerts.)
Solo artist, Professor Willy Hess.

NEW YORK PRESS
JAN 7 - 1906

At its concerts in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction once more of Gericke, will give two typical programmes. The two previous concerts were devoted entirely to modern French music, played under the direction of Vincent d'Indy, but this did not signify that a new policy in the management of the orchestra had been adopted and that "guest" conductors would be a feature of every season. Indeed, it is probable the policy of the orchestra in the future will be the old one, experience having shown conclusively that best results are obtained only when a band works under one conductor. The soloist on Thursday night will be Alfred Reisenauer, who will be heard in Weber's "Concertstueck." On Saturday afternoon Professor Willy Hess, concert master of the orchestra, will be the soloist. His contribution will be Spohr's concerto in D minor. These are the complete programmes: Thursday evening—Rubin Goldmark, overture, "Hiawatha"; Weber, concert piece in F minor for piano and orchestra, opus 79; Tschaikowsky, orchestral fantasia, "Francesca da Rimini," opus 32; Brahms, symphony No. 2 in D major, opus 73. Saturday afternoon—Schumann, symphony No. 1, in B flat major, opus 38; Spohr, concerto for violin in D minor, No. 9; Richard Strauss, tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," opus 28; Elgar, overture, "In the South" (first time at these concerts).

NEW YORK TIMES.
JAN 7 - 1906

The visit of the Boston Symphony Quartet showed how rapidly that organization, under the extraordinarily vigorous and energetic domination of Prof. Willy Hess, has acquired the essential unity of thinking, feeling, and acting that is the most difficult quality for even musicians of the highest rank to acquire when they come together as players of chamber music. That these players will reach it in increasing measure is a foregone conclusion, for they are all artists initiated into the inner secrets of quartet playing. The greater spread of this form of art is one of the surest touchstones of musical cultivation, and the recent additions to New York's resources in this direction are notable. The latest is Ludwig Marum's Quartet, that began its work last week with an effort to inculcate the love and appreciation of chamber music in the lower part of the town. Such efforts always repay in the end, even if they are attended with difficulties in the beginning. Experience has shown that nowhere is there a greater hunger for music and musical cultivation than in this quarter of the city, and it is a hunger for the best. The People's Symphony Auxiliary Club has done work in this way; but it has necessarily been rather fragmentary and has availed itself of the best it could get, as it could get it, to carry it on.

\+ + +

It is on the whole gratifying to have the assurance of the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra that there is no intention of keeping up the policy of inviting "guest" conductors from Europe to conduct the concerts of that orchestra. Mr. d'Indy was a welcome guest, and his musical offerings stirred the waters as they are not often stirred. It was a valuable and a significant experience. But so far as Mr. d'Indy, the "guest" conductor, is concerned, his visit was only moderately a success. He is not a conductor of high powers of anybody's music, not even his own, and it was not difficult to perceive that the jealously guarded perfection of the band's technical performance was not all there when Mr. d'Indy conducted. It has only proved once more that the best results are obtained under one conductor, and that the Boston Orchestra will continue to play under one conductor is on the whole a decision to be grateful for. There have been and will be foreign conductors to hear whom conduct would be an interesting experience; but it is one which the admirers of the orchestra will perhaps be willing to forego rather than see any risk of injuring the perfect finish of the orchestra's playing.

NEW YORK TIMES.
JAN 7 - 1906

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

At its next New York concerts in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, Jan. 11, and Saturday afternon, Jan. 13, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will again be under the direction of Mr. Gericke. The management is thoroughly content with the result of the experiment of bringing Mr. d'Indy to this country, which gave an unusual fillip of interest to the season. But it is necessary to correct an impression that the coming of Mr. d'Indy meant the beginning of a new policy in the management of the orchestra and that "guest" conductors will be a feature of every season. This is not true. So far as can be seen, the policy of the orchestra in the future will be the same as that of the past. The success of the orchestra has proved conclusively that best results are obtainable only when a band works continuously under one conductor.

The soloist on Thursday night will be Alfred Reisenauer, who has chosen Weber's "Concertstück," a work which is now seldom heard in concert halls. On Saturday afternoon Prof. Willy Hess, the concert-master of the orchestra, will be the soloist. He will play Spohr's concerto in G minor. The programmes are as follows:

Thursday Evening.

Overture, "Hiawatha".....Rubin Goldmark
Concert piece in F minor for pianoforte and orchestra, Op. 79.....Weber
Orchestral fantasia, "Francesca da Rimini," Op. 32.....Tschaikowsky
Symphony No. 2 in D major, Op. 73.....Brahms
Solo artist, Mr. Alfred Reisenauer.

Saturday Afternoon.

Symphony No. 1 in B flat major, Op. 38.....Schumann
Concerto for violin in D minor, No. 9.....Spohr
Tone Poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," Op. 28.....Strauss
Overture, "In the South".....Elgar
(First time at these concerts.)
Solo artist, Professor Willy Hess.

NEW YORK
JAN 7- 190

the Brooklyn ... announces the ... Philharmonic Concert ... Symphony Orchestra, Wil... conductor, assisted by Al... auer, pianist, at the Bap... Third avenue and Schermerhorn ... on Friday evening, Jan. ... o'clock. The programme will ...
Mendelssohn—Overture, "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage."
Beethoven—Symphony, No. 6, "Pastoral."
Allegro ma non troppo.
Andante molto moto.
Allegro.
Allegretto.
Weber—Concertstuck for Pianoforte.
Humperdinck—Introduction to Act III., "King's Children" (Die Konigskinder).
Liszt—Symphonic Poem No. 2, "Tasso: Lament and Triumph."
Soloist—Mr. Alfred Reisenauer.

NEW YORK HERALD
JAN 7 1906

Following is the programme for the ... Philharmonic concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the Baptist Temple on Friday evening. Alfred Reisenauer, pianist, will be the soloist. Wilhelm Gericke will, of course, be the conductor.

Mendelssohn—Overture, "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage."
Beethoven—Symphony, No. 6, "Pastorale." Allegro ma non troppo, Andante molto moto, Allegro, Allegretto.
Weber—Concertstück for pianoforte.
Humperdinck—Introduction to Act III., "King's Children." (Die Königskinder).
Liszt—Symphonic Poem No. 2, "Tasso: Lament and Triumph."

NEW YORK SUN
JAN 7 1906

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's next concerts will take place Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon at Carnegie Hall. On Thursday Rubin Goldmark's "Hiawatha" overture, Weber's "Concertstück," Tschaikowsky's "Francesca di Rimini" and Brahms's D major symphony will be played. Alfred Reisenauer will be the soloist. On Saturday afternoon Schumann's B flat symphony, Spohr's D minor violin concerto, Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel" and Elgar's "In the South" overture will be given. Willy Hess will be the soloist.

NEW YORK HERALD
JAN 7 1906

The Boston Symphony Orchestra pays New York its January visit on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, giving two programmes of a highly interesting sort. On Thursday evening the numbers are Rubin Goldmark's overture, "Hiawatha," Tschaikowsky's "Francesca di Rimini" fantasia, the Second Brahms Sympnony and the Weber concert piece for pianoforte and orchestra, op. 79. Mr. Reisenauer will be the soloist in this latter number.

Saturday afternoon the numbers are Schumann's First Symphony, Spohr's D minor violin concerto, with Mr. Willy Hess as the soloist; Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Till Eulenspigel," and Edward Elgar's overture, "In the South."

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
NEW YORK EV'G POST
JAN 8 - 1906

A grand array of good things is the Boston Orchestra's Brooklyn programme, next Friday evening. It will include Mendelssohn's "Calm Sea" overture, Beethoven's "Pastoral" sympathy, Weber's Concertstück (Reisenauer), Humperdinck's Introduction to "King's Children," and Liszt's "Tasso."

EW YORK EV'G WORLD
JAN 12 1906

Boston Symp...

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its concert at Carnegie Hall last evening Mr. Gericke, its old and tried leader, again wielded the baton, which at the band's last appearance here he had yielded to the specially imported French conductor, Vincent D'Indy. He was warmly welcomed.

Alfred Reisenauer, the pianist, was the solo performer. He chose Weber's Concert Stuck," which he played with fluency and ... lightfully dainty accompaniment ... orchestra.

The band was at its best ... sky's "Francesca da ... was played with such fine ... expression that ... called to their feet to ... applause. In Rubin Gold... ing" ... and ... ed Symphony ... es of ... known ...

[150]

om AMERICA
BALTIM
ldress
JAN 11
ite

AT THE LYRIC

Third Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The third concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place last evening at the Lyric before a large audience. The orchestra was directed again by Mr. Gericke, whose return to this duty was heartily acknowledged. He presented the following program:

Schumann—
Symphony in B flat major, No. 1, Op. 38.
1. Andante un poco maestoso; allegro molto vivace.
2. Larghetto.
3. Scherzo: Molto vivace. Trio I.: Molto piu vivace. Trio II.
4. Allegro animato e grazioso.

Weber—
Concert piece in F minor for pianoforte and orchestra.

Strauss—
"Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," Op. 28.

Elgar—
Concert overture, "In the South," Op. 50. (First time at these concerts.)
Soloist—Mr. Alfred Reisenauer.

The program afforded a good chronological view of the entire period of program music, as this school of composers started with Von Weber, who had said that "he hated tone-pictures with titles." Still he felt impelled to explain this concert piece, and the custom has gone on growing from that time, about 90 years ago, to the present.

The most effective member of the evening was Richard Strauss' opus No. 28, "in rondo form," put on programs "Tyll Ehlenspiegel's Merry Pranks." This old legendary German funmaker was an exact counterpart of Shakespeare's Autolycus, the clown in "The Winter's Tale." Like his German predecessor, he comes in singing his jolly song,

Newspaper Cutting Bureau of the World
s

Wilhelm Gericke has resumed his duties as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and he has arranged these programmes for next week's concerts at Carnegie Hall:

THURSDAY EVENING.

Overture, "Hiawatha"..Rubin Goldmark
Concert piece in F minor for pianoforte and orchestra, Op. 79.....Weber
Orchestral Fantasia, "Francesca da Rimini, Op. 38.....Tschaikowsky
Symphony No. 2 in D major, Op. 73.....Brahms
Solo Artist, Mr. Alfred Reisenauer.

SATURDAY AFTERNOON.

Symphony No. 1, in B flat major, Op. 38.....Schumann
Concerto for violin in D minor, No. 9.....Spohr
Tone Poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," Op. 28..Richard Strauss
Overture, "In the South,".....Elgar
(First time at these concerts.)
Solo Artist, Prof. Willy Hess.

The Philadelphia Orchestra, under direction of Fritz Scheel, will give a second concert Monday evening in Carnegie Hall. Arthur Rubinstein, the young Polish pianist, will then make his American debut. The programme:

Overture, "Liebesfruhling,"
Georg Schumann
Symphony No. 2, D major, op. 73,
Johannes Brahms
Concerto for piano and orchestra, opus. 22, G minor..Camille Saint-Saens
Arthur Rubinstein.
Symphonic prologue to Sophocles's "Oedipus Rex," opus 11
Max Schillings

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has no intention of taking up the plan of "guest-conductors." Now that Vincent d'Indy is back in Paris, Mr. Gericke has resumed his place. He will conduct two concerts at our Carnegie Hall next week. The Thursday evening programme includes Rubin Goldmark, overture, "Hiawatha"; Weber, concert piece for pianoforte and orchestra; Tchaikovsky, orchestral fantasia, "Francesca da Rimini"; Brahms, symphony No. 2. Solo artist, Mr. Alfred Reisenauer. Saturday afternoon programme includes Schumann, symphony No. 1; Spohr, concerto for violin in D; Richard Strauss, tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks"; Elgar, overture, "In the South." Solo artist, Professor Willy Hess.

rom N. Y. TRIBUNE,
ddress
Date JAN 7 - 1906

PROFESSOR WILLY HESS.
Violinist who will play Spohr's ninth concert at the Boston Orchestra's concert next Saturday afternoon.

Here is a statement which comes with official sanction from Boston, touching the concerts given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of M. Vincent d'Indy: "The last pair of concerts were distinctly of a special order, having been devoted entirely to modern French music, and under the personal direction of Mr. Vincent d'Indy. While critical opinion regarding this music is by no means unanimous, the management is thoroughly content with the result of the experiment, for the bringing of Mr. d'Indy to this country gave an unusual fillip of interest to the season. But it is necessary to correct an impression which seems to have become more or less general, that the coming of Mr. d'Indy meant the beginning of a new policy in the management of the orchestra and that "guest" conductors will be a feature of every season. This is not at all true. So far as can be seen, the policy of the orchestra in the future will be the same as that of the past. The success of the orchestra has proved conclusively that best results are obtainable only when a band works continuously under one conductor. It is possible, in case there should be another school of composition as distinctive and special as that of the "younger" Frenchmen that the Boston Symphony Orchestra would invite its chief exponent to conduct a series of its concerts in this music as it did Mr. d'Indy. But the idea of having special conductors, even one in a season, has never been entertained."

Mr. Gericke will return with the Boston Orchestra for two concerts in the Borough of Manhattan on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon of this week, and one concert in Brooklyn on Friday evening. The New-York programme will be as follows:

THURSDAY EVENING.

Overture, "Hiawatha".....Goldmark
Concert piece, in F minor, for pianoforte and orchestra, Op. 79.....Weber
Orchestral fantaisie, "Francesca da Rimini," Op. 88.....Tschaikowsky
Symphony No. 2, in D major, Op. 73.....Brahms
Solo artist, Alfred Reisenauer.

SATURDAY AFTERNOON.

Symphony No. 1, in B flat, Op. 38.....Schumann
Concerto for violin, in D minor, No. 9.....Spohr
Tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," Op. 28.....Strauss
Overture, "In the South".....Elgar
(First time at these concerts.)
Solo artist, Professor Willy Hess.

NEW YORK PRESS
ss

At its concerts in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction once more of Gericke, will give two typical programmes. The two previous concerts were devoted entirely to modern French music, played under the direction of Vincent d'Indy, but this did not signify that a new policy in the management of the orchestra had been adopted and that "guest" conductors would be a feature of every season. Indeed, it is probable the policy of the orchestra in the future will be the old one, experience having shown conclusively that best results are obtained only when a band works under one conductor. The soloist on Thursday night will be Alfred Reisenauer, who will be heard in Weber's "Concertstueck." On Saturday afternoon Professor Willy Hess, concert master of the orchestra, will be the soloist. His contribution will be Spohr's concerto in D minor. These are the complete programmes: Thursday evening—Rubin Goldmark, overture, "Hiawatha"; Weber, concert piece in F minor for piano and orchestra, opus 79; Tschaikowsky, orchestral fantasia, "Francesca da Rimini," opus 38; Brahms, symphony No. 2 in D major, opus 73. Saturday afternoon—Schumann, symphony No. 1, in B flat major, opus 38; Spohr, concerto for violin in D minor, No. 9; Richard Strauss, tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," opus 28; Elgar, overture, "In the South" (first time at these concerts).

[150]

NEW YORK TIMES.
JAN 7 - 1906
ss

+ + +

The visit of the Boston Symphony Quartet showed how rapidly that organization, under the extraordinarily vigorous and energetic domination of Prof. Willy Hess, has acquired the essential unity of thinking, feeling, and acting that is the most difficult quality for even musicians of the highest rank to acquire when they come together as players of chamber music. That these players will reach it in increasing measure is a foregone conclusion, for they are all artists initiated into the inner secrets of quartet playing. The greater spread of this form of art is one of the surest touchstones of musical cultivation, and the recent additions to New York's resources in this direction are notable. The latest is Ludwig Marum's Quartet, that began its work last week with an effort to inculcate the love and appreciation of chamber music in the lower part of the town. Such efforts always repay, in the end, even if they are attended with difficulties in the beginning. Experience has shown that nowhere is there a greater hunger for music and musical cultivation than in this quarter of the city, and it is a hunger for the best. The People's Symphony Auxiliary Club has done work in this way; but it has necessarily been rather fragmentary and has availed itself of the best it could get, as it could get it, to carry it on.

+ + +

It is on the whole gratifying to have the assurance of the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra that there is no intention of keeping up the policy of inviting "guest" conductors from Europe to conduct the concerts of that orchestra. Mr. d'Indy was a welcome guest, and his musical offerings stirred the waters as they are not often stirred. It was a valuable and a significant experience. But so far as Mr. d'Indy, the "guest" conductor, is concerned, his visit was only moderately a success. He is not a conductor of high powers of anybody's music, not even his own, and it was not difficult to perceive that the jealously guarded perfection of the band's technical performance was not all there when Mr. d'Indy conducted. It has only proved once more that the best results are obtained under one conductor, and that the Boston Orchestra will continue to play under one conductor is on the whole a decision to be grateful for. There have been and will be foreign conductors to hear whom conduct would be an interesting experience; but it is one which the admirers of the orchestra will perhaps be willing to forego rather than see any risk of injuring the perfect finish of the orchestra's playing.

NEW

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

At its next New York concerts in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, Jan. 11, and Saturday afternon, Jan. 13, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will again be under the direction of Mr. Gericke. The management is thoroughly content with the result of the experiment of bringing Mr. d'Indy to this country, which gave an unusual fillip of interest to the season. But it is necessary to correct an impression that the coming of Mr. d'Indy meant the beginning of a new policy in the management of the orchestra and that "guest" conductors will be a feature of every season. This is not true. So far as can be seen, the policy of the orchestra in the future will be the same as that of the past. The success of the orchestra has proved conclusively that best results are obtainable only when a band works continuously under one conductor.

The soloist on Thursday night will be Alfred Reisenauer, who has chosen Weber's "Concertstück," a work which is now seldom heard in concert halls. On Saturday afternoon Prof. Willy Hess, the concert-master of the orchestra, will be the soloist. He will play Spohr's concerto in G minor. The programmes are as follows:

Thursday Evening.

Overture, "Hiawatha".....Rubin Goldmark
Concert piece in F minor for pianoforte and orchestra, Op. 79.....Weber
Orchestral fantasia, "Francesca da Rimini," Op. 38.....Tschaikowsky
Symphony No. 2 in D major, Op. 73..Brahms
Solo artist, Mr. Alfred Reisenauer.

Saturday Afternoon.

Symphony No. 1 in B flat major, Op. 38..Schumann
Concerto for violin in D minor, No. 9....Spohr
Tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," Op. 28.....Richard Strauss
Overture, "In the South".....Elgar
Solo artist, Prof. Willy Hess.

NEW YORK WORL
dress
JAN 7 - 1906

The Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, Department of Music, and the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society announces the programme of the third Philharmonic Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Wilhelm Gericke, conductor, assisted by Alfred Reisenauer, pianist, at the Baptist Temple, Third avenue and Schermerhorn street, on Friday evening, Jan. 12, at 8:15 o'clock. The programme will include:

Mendelssohn—Overture, "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage."
Beethoven—Symphony, No. 6, "Pastorale."
Allegro ma non troppo.
Andante molto moto.
Allegro.
Allegretto.

Weber—Concertstuck for Pianoforte.
Humperdinck—Introduction to Act. III., "King's Children" (Die Konigskinder).
Liszt—Symphonic Poem No. 2, "Tasso: Lament and Triumph."
Soloist—Mr. Alfred Reisenauer.

Following is the programme for the third Philharmonic concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the Baptist Temple on Friday evening. Alfred Reisenauer, pianist, will be the soloist. Wilhelm Gericke will, of course, be the conductor.

Mendelssohn—Overture, "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage."
Beethoven—Symphony, No. 6, "Pastorale." Allegro ma non troppo, Andante molto moto, Allegro, Allegretto.
Weber—Concertstück for pianoforte.
Humperdinck—Introduction to Act III., "King's Children." (Die Königskinder).
Liszt—Symphonic Poem No. 2, "Tasso: Lament and Triumph."

NEW YORK SUN
JAN 7 1906

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's next concerts will take place Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon at Carnegie Hall. On Thursday Rubin Goldmark's "Hiawatha" overture, Weber's "Concertstück," Tschaikowsky's "Francesca di Rimini" and Brahms's D major symphony will be played. Alfred Reisenauer will be the soloist. On Saturday afternoon Schumann's B flat symphony, Spohr's D minor violin concerto, Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel" and Elgar's "In the South" overture will be given. Willy Hess will be the soloist.

NEW YORK HERALD
JAN 7 1906

The Boston Symphony Orchestra pays New York its January visit on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, giving two programmes of a highly interesting sort. On Thursday evening the numbers are Rubin Goldmark's overture, "Hiawatha," Tschaikowsky's "Francesca da Rimini" fantasia, the Second Brahms Symphony and the Weber concert piece for pianoforte and orchestra, op. 79. Mr. Reisenauer will be the soloist in this latter number.

Saturday afternoon the numbers are Schumann's First Symphony, Spohr's D minor violin concerto, with Mr. Willy Hess as the soloist; Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Till Eulenspigel," and Edward Elgar's overture, "In the South."

Newspaper Cutting Bureau of the World
NEW YORK EV'G POST
om
ldress
ite

...the Peace Conference.

A grand array of good things is the Boston Orchestra's Brooklyn programme, next Friday evening. It will include Mendelssohn's "Calm Sea" overture, Beethoven's "Pastoral" sympathy, Weber's Concertstück (Reisenauer), Humperdinck's Introduction to "King's Children," and Liszt's "Tasso."

The P...

EVG WORLD
JAN 7 1906

Boston Symp

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its concert at Carnegie Hall last evening Mr. Gericke, its old and tried leader, again wielded the baton, which at the band's last appearance here he had yielded to the specially imported French composer, Vincent D'Indy. He was warmly welcomed.

Alfred Reisenauer, the pianist, was the solo performer. He chose Weber's "Concert Stuck," which he played with brilliancy and little sentiment, to a delightfully dainty accompaniment by the orchestra.

The band was at its best. Tschaikowsky's "Francesca da Rimini" fantasy was played with such fine feeling and expression that all the players were called to their feet to respond to the applause. In Rubin Goldmark's "Hiawatha" overture, and in Brahms's Second Symphony also the admirable qualities of this fine body of musicians were shown at their best.

NEW YORK CITY
JAN 12 1906

...applauded hear... audience that gathered ... Carnegie Hall, when he re... post as conductor of the Boston ... Orchestra. Whatever Mr. ... ...ations of temperament, his ... ...good qualities are appreci... ...in New York.

...ening number was Rubin Gold... overture "Hiawatha," one of the ...estral compositions by an Ameri... ...dly known to this public. Mr. ... is a nephew of Carl Goldmark, ..., but was born in New York, ... three years ago, and is as thorough ...American as could be asked. This ..."Hiawatha" overture he wrote in 1896 ...living in Colorado. It is a work of ...inspiration and orchestral skill, ...re written with the clarity and di... ...ness of the elder Goldmark or of ..., who was one of his teachers. ...haps it is over long for its ideas, but ...e is beauty of thought as well as of ...r throughout.

The Boston orchestra, under Mr. Ge...'s baton, played this music with ...irit and appreciation, and it was well ...eived by the audience.

The soloist of the evening was Alfred ...isenauer, the pianist, and his perform... ...e of Weber's old-fashioned "Concert-...ück" in F minor was a brilliant ...hievement, full of the dash and bra... ...ura that are characteristic of the com... ...ser's work.

It was well enough to hear this music ...gain, though its periods of repose from ...n once active concert room service are ...likely to grow longer and longer. The ...uarch, in particular, seemed to hark ...back to the old masters of music, so far ...removed is it from modern thought and ...expression.

The other music of Mr. Gericke's pro...gramme comprised Tschaikowsky's fan...tasia, "Francesca da Rimini," one of the ...most imposing of the Russian's works in ...this form, and the beautiful symphony ...of Brahms in D major, which always ...brings out alike Mr. Gericke's happiest ...qualities as a conductor, and the serene ...perfection of the orchestra itself.

N. Y. EVG. TELEGRAM
JAN 12 1906

Boston Symphony

SOMETIMES it seems almost impossible to believe that Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, could be other than stately impassive, so far as external appearances may go, even when his finely schooled body of musicians are playing upon every heartstring of their auditors with their scholarly renditions of classical music.

Yet Mr. Gericke last night was so far moved out of his own self—as New York audiences have come to know him—that he was positively intensely dramatic at the finale of Tschaikowsky's "Francesca da Rimini," the second number for the orchestra on the programme. And as for the audience, it would not cease clamoring its approbation until all the members of the orchestra arose to their feet and bowed gratefully, even as Mr. Gericke had answered before them in his most polished manner four hearty recalls.

Mr. Alfred Reisenauer, a rather short, decidedly stout and somewhat solemn pianist, with a wonderful mane of hair, like a wig of olden times minus the powder, was the soloist. He chose Weber's concert piece in F minor, opus 79, for his part of the programme. At the opening his tone seemed rather harsh, and a certain lack of magnetism and absence of poetic touch made his performance sound mechanical rather than smooth and sympathetic. But Mr. Reisenauer grew better as he went along and left such an agreeable impression that four healthy recalls were demanded before he was permitted to rest. His execution in the main was good, though now and then slurred by the tempo, at which he hurried the music.

From N. Y. TRIBUNE
Address
JAN 12 190

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

In a week almost too full of music, especially of orchestral music, for the patience or the purse of the average concertgoer, befell that the third group of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra should occur. One of the group was given last night, the other will be heard Saturday afternoon. The hall, as might have been expected under the circumstances, was not quite filled. But every vacant chair represented for some one the loss of an evening of rare enjoyment. Amid much striving, here seemed, at times at least, an oasis almost of perfection.

The programme opened with Rubin Goldmark's overture to "Hiawatha," which was followed by Weber's "Concert-Stück" for pianoforte and orchestra, Reisenauer playing the solo instrument. It was this piece which Mendelssohn played at his debut in London, in 1829, on which occasion "he wore very long white trousers, a brown silk waistcoat, a black cravat and a blue dress coat." "The Literary Gazette" declared that he "never once stuck (this British pun, at least, is still in fashion!) in his performance, but, on the contrary, appeared to get through his work with not less satisfaction to his audience than to himself." Barring the sartorial details, the same might be written of Reisenauer's performance last night. The orchestral accompaniment was remarkably delicate and sympathetic, and the pianist's tone was crisp and brilliant, his melody high spirited and clear.

Tschaikowsky's "Francesca da Rimini" fantasia followed, and in it Mr. Gericke disclosed not only the highest virtuosity and capacity for tonal tinting in his band, but a definite and poignant emotional conception, which aroused the audience to a high pitch of enthusiasm, so that they were not contented until the entire band had risen and bowed to the applause. The evening closed with a serene reading of Brahms's second symphony (D major), that fell beautiful and melodious after the writhing spirits on the winds of hell.

TOWN & COUNTRY
NEW YORK CITY.
JAN 13 1906

The Boston Symphony Quartet made its first appearance for the season at Mendelssohn Hall, New York, on Tuesday evening January second, when they performed the following interesting works: Beethoven's Quartet Op. 18 No. 6, Brahm's Sextet (in which they had the able assistance of Mr. Max Zach, viola, and Mr. Josef Keller, (violincello), and Sigismond Stojowski's sonata for violin and piano with the assistance of the composer. The latter work contains some beautiful themes, and graceful rhythmical patterns, cleverly wrought out, but it is not a profound work. Mr. Stojowski, proved to be an excellent ensemble player, showing great discretion and at no time overpowering the violin. Mr. Hess played the violin part with sympathy and artistic skill.

The work of the Quartet in the beautiful Beethoven quartet and also of the six artists in Brahm's wonderful sextet was finished, and in fine spirit with each work. The first violin might be somewhat less prominent at times for the production of a more perfect ensemble, which, however, is generally good.

NEW YORK EV'G POST
...ress
...e
JAN 12 1906

The Boston Orchestra.

The third of the Boston Orchestra's concerts this season was given under Mr. Gericke's direction in Carnegie Hall last night to the great satisfaction of the usual large and distinguished audience. The programme consisted of Rubin Goldmark's "Hiawatha" overture, the Weber Concert-Stück, with Herr Reisenauer at the piano, Tchaikovsky's orchestral fantasia, "Francesca da Rimini," and Brahms's second symphony. Barring the Weber piece, which has no longer the musical significance that our grandfathers found in it, this made an interesting and well-balanced entertainment. Why Mr. Gericke, in providing a touch of the archaic by way of contrast to the modernity of Tchaikovsky, should have pitched upon the venerable Weber Concert-Stück, is one of the puzzles that he so often offers his New York audiences. One would have thought that some short orchestral piece of antique character would have sufficed. The Weber music is not only pretty stuff to modern ears, but its choice involved the sacrifice of Herr Reisenauer who, excellent pianist as he is, could make but little of it. He played with conscientious care, but without a spark of enthusiasm or brilliancy.

The Goldmark overture, which is one of the most interesting orchestral pieces ever written in America, and the "Francesca da Rimini" fantasia, which is a work of many beauties but which has failed to become popular owing perhaps to its extreme prolixity, were both admirably played, Mr. Gericke, after the latter piece, causing his men to rise and bow in answer to the prolonged applause. But the real triumphs of the evening were achieved with the Brahms symphony, the most melodious and pleasing of the Viennese master's works. It has long been one of the symphonies upon which Mr. Gericke and his men lavish their ... and the Boston Orchestra's best means ... of tone, a perfection of dynamic ... and a lovely singing quality in the ... only half a dozen bands in the ... From the notes of the ... the opening melody of the ... to the final thunderous ... Beethovenesque

NEW YORK STAATSZEITUNG
...s
JAN 12 1906

Bostoner Symphonieorchester.

Das Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester erwarb sich gestern Abend in seinem fünften Konzert in Carnegie Hall durch sein ausgezeichnetes Spiel neue Freunde. Herr Gericke hatte sicherlich besondere Sorgfalt auf das Studiren der Brahms'schen D-Dur Symphonie verwendet haben, denn die Abtönung der Farben, die Vertheilung der Akzente und die ganze Tonqualität waren von jener sublimen Art, die man eben nur von den Bostonern zu hören bekommt. Rubin Goldmark's „Hiawatha"-Ouverture und Tschaikowsky's „Francesca da Rimini"-Phantasie waren die anderen Orchesternummern.

Als Solist ließ sich Herr Reisenauer mit dem Weber'schen Konzertstück hören. Wie man es bei diesem Pianisten nachgerade gewohnt geworden ist, spielte er sehr ungleich: manches ward im großen Stil empfunden und ausgeführt, anderes behandelte Reisenauer einfach saloppe. Jene berühmte Sechzehntelfigur im letzten Satz einfach auf die Melodie-Achtel zu reduziren, ist gewiß nicht legitimes Verfahren, und ein Künstler von der Stellung Reisenauers sollte sich so etwas nicht zu schulden kommen lassen.

NEW YORK PRESS
JAN 12 1906

Boston Players Win Plaudits.

Brahms and Tschaikowsky are in the musical limelight just now. The Russian's name was on the programme of the Boston Symphony concert in Carnegie Hall last night, and three of his compositions figure in the pair of concerts Safonoff is to conduct this afternoon and to-morrow evening in the same auditorium. The German composer is only a trifle behind the Russian in this aspect of the frequency with which his compositions have been played recently, for Fritz Scheel had his second symphony on his programme on Monday night, Gericke repeated it last evening and Felix Weingartner is to give it at a New York Symphony concert soon. When this work was first produced one French critic said it was "childish." He would not have described it thus if he could have heard it played as Colonel Higginson's band gave it. The men also played Goldmark's "Hiawatha" overture, the Tschaikowsky "Francesca di Rimini" orchestral fantasia, and, with Alfred Reisenauer as soloist, the concert piece in F minor by Weber. The players had to rise in their places before the large audience would cease applauding the Russian number.

NEW YORK STAATSZEITUNG
...ress
...e
JAN 14 1906

Das Bostoner Symphonieorchester.

Die gestrige Matinée des Bostoner Symphonieorchesters in Carnegie Hall war nicht so stark besucht, wie das vorangegangene Konzert; immerhin hatte sich eine so zahlreiche und zahlende Zuhörerschaft eingestellt, wie sie nicht vielen Konzerten in Carnegie Hall zu theil wird.

Das Programm hob mit der Schumann'schen B-dur-Symphonie an. Daß sie unter Gericke's Leitung eine sorgfältige und konservative Wiedergabe erhielt, braucht kaum noch erwähnt zu werden. Dann kam Spohr's neuntes Violinkonzert an die Reihe, vom Konzertmeister des Orchesters, Willy Heß, gespielt. Es ist erst ein paar Jahrzehnte her, da hielt man dieses Concert noch für eines der größten Erzeugnisse der Violinlitteratur. Wie viel blasser ist sein Ruhm seitdem geworden! Was man ehemals für Ritterlichkeit hielt, klingt nun bloß noch wie Gespreiztheit, liebenswürdig und nobel genug, aber doch Gespreiztheit. Leichter in der Ausführung ist das Concert aber nicht geworden, und es gereicht Herrn Willy Heß zum Ruhme, daß er es technisch geradezu tadellos spielte. Auch ließ er etwas von jenem gravitätischen Virtuosenstil spüren, der zur Spohr'schen Periode gehörte, und der dem vorgetragenen Concert wohl zu statten kam. Vor Allem aber ist anzuerkennen, daß Herr Heß im Adagio nicht in süßliche Sentimentalität verfiel.

Richard Strauß' Schelmenweise „Till Eulenspiegel" war die folgende Programmnummer. Die Bostoner haben diese außerordentlich interessante Humoreske schon früher, und ebenfalls unter Gericke's Leitung gespielt, und zwar mit besserem Effekt. Gestern „klappte" nicht Alles auf's Genaueste, und an einigen Stellen befremdete das Tempo. Aber einerlei, dieser geistsprotzende Scherz war doch ein Hochgenuß nach dem antiquirten Spohr.

Den Schluß bildete Elgar's Ouverture „Im Süden", mit der uns Walter Damrosch bereits vor zwei Saisons bekannt gemacht hat. Das farbenprächtige Tongemälde erfuhr eine vortreffliche Ausführung.

...Y. EVG. STAATSZ...
JAN 12 1906

Das Bostoner Orchester veranstaltete gestern Abend in Carnegie Hall sein drittes Konzert. Reisenauer war Solist. Die amerikanische Violinistin Maud Powell gab gestern Abend in Mendelsohn Hall ein Konzert, das mit der Es-dur-Sonate für Geige und Klavier von Richard Strauß begann und allerlei Interessantes bot.

NEW YORK Times
JAN 12 1906

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

It Returns with Mr. Gericke at its Head and with Mr. Reisenauer as Soloist.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra returned to New York with Mr. Gericke at its head yesterday, giving its first concert last evening in Carnegie Hall. The programme contained nothing new, nothing revolutionary; for now even Tschaikowsky's "Francesca da Rimini," hissed at its first performance in Berlin, is intelligible and enjoyable, even through its gloom and its representation of the tragedy of lost souls. This was played with splendid eloquence and poetic spirit. At the beginning of the programme stood the "Hiawatha" overture by Rubin Goldmark, and at the end Brahms's second symphony.

The overture, by a talented musician resident in New York, has been heard here before—a sound and substantial composition, the work of a musician with ideas and musical feeling, who can stand by himself without the help of a distinguished name. As music it may be enjoyed, but they who shall try to find in it suggestion of Longfellow's Indian or of the life of the woods and plains that should be connected with his name will go far afield.

The soloist was Mr. Reisenauer, who played Weber's "Concert Piece" in F minor, music that has almost vanished from the concert halls, and that, notwithstanding its grace and certain chivalrous and picturesque traits, sounds old-fashioned to-day. Mr. Reisenauer played it with poetical feeling in the slow introduction, and with brilliancy in the main section of the work, and for brilliancy he was willing to sacrifice some of the peculiar charm of Weber's piano style, changing certain passages to gain greater sonority. He pleased his listeners greatly, and they recalled him several times.

NEW YORK SUN
...s
JAN 12 1906

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Alfred Reisenauer Takes the Romance Out of Weber's Music.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's third evening concert at Carnegie Hall last night was an entertainment of uneven merit, but that was not the fault of the orchestra. Alfred Reisenauer, the pianist, was the solo performer, and he selected the "Concertstück" of Weber for the occasion. Weber himself told Sir Julius Benedict that this composition delineated the emotions of a high born lady awaiting with uncertainty the return of her lover from the Crusades. He comes back safely and the lady falls into his arms.

Mr. Reisenauer's performance of the composition was not in his best manner and it left room for doubt as to whether the story was of a blue blooded damsel waiting for a knight or of a low born lass waiting for the milkman early in the morn.

The orchestral numbers were Rubin Goldmark's "Hiawatha" overture, Tschaikowsky's fantasia, "Francesca da Rimini," and Brahms's second symphony. A performance of this symphony by the Boston orchestra is something always agreeable to hear. Mr. Gericke conducts the work con amore.

NEW YORK HERALD
JAN 12 1906

Boston Orchestra's Concert.

Again restored to Mr. Gericke's precise and classic baton, the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its third evening concert of the season in Carnegie Hall last night, Mr. Alfred Reisenauer, pianist, being the soloist.

The programme was headed by the interesting "Hiawatha" overture of Mr. Rubin Goldmark, who claims nationality as an American composer. It included the Weber "Concertstuck, opus 79," for piano and orchestra, and Tschaikowsky's "Francesca da Rimini" Fantasia, opus 32, and closed with the most delightful of Brahms' four symphonies, that in D major, No. 2.

Both Mr. Gericke and his men were in ... settle. Considered as a whole the ... has not this season played with ... balance of ... graceful elasti...

...Newspaper Cutting Bureau ...
N. Y. EVG SU...
...ress
...e
JAN 11 1906

Mr. Gericke and the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall to-night will perform a programme of classics without probs or problem. The welcome symphony is Brahms's second. The star in a Weber concertstuck is Alfred Reisenauer.

NEW YORK CITY

JAN 12 1906

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Wilhelm Gericke was applauded heartily by the fine audience that gathered last night in Carnegie Hall, when he resumed his post as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Whatever Mr. Gericke's limitations of temperament, his conspicuous good qualities are appreciated in New York.

The opening number was Rubin Goldmark's overture "Hiawatha," one of the few orchestral compositions by an American already known to this public. Mr. Goldmark is a nephew of Carl Goldmark, of Vienna, but was born in New York, thirty-three years ago, and is as thorough an American as could be asked. This "Hiawatha" overture he wrote in 1896 while living in Colorado. It is a work of melodic inspiration and orchestral skill, a score written with the clarity and directness of the elder Goldmark or of Dvorak, who was one of his teachers. Perhaps it is over long for its ideas, but there is beauty of thought as well as of color throughout.

The Boston orchestra, under Mr. Gericke's baton, played this music with spirit and appreciation, and it was well received by the audience.

The soloist of the evening was Alfred Reisenauer, the pianist, and his performance of Weber's old-fashioned "Concertstuck" in F minor was a brililant achievement, full of the dash and bravura that are characteristic of the composer's work.

It was well enough to hear this music again, though its periods of repose from a once active concert room service are likely to grow longer and longer. The march, in particular, seemed to hark back to the old masters of music, so far removed is it from modern thought and expression.

The other music of Mr. Gericke's programme comprised Tschaikowsky's fantasia, "Francesca da Rimini," one of the most imposing of the Russian's works in this form, and the beautiful symphony of Brahms in D major, which always brings out alike Mr. Gericke's happiest qualities as a conductor, and the serene perfection of the orchestra itself.

N. Y. EVG. TELEGRAM

JAN 12 1906

Boston Symphony C

SOMETIMES it seems almost impossible to believe that Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, could be other than stately impassive, so far as external appearances may go, even when his finely schooled body of musicians are playing upon every heartstring of their auditors with their scholarly renditions of classical music.

Yet Mr. Gericke last night was so far moved out of his own self—as New York audiences have come to know him—that he was positively intensely dramatic at the finale of Tschaikowsky's "Francesca da Rimini," the second number for the orchestra on the programme. And as for the audience, it would not cease clamoring its approbation until all the members of the orchestra arose to their feet and bowed gratefully, even as Mr. Gericke had answered before them in his most polished manner four hearty recalls.

Mr. Alfred Reisenauer, a rather short, decidedly stout and somewhat solemn pianist, with a wonderful mane of hair, like a wig of olden times minus the powder, was the soloist. He chose Weber's concert piece in F minor, opus 79, for his part of the programme. At the opening his tone seemed rather harsh, and a certain lack of magnetism and absence of poetic touch made his performance sound mechanical rather than smooth and sympathetic. But Mr. Reisenauer grew better as he went along and left such an agreeable impression that four healthy recalls were demanded before he was permitted to rest. His execution in the main was good, though now and then slurred by the tempo, at which he hurried the music.

From N. Y. TRIBUNE

Address

JAN 12 1906

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

In a week almost too full of music, especially of orchestral music, for the patience or the purse of the average concertgoer, befell that the third group of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra should occur. One of the group was given last night, the other will be heard Saturday afternoon. The hall, as might have been expected under the circumstances, was not quite filled. But every vacant chair represented for some one the loss of an evening of rare enjoyment. Amid much striving, here seemed, at times at least, an oasis almost of perfection.

The programme opened with Rubin Goldmark's overture to "Hiawatha," which was followed by Weber's "Concert-Stück" for pianoforte and orchestra, Reisenauer playing the solo instrument. It was this piece which Mendelssohn played at his debut in London, in 1829, on which occasion "he wore very long white trousers, a brown silk waistcoat, a black cravat and a blue dress coat." "The Literary Gazette" declared that he "never once stuck (the British pun, at least, is still in fashion!) in his performance, but, on the contrary, appeared to get through his work with not less satisfaction to his audience than to himself." Barring the sartorial details, the same might be written of Reisenauer's performance last night. The orchestral accompaniment was remarkably delicate and sympathetic, and the pianist's tone was crisp and brilliant, his melody high spirited and clear.

Tschaikowsky's "Francesca da Rimini" fantasia followed, and in it Mr. Gericke disclosed not only the highest virtuosity and capacity for tonal tinting in his band, but a definite and poignant emotional conception, which aroused the audience to a high pitch of enthusiasm, so that they were not contented until the entire band had risen and bowed to the applause. The evening closed with a serene reading of Brahms's second symphony (D major), that fell beautiful and melodious after the writhing spirits on the winds of hell.

TOWN & COUNTRY

NEW YORK CITY.

JAN 13 1906

The Boston Symphony Quartet made its first appearance for the season at Mendelssohn Hall, New York, on Tuesday evening January second, when they performed the following interesting works: Beethoven's Quartet Op. 18 No. 6, Brahm's Sextet (in which they had the able assistance of Mr. Max Zach, viola, and Mr. Josef Kuster, (violincello), and Sigismond Stojowski's sonata for violin and piano with the assistance of the composer. The latter work contains some beautiful themes, and graceful rhythmical patterns, cleverly wrought out, but it is not a profound work. Mr. Stojowski, proved to be an excellent ensemble player, showing great discretion and at no time overpowering the violin. Mr. Hess played the violin part with sympathy and artistic skill.

The work of the Quartet in the beautiful Beethoven quartet and also of the artists in Brahm's wonderful sextet was faultless and in fine spirit with each work. The first violin might be somewhat less prominent at times in the production of a more perfect ensemble which however, is generally good.

NEW YORK STAATS-ZEITUNG

JAN 14 1906

Das Bostoner Symphonieorchester.

Die gestrige Matinée des Bostoner Symphonieorchesters in Carnegie Hall war nicht so stark besucht, wie das vorangegangene Konzert; immerhin hatte sich eine so zahlreiche und zahlende Zuhörerschaft eingestellt, wie sie nicht vielen Konzerten in Carnegie Hall zu theil wird.

Das Programm hob mit der Schumann'schen B-dur-Symphonie an. Daß sie unter Gericke's Leitung eine sorgfältige und konservative Wiedergabe erhielt, braucht kaum noch erwähnt zu werden. Dann kam Spohr's neuntes Violinkonzert an die Reihe, vom Konzertmeister des Orchesters, Willy Heß, gespielt. Es ist erst ein paar Jahrzehnte her, da hielt man dieses Concert noch für eines der größten Erzeugnisse der Violinlitteratur. Wie viel blasser ist sein Ruhm seitdem geworden! Was man ehemals für Ritterlichkeit hielt, klingt nun bloß noch wie Gespreiztheit, liebenswürdig und nobel genug, aber doch Gespreiztheit. Leichter in der Ausführung ist das Concert aber nicht geworden, und es gereicht Herrn Willy Heß zum Ruhme, daß er es technisch geradezu tadellos spielte. Auch ließ er etwas von jenem gravitätischen Virtuosenstil spüren, der zur Spohr'schen Periode gehörte, und der dem vorgetragenen Concert wohl zu statten kam. Vor Allem aber ist anzuerkennen, daß Herr Heß im Adagio nicht in süßliche Sentimentalität verfiel.

Richard Strauß' Schelmenweise „Till Eulenspiegel" war die folgende Programmnummer. Die Bostoner haben diese außerordentlich interessante Humoreske schon früher, und ebenfalls unter Gericke's Leitung gespielt, und zwar mit besserem Effekt. Gestern „klappte" nicht Alles auf's Genaueste, und an einigen Stellen befremdete das Tempo. Aber einerlei, dieser geistsprotzende Scherz war doch ein Hochgenuß nach dem antiquirten Spohr.

Den Schluß bildete Elgar's Ouverture „Im Süden", mit der uns Walter Damrosch bereits vor zwei Saisons bekannt gemacht hat. Das farbenprächtige Tongemälde erfuhr eine vortreffliche Ausführung.

NEW YORK EV'G POST

JAN 12 1906

The Boston Orchestra.

The third of the Boston Orchestra's concerts this season was given under Mr. Gericke's direction in Carnegie Hall last night to the great satisfaction of the usual large and distinguished audience. The programme consisted of Rubin Goldmark's "Hiawatha" overture, the Weber Concert-Stück, with Herr Reisenauer at the piano, Tchaikovsky's orchestral fantasia, "Francesca da Rimini," and Brahms's second symphony. Barring the Weber piece, which has no longer the musical significance that our grandfathers found in it, this made an interesting and well-balanced entertainment. Why Mr. Gericke, in providing a touch of the archaic by way of contrast to the modernity of Tchaikovsky, should have pitched upon the venerable Weber Concert-Stück, is one of the puzzles that he so often offers his New York audiences. One would have thought that some short orchestral piece of antique character would have sufficed. The Weber music is not only pretty dry stuff to modern ears, but its choice involved the sacrifice of Herr Reisenauer who, excellent pianist as he is, could make but little of it. He played with conscientious care, but without a spark of enthusiasm or brilliancy.

The Goldmark overture, which is one of the most interesting orchestral pieces ever written in America, and the "Francesca da Rimini" fantasia, which is a work of many beauties but which has failed to become popular owing perhaps to its extreme prolixity, were both admirably played, Mr. Gericke, after the latter piece, causing his men to rise and bow in answer to the prolonged applause. But the real triumphs of the evening were achieved with the Brahms symphony, the most melodious and pleasing of the Viennese master's works. It has long been one of the symphonies upon which Mr. Gericke and his men lavish their best, and the Boston Orchestra's best means a beauty of tone, a perfection of dynamic shading, and a lovely singing quality in the strings that only half a dozen bands in the world can equal. From the notes of the horn that sound the opening melody of the first movement to the final thunderous chords at the close of the Beethovenesque adagio, it was a performance about as flawless as one may hope to hear.

NEW YORK PRESS

JAN 12 1906

Bostoner Symphonieorchester.

Das Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester erwarb sich gestern Abend in seinem fünften Konzert in Carnegie Hall durch sein ausgezeichnetes Spiel neue Freunde. Herr Gericke hatte sicherlich besondere Sorgfalt auf das Studiren der Brahms'schen D-Dur Symphonie verwendet haben, denn die Abtönung der Farben, die Vertheilung der Akzente und die ganze Tonqualität waren von jener sublimen Art, die man eben nur von den Bostonern zu hören bekommt. Rubin Goldmark's „Hiawatha"-Ouverture und Tschaikowsky's „Francesca da Rimini"-Phantasie waren die anderen Orchesternummern.

Als Solist ließ sich Herr Reisenauer mit dem Weber'schen Konzertstück hören. Wie man es bei diesem Pianisten nachgerade gewohnt geworden ist, spielte er sehr ungleich: manches ward im großen Stil empfunden und ausgeführt, anderes behandelte Reisenauer einfach saloppp. Jene berühmte Sechzehntelfigur im letzten Satz einfach auf die Melodie-Achtel zu reduziren, ist gewiß nicht legitimes Verfahren, und ein Künstler von der Stellung Reisenauers sollte sich so etwas nicht zu schulden kommen lassen.

NEW YORK PRESS

JAN 12 1906

Boston Players Win Plaudits.

Brahms and Tschaikowsky are in the musical limelight just now. The Russian's name was on the programme of the Boston Symphony concert in Carnegie Hall last night, and three of his compositions figure in the pair of concerts Safonoff is to conduct this afternoon and to-morrow evening in the same auditorium. The German composer is only a trifle behind the Russian in this aspect of the frequency with which his compositions have been played recently, for Fritz Scheel had his second symphony on his programme on Monday night, Gericke repeated it last evening and Felix Weingartner is to give it at a New York Symphony concert soon. When this work was first produced one French critic said it was "childish." He would not have described it thus if he could have heard it played as Colonel Higginson's band gave it. The men also played Goldmark's "Hiawatha" overture, the Tschaikowsky "Francesca di Rimini" orchestral fantasia, and, with Alfred Reisenauer as soloist, the concert piece in F minor by Weber. The players had to rise in their places before the large audience would cease applauding the Russian number.

Das Bostoner Orchester veranstaltete gestern Abend in Carnegie Hall sein drittes Konzert. Reisenauer war Solist. Die amerikanische Violiniſtin Maud Powell gab gestern Abend in Mendelsohn Hall ein Konzert, das mit der Es-dur-Sonate für Geige und Klavier von Richard Strauß begann und allerlei Interessantes bot.

N. Y. EV'G SUN

JAN 12 1906

Mr. Gericke and the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall to-night will perform a programme of classics without probe or problem. The welcome symphony is Brahms's second. The star in a Weber concertstuck is Alfred Reisenauer.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

It Returns with Mr. Gericke at Its Head and with Mr. Reisenauer as Soloist.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra returned to New York with Mr. Gericke at its head yesterday, giving its first concert last evening in Carnegie Hall. The programme contained nothing new, nothing revolutionary; for now even Tschaikowsky's "Francesca da Rimini," hissed at its first performance in Berlin, is intelligible and enjoyable, even through its gloom and its representation of the tragedy of lost souls. This was played with splendid eloquence and poetic spirit. At the beginning of the programme stood the "Hiawatha" overture by Rubin Goldmark, and at the end Brahms's second symphony.

The overture, by a talented musician resident in New York, has been heard here before—a sound and substantial composition, the work of a musician with ideas and musical feeling, who can stand by nimself without the help of a distinguished name. As music it may be enjoyed, but they who shall try to find in it suggestion of Longfellow's Indian or of the life of the woods and plains that should be connected with his name will go far afield.

The soloist was Mr. Reisenauer, who played Weber's "Concert Piece" in F minor, music that has almost vanished from the concert halls, and that, notwithstanding its grace and certain chivalrous and picturesque traits, sounds old-fashioned to-day. Mr. Reisenauer played it with poetical feeling in the slow introduction, and with brilliancy in the main section of the work, and for brilliancy he was willing to sacrifice some of the peculiar charm of Weber's piano style, changing certain passages to gain greater sonority. He pleased his listeners greatly, and they recalled him several times.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Alfred Reisenauer Takes the Romance Out of Weber's Music.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's third evening concert at Carnegie Hall last night was an entertainment of uneven merit, but that was not the fault of the orchestra. Alfred Reisenauer, the pianist, was the solo performer, and he selected the "Concertstück" of Weber for the occasion. Weber himself told Sir Julius Benedict that this composition delineated the emotions of a high born lady awaiting with uncertainty the return of her lover from the Crusades. He comes back safely and the lady falls into his arms.

Mr. Reisenauer's performance of the composition was not in his best manner and it left room for doubt as to whether the story was of a blue blooded damsel waiting for a knight or of a low born lass waiting for the milkman early in the morn.

The orchestral numbers were Rubin Goldmark's "Hiawatha" overture, Tschaikowsky's fantasia, "Francesca da Rimini," and Brahms's second symphony. A performance of this symphony by the Boston orchestra is something always agreeable to hear. Mr. Gericke conducts the work con amore.

NEW YORK HERALD

JAN 12 1906

Boston Orchestra's Concert.

Again restored to Mr. Gericke's precise and classic baton, the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its third evening concert of the season in Carnegie Hall last night, Mr. Alfred Reisenauer, pianist, being the soloist.

The programme was headed by the interesting "Hiawatha" overture of Mr. Rubin Goldmark, who claims nationality as an American composer. It included the Weber "Concertstuck, opus 79," for piano and orchestra, and Tschaikowsky's "Francesca da Rimini" Fantasia, opus 32, and closed with the most delightful of Brahms' four symphonies, that in D major, No. 2.

Both Mr. Gericke and his men were in fine fettle. Considered as a whole the orchestra has not this season played with better balance or more delightful elasticity.

NEW YORK PRESS

JAN 14 19

Wilhelm Gericke and his Boston Symphony Orchestra gave their second concert of the week yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. As usual, they attracted a big audience. Not often have matinee hearers of the Boston Symphony shown as much spirit as did yesterday's throng. Gericke and his men were greeted with prolonged applause. As for Willy Hess, concert-master of the orchestra and this time soloist, his reception was great.

The afternoon opened with Schumann's Symphony in B flat major, No. 1, opus 38. Then Hess was heard in Spohr's violin concerto in D minor, No. 9. Richard Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" and Edward Elgar's concert overture, "In the South," opus 50, finished the programme. As usual with the Boston Orchestra, the concert was one of orchestral euphony, unanimity and precision—in a word, of simply astonishing technical brilliancy and perfection. But this impeccable adherence to the printed note was not wholly satisfying; indeed, it was at times distinctly irritating. The Schumann symphony had a hast to suffer from Gericke's excessive attention to correctness of detail. The conductor is more in sympathy with the music of that master than he is with the more modern school.

Elgar's overture, too, came to an impressive hearing—sheer beauty of tone counting for much in this composition. But the only pleasure one could find in Gericke's reading of the Strauss tone-poem came through the extraordinarily lucid and perspicuous exposition it gave of the composer's orchestral web. As an interpretation it was absolutely out of key with Strauss's own conception of the work. It was wanting in every suggestion of whimsicality, prankishness, roguery and humor—a result due chiefly to the conductor's mistaken tempos and the inflexibility of his rhythms. To mention a few examples, the opening was too fast ("Gemaechlich" does not imply "moderato" simply, but "comfortable" progress); that graceful section, marked "Leichtfertig," was not nearly fast enough, and the Epilogue was taken at an inconsiderately propulsive pace. It seemed as if Gericke had studied out his tempos as mechanical problems, giving no attention whatever to the emotional significance of Strauss's superscriptions.

Spohr's violin concerto sounds somewhat old-fashioned and banal in its melodic content in these days; but it is not without spontaneous beauty and charm, and from a violinist's point of view is still an effective piece of work. Hess performed the concerto not only with spirit and fine musicianship, but with a good deal of brilliancy. His playing in the last movement was not altogether flawless, but the Adagio as he gave it, proved one of the most distinguished, noble and well-balanced examples of violin playing we have heard this season.

om NEW YORK SU

ddress JAN 14 1906

te

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Prof. Willy Hess the Soloist at Its Afternoon Concert.

The afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall yesterday was one of those enjoyable affairs that do not call for excited comment. There were no novelties on the programme, and the soloist was Prof. Willy Hess, the concert master of the orchestra, not a stranger to local music lovers. He played Spohr's concerto No. 9, in D minor, which might perhaps be called a novelty because it had not been heard for so long.

It was a pleasure to hear the formal old music as Prof. Hess played it. The music is real fiddle music, written by a real composer who was also a fiddler of the very first rank. Most violin music is written either by great composers who are not violinists, or by great fiddlers who are not composers. Prof. Hess put a deal of temperament into his performance without sacrificing the elegance and finish of style demanded by the music. It is an old fashioned concerto, but in the hands of an artist it is worth while.

The orchestral numbers were Schumann's B flat symphony, Strauss's "Til Eulenspiegel," and Sir Edwad Elgar's overture "In the South." It goes without saying that these compositions were well played. The Schumann symphony was performed with a wealth of tone, a perfection of balance, a neatness and finish which brought joy to every hearer.

The Strauss tone poem gave opportunity for one of those feats of virtuosity for which the Boston orchestra is famous. Sir Edward Elgar's overture bore well the test of following the highly colored and brilliantly clever composition of Strauss. It was superbly played.

Address N. Y. TRIB

JAN 14 1906

The Boston Symphony Orchestra was at its best in its two concerts on Thursday evening and yesterday afternoon. What that means need not be explained. The joy of the first concert was the second symphony of Brahms; of the second, the first of Schumann. As we had occasion to remark when the Philadelphia Orchestra first visited us, conductors seem singularly moved to duplicate each other's selections this season. Thus, we had several performances within a few days of the "Sakuntala" overture and Tschaikowsky's fourth symphony. Last Monday Mr. Scheel played the second symphony of Brahms—a preparatory study, as it seemed, for Mr. Gericke's reading. The Schumann symphony, which Mr. Gericke brought forward yesterday, will be played this afternoon and next Tuesday evening by the New-York Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Weingartner. Fine opportunities these for the lovers of comparison. Besides the Schumann symphony, the orchestra yesterday played Elgar's overture "In the South," which Mr. Walter Damrosch introduced here on November 6, 1904, and Richard Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel's Lustige Streiche." The solo [illegible] violin concerto, played [illegible] considerable ela[illegible]

New York Times

ress

JAN

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Schumann's B Flat Symphony and Pieces by Strauss and Elgar Heard.

At the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon Mr. Gericke brought forward two works of the most modern spirit to balance the symphony, which was of the romantic period of the last century. They were Richard Strauss's symphonic Rondo, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" and Edward Elgar's overture, "In the South"; and the symphony was Schumann's first, in B flat. In all these the orchestra played with the splendor of tone and beauty of style that make its ministrations so constant a delight.

Mr. Gericke read the symphony in such a way that its smiling freshness and charm, its "vernal passion," seemed unimpaired by the ravages of sixty-five years. It is not a masterpiece of orchestration, or even of symphonic structure, but it is lovable, and still beloved, for it is full of ideas, of beauty, and of sincerity.

An extraordinarily brilliant performance of Strauss's extraordinary tour de force "Till Eulenspiegel" was given, overflowing with the riotous extravagance, the Rabelaisian humor and boisterousness which Strauss put into the piece, and bringing out every instrumental touch of subtlety and drollery that abound in it. It is the most fascinating of all Strauss's productions, and for it he could be forgiven half a dozen domestic symphonies.

Elgar's overture was made known here last season by Mr. Damrosch. It has many details of great attractiveness, and even of compelling beauty; but as a whole it is singularly ineffective. Its impression is always of detail; it is episodical, and seems more like a mosaic than a long and sustained development. Its themes, striking as several of them are, are mostly of a sort that seem to preclude such a development into a large and logical whole.

Prof. Hess, the concert master of the orchestra, was the soloist and played the ninth violin concerto of Spohr. Here is music that was once considered serious, impassioned, agitated, imperious—at least Spohr himself considered it so and recorded his opinion; and no doubt it was generally accepted at his own valuation; but how faded and savorless it is now, how remote from any sort of present-day musical consciousness! Like the "Consecration of Tone," the symphony of Spohr's that used to be so great a favorite in this town and elsewhere, it has been long since left behind.

Prof. Hess's playing of it was perfectly competent, fluent, finished, and commanding all its difficulties, even those that used to cause the final rondo to be generally omitted. It compelled respect and admiration for the excellent qualities of Prof. Hess's art; but it could not stir the audience even superficially.

NEW YORK EV'G POST

ess

JAN 15 1906

The Boston Orchestra's concert on Saturday afternoon was one of those highly finished, almost flawless, performances that the Hub's famous band has led one to expect. Mr. Gericke knows how to polish a score till it glitters like a diamond necklace. He gave an interesting reading of Schumann's first symphony, and after Prof. Willy Hess had played an empty but "grateful" violin concerto by Spohr in a brilliant manner, the orchestra concluded with R. Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" and Elgar's overture "In the South," both of which were superbly played. The Elgar overture was on the programme of the Bostonians for the first time. It is not remarkable from the viewpoint of melodic invention, but is beautifully orchestrated. Concerning the Strauss piece the commentators have had much to conjecture; in reality it is simply an essay in pranks of orchestration by a composer who had no new melodies to present, and who consequently endeavored to hide that fact by devising tonal tricks to astonish the natives. The only melodic oases in this work are the interpolated fragments of folksong and polka—and how pretty they do sound!—suggesting a fair circus-rider in a ring of clowns. Richard Strauss is the Offenbach of the concert hall. He makes us laugh, but never does he, like the great masters, make us weep.

N. Y. EVG. TELEGRAM

JAN 15 1906

Boston Symphony Co

WILHELM GERICKE led his Boston Symphony Orchestra through an unusually attractive programme at the third matinee at Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon. The soloist was Professor Willy Hess, who presented Spohr's concerto No. 9 in D minor with an orchestral accompaniment.

It was a most delightful rendering of this classic, and the orchestral accompaniment was superb. Professor Hess' handling of the violin is quite unique, but his strength and mastery of the instrument are beyond question. He was at all times en rapport with the orchestra, and the effect of certain chromatic passages when in the adagio movement the second violins and 'cellos played in very close harmony was superb. So completely did the members of the orchestra enter into the spirit of the number that at the close every individual man joined heartily in the applause, which was either given by hand clapping or by the players of the strings striking their bows on the music racks.

This seemed to please Professor Hess almost as much as it did the audience. He did not respond to an encore, however.

Schumann's Symphony in B flat major was the opening number. Concluding the recital was Elgar's concert overture "In the South," which was played for the first time at these concerts.

ewspaper Cutting Bureau

GLOBE

NEW YORK COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER

JAN 15 1906

FOR sheer brilliance and beauty of sound no orchestral concert of the past week—and they have been many—has stood out like that of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon. The wonderful tone of his orchestra sang and sparkled through Schumann's ever fresh and melodious B-flat symphony, it sank to a whispered delicacy in Spohr's D minor violin concerto, it rose to the boisterous humor of Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel," and refined its grotesqueness into an exquisite diablerie, and finally it glorified the pretentious British dulness of Elgar's overture, "In the South." Such a tone Spohr might well have celebrated in his once famous symphony, "The Consecration of Sound."

Elgar's overture "In the South" is well-made music. There is charm in some of its melodic details, like the viola solo, and it is robed in gorgeous instrumental colors. But in the splendid robes of the muse of Italy do we not find masquerading the intrepid British matron, with her babies and her bathtub?

Prof. Willy Hess played the Spohr concerto, not only with a large and glowing tone, but with a finished elegance of style that gave just the right distinction to the somewhat old-fashioned graces of the music.

NEW YORK WORLD

JAN 12 1906

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA GIVES FINE PROGRAMME.

The Third Concert of the Season Well Received at Carnegie Hall.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its third evening concert of the present season in Carnegie Hall last night. The programme began with Rubin Goldmark's overture "Hiawatha," which work renewed the favorable impression created at an earlier hearing.

The remainder of the orchestral part of the programme was devoted to Tschaikowsky's "Francesca di Rimini" Fantasia and Brahms's Second Symphony. Especially the latter number was exquisitely played and conducted by Gericke.

Reisenauer, the pianist, was the soloist, playing Weber's Concertstueck. This work sounds distinctly out-moded. It is a programme composition, based upon an ultra-sentimental and fantastic story of the time of the Crusaders.

Reisenauer began rather disappointingly, but concluded the composition in a rousing manner.

EAGLE

Brooklyn, N. Y.

ess

JAN 6 1906

At its next Brooklyn concert in the Baptist Temple on Friday evening, Jan. 12, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will again be under the direction of Mr. Gericke, and will give a typical programme. An impression which seems to have become more or less general that the coming of Mr. d'Indy meant the beginning of a new policy in the management of the orchestra, and that "guest" conductors will be a feature of every season is not at all true. So far as can be seen the policy of the orchestra in the future will be the same as it has been in the past. The solo artist at the coming concert will be the pianist, Alfred Reisenauer. Mr. Reisenauer needs no introduction to the Brooklyn public. He will play Weber's brilliant "Concertstuck." With this he had almost sensational success in Boston, where he appeared with the orchestra three weeks ago, winning a half score of recalls. The symphony will be Beethoven's "Pastoral," and the other numbers will be Mendelssohn's "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage," the prelude to Act 3 of Humperdinck's "Die Koenigskinder" and Liszt's "Tasso." The programme in full is as follows: Overture, "A Calm Sea and a Prosperous Voyage," op. 27, Mendelssohn; Symphony in F major, No. 6, "Pastoral," op. 68, Beethoven; Concert Piece for Pianoforte and Orchestra in F minor, op. 79, Weber; Prelude to Act 3, "The King's Children," Humperdinck; Symphonic Poem, No. 2, "Tasso: Lament and Triumph," Liszt. Solo artist, Alfred Reisenauer.

Standard Union

Brooklyn, N. Y.

JAN 6 1906

At its next Brooklyn concert in the Baptist Temple on Friday evening, Jan. 12, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will again be under the direction of Mr. Gericke, and will give a typical programme. An impression which seems to have become more or less general that the coming of Mr. d'Indy meant the beginning of a new policy in the management of the orchestra, and that "guest" conductors will be a feature of every season is not at all true. So far as can be seen the policy of the orchestra in the future will be the same as it has been in the past. The solo artist at the coming concert will be the pianist, Alfred Reisenauer. Mr. Reisenauer needs no introduction to the Brooklyn public. He will play Weber's brilliant "Concertstuck." With this he had almost sensational success in Boston, where he appeared with the orchestra three weeks ago, winning a half score of recalls. The symphony will be Beethoven's "Pastoral," and the other numbers will be Mendelssohn's "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage," the prelude to Act 3 of Humperdinck's "Die Koenigskinder" and Liszt's "Tasso." The programme in full is as follows: Overture, "A Calm Sea and a Prosperous Voyage," op. 27, Mendelssohn; Symphony in F major, No. 6, "Pastoral," op. 68, Beethoven; Concert Piece for Pianoforte and Orchestra in F minor, op. 79, Weber; Prelude to Act 3, "The King's Children," Humperdinck; Symphonic Poem, No. 2, "Tasso: Lament and Triumph," Liszt. Solo artist, Alfred Reisenauer.

Brooklyn, N. Y.

JAN 11 1906

Lecture on Concert Programmes.

William J. Henderson, music editor of the New York Sun, gave the third lecture of a series of five lecture recitals on the programmes of the concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra (Brooklyn Institute, Brooklyn Philharmonic Society), at Association Hall yesterday afternoon, and explained the majority of those who listened to the concerts. There was a good number of men for an afternoon lecture. Mr. Henderson was assisted by Miss Elsa [illegible], a pianist who has played much at concerts in Manhattan, and by Paul B. Heyman, also of Manhattan, who played the Mendelssohn "Pastoral" Symphony, with Miss [illegible] as a piano duet. The music gave much pleasure.

Jan 12 1906

The World

Boston Symphony Concert.

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its concert at Carnegie Hall last evening Mr. Gericke, its old and tried leader, again wielded the baton, which at the band's last appearance here he had yielded to the specially imported French composer, Vincent D'Indy. He was warmly welcomed.

Alfred Reisenauer, the pianist, was the solo performer. He chose Weber's "Concert Stuck," which he played with brilliancy and little sentiment, to a delightfully dainty accompaniment by the orchestra.

The band was at its best. Tschaikowsky's "Francesca da Rimini" fantasy was played with such fine feeling and expression that all the players were called to their feet to respond to the applause. In Rubin Goldmark's "Hiawatha" overture, and in Brahms's Second Symphony also the admirable qualities of this fine body of musicians were shown at their best.

[152]

NEW YORK PRESS

JAN 15

Wilhelm Gericke and his Boston Symphony Orchestra gave their second concert of the week yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. As usual, they attracted a big audience. Not often have matinee hearers of the Boston Symphony shown as much spirit as did yesterday's throng. Gericke and his men were greeted with prolonged applause. As for Willy Hess, concertmaster of the orchestra and this time soloist, his reception was great.

The afternoon opened with Schumann's symphony in B flat major, No. 1, opus 38. Then Hess was heard in Spohr's violin concerto in D minor, No. 9. Richard Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" and Edward Elgar's concert overture, "In the South," opus 50, finished the programme. As usual with the Boston Orchestra the concert was one of orchestral euphony, unanimity and precision—in a word, of simply astonishing technical brilliancy and perfection. But this impeccable adherence to the printed note was not wholly satisfying; indeed, it was at times distinctly irritating. The Schumann symphony had least to suffer from Gericke's excessive attention to correctness of detail. The conductor is more in sympathy with the music of that master than he is with the more modern school.

Elgar's overture, too, came to an impressive hearing—sheer beauty of tone counting for much in this composition. But the only pleasure one could find in Gericke's reading of the Strauss tone-poem came through the extraordinarily lucid and perspicuous exposition it gave of the composer's orchestral web. As an interpretation it was absolutely out of key with Strauss's own conception of the work. It was wanting in every suggestion of whimsicality, prankishness, roguery and humor—a result due chiefly to the conductor's mistaken tempos and the inflexibility of his rhythms. To mention a few examples, the opening was too fast ("Gemaechlich" does not imply progress); that graceful section, marked "moderato" simply, but "comfortable" "Leichtfertig," was not nearly fast enough, and the Epilogue was taken at an inconsiderately propulsive pace. It seemed as if Gericke had studied out his tempos as mechanical problems, giving no attention whatever to the emotional significance of Strauss's superscriptions.

Spohr's violin concerto sounds somewhat old-fashioned and banal in its melodic content in these days; but it is not without spontaneous beauty and charm, and from a violinist's point of view is still an effective piece of work. Hess performed the concerto not only with spirit and fine musicianship, but with a good deal of brilliancy. His playing in the last movement was not altogether flawless, but the Adagio as he gave it, proved one of the most distinguished, noble and well-balanced examples of violin playing we have heard this season.

NEW YORK

JAN 14 1905

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Prof. Willy Hess the Soloist at Its Afternoon Concert.

The afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall yesterday was one of those enjoyable affairs that do not call for excited comment. There were no novelties on the programme, and the soloist was Prof. Willy Hess, the concert master of the orchestra, not a stranger to local music lovers. He played Spohr's concerto No. 9, in D minor, which might perhaps be called a novelty because it had not been heard for so long.

It was a pleasure to hear the formal old music as Prof. Hess played it. The music is real fiddle music, written by a real composer who was also a fiddler of the very first rank. Most violin music is written either by great composers who are not violinists, or by great fiddlers who are not composers. Prof. Hess put a deal of temperament into his performance without sacrificing the elegance and finish of style demanded by the music. It is an old fashioned concerto, but in the hands of an artist it is worth while.

The orchestral numbers were Schumann's B flat symphony, Strauss's "Til Eulenspiegel," and Sir Edward Elgar's overture "In the South." It goes without saying that these compositions were well played. The Schumann symphony was performed with a wealth of tone, a perfection of balance, a neatness and finish which brought joy to every hearer.

The Strauss tone poem gave opportunity for one of those feats of virtuosity for which the Boston orchestra is famous. Sir Edward Elgar's overture bore well the test of following the highly colored and brilliantly clever composition of Strauss. It was superbly played.

Address N. Y. TRIBUNE

1905

The Boston Symphony Orchestra was at its best in its two concerts on Thursday evening and yesterday afternoon. What that means need not be explained. The joy of the first concert was the second symphony of Brahms; of the second, the first of Schumann. As we had occasion to remark when the Philadelphia Orchestra first visited us, conductors seem singularly moved to duplicate each other's selections this season. Thus, we had several performances within a few days of the "Sakuntala" overture and Tschaikowsky's fourth symphony. Last Monday Mr. Scheel played the second symphony of Brahms—a preparatory study, as it seemed, for Mr. Gericke's reading. The Schumann symphony, which Mr. Gericke brought forward yesterday, will be played this afternoon and next Tuesday evening by the New-York Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Weingartner. Fine opportunities these for the lovers of comparison. Besides the Schumann symphony, the orchestra yesterday played Elgar's overture "In the South," which Mr. Walter Damrosch introduced here on November 6, 1904, and Richard Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel's Lustige Streiche." The solo number was Spohr's ninth violin concerto, played with brilliancy, taste and no inconsiderable ele-

New York Times

JAN

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Schumann's B Flat Symphony and Pieces by Strauss and Elgar Heard.

At the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon Mr. Gericke brought forward two works of the most modern spirit to balance the symphony, which was of the romantic period of the last century. They were Richard Strauss's symphonic Rondo, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" and Edward Elgar's overture, "In the South"; and the symphony was Schumann's first, in B flat. In all these the orchestra played with the splendor of tone and beauty of style that make its ministrations so constant a delight.

Mr. Gericke read the symphony in such a way that its smiling freshness and charm, its "vernal passion," seemed unimpaired by the ravages of sixty-five years. It is not a masterpiece of orchestration, or even of symphonic structure, but it is lovable, and still beloved, for it is full of ideas, of beauty, and of sincerity.

An extraordinarily brilliant performance of Strauss's extraordinary tour de force "Till Eulenspiegel" was given, overflowing with the riotous extravagance, the Rabelaisian humor and boisterousness which Strauss put into the piece, and bringing out every instrumental touch of subtlety and drollery that abound in it. It is the most fascinating of all Strauss's productions, and for it he could be forgiven half a dozen domestic symphonies.

Elgar's overture was made known here last season by Mr. Damrosch. It has many details of great attractiveness, and even of compelling beauty; but as a whole it is singularly ineffective. Its impression is always of detail; it is episodical, and seems more like a mosaic than a long and sustained development. Its themes, striking as several of them are, are mostly of a sort that seem to preclude such a development into a large and logical whole.

Prof. Hess, the concert master of the orchestra, was the soloist and played the ninth violin concerto of Spohr. Here is music that was once considered serious, impassioned, agitated, imperious—at least Spohr himself considered it so and recorded his opinion; and no doubt it was generally accepted at his own valuation; but how faded and savorless it is now, how remote from any sort of present-day musical consciousness! Like the "Consecration of Tone," the symphony of Spohr's that used to be so great a favorite in this town and elsewhere, it has been long since left behind.

Prof. Hess's playing of it was perfectly competent, fluent, finished, and commanding all its difficulties, even those that used to cause the final rondo to be generally omitted. It compelled respect and admiration for the excellent qualities of Prof. Hess's art; but it could not stir the audience even superficially.

NEW YORK EV'G POST

ess

The Boston Orchestra's concert on Saturday afternoon was one of those highly finished, almost flawless, performances that the Hub's famous band has led one to expect. Mr. Gericke knows how to polish a score till it glitters like a diamond necklace. He gave an interesting reading of Schumann's first symphony, and after Prof. Willy Hess had played an empty but "grateful" violin concerto by Spohr in a brilliant manner, the orchestra concluded with R. Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" and Elgar's overture "In the South," both of which were superbly played. The Elgar overture was on the programme of the Bostonians for the first time. It is not remarkable from the viewpoint of melodic invention, but is beautifully orchestrated. Concerning the Strauss piece the commentators have had much to conjecture; in reality it is simply an essay in pranks of orchestration by a composer who had no new melodies to present, and who consequently endeavored to hide that fact by devising tonal tricks to astonish the natives. The only melodic oases in this work are the interpolated fragments of folksong and polka—and how pretty they do sound!—suggesting a fair circus-rider in a ring of clowns. Richard Strauss is the Offenbach of the concert hall. He makes us laugh, but never does he, like the great masters, make us weep.

N. Y. EVG. TELEGRAM

JAN 15 1906

Boston Symphony Co

WILHELM GERICKE led his Boston Symphony Orchestra through an unusually attractive programme at the third matinee at Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon. The soloist was Professor Willy Hess, who presented Spohr's concerto No. 9 in D minor with an orchestral accompaniment.

It was a most delightful rendering of this classic, and the orchestral accompaniment was superb. Professor Hess' handling of the violin is quite unique, but his strength and mastery of the instrument are beyond question. He was at all times en rapport with the orchestra, and the effect of certain chromatic passages when in the adagio movement the second violins and 'cellos played in very close harmony was superb. So completely did the members of the orchestra enter into the spirit of the number that at the close every individual man joined heartily in the applause, which was either given by hand clapping or by the players of the strings striking their bows on the music racks.

This seemed to please Professor Hess almost as much as it did the audience. He did not respond to an encore, however.

Schumann's Symphony in B flat major was the opening number. Concluding the recital was Elgar's concert overture "In the South," which was played for the first time at these concerts.

ewspaper Cutting Bureau

GLOBE

NEW YORK COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER

JAN 15 1906

FOR sheer brilliance and beauty of sound no orchestral concert of the past week—and they have been many—has stood out like that of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon. The wonderful tone of his orchestra sang and sparkled through Schumann's ever fresh and melodious B-flat symphony, it sank to a whispered delicacy in Spohr's D minor violin concerto, it rose to the boisterous humor of Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel," and refined its grotesqueness into an exquisite diablerie, and finally it glorified the pretentious British dulness of Elgar's overture, "In the South." Such a tone Spohr might well have celebrated in his once famous symphony, "The Consecration of Sound."

Elgar's overture "In the South" is well-made music. There is charm in some of its melodic details, like the viola solo, and it is robed in gorgeous instrumental colors. But in the splendid robes of the muse of Italy do we not find masquerading the intrepid British matron, with her babies and her bathtub?

Prof. Willy Hess played the Spohr concerto, not only with a large and glowing tone, but with a finished elegance of style that gave just the right distinction to the somewhat old-fashioned graces of the music.

NEW YORK WORLD

JAN 2

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA GIVES FINE PROGRAMME.

The Third Concert of the Season Well Received at Carnegie Hall.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its third evening concert of the present season in Carnegie Hall last night. The programme began with Rubin Goldmark's overture "Hiawatha," which work renewed the favorable impression created at an earlier hearing.

The remainder of the orchestral part of the programme was devoted to Tschaikowsky's "Francesca di Rimini" Fantasia and Brahms's Second Symphony. Especially the latter number was exquisitely played and conducted by Gericke.

Reisenauer, the pianist, was the soloist, playing Weber's Concertstueck. This work sounds distinctly out-moded. It is a programme composition, based upon an ultra-sentimental and fantastic story of the time of the Crusaders.

Reisenauer began rather disappointingly, but concluded the composition in a rousing manner.

EAGLE

Brooklyn, N. Y.

JAN 6 1906

At its next Brooklyn concert in the Baptist Temple on Friday evening, January 12, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will again be under the direction of Mr. Gericke, and will give a typical programme. The December concert was distinctly of a special order, having been devoted entirely to modern French music and under the personal direction of Vincent d'Indy. While critical opinion regarding this music is by no means unanimous, the management is thoroughly content with the result of the experiment, for the bringing of Mr. d'Indy to this country gave an unusual filip of interest to the season. The solo artist at the coming concert will be the distinguished pianist Alfred Reisenauer. Mr. Reisenauer needs no introduction to the Brooklyn public. Now in his second tour of America, he has more than confirmed the flattering verdict rendered by the public when he first played over here. He stands as an artist abreast with the leading pianists. He will play Weber's brilliant "Concertstueck," a work which is heard all too rarely in our concert halls. With this he had almost sensational success in Boston, where he appeared with the orchestra three weeks ago, winning a half score of recalls.

The symphony will be Beethoven's "Pastoral" and the other numbers will be Mendelssohn's "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage," the prelude to Act III of Humperdinck's "Die Koenigskinder" and Liszt's "Tasso." The "Koenigskinder" music is little known as compared with "Haensel und Gretel," and it is yet a question with connoisseurs whether Humperdinck has not put the best of his talent into the music written for this second fairy play. Unlike "Haensel und Gretel," "Die Koenigskinder" (The Children of the King) is not an opera, but a little play to which the music is incidental; or rather, it is a melodrama in the true and technical sense of the term. The play is by "Ernst Rosmer" (Elsa Bernstein), and was produced in Munich on January 23, 1897. It had its first appearance in New York at the Irving Place Theater on April 29, 1898, with Agnes Sorma and Rudolf Christians as the king's children. Its first performance in this country in English took place in the Herald Square Theater on November 3, 1903, with Martin Harvey, the English actor, and Miss de Silva in the leading parts. The first production in America of any portion of the work was made here in Brooklyn at the Montauk Theater on November 22, 1896, when the introduction to Act II was played at a concert of the Brooklyn Saengerbund, conducted by Louis Koemmenich. The programme in full is as follows:

Overture, A Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage, op. 27 ..... Mendelssohn
Symphony in F major, No. 6, Pastoral, op. 68. Beethoven Concert piece for pianoforte and orchestra in F minor, op. 79..... Weber
Prelude to act III, The King's Children, Humperdinck
Symphonic poem, No. 2, Tasso: Lament and Triumph ..... Liszt

At its next Brooklyn concert in the Baptist Temple on Friday evening, Jan. 12, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will again be under the direction of Mr. Gericke, and will give a typical programme. An impression which seems to have become more or less general that the coming of Mr. d'Indy meant the beginning of a new policy in the management of the orchestra, and that "guest" conductors will be a feature of every season is not at all true. So far as can be seen the policy of the orchestra in the future will be the same as it has been in the past. The solo artist at the coming concert will be the pianist, Alfred Reisenauer. Mr. Reisenauer needs no introduction to the Brooklyn public. He will play Weber's brilliant "Concertstuck." With this he had almost sensational success in Boston, where he appeared with the orchestra three weeks ago, winning a half score of recalls. The symphony will be Beethoven's "Pastoral," and the other numbers will be Mendelssohn's "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage," the prelude to Act 3 of Humperdinck's "Die Koenigskinder" and Liszt's "Tasso." The programme in full is as follows: Overture, "A Calm Sea and a Prosperous Voyage," op. 27, Mendelssohn; Symphony in F major, No. 6, "Pastoral," op. 68, Beethoven; Concert Piece for Pianoforte and Orchestra in F minor, op. 79, Weber; Prelude to Act 3, "The King's Children," Humperdinck; Symphonic Poem, No. 2, "Tasso: Lament and Triumph," Liszt. Solo artist, Alfred Rensenauer.

The World

Boston Symphony Concert.

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its concert at Carnegie Hall last evening Mr. Gericke, its old and tried leader, again wielded the baton, which at the band's last appearance here he had yielded to the specially imported French composer, Vincent D'Indy. He was warmly welcomed.

Alfred Reisenauer, the pianist, was the solo performer. He chose Weber's "Concert Stuck," which he played with brilliancy and little sentiment, to a delightfully dainty accompaniment by the orchestra.

The band was at its best. Tschaikowsky's "Francesca da Rimini" fantasy was played with such fine feeling and expression that all the players were called to their feet to respond to the applause. In Rubin Goldmark's "Hiawatha" overture, and in Brahms's Second Symphony also the admirable qualities of this fine body of musicians were shown at their best.

Lecture on Concert Programme.

William J. Henderson, music editor of the New York Sun, gave the third in the series of five lecture recitals on the programmes of the concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra (Brooklyn Institute and Brooklyn Philharmonic Society), at Association Hall yesterday afternoon, and evidently addressed the majority of those who go to the concerts. There was a noticeable number of men for an afternoon lecture. Mr. Henderson was assisted by Miss Elsa Breidt, a pianist who has played much at recitals in Manhattan, and by Paul B. Heyman, also of Manhattan, who played the Mendelssohn "Pastoral" Symphony, with Miss Breidt, as a piano duet. The music gave much pleasure.

[152]

CITIZEN
Brooklyn, N. Y.
JAN - 6 1906

NUMEROUS MUSIC EVENTS NEAR IN TWO BOROUGHS

Philadelphia Orchestra to Give Concert in Baptist Temple.

THIRD SYMPHONY PROGRAMME.

Mr. Watters' Morning Musicales Begin Monday at the Heights Casino.

At its next Brooklyn concert in the Baptist Temple on Friday evening, Jan. 12, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will again be under the direction of Mr. Gericke and will give a typical programme. The December concert was distinctly of a special order, having been devoted entirely to modern French music and under the personal direction of Vincent d'Indy. While critical opinion regarding this music is by no means unanimous, the management is thoroughly content with the result of the experiment, for the bringing of Mr. d'Indy to this country gave an unusual fillip of interest to the season.

But it is necessary to correct an impression which seems to have become more or less general, that the coming of Mr. d'Indy meant the beginning of a new policy in the management of the Orchestra and the "guest" conductors will be a feature of every season. This is not at all true. So far as can be seen, the policy of the Orchestra in the future will be the same as it has been in the past. The success of the Orchestra has proved conclusively that best results are obtainable only when a band works continuously under one conductor. It is possible that in case there should be another school of composition as distinctive and as special as that of the "younger" Frenchmen, the Boston Symphony Orchestra would invite its chief exponent to conduct a series of its concerts in this music as it did Mr. d'Indy. But the idea of having special conductors, even one in a season, has never been entertained.

The solo artist at the coming concert will be the distinguished pianist, Alfred Reisenauer. Mr. Reisenauer needs no introduction to the Brooklyn public. Now in his second tour of America he has more than confirmed the flattering verdict rendered by the public when he first played over here. He stands as an artist abreast with the few pianists who must be called great. He will play Weber's brilliant "Concertstuck," a work which is heard all too rarely in our concert halls. With this he had almost sensational success in Boston, where he appeared with the Orchestra three weeks ago, winning a half score of recalls.

The symphony will be Beethoven's "Pastoral," and the other numbers will be Mendelssohn's "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage," the prelude to Act. III. of Humperdinck's "Die Konigskinder" and Liszt's "Tasso." The "Konigskinder" music is little known as compared with "Hansel and Gretel," and yet it is a question with connoisseurs whether Humperdinck has not put the best of his talent into the music written for this second fairy play. Unlike "Hansel und Gretel," "Die Konigskinder" (The Children of the King) is not an opera, but a little play to which the music is incidental; or, rather, it is a melodrama in the true and technical sense of the term. The play is by Ernst Rosmer (Elsa Bernstein), and was produced at Munich on Jan. 23, 1897. It had its first performance in New York at the Irving Place Theater on April 29, 1898, with Agnes Sorma and Rudolf Christians as the King's children. Its first appearance in this country in English took place in the Herald Square Theater on Nov. 3, 1903, with Martin Harvey, the English actor, and Miss de Silva in the leading parts. The first production in America of any portion of the work was made here in Brooklyn at the Montauk Theater on Nov. 22, 1896, when the introduction to Act. II. was played at a concert of the Brooklyn Saengerbund, conducted by Mr. Louis Koemmenich.

The programme in full is as follows: Overture, "A Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage," op. 27 (Mendelssohn); Symphony [illegible] major, No. 6, "Pastoral," op. 28 (Beethoven); concert piece for pianoforte and orchestra in F minor, op. 79 (Weber); Prelude to Act III. "The King's Children" (Humperdinck); Symphonic Poem, No. 2, "Tasso: Lament and Triumph" (Liszt. Soloist, Mr. Alfred Reisenauer.

CITIZEN
Brooklyn, N. Y.

VINCENT D'INDY AND WAGNER.

George W. Harris, in "Public Opinion," has some interesting things to say of Vincent D'Indy, who has come to this country to interpret some of his own works for the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Harris says:

"In his later works M. d'Indy has succeeded in emancipating himself from the domination of Wagner. These are strikingly individual and original compositions, in the orchestration of which he goes as far beyond Wagner as that composer went beyond his predecessors. The sturdy independence of the man compels respect and admiration. 'Istar' (Opus 44), a set of symphonic variations, written in 1898 and brought out at Brussels by Eugene Ysaye the following year, is probably as odd a piece of programme music as has ever been written, and its form is unique. It illustrates the old Babylonian story of 'Istar's Descent Into Hell.' Istar's lover is dead and she goes to the Dead Abode to seek him. She has to pass through seven doors and at each of them the keeper takes from her some article of attire, until she passes through the last, denuded of all garments. To illustrate this curious story, the composer has daringly reversed the established order of a hackneyed old musical form and, instead of a theme followed by variations, has written a set of variations followed by the theme. This theme, which is not heard in its entirety until near the end of the composition, is ultimately played in unison by the whole orchestra and is intended, presumably, to represent the venturesome and lovelorn Istar when she has reached the end of her journey. The piece has been played in this country several times."

TIMES
Brooklyn, N. Y.
JAN 13 1906

MUSICAL.

Third Concert of Boston Symphony Orchestra, With Alfred Reisenauer as Soloist.

There was a very marked reversion to old standards from the ultra-modern, vaguely soaring French music of the December concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to the list presented at the third concert, in the Baptist Temple last night. It was quite literally from one extreme to the other, and moreover, the programme last night was "programme" music of very definite import—music whose purpose it is to suggest specific scenes and incident, as distinct from the lofty, indefinite music which scorns to suggest anything.

Excepting the introduction to act three of Humperdinck's "King's Children" all the music belonged to what in these days is referred to as the old school. It is rather curious and interesting that the programme should have made this impression, with Mendelssohn's "Sea-calm and Prosperous Voyage" overture as an opening, Beethoven's "Pastoral" (Sixth) Symphony, and the principal piece, the Weber concert piece in F minor for piano soloist, and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Tasso; Lament and Triumph," as a closing number. Not so many years ago this would have been regarded a forward type of orchestral programme.

But the noble music of the modern masters, Wagner, Dvorak, Tschaikowsky and others, with its surging fullness of harmonic, rich variation in orchestral treatment and broad vitality in thought, has taken such a hold, that people miss it when it is absent from a concert list. This music of the modern strong men has penetrated beyond the surface of musical appreciation and become part of the modern musical life. It is hardly possible now to avoid contemplating the Beethoven symphony performed last night as a thing of primitive simplicity, and this without any disrespect to its manifest beauty and idyllic charm.

It was a conservative programme. The Mendelssohn overture, picturing a calm at sea, followed by the successful continuation of a voyage, has not the striking interest of some of his other compositions. The Humperdinck music was a welcome glimpse of a work not very well known in this country. The character of the symphony was finely brought out, and that discriminating regard for all the niceties of detail in tone, color and finesse, always to be noted in Mr. Gericke's interpretations, was agreeably pronounced and gave to every piece its full quota of orchestral meaning. Because of its position on the programme one was inclined to wish that the Liszt piece was less prolonged in its lament, but it was a welcome climax.

Alfred Reisenauer, the pianist, was the soloist, and gave much pleasure with the exhibition of skill which betokened the fine skill and musicianly feeling of the mature artist, whose tone and touch were a positive delight. The Weber concert piece is one of the old-timers for the solo pianist and it would not have been amiss for Mr. Reisenauer to have had opportunity to show his skill in a more modern work that is a fairer test for the pianists of to-day. His playing, however, served the purpose of giving pleasure and disclosing his possession of an interesting artistic equipment.

EAGLE
Brooklyn, N. Y.
JAN 1 1906

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

William J. Henderson Discusses, in Lecture Recital, the Programme of To-morrow Evening.

William J. Henderson, music editor of the New York Sun, gave the third in the series of five lecture recitals on the programmes of the concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra (Brooklyn Institute and Brooklyn Philharmonic Society) at Association Hall, yesterday afternoon. Mr. Henderson was assisted by Miss Elsa Breidt, a pianist, who has played much at recitals in Manhattan, and by Paul B. Heyman, also of Manhattan, who played the "Pastoral" Symphony, with Miss Breidt, as a piano duet.

The programme to be given to-morrow evening consists of the overture, "Sea-calm and Prosperous Voyage," Mendelssohn; symphony in F major, No. 6, op 68 (pastoral), Beethoven; concert piece in F minor, for pianoforte and orchestra, Weber; overture to Act III of "King's Children," Humperdinck, and the symphonic poem, No. 2, "Tasso: Lament and Triumph," Liszt. Of these Mr. Henderson took the Mendelssohn, Beethoven and Liszt numbers and explained their construction and development. He said the programme was made up of most decidedly "programme music," of the best class. He then gave a bit of the history of music saying that this idea—programme music—prevailed at a very early date and was well known in the sixteenth century.

Mr. Henderson spoke of the growth of the overture from a mere introductory to a more important position. He then told how the composer took the overture, made more of it and prepared it for the concert stage. Out of it the symphony developed. To the modern the name of Mendelssohn's overture is a misnomer. It conveys the idea of a steamer of a transatlantic line in June, with 1,500 tourists aboard, nobody sick and making time that breaks the record. It is really a picture of a sailing craft, when a sea-calm is a thing to be dreaded and the breeze brings the prosperous voyage. It was suggested by two poems of Goethe.

From CITIZEN
Brooklyn, N. Y
Address
Date JAN 13 1906

THIRD SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Alfred Reisenauer Delights Audience at the Baptist Temple.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its third concert of this season last evening in the Baptist Temple, with Alfred Reisenauer as the assisting soloist. The wonted finish of the Boston musicians characterized their playing, and Mr. Gericke's readings of the selections was duly appreciated. The choice of compositions, however, was a singular mingling of selections that seem a bit old fashioned to-day. These were in particular Beethoven's "Pastoral Symphony" and Weber's concerto, Op. 79, for piano and orchestra. The tone pictures of the symphony were beautifully interpreted. As for the pianist, his performance was masterful and his tempores were very rapid in most difficult scale passages. The brilliancy of the piece delighted the audience, as applause showed. In marked contrast were the introduction to the third act of "King's Children," by Humperdinck, and the final symphonic poem, by Liszt, "Tasso; Lament and Triumph."

Mendelssohn's overture, "Sea Calm and Prosperous Voyage," was the opening number.

Willy Hess, the first violinist, and Timothy Adamowski were absent last night.

From Standard Union
Brooklyn, N. Y
Address
Date JAN 13 1906

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mr. Gericke again returned to the leadership at last night's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given in the Baptist Temple. The popularity of the conductor in Brooklyn was attested by the applause with which he was received. Willy Hess, the concertmeister, was absent, however, his place being filled by Mr. Adamowski. The audience was a very large one, and the programme, which was almost exclusively devoted to descriptive music, was greatly enjoyed. Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony No. 6, was the chief attraction. This work has always been a source of unfailing joy to the lover of music for music's sake, and not less so to the commentators who are able to revel in the pictures of rural life, country dances, babbling brooks, bird calls, lowing kine and many other things which the composer may or may not have had in mind. Mr. Gericke played it in the way which Boston of late years seems to approve, carefuly suppressing any undue hilarity in the merry gathering of the villagers, and giving the thunder storm an effect of distance. The other numbers for orchestra alone were Mendelssohn's "Sea-calm and Prosperous Voyage," which is [illegible]

Alfred Reisenauer, pianist, was the soloist of the evening. He played [illegible] M. von Weber's concert stueck, which seems to be the delight of all pianists of the muscular type, and contains a nice little surprise in the way of a climax pointed with cymbals, which always seems to give the ladies in the audience a delightful shock. Mr. Reisenauer has not improved since his last visit to America. He is still much given to fumbling and exaggerated fortes. Mere virtuosity is in itself of little value, but the concert pianist should endeavor to retain enough of it to carry him through the limited repertoire demanded of him.

From EAGLE
Brooklyn, N. Y
Date JAN 13 1906

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Its Third Concert of the Season at the Baptist Temple.

Mr. Gericke arranged a programme for Brooklyn that had not a shock in it, and played it in a perfectly respectable manner at the Baptist Temple last night. And after the inconclusive symphonations of Mr. d'Indy, who led the orchestra when it last appeared here, it must be confessed that it was a relief to hear music that conformed to certain principles of harmony, and that was not superior to an occasional tune. At the same time, it would have been pleasant to hear even the classics that Mr. Gericke accepts as such—and there are not so very many of them—played with a little more swing and accent. The refinement of the Boston band is admirable; its tone, its entrances, its phrasing are not surpassed by any other orchestra in the world; but its leader never gets away from himself, and flames never issue from the fagotti or from under the kettle drums. Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony was the principal number on the bill, and it was played with clearness, grace and tonal beauty, but when it came to the storm, not one of the dancing peasantry had her hat wet. It was a gentle storm, with most polite thunder, that never roared so as to fright the ladies. Still, it is not altogether Mr. Gericke's fault, this mildness of the weather. Beethoven's mood is idyllic in this symphony. Indeed we cannot get rid of a certain domesticity in his country, that inspires "serene impressions" and "glad and thankful feelings." It is not the romantic Rhine, that he should have known so well, but rather the suburbs of Cologne, where he disports himself. We are positive that the clothes are hanging in the back yard, and that the neighbors keep hens, for we can hear them cackling over their eggs, and are by no means sure that a note or so of the bassoon does not signify the bawling of a cow. Rustic character is denoted rather in the country dances than in any expression of the breezy space, and freedom, and the splendor of the hills, and it is a brook that tinkles rather than a river that surges. The symphony is consistent, however; it makes in its entirety a pretty, a charming, an almost Watteau-like picture, and we even forgive the see-sawing notes of the birds, the least musical of the feathered choir.

Weber's Concert Piece in F minor brought out Alfred Reisenauer as pianist; a large and solemn artist who plays with Teutonic sturdiness, resonance and in a proclamatory fashion that goes excellently with certain portions of the concerto. This Weber composition is one of many that was devised to exhibit the virtuosity of the performer; hence it used to be the hope of all the boarding school contingent, forty years ago, that it would be able to play it; but our ideals change, slowly, and the concerto of to-day must admit intrinsic beauty to an equality with the technic that discloses it. Not that Weber's piece is deficient in that, but it is the manual labor of making it audible that is apt to impress itself on the multitude. Mr. Reisenauer plays with taste, and he is brilliant at times, though it is an easy brilliancy that glissades down three or four octaves with the finger nail. He knows the resources of the piano, and his variety of tone, and the singing notes he developed before he arrived at the sprightly little march, were remarkable. Though not exactly programme music, this work of Weber's is supposed to indicate the separation of a lady from her knight, her laments during his absence, and the joy of reunion. By the composer's own divisions we are to surmise that the pianist is expressing these emotions and circumstances; Separation, Lamentation, Tribulation, Consolation, Jubilation. Mr. Reisenauer's dominant note is jubilant.

Mendelssohn's "Calm Sea and Happy Voyage," was the introductory number, a programme piece, yet not one in which the writer has tied himself to the task of actual representation. The long drawn violin notes indicate calm, plainly enough; the muffled throb of the basses suggest the deeps of the sea; we hear the freshening wind, and the arrival of the ship in port is an occasion of gayety. Liszt's "Lament and Triumph of Tasso," was the closing number, and was played with resonance and pomp. The other selection was the introduction to the third act of Humperdinck's "King's Children," which sketches the death of the prince and princess in the snow. In manner the music is more lyrical than dramatic, and it suggests the scene in the enchanted wood in the "Hansel und Gretel" of the same composer. It is sweet, gentle, pathetic, if not deeply moving, and it is rich in its orchestration.

Brooklyn will not have the whole of the symphony orchestra until it has a building large enough to hold it. Still, three-quarters of the organization played last night. The conspicuous absentees were Willy Hess and Timothee Adamowski, who are usually at the head of the violin corps. The concert master last night was Otto Roth. To-day, however, we shall have our [illegible] Music, and then we can not only hear the whole of the Boston band, but shall have more music and better music than before. Speed the day!

CITIZEN
Brooklyn, N. Y.
JAN 8 1906

NUMEROUS MUSIC EVENTS NEAR IN TWO BOROUGHS

Philadelphia Orchestra to Give Concert in Baptist Temple.

THIRD SYMPHONY PROGRAMME.

Mr. Watters' Morning Musicales Begin Monday at the Heights Casino.

At its next Brooklyn concert in the Baptist Temple on Friday evening, Jan. 12, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will again be under the direction of Mr. Gericke and will give a typical programme. The December concert was distinctly of a special order, having been devoted entirely to modern French music and under the personal direction of Vincent d'Indy. While critical opinion regarding this music is by no means unanimous, the management is thoroughly content with the result of the experiment, for the bringing of Mr. d'Indy to this country gave an unusual fillip of interest to the season.

But it is necessary to correct an impression which seems to have become more or less general, that the coming of Mr. d'Indy meant the beginning of a new policy in the management of the Orchestra and the "guest" conductors will be a feature of every season. This is not at all true. So far as can be seen, the policy of the Orchestra in the future will be the same as it has been in the past. The success of the Orchestra has proved conclusively that best results are obtainable only when a band works continuously under one conductor. It is possible that in case there should be another school of composition as distinctive and as special as that of the "younger" Frenchmen, the Boston Symphony Orchestra would invite its chief exponent to conduct a series of its concerts in this music as it did Mr. d'Indy. But the idea of having special conductors, even one in a season, has never been entertained.

The solo artist at the coming concert will be the distinguished pianist, Alfred Reisenauer. Mr. Reisenauer needs no introduction to the Brooklyn public. Now in his second tour of America he has more than confirmed the flattering verdict rendered by the public when he first played over here. He stands as an artist abreast with the few pianists who must be called great. He will play Weber's brilliant "Concertstuck," a work which is heard all too rarely in our concert halls. With this he had almost sensational success in Boston, where he appeared with the Orchestra three weeks ago, winning a half score of recalls.

The symphony will be Beethoven's "Pastoral," and the other numbers will be Mendelssohn's "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage," the prelude to Act. III. of Humperdinck's "Die Konigskinder" and Liszt's "Tasso." The "Konigskinder" music is little known as compared with "Hansel and Gretel," and yet it is a question with connoisseurs whether Humperdinck has not put the best of his talent into the music written for this second fairy play. Unlike "Hansel und Gretel," "Die Konigskinder" (The Children of the King) is not an opera, but a little play to which the music is incidental; or, rather, it is a melodrama in the true and technical sense of the term. The play is by Ernst Rosmer (Elsa Bernstein), and was produced in Munich on Jan. 23, 1897. It had its first performance in New York at the Irving Place Theater on April 29, 1898, with Agnes Sorma and Rudolf Christians as the King's children. Its first appearance in this country in English took place in the Herald Square Theater on Nov. 3, 1903, with Martin Harvey, the English actor, and Miss de Silva in the leading parts. The first production in America of any portion of the work was made here in Brooklyn at the Montauk Theater on Nov. 22, 1896, when the introduction to Act. II. was played at a concert of the Brooklyn Saengerbund, conducted by Mr. Louis Koemmenich.

The programme in full is as follows: Overture, "A Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage," op. 27 (Mendelssohn); Symphony in F major, No. 6, "Pastoral," op. 28 (Beethoven); concert piece for pianoforte and orchestra in F minor, op. 79 (Weber); prelude to Act III. "The King's Children" (Humperdinck); Symphonic Poem, No. 2, "Tasso: Lament and Triumph" (Liszt. Solo artist, Mr. Alfred Reisenauer.

VINCENT D'INDY AND WAGNER.

George W. Harris, in "Public Opinion," has some interesting things to say of Vincent D'Indy, who has come to this country to interpret some of his own works for the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Harris says:

"In his later works M. d'Indy has succeeded in emancipating himself from the domination of Wagner. These are strikingly individual and original compositions, in the orchestration of which he goes as far beyond Wagner as that composer went beyond his predecessors. The sturdy independence of the man compels respect and admiration. 'Istar' (Opus 44), a set of symphonic variations, written in 1898 and brought out at Brussels by Eugene Ysaye the following year, is probably as odd a piece of programme music as has ever been written, and its form is unique. It illustrates the old Babylonian story of 'Istar's Descent Into Hell.' Istar's lover is dead and she goes to the Dead Abode to seek him. She has to pass through seven doors and at each of them the keeper takes from her some article of attire, until she passes through the last, denuded of all garments. To illustrate this curious story, the composer has daringly reversed the established order of a hackneyed old musical form and, instead of a theme followed by variations, has written a set of variations followed by the theme. This theme, which is not heard in its entirety until near the end of the composition, is ultimately played in unison by the whole orchestra and is intended, presumably, to represent the venturesome and lovelorn Istar when she has reached the end of her journey. The piece has been played in this country several times."

MUSICAL.

Third Concert of Boston Symphony Orchestra, With Alfred Reisenauer as Soloist.

There was a very marked reversion to old standards from the ultra-modern, vaguely soaring French music of the December concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to the list presented at the third concert, in the Baptist Temple last night. It was quite literally from one extreme to the other, and moreover, the programme last night was "programme" music of very definite import—music whose purpose it is to suggest specific scenes and incident, as distinct from the lofty, indefinite music which scorns to suggest anything.

Excepting the introduction to act three of Humperdinck's "King's Children" all the music belonged to what in these days is referred to as the old school. It is rather curious and interesting that the programme should have made this impression, with Mendelssohn's "Sea-calm and Prosperous Voyage" overture as an opening, Beethoven's "Pastoral" (Sixth) Symphony, and the principal piece, the Weber concert piece in F minor for piano soloist, and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Tasso; Lament and Triumph," as a closing number. Not so many years ago this would have been regarded a forward type of orchestral programme.

But the noble music of the modern masters, Wagner, Dvorak, Tschaikowsky and others, with its surging fullness of harmonie, rich variation in orchestral treatment and broad vitality in thought, has taken such a hold, that people miss it when it is absent from a concert list. This music of the modern strong men has penetrated beyond the surface of musical appreciation and become part of the modern musical life. It is hardly possible now to avoid contemplating the Beethoven symphony performed last night as a thing of primitive simplicity, and this without any disrespect to its manifest beauty and idyllic charm.

It was a conservative programme. The Mendelssohn overture, picturing a calm at sea, followed by the successful continuation of a voyage, has not the striking interest of some of his other compositions. The Humperdinck music was a welcome glimpse of a work not very well known in this country. The character of the symphony was finely brought out, and that discriminating regard for all the niceties of detail in tone, color and finesse, always to be noted in Mr. Gericke's interpretations, was agreeably pronounced and gave to every piece its full quota of orchestral meaning. Because of its position on the programme one was inclined to wish that the Liszt piece was less prolonged in its lament, but it was a welcome climax.

Alfred Reisenauer, the pianist, was the soloist, and gave much pleasure with the exhibition of skill which betokened the fine skill and musicianly feeling of the mature artist, whose tone and touch were a positive delight. The Weber concert piece is one of the old-timers for the solo pianist and it would not have been amiss for Mr. Reisenauer to have had opportunity to show his skill in a more modern work that is a fairer test for the pianists of to-day. His playing, however, served the purpose of giving pleasure and disclosing his possession of an interesting artistic equipment.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

William J. Henderson Discusses, in Lecture Recital, the Programme of To-morrow Evening.

William J. Henderson, music editor of the New York Sun, gave the third in the series of five lecture recitals on the programmes of the concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra (Brooklyn Institute and Brooklyn Philharmonic Society) at Association Hall, yesterday afternoon. Mr. Henderson was assisted by Miss Elsa Breidt, a pianist, who has played much at recitals in Manhattan, and by Paul B. Heyman, also of Manhattan, who played the "Pastoral" Symphony, with Miss Breidt, as a piano duet.

The programme to be given to-morrow evening consists of the overture, "Sea-calm and Prosperous Voyage," Mendelssohn; symphony in F major, No. 6, op 68 (pastoral), Beethoven; concert piece in F minor, for pianoforte and orchestra, Weber; overture to Act III of "King's Children," Humperdinck, and the symphonic poem, No. 2, "Tasso: Lament and Triumph," Liszt. Of these Mr. Henderson took the Mendelssohn, Beethoven and Liszt numbers and explained their construction and development. He said the programme was made up of most decidedly "prog amme music," of the best class. He then gave a bit of the history of music saying that this idea—programme music—prevailed at a very early date and was well known in the sixteenth century.

Mr. Henderson spoke of the growth of the overture from a mere introductory to a more important position. He then told how the composer took the overture, made more of it and prepared it for the concert stage. Out of it the symphony developed. To the modern the name of Mendelssohn's overture is a misnomer. It conveys the idea of a steamer of a transatlantic line in June, with 1,500 tourists aboard, nobody sick and making time that breaks the record. It is really a picture of a sailing craft, when a sea-calm is a thing to be dreaded and the breeze brings the prosperous voyage. It was suggested by two poems of Goethe.

From .....

Address .....

Date .....

THIRD SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Alfred Reisenauer Delights Audience at the Baptist Temple.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its third concert of this season last evening in the Baptist Temple, with Alfred Reisenauer as the assisting soloist. The wonted finish of the Boston musicians characterized their playing, and Mr. Gericke's readings of the selections was duly appreciated. The choice of compositions, however, was a singular mingling of selections that seem a bit old fashioned to-day. These were in particular Beethoven's "Pastoral Symphony" and Weber's concerto, Op. 79, for piano and orchestra. The tone pictures of the symphony were beautifully interpreted. As for the pianist, his performance was masterful and his tempores were very rapid in most difficult scale passages. The brilliancy of the piece delighted the audience, as applause showed. In marked contrast were the introduction to the third act of "King's Children," by Humperdinck, and the final symphonic poem, by Liszt, "Tasso; Lament and Triumph."

Mendelssohn's overture, "Sea Calm and Prosperous Voyage," was the opening number.

Willy Hess, the first violinist, and Timothy Adamowski were absent last night.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mr. Gericke again returned to the leadership at last night's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given in the Baptist Temple. The popularity of the conductor in Brooklyn was attested by the applause with which he was received. Willy Hess, the concertmeister, was absent, however, his place being filled by Mr. Adamowski. The audience was a very large one, and the programme, which was almost exclusively devoted to descriptive music, was greatly enjoyed. Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony No. 6, was the chief attraction. This work has always been a source of unfailing joy to the lover of music for music's sake, and not less so to the commentators who are able to revel in the pictures of rural life, country dances, babbling brooks, bird calls, lowing kine and many other things which the composer may or may not have had in mind. Mr. Gericke played it in the way which Boston of late years seems to approve, carefuly suppressing any undue hilarity in the merry gathering of the villagers, and giving the thunder storm an effect of distance. The other numbers for orchestra alone were Mendelssohn's "Sea-Calm and Prosperous Voyage" overture, which is rarely enough heard to be a novelty despite its age; introduction to the third act of Humperdinck's "King[illegible] composer himself directed not so long ago at one of the Metropolitan concerts, and Liszt's Symphonic Love Poem, "Tasso."

Alfred Reisenauer, pianist, was the soloist of the evening. He played C. M. von Weber's concert stuecke, which seems to be the delight of all piano players of the muscular type, and contains a nice little surprise in the way of a climax pointed with cymbals, which always seems to give the ladies in the audience a delightful shock. Mr. Reisenauer has not improved since his last visit to America. He is still much given to fumbling and exaggerated fortes. Mere virtuosity is in itself of little value, but the concert pianist should endeavor to retain enough of it to carry him through the limited repertoire demanded of him.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Its Third Concert of the Season at the Baptist Temple.

Mr. Gericke arranged a programme for Brooklyn that had not a shock in it, and played it in a perfectly respectable manner at the Baptist Temple last night. And after the inconclusive symphonations of Mr. d'Indy, who led the orchestra when it last appeared here, it must be confessed that it was a relief to hear music that conformed to certain principles of harmony, and that was not superior to an occasional tune. At the same time, it would have been pleasant to hear even the classics that Mr. Gericke accepts as such—and there are not so very many of them—played with a little more swing and accent. The refinement of the Boston band is admirable; its tone, its entrances, its phrasing are not surpassed by any other orchestra in the world; but its leader never gets away from himself, and flames never issue from the fagotti or from under the kettle drums. Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony was the principal number on the bill, and it was played with clearness, grace and tonal beauty, but when it came to the storm, not one of the dancing peasantry had her hat wet. It was a gentle storm, with most polite thunder, that never roared so as to fright the ladies. Still, it is not altogether Mr. Gericke's fault, this mildness of the weather. Beethoven's mood is idyllic in this symphony. Indeed we cannot get rid of a certain domesticity in his country, that inspires "serene impressions" and "glad and thankful feelings." It is not the romantic Rhine, that he should have known so well, but rather the suburbs of Cologne, where he disports himself. We are positive that the clothes are hanging in the back yard, and that the neighbors keep hens, for we can hear them cackling over their eggs, and are by no means sure that a note or so of the bassoon does not signify the bawling of a cow. Rustic character is denoted rather in the country dances than in any expression of the breezy space, and freedom, and the splendor of the hills, and it is a brook that tinkles rather than a river that surges. The symphony is consistent, however; it makes in its entirety a pretty, a charming, an almost Watteau-like picture, and we even forgive the see-sawing notes of the birds, the least musical of the feathered choir.

Weber's Concert Piece in F minor brought out Alfred Reisenauer as pianist; a large and solemn artist who plays with Teutonic sturdiness, resonance and in a proclamatory fashion that goes excellently with certain portions of the concerto. This Weber composition is one of many that was devised to exhibit the virtuosity of the performer; hence it used to be the hope of all the boarding school contingent, forty years ago, that it would be able to play it; but our ideals change, slowly, and the concerto of to-day must admit intrinsic beauty to an equality with the technic that discloses it. Not that Weber's piece is deficient in that, but it is the manual labor of making it audible that is apt to impress itself on the multitude. Mr. Reisenauer plays with taste, and he is brilliant at times, though it is an easy brilliancy that glissades down three or four octaves with the finger nail. He knows the resources of the piano, and his variety of tone, and the singing notes he developed before he arrived at the sprightly little march, were remarkable. Though not exactly programme music, this work of Weber's is supposed to indicate the separation of a lady from her knight, her laments during his absence, and the joy of reunion. By the composer's own divisions we are to surmise that the pianist is expressing these emotions and circumstances: Separation, Lamentation, Tribulation, Consolation, Jubilation. Mr. Reisenauer's dominant note is jubilant.

Mendelssohn's "Calm Sea and Happy Voyage," was the introductory number—a programme piece, yet not one in which the writer has tied himself to the task of actual representation. The long drawn violin notes indicate calm, plainly enough; the muffled throb of the basses suggest the deeps of the sea; we hear the freshening wind, and the arrival of the ship in port is an occasion of gayety. Liszt's "Lament and Triumph of Tasso," was the closing number, and was played with resonance and pomp. The other selection was the introduction to the third act of Humperdinck's "King's Children," which sketches the death of the prince and princess in the snow. In manner the music is more lyrical than dramatic, and it suggests the scene in the enchanted wood in the "Hansel und Gretel" of the same composer. It is sweet, gentle, pathetic, if not deeply moving, and it is rich in its orchestration.

Brooklyn will not have the whole of the symphony orchestra until it has a building large enough to hold it. Still, three-quarters of the organization played last night. The conspicuous absentees were Willy Hess and Timothee Adamowski, who are usually at the head of the violin corps. The concert master last night was Otto Roth. One day, however, we shall have our Academy of Music, and then we can not only have the whole of the Boston band, but shall have more music and better music than ever before. Speed the day!

[153]

CITIZEN
Brooklyn, N. Y.
JAN - 8 1906

NUMEROUS MUSIC EVENTS NEAR IN TWO BOROUGHS

Philadelphia Orchestra to Give Concert in Baptist Temple.

THIRD SYMPHONY PROGRAMME.

Mr. Watters' Morning Musicales Begin Monday at the Heights Casino.

At its next Brooklyn concert in the Baptist Temple on Friday evening, Jan. 12, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will again be under the direction of Mr. Gericke and will give a typical programme. The December concert was distinctly of a special order, having been devoted entirely to modern French music and under the personal direction of Vincent d'Indy. While critical opinion regarding this music is by no means unanimous, the management is thoroughly content with the result of the experiment, for the bringing of Mr. d'Indy to this country gave an unusual fillip of interest to the season.

But it is necessary to correct an impression which seems to have become more or less general, that the coming of Mr. d'Indy meant the beginning of a new policy in the management of the Orchestra and the "guest" conductors will be a feature of every season. This is not at all true. So far as can be seen, the policy of the Orchestra in the future will be the same as it has been in the past. The success of the Orchestra has proved conclusively that best results are obtainable only when a band works continuously under one conductor. It is possible that in case there should be another school of composition as distinctive and as special as that of the "younger" Frenchmen, the Boston Symphony Orchestra would invite its chief exponent to conduct a series of its concerts in this music as it did Mr. d'Indy. But the idea of having special conductors, even one in a season, has never been entertained.

The solo artist at the coming concert will be the distinguished pianist, Alfred Reisenauer. Mr. Reisenauer needs no introduction to the Brooklyn public. Now in his second tour of America he has more than confirmed the flattering verdict rendered by the public when he first played over here. He stands as an artist abreast with the few pianists who must be called great. He will play Weber's brilliant "Concertstuck," a work which is heard all too rarely in our concert halls. With this he had almost sensational success in Boston, where he appeared with the Orchestra three weeks ago, winning a half score of recalls.

The symphony will be Beethoven's "Pastoral," and the other numbers will be Mendelssohn's "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage," the prelude to Act. III. of Humperdinck's "Die Konigskinder" and Liszt's "Tasso." The "Konigskinder" music is little known as compared with "Hansel and Gretel," and yet it is a question with connoisseurs whether Humperdinck has not put the best of his talent into the music written for this second fairy play. Unlike "Hansel und Gretel," "Die Konigskinder" (The Children of the King) is not an opera, but a little play to which the music is incidental; or, rather, it is a melodrama in the true and technical sense of the term. The play is by Ernst Rosmer (Elsa Bernstein), and was produced in Munich on Jan. 23, 1897. It had its first performance in New York at the Irving Place Theater on April 29, 1898, with Agnes Sorma and Rudolf Christians as the King's children. Its first appearance in this country in English took place in the Herald Square Theater on Nov. 3, 1903, with Martin Harvey, the English actor, and Miss de Silva in the leading parts. The first production in America of any portion of the work was made here in Brooklyn at the Montauk Theater on Nov. 22, 1896, when the introduction to Act. II. was played at a concert of the Brooklyn Saengerbund, conducted by Mr. Louis Koemmenich.

The programme in full is as follows: Overture, "A Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage," op. 27 (Mendelssohn); Symphony in F major, No. 6, "Pastoral," op. 28 (Beethoven); concert piece for pianoforte and orchestra in F minor, op. 79 (Weber); prelude to Act III. "The King's Children" (Humperdinck); Symphonic Poem, No. 2, "Tasso: Lament and Triumph" (Liszt. Solo artist, Mr. Alfred Reisenauer.

---

ss _____

VINCENT D'INDY AND WAGNER.

George W. Harris, in "Public Opinion," has some interesting things to say of Vincent D'Indy, who has come to this country to interpret some of his own works for the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Harris says:

"In his later works M. d'Indy has succeeded in emancipating himself from the domination of Wagner. These are strikingly individual and original compositions, in the orchestration of which he goes as far beyond Wagner as that composer went beyond his predecessors. The sturdy independence of the man compels respect and admiration. 'Istar' (Opus 44), a set of symphonic variations, written in 1898 and brought out at Brussels by Eugene Ysaye the following year, is probably as odd a piece of programme music as has ever been written, and its form is unique. It illustrates the old Babylonian story of 'Istar's Descent Into Hell.' Istar's lover is dead and she goes to the Dead Abode to seek him. She has to pass through seven doors and at each of them the keeper takes from her some article of attire, until she passes through the last, denuded of all garments. To illustrate this curious story, the composer has daringly reversed the established order of a hackneyed old musical form and, instead of a theme followed by variations, has written a set of variations followed by the theme. This theme, which is not heard in its entirety until near the end of the composition, is ultimately played in unison by the whole orchestra and is intended, presumably, to represent the venturesome and lovelorn Istar when she has reached the end of her journey. The piece has been played in this country several times."

---

s _____

MUSICAL.

Third Concert of Boston Symphony Orchestra, With Alfred Reisenauer as Soloist.

There was a very marked reversion to old standards from the ultra-modern, vaguely soaring French music of the December concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to the list presented at the third concert, in the Baptist Temple last night. It was quite literally from one extreme to the other, and moreover, the programme last night was "programme" music of very definite import—music whose purpose it is to suggest specific scenes and incident, as distinct from the lofty, indefinite music which scorns to suggest anything.

Excepting the introduction to act three of Humperdinck's "King's Children" all the music belonged to what in these days is referred to as the old school. It is rather curious and interesting that the programme should have made this impression, with Mendelssohn's "Sea-calm and Prosperous Voyage" overture as an opening, Beethoven's "Pastoral" (Sixth) Symphony, and the principal piece, the Weber concert piece in F minor for piano soloist, and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Tasso; Lament and Triumph," as a closing number. Not so many years ago this would have been regarded a forward type of orchestral programme.

But the noble music of the modern masters, Wagner, Dvorak, Tschaikowsky and others, with its surging fullness of harmonie, rich variation in orchestral treatment and broad vitality in thought, has taken such a hold, that people miss it when it is absent from a concert list. This music of the modern strong men has penetrated beyond the surface of musical appreciation and become part of the modern musical life. It is hardly possible now to avoid contemplating the Beethoven symphony performed last night as a thing of primitive simplicity, and this without any disrespect to its manifest beauty and idyllic charm.

It was a conservative programme. The Mendelssohn overture, picturing a calm at sea, followed by the successful continuation of a voyage, has not the striking interest of some of his other compositions. The Humperdinck music was a welcome glimpse of a work not very well known in this country. The character of the symphony was finely brought out, and that discriminating regard for all the niceties of detail in tone, color and finesse, always to be noted in Mr. Gericke's interpretations, was agreeably pronounced and gave to every piece its full quota of orchestral meaning. Because of its position on the programme one was inclined to wish that the Liszt piece was less prolonged in its lament, but it was a welcome climax.

Alfred Reisenauer, the pianist, was the soloist, and gave much pleasure with the exhibition of skill which betokened the fine skill and musicianly feeling of the mature artist, whose tone and touch were a positive delight. The Weber concert piece is one of the old-timers for the solo pianist and it would not have been amiss for Mr. Reisenauer to have had opportunity to show his skill in a more modern work that is a fairer test for the pianists of to-day. His playing, however, served the purpose of giving pleasure and disclosing his possession of an interesting artistic equipment.

---

ess _____ Brooklyn
JAN 7

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

William J. Henderson Discusses, in Lecture Recital, the Programme of To-morrow Evening.

William J. Henderson, music editor of the New York Sun, gave the third in the series of five lecture recitals on the programmes of the concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra (Brooklyn Institute and Brooklyn Philharmonic Society) at Association Hall, yesterday afternoon. Mr. Henderson was assisted by Miss Elsa Breidt, a pianist, who has played much at recitals in Manhattan, and by Paul B. Heyman, also of Manhattan, who played the "Pastoral" Symphony, with Miss Breidt, as a piano duet.

The programme to be given to-morrow evening consists of the overture, "Sea-calm and Prosperous Voyage," Mendelssohn; symphony in F major, No. 6, op 68 (pastoral), Beethoven; concert piece in F minor, for pianoforte and orchestra, Weber; overture to Act III of "King's Children," Humperdinck, and the symphonic poem, No. 2, "Tasso: Lament and Triumph," Liszt. Of these Mr. Henderson took the Mendelssohn, Beethoven and Liszt numbers and explained their construction and development. He said the programme was made up of most decidedly "prog amme music," of the best class. He then gave a bit of the history of music saying that this idea—programme music—prevailed at a very early date and was well known in the sixteenth century.

Mr. Henderson spoke of the growth of the overture from a mere introductory to a more important position. He then told how the composer took the overture, made more of it and prepared it for the concert stage. Out of it the symphony developed. To the modern the name of Mendelssohn's overture is a misnomer. It conveys the idea of a steamer of a transatlantic line in June, with 1,500 tourists aboard, nobody sick and making time that breaks the record. It is really a picture of a sailing craft, when a sea-calm is a thing to be dreaded and the breeze brings the prosperous voyage. It was suggested by two poems of Goethe.

From _____

Address _____

Date _____

THIRD SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Alfred Reisenauer Delights Audience at the Baptist Temple.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its third concert of this season last evening in the Baptist Temple, with Alfred Reisenauer as the assisting soloist. The wonted finish of the Boston musicians characterized their playing, and Mr. Gericke's readings of the selections was duly appreciated. The choice of compositions, however, was a singular mingling of selections that seem a bit old fashioned to-day. These were in particular Beethoven's "Pastoral Symphony" and Weber's concerto, Op. 79, for piano and orchestra. The tone pictures of the symphony were beautifully interpreted. As for the pianist, his performance was masterful and his tempores were very rapid in most difficult scale passages. The brilliancy of the piece delighted the audience, as applause showed. In marked contrast were the introduction to the third act of "King's Children," by Humperdinck, and the final symphonic poem, by Liszt, "Tasso; Lament and Triumph."

Mendelssohn's overture, "Sea Calm and Prosperous Voyage," was the opening number.

Willy Hess, the first violinist, and Timothy Adamowski were absent last night.

m _____

ress _____ 1903

te _____

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mr. Gericke again returned to the leadership at last night's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given in the Baptist Temple. The popularity of the conductor in Brooklyn was attested by the applause with which he was received. Willy Hess, the concertmeister, was absent, however, his place being filled by Mr. Adamowski. The audience was a very large one, and the programme, which was almost exclusively devoted to descriptive music, was greatly enjoyed. Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony No. 6, was the chief attraction. This work has always been a source of unfailing joy to the lover of music for music's sake, and not less so to the commentators who are able to revel in the pictures of rural life, country dances, babbling brooks, bird calls, lowing kine and many other things which the composer may or may not have had in mind. Mr. Gericke played it in the way which Boston of late years seems to approve, carefully suppressing any undue hilarity in the merry gathering of the villagers, and giving the thunder storm an effect of distance. The other numbers for orchestra alone were Mendelssohn's "Sea-Calm and Prosperous Voyage" overture, which is rarely enough heard to be a novelty despite its age; introduction to the third act of Humperdinck's "King's ago at one of the Metropolitan concerts, and Liszt's Symphonic Love Poem, "Tasso."

[153]

---

Alfred Reisenauer, pianist, was the soloist of the evening. He played C. M. von Weber's concert stuecke, which seems to be the delight of all piano players of the muscular type, and contains a nice little surprise in the way of a climax pointed with cymbals, which always seems to give the ladies in the audience a delightful shock. Mr. Reisenauer has not improved since his last visit to America. He is still much given to fumbling and exaggerated fortes. Mere virtuosity is in itself of little value, but the concert pianist should endeavor to retain enough of it to carry him through the limited repertoire demanded of him.

---

m _____

ress _____

e _____

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Its Third Concert of the Season at the Baptist Temple.

Mr. Gericke arranged a programme for Brooklyn that had not a shock in it, and played it in a perfectly respectable manner at the Baptist Temple last night. And after the inconclusive symphonations of Mr. d'Indy, who led the orchestra when it last appeared here, it must be confessed that it was a relief to hear music that conformed to certain principles of harmony, and that was not superior to an occasional tune. At the same time, it would have been pleasant to hear even the classics that Mr. Gericke accepts as such—and there are not so very many of them—played with a little more swing and accent. The refinement of the Boston band is admirable; its tone, its entrances, its phrasing are not surpassed by any other orchestra in the world; but its leader never gets away from himself, and flames never issue from the fagotti or from under the kettle drums. Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony was the principal number on the bill, and it was played with clearness, grace and tonal beauty, but when it came to the storm, not one of the dancing peasantry had her hat wet. It was a gentle storm, with most polite thunder, that never roared so as to fright the ladies. Still, it is not altogether Mr. Gericke's fault, this mildness of the weather. Beethoven's mood is idyllic in this symphony. Indeed we cannot get rid of a certain domesticity in his country, that inspires "serene impressions" and "glad and thankful feelings." It is not the romantic Rhine, that he should have known so well, but rather the suburbs of Cologne, where he disports himself. We are positive that the clothes are hanging in the back yard, and that the neighbors keep hens, for we can hear them cackling over their eggs, and are by no means sure that a note or so of the bassoon does not signify the bawling of a cow. Rustic character is denoted rather in the country dances than in any expression of the breezy space, and freedom, and the splendor of the hills, and it is a brook that tinkles rather than a river that surges. The symphony is consistent, however; it makes in its entirety a pretty, a charming, an almost Watteau-like picture, and we even forgive the see-sawing notes of the birds, the least musical of the feathered choir.

Weber's Concert Piece in F minor brought out Alfred Reisenauer as pianist; a large and solemn artist who plays with Teutonic sturdiness, resonance and in a proclamatory fashion that goes excellently with certain portions of the concerto. This Weber composition is one of many that was devised to exhibit the virtuosity of the performer; hence it used to be the hope of all the boarding school contingent, forty years ago, that it would be able to play it; but our ideals change, slowly, and the concerto of to-day must admit intrinsic beauty to an equality with the technic that discloses it. Not that Weber's piece is deficient in that, but it is the manual labor of making it audible that is apt to impress itself on the multitude. Mr. Reisenauer plays with taste, and he is brilliant at times, though it is an easy brilliancy that glissades down three or four octaves with the finger nail. He knows the resources of the piano, and his variety of tone, and the singing notes he developed before he arrived at the sprightly little march, were remarkable. Though not exactly programme music, this work of Weber's is supposed to indicate the separation of a lady from her knight, her laments during his absence, and the joy of reunion. By the composer's own divisions we are to surmise that the pianist is expressing these emotions and circumstances: Separation, Lamentation, Tribulation, Consolation, Jubilation. Mr. Reisenauer's dominant note is jubilant.

Mendelssohn's "Calm Sea and Happy Voyage," was the introductory number—a programme piece, yet not one in which the writer has tied himself to the task of actual representation. The long drawn violin notes indicate calm, plainly enough; the muffled throb of the basses suggest the deeps of the sea; we hear the freshening wind, and the arrival of the ship in port is an occasion of gayety Liszt's "Lament and Triumph of Tasso," was the closing number, and was played with resonance and pomp The other selection was the introduction to the third act of Humperdinck's "King's Children," which sketches the death of the prince and princess in the snow. In manner the music is more lyrical than dramatic, and it suggests the scene in the enchanted wood in the "Hansel und Gretel" of the same composer. It is sweet, gentle, pathetic, if not deeply moving, and it is rich in its orchestration.

